the shadows of his own approaching fate stole with mourning prophecy across his mind. "Gentlemen," he said, as he closed his recital, "I would rather have written those lines than take Quebec to-morrow."

As they approached the landing-place, the boats edged closer in towards the northern shore, and the woody precipices rose high on their left, like a wall of undistinguished blackness.

"Qui vive?" shouted a French sentinel, from out the impervious gloom.

"La France!" answered a captain of Fraser's Highlanders, from the foremost boat.

"A quel régiment?" demanded the soldier.

"De la Reine!" promptly replied the Highland captain, who chanced to know that the corps so designated formed part of Bougainville's command. As boats were frequently passing down the river with supplies for the garrison, and as a convoy from Bougainville was expected that very night, the sentinel was deceived, and allowed the English to proceed.

A few moments after, they were challenged again, and this time they could discern the soldier running close down to the water's edge, as if all his suspicions were aroused; but the skilful replies of the Highlander once more saved the party from discovery.

They reached the landing-place in safety—an indentation in the shore, about a league above the city, and now bearing the name of Wolfe's Cove. 10 Here a narrow path led up the face of the heights, and a French guard was posted at the top to defend the pass. By the force of the current, the foremost boats, including that which carried Wolfe himself, were borne a little below the spot. The general was one of the first on shore. He looked upward at the rugged heights which towered above him in the gloom. "You 20 can try it," he coolly observed to an officer near him; "but I don't think you'll get up."

At the point where the Highlanders landed, one of their captains, Donald Macdonald, apparently the same whose presence of mind had just saved the enterprise from ruin, was climbing in advance of his men, when he was challenged by a sentinel. He replied in 30 French, by declaring that he had been sent to relieve the guard, and ordering the soldier to withdraw. Before the latter was undeceived, a crowd of Highlanders were close at hand, while the steep slopes below were thronged with eager climbers, dragging themselves up by trees, roots, and bushes. The guard turned out, and made a brief though brave resistance. In a moment, they 40 were cut to pieces, dispersed, or made prisoners; while man after man came swarming up the height, and quickly formed upon the plains above. Meanwhile, the vessels had dropped downward with the current, and anchored opposite the landing-place. The remaining troops were disembarked, and, with the dawn of day, the whole were brought in safety to the shore.

The sun rose, and, from the ramparts of Quebec, the astonished people saw the Plains of Abraham glittering with arms, and the dark-red lines of the English forming in array of battle. Breathless messengers had borne the evil tidings to Montcalm, and far and near his wide-extended camp resounded with the rolling of alarm drums and the din of startled preparation. He, too, had had his struggles and his sorrows. The civil power had thwarted him; famine, discontent, and disaffection were rife among his soldiers; and no small portion of the Canadian militia had dispersed from sheer starvation. In spite of all, he had trusted to hold out till the winter frosts should drive the invaders from before the town; when, on that disastrous morning, the news of their successful temerity fell like a cannon shot upon his ear. Still he assumed a tone of confidence. "They have got to the weak side of us at last," he is reported to have said, "and we must crush them with our numbers." With headlong haste, his troops were pouring over the bridge of the St. Charles, and gathering in heavy masses under the western ramparts of the town. Could numbers give assurance of success, their triumph would have been secure; for five 30 French battalions and the armed colonial peasantry amounted in all to more than seven thousand five hundred men. Full in sight before them stretched the long, thin lines of the British forces—the half-wild Highlanders, the steady soldiery of England, and the hardy levies of the provinces—less than five thousand in number, but all inured to battle, and strong in the full assurance of success. Yet, could the chiefs 40 of that gallant army have pierced the secrets of the future, could they have foreseen that the victory which they burned to achieve would have robbed England of her proudest boast, that the conquest of Canada would pave the way for the independence of America, their swords would have dropped from their hands, and the heroic fire have 50 gone out within their hearts.

It was nine o'clock, and the adverse armies stood motionless, each gazing on the other. The clouds hung low, and, at intervals, warm light showers descended, besprinkling both alike. The coppice and cornfields in front of the British troops were filled with French sharpshooters, who kept up a distant, spattering fire. Here and there a soldier fell in the ranks, and the gap was filled in silence.

At a little before ten, the British could see that Montcalm was preparing to advance, and, in a few moments, all his troops appeared in rapid motion. They came on in three divisions, shouting after the manner of their nation, and firing heavily as soon as they came within range. In the British ranks, not a trigger was pulled, not a soldier stirred; and their ominous composure seemed to damp the spirits of the assailants. It was not till the French were within forty yards that the fatal word was given. At once, from end to end of the British line, the muskets rose to the level, as if with the sway of some great machine, and the whole blazed forth at once in one crashing explosion. Like a ship at full career, arrested with sudden ruin on a sunken rock, the columns of Montcalm staggered, shivered, and broke before that wasting storm of lead. The smoke, rolling along the field, for a moment shut out the view; but when the white wreaths were scattered on the wind, a wretched spectacle was disclosed; men and officers tumbled in heaps, columns resolved into a mob, order and obedience gone; and when the British muskets were levelled for a second volley, the masses were seen to cower and shrink with uncontrollable panic. For a few minutes, the French regulars stood their ground, returning a sharp and not ineffectual fire. But now, echoing cheer on cheer, redoubling volley on volley, trampling the dying and the dead, and driving the fugitives in crowds, the British troops advanced and swept the field before them. The ardour of the men burst all restraint. They broke into a run, and with unsparing slaughter chased the flying multitude to the very gates of Quebec. Foremost of all, the light-footed Highlanders dashed along in furious pursuit, hewing down the Frenchmen with their broadswords, and slaying many in the very ditch of the fortifications. Never was victory more quick or more decisive.

In the short action and pursuit, the French lost fifteen hundred men, killed, wounded, and taken. Of the remainder, some escaped within the city, and others fled across the St. Charles to rejoin their comrades who had been left to guard the camp. The pursuers were recalled by sound of trumpet; the broken ranks were formed afresh, and the English troops withdrawn beyond reach of the cannon of Quebec. Bougainville, with his detachment, arrived from the upper country, and, hovering about their rear, threatened an attack; but when he saw what greeting was prepared for him, he abandoned his purpose and withdrew. Townshend and Murray, the only general officers who remained unhurt, passed to the head of every regiment in turn, and thanked the soldiers for the bravery they had shown; yet the triumph of the victors was mingled with sadness, as the tidings went from rank to rank that Wolfe had fallen.

In the heat of the action, as he advanced at the head of the grenadiers of Louisberg, a bullet shattered his wrist; but he wrapped his handkerchief about the wound, and showed no sign of pain. A moment more, and a ball pierced his side. Still he pressed forward, waving his sword and cheering his soldiers to the attack, when a third shot lodged deep within his breast. He paused, reeled, and, staggering to one side, fell to the earth. Brown, a lieutenant of the grenadiers, Henderson, a volunteer, an officer of artillery, and a private soldier raised him together in their arms, and, bearing him to the rear, laid him softly on the grass. They asked if he would have a surgeon; but he shook his head, and answered that all was over with him. His eyes closed with the torpor of approaching death, and those around sustained his fainting form. Yet they could not withhold their gaze from the wild turmoil before them, and the charging ranks of their companions rushing through fire and smoke. "See how they run," one of the officers exclaimed, as the French fled in confusion before the levelled bayonets. "Who run?" demanded Wolfe, opening his eyes like a man aroused from sleep. "The enemy, sir," was the reply; "they give way everywhere." "Then," said the dying general, "tell Colonel Burton to march Webb's regiment down to Charles River, to cut off their retreat from the bridge. Now, God be praised, I will die in peace," he murmured; and, turning on his side, he calmly breathed his last.¹

Almost at the same moment fell his great adversary, Montcalm, as he strove, with useless bravery, to rally his shattered ranks. Struck down with a mortal wound, he was placed upon a litter and borne to the General Hospital on the banks of the St. Charles. The surgeons told him that he could not recover. "I am glad of it," was his calm reply. He then asked how long he might survive, and was told that he had not many hours remaining. "So much the better," he said; "I am happy that I shall not live to see the surrender of Quebec." Officers from the garrison came to his bedside to ask his orders and instructions. "I will give no more orders," replied the defeated soldier; "I have much business that must be attended to, of greater moment than your ruined garrison and this wretched country. My time is very short; therefore, pray leave me." The officers withdrew, and none remained in the chamber but his confessor and the Bishop of Quebec. To the last, he expressed his contempt for his own mutinous and half-famished troops, and his admiration for the disciplined valour of his opponents. He died before midnight, and was buried at his own desire in a cavity of the earth formed by the bursting of a bombshell.

The victorious army encamped before Quebec, and pushed their preparations for the siege with zealous energy; but before a single gun was brought to bear, the white flag was hung out, and the garrison surrendered. On the eighteenth of September, 1759, the rock-built citadel of Canada passed forever from the hands of its ancient masters.

The victory on the Plains of Abraham and the downfall of Quebec filled all England with pride and exultation. From north to south, the whole land blazed with illuminations, and resounded with the ringing of bells, the firing of guns, and the shouts of the multitude. In one village alone all was dark and silent amid the general joy; for here dwelt the widowed mother of Wolfe. The populace, with unwonted delicacy, respected her lonely sorrow, and forbore to obtrude the sound of their rejoicings upon her grief for one who had been through life her pride and solace, and repaid her love with a tender and constant devotion.

Canada, crippled and dismembered by the disasters of this year's campaign, lay waiting, as it were, the final stroke which was to extinguish her last remains of life, and close the eventful story of French dominion in America. Her limbs and her head were lopped away, but life still fluttered at her heart. Quebec, Niagara, Frontenac, and Crown Point had fallen; but Montreal and the adjacent country still held out, and thither, with the opening season of 1760, the British commanders turned all their energies. Three armies were to enter Canada at three several points, and, conquering as they advanced, converge towards Montreal as a common centre. In accordance with this plan, Sir Jeffrey Amherst embarked at Oswego, crossed Lake Ontario, and descended the St. Lawrence with ten thousand men; while Colonel Haviland advanced by way of Lake Champlain and the River Sorel, and General Murray ascended from Quebec, with a body of the veterans who had fought on the Plains of Abraham.

By a singular concurrence of fortune and skill, the three armies reached the neighbourhood of Montreal on the same day. The feeble and disheartened garrison could offer no resistance, and on the eighth of September, 1760, the Marquis de Vaudreuil surrendered Canada with all its dependencies, to the British crown.

CHAPTER XXVIII

THE ILLINOIS

We turn to a region of which, as yet, we have caught but transient glimpses; a region which to our forefathers seemed remote and strange, as to us the mountain strongholds of the Apaches, or the wastes of farthest Oregon. The country of the Illinois was chiefly embraced within the boundaries of the state which now retains the name. Thitherward, from the east, the west, and the north, three mighty rivers rolled their tributary waters; while countless smaller streams—small only in comparison—traversed the land with a watery network, impregnating the warm soil with exuberant fecundity. From the eastward, the Ohio—La Belle Rivière—pursued its windings for more than a thousand miles. The Mississippi descended from the distant north; while from its fountains in the west, three thousand miles away, the Missouri poured its torrent towards the same common centre. Born among mountains, trackless even now, except by the adventurous footstep of the trapper,—nurtured amid the howling of beasts and the war-cries of savages, never silent in that wilderness,—it holds its angry course through sun-scorched deserts, among towers and palaces, the architecture of no human hand, among lodges of barbarian hordes, and herds of bison blackening the prairie to the horizon. Fierce, reckless, headstrong, exulting in its tumultuous force, it plays a thousand freaks of wanton power; bearing away forests from its shores, and planting them, with roots uppermost, in its quicksands;

sweeping off islands, and rebuilding them; frothing and raging in foam and whirlpool, and, again, gliding with dwindled current along its sandy channel. At length, dark with uncurbed fury, it pours its muddy tide into the reluctant Mississippi. That majestic river, drawing life from the pure fountains of the north, wandering among 10 emerald prairies and wood-crowned bluffs, loses all its earlier charm with this unhallowed union. At first, it shrinks as with repugnance; and along the same channel the two streams flow side by side, with unmingled waters. But the disturbing power prevails at length; and the united torrent bears onward in its might, boiling up from the bottom, whirling in many a vortex, 20 flooding its shores with a malign deluge fraught with pestilence and fever, and burying forests in its depths, to insnare the heedless voyager. Mightiest among rivers, it is the connecting link of adverse climates and contrasted races; and while at its northern source the fur-clad Indian shivers in the cold,—where it mingles with the ocean, the growth of the tropics springs along its banks, and the panting negro cools his limbs in its refreshing waters.

To these great rivers and their tributary streams the country of the Illinois owed its wealth: its grassy prairies, and the stately woods that flourished on its deep, rich soil. This prolific land teemed with life. It was a hunter's paradise. Deer grazed on its meadows. The elk trooped in herds, like squadrons of cavalry. In the still morning, one might hear the clatter of their antlers for half a mile over the dewy prairie. Countless bison roamed the plains, filing in grave procession to drink at the rivers, plunging and snorting among the rapids and quicksands, rolling their huge bulk on the grass, or rushing upon each other in hot encounter, like champions under shield. The wildcat glared from the thicket; the raccoon thrust his furry countenance from the hollow tree, and the opossum swung, head downwards, from the overhanging bough.

With the opening spring, when the forests are budding into leaf, and the prairies gemmed with flowers; when a warm, faint haze rests upon the landscape,—then heart and senses are enthralled with luxurious beauty. The shrubs and wild fruit-trees, flushed with pale red blossoms, and the small clustering flowers of grape vines, which choke the gigantic trees with Laocoön writhings, fill the forest with their rich perfume. A few days later, and a cloud of verdure overshadows the land, while birds innumerable sing beneath its canopy, and brighten its shades with their glancing hues.

Yet this western paradise is not free from the curse of Adam. The beneficent sun, which kindles into life so many forms of loveliness and beauty, fails not to engender venom and death from the rank slime of pestilential swamp and marsh. In some stagnant pool, buried in the jungle-like depths of the forest, where the hot and lifeless water reeks with exhalations, the water-snake basks by the margin, or winds his checkered length of loathsome beauty across the sleepy surface. From beneath the rotten carcass of some fallen tree, the moccasin thrusts out his broad flat head, ready to dart on the intruder. On the dry, sun-scorched prairie, the rattlesnake, a more generous enemy, reposes in his spiral coil. He scorns to shun the eye of day, as if conscious of the honor accorded to his name by the warlike race, who, jointly with him, claim lordship over the land. But some intrusive footstep awakes him from his slumbers. His neck is arched; the white fangs gleam in his distended jaws; his small eyes dart rays of unutterable fierceness; and his rattles, invisible with their quick vibration, ring the sharp warning which no man will rashly condemn.

The land thus prodigal of good and evil, so remote from the sea, so primitive in its aspect, might well be deemed an undiscovered region, ignorant of European arts; yet it may boast a colonization as old as that of many a spot to which are accorded the scanty honors of an American antiquity. The earliest settlement of Pennsylvania was made in 1681; the first occupation of the Illinois took place in the previous year. La Salle may be called the father of the colony. That remarkable man entered the country with a handful of followers, bent on his grand scheme of Mississippi discovery. A legion of enemies rose in his path; but neither delay, disappointment, sickness, famine, open force, nor secret conspiracy, could bend his soul of iron. Disasters accumulated upon him. He flung them off, and still pressed forward to his object. His victorious energy bore all before it; but the success on which he had staked his life served only to entail fresh calamity, and an untimely death; and his best reward is, that his name stands forth in history an imperishable monument of heroic constancy. When on his way to the Mississippi, in the year 1680, La Salle built a fort in the country of the Illinois; and, on his return from the mouth of the great river, some of his followers remained and established themselves near the spot. Heroes of another stamp took up the work which the daring Norman had begun. Jesuit missionaries, among the best and purest of their order, burning with zeal for the salvation of souls, and the gaining of an immortal crown, here toiled and suffered, with a self-sacrificing devotion which extorts a tribute of admiration even from sectarian bigotry. While the colder apostles of Protestantism labored upon the outskirts of heathendom, these champions of the cross, the forlorn hope of the army of Rome, pierced to the heart of its dark and dreary domain, confronting death at every step, and well repaid for all, could they but sprinkle a few drops of water on the forehead of a dying child, or hang a gilded crucifix round the neck of some warrior, pleased with the glittering trinket. With the beginning of the eighteenth century, the black robe of the Jesuit was known in every village of the Illinois. Defying the wiles of Satan and the malice of his emissaries, the Indian sorcerers, exposed to the rage of the elements, and every casualty of forest life, they followed their wandering proselytes to war and to the chase; now wading through morasses, now dragging canoes over rapids and sand-bars; now scorched with heat on the sweltering prairie, and now shivering houseless in the blasts of January. At Kaskaskia and Cahokia they established missions, and built frail churches from the bark of trees, fit emblems of their own transient and futile labors. Morning and evening, the savage worshippers sang praises to the Virgin, and knelt in supplication before the shrine of St. Joseph. . . .

BAYARD TAYLOR (1825-1878)

THE FIGHT OF PASO DEL MAR

Gusty and raw was the morning;
A fog hung over the seas,
And its gray skirts, rolling inland,
Were torn by the mountain trees;
No sound was heard but the dashing 5
Of waves on the sandy bar,
When Pablo of San Diego
Rode down to the Paso del Mar.

The pescador,¹ out in his shallop,
Gathering his harvest so wide, 10
Sees the dim bulk of the headland
Loom over the waste of the tide;
He sees, like a white thread, the pathway
Wind round on the terrible wall, Where the faint, moving speck of the rider 15
Seems hovering close to its fall.

Stout Pablo of San Diego
Rode down from the hills behind;
With the bells on his gray mule tinkling,
He sang through the fog and wind. 20
Under his thick, misted eyebrows
Twinkled his eye like a star,
And fiercer he sang as the sea-winds
Drove cold on the Paso del Mar.

Now Bernal, the herdsman of Chino, 25
Had travelled the shore since dawn,

¹ fisher

Leaving the ranches behind him—
Good reason had he to be gone!
The blood was still red on his dagger,
The fury was hot in his brain, 30
And the chill, driving scud of the breakers
Beat thick on his forehead in vain.

With his poncho wrapped gloomily round him,
He mounted the dizzying road,
And the chasms and steepes of the head-
land 35
Were slippery and wet as he trod;
Wild swept the wind of the ocean,
Rolling the fog from afar,
When near him a mule-bell came tinkling,
Midway on the Paso del Mar. 40

"Back!" shouted Bernal, full fiercely;
And "Back!" shouted Pablo, in wrath,
As his mule halted, startled and shrinking,
On the perilous line of the path.
The roar of devouring surges 45
Came up from the breakers' hoarse
war;
And "Back, or you perish!" cried Bernal,
"I turn not on Paso del Mar!"

The gray mule stood firm as the head-
land;
He clutched at the jingling rein, 50
When Pablo rose up in his saddle
And smote till he dropped it again.
A wild oath of passion swore Bernal,
And brandished his dagger, still red,
While fiercely stout Pablo leaned forward, 55
And fought o'er his trusty mule's
head.

They fought till the black wall below
them
Shone red through the misty blast;
Stout Pablo then struck, leaning farther,
The broad breast of Bernal at last; 60
And, frenzied with pain, the swart herdsman
Closed on him with terrible strength,

And jerked him, despite of his struggles,
Down from the saddle at length.

They grappled with desperate madness,
On the slippery edge of the wall; 66
They swayed on the brink, and together
Reeled out to the rush of the fall.
A cry of the wildest death-anguish
Rang faint through the mist afar, 70
And the riderless mule went homeward
From the fight of the Paso del Mar.

BEDOUIN SONG

From the Desert I come to thee
On a stallion shod with fire,
And the winds are left behind
In the speed of my desire.
Under thy window I stand, 5
And the midnight hears my cry:
I love thee! I love but thee!
With a love that shall not die
Till the sun grows cold,
And the stars are old, 10
And the leaves of the Judgment Book unfold!

Look from thy window, and see
My passion and my pain!
I lie on the sands below,
And I faint in thy disdain. 15
Let the night-winds touch thy brow
With the heat of my burning sigh,
And melt thee to hear the vow
Of a love that shall not die
Till the sun grows cold, 20
And the stars are old,
And the leaves of the Judgment Book
unfold!

My steps are nightly driven,
By the fever in my breast,
To hear from thy lattice breathed 25
The word that shall give me rest.
Open the door of thy heart,
And open thy chamber door,
And my kisses shall teach thy lips
The love that shall fade no more 30
Till the sun grows cold,
And the stars are old,
And the leaves of the Judgment Book
unfold!

TO THE NILE

Mysterious Flood, that through the silent sands

Hast wandered, century on century, Watering the length of green Egyptian lands,
Which were not, but for thee—

Art thou the keeper of that eldest lore, 5 Written ere yet thy hieroglyphs began,

When dawned upon thy fresh, un-trampled shore
The earliest life of Man?

Thou guardest temple and vast pyramid,

Where the gray Past records its ancient speech; 10
But in thine unrevealing breast lies hid
What they refuse to teach.

All other streams with human joys and fears

Run blended, o'er the plains of History:

Thou tak'st no note of Man; a thousand years 15

Are as a day to thee.

What were to thee the Osirian festivals?

Or Memnon's music on the Theban
plain?

The carnage, when Cambyses made thy halls

Ruddy with royal slain? 20

Even then thou wast a God, and shrines were built

For worship of thine own majestic flood;

For thee the incense burned, for thee was spilt

The sacrificial blood.

And past the bannered pylons that arose 25

Above thy palms, the pageantry and
state,

Thy current flowed, calmly as now it flows,

Unchangeable as Fate.

Thou givest blessing as a God might give,
Whose being is his bounty; from the slime 30
Shaken from off thy skirts the nations live,
Through all the years of Time.

In thy solemnity, thine awful calm,
Thy grand indifference of Destiny,
My soul forgets its pain, and drinks the balm 35
Which thou dost proffer me.

Thy godship is unquestioned still: I bring
No doubtful worship to thy shrine supreme;
But thus my homage as a chaplet fling,
To float upon thy stream! 40

THE QUAKER WIDOW

Thee finds me in the garden, Hannah—
come in! 'Tis kind of thee
To wait until the Friends were gone,
who came to comfort me;
The still and quiet company a peace
may give, indeed,
But blessed is the single heart that comes to us at need.

Come, sit thee down! Here is the bench where Benjamin would sit 5 On First-day afternoons in spring, and watch the swallows flit;
He loved to smell the sprouting box,
and hear the pleasant bees Go humming round the lilacs and through the apple-trees.

I think he loved the spring: not that he cared for flowers—most men Think such things foolishness—but we were first acquainted then, 10
One spring; the next he spoke his mind;
the third I was his wife;
And in the spring (it happened so) our children entered life.

He was but seventy-five: I did not think to lay him yet
In Kennett graveyard, where at Monthly Meeting first we met.

The Father's mercy shows in this: 'tis better I should be 15 Picked out to bear the heavy cross—alone in age—than he.

We've lived together fifty years: it seems but one long day—
One quiet Sabbath of the heart—till he was called away;
And as we bring from Meeting-time a sweet contentment home,
So, Hannah, I have store of peace for all the days to come. 20

I mind (for I can tell thee now) how hard it was to know
If I had heard the spirit right, that told me I should go;
For father had a deep concern upon his mind that day,
But mother spoke for Benjamin—she knew what best to say.

Then she was still. They sat awhile;
at last she spoke again: 25
"The Lord incline thee to the right!"
And "Thou shalt have him, Jane!"
My father said. I cried. Indeed, 'twas not the least of shocks,
For Benjamin was Hicksite, and father Orthodox.

I thought of this ten years ago, when daughter Ruth we lost:
Her husband's of the world, and yet I could not see her crossed. 30
She wears, thee knows, the gayest gowns, she hears a hireling priest—Ah, dear! the cross was ours: her life's a happy one, at least.

Perhaps she'll wear a plainer dress
when she's as old as I—Would thee believe it, Hannah? once I felt temptation nigh!
My wedding-gown was ashen silk, too simple for my taste: 35
I wanted lace around the neck, and a ribbon at the waist.

How strange it seemed to sit with him upon the women's side!
I did not dare to lift my eyes: I felt more fear than pride,

Till "In the presence of the Lord," he said, and then there came A holy strength upon my heart and I could say the same. 40

I used to blush when he came near, but then I showed no sign;
With all the meeting looking on, I held his hand in mine.
It seemed my bashfulness was gone,
now I was his for life:
Thee knows the feeling, Hannah—thee,
too, hast been a wife.

As home we rode, I saw no fields look half so green as ours; 45
The woods were coming into leaf, the meadows full of flowers;
The neighbors met us in the lane, and every face was kind—
'Tis strange how lively everything comes back upon my mind.

I see, as plain as thee sits there, the wedding-dinner spread:
At our own table we were guests, with father at the head; 50
And Dinah Passmore helped us both—
'twas she stood up with me,
And Abner Jones with Benjamin,—and now they're gone, all three!

It is not right to wish for death; the Lord disposes best.
His Spirit comes to quiet hearts, and fits them for His rest;
And that He halved our little flock was merciful, I see: 55
For Benjamin has two in heaven, and two are left with me.

Eusebius never cared to farm—'twas not his call, in truth:
And I must rent the dear old place, and go to daughter Ruth.
Thee'll say her ways are not like mine
—young people now-a-days
Have fallen sadly off, I think, from all the good old ways. 60

But Ruth is still a Friend¹ at heart:
she keeps the simple tongue,
The cheerful, kindly nature we loved when she was young;

¹ Quaker

And it was brought upon my mind, remembering her, of late,
That we on dress and outward things
perhaps lay too much weight.

I once heard Jesse Kersey say a spirit clothed with grace, 65
And pure almost as angels are, may have a homely face.
And dress may be of less account; the Lord will look within:
The soul it is that testifies of righteousness or sin.

Thee mustn't be too hard on Ruth:
she's anxious I should go,
And she will do her duty as a daughter should, I know. 70
'Tis hard to change so late in life, but we must be resigned:
The Lord looks down contentedly upon a willing mind.

HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW (1807-1882)

HYMN TO THE NIGHT

'Ἀσπασίη, τριλλίστος¹

I heard the trailing garments of the
Night
Sweep through her marble halls!
I saw her sable skirts all fringed with
light
From the celestial walls!

I felt her presence, by its spell of might,
Stoop o'er me from above; 6
The calm, majestic presence of the Night,
As of the one I love.

I heard the sounds of sorrow and de-
light,
The manifold, soft chimes, 10
That fill the haunted chambers of the Night,
Like some old poet's rhymes.

From the cool cisterns of the midnight
air
My spirit drank repose;

The fountain of perpetual peace flows
there,— 15
From those deep cisterns flows.

O holy Night! from thee I learn to bear
What man has borne before!
Thou layest thy finger on the lips of Care,
And they complain no more. 20

Peace! Peace! Orestes-like I breathe this prayer!
Descend with broad-winged flight,
The welcome, the thrice-prayed for, the most fair,
The best-beloved Night!

A PSALM OF LIFE

WHAT THE HEART OF THE YOUNG MAN
SAID TO THE PSALMIST

Tell me not, in mournful numbers,
Life is but an empty dream!—
For the soul is dead that slumbers,
And things are not what they seem.

Life is real! Life is earnest! 5
And the grave is not its goal;
Dust thou art, to dust returnest,
Was not spoken of the soul.

Not enjoyment, and not sorrow, 10
Is our destined end or way;
But to act, that each tomorrow
Find us farther than today.

Art is long, and Time is fleeting,
And our hearts, though stout and brave,
Still, like muffled drums, are beating 15
Funeral marches to the grave.

In the world's broad field of battle,
In the bivouac of Life,
Be not like dumb, driven cattle!
Be a hero in the strife! 20

Trust no Future, how'er pleasant!
Let the dead Past bury its dead!
Act,—act in the living Present!
Heart within, and God o'erhead!

Lives of great men all remind us 25
We can make our lives sublime,

And, departing, leave behind us,
Footprints on the sands of time;

Footprints, that perhaps another, 30
Sailing o'er life's solemn main,
A forlorn and shipwrecked brother,
Seeing, shall take heart again.

Let us, then, be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate;
Still achieving, still pursuing, 35
Learn to labor and to wait.

THE WRECK OF THE HESPERUS

It was the schooner Hesperus,
That sailed the wintry sea;
And the skipper had taken his little daughtèr,
To bear him company.

Blue were her eyes as the fairy-flax, 5
Her cheeks like the dawn of day,
And her bosom white as the hawthorn buds,
That ope in the month of May.

The skipper he stood beside the helm,
His pipe was in his mouth, 10
And he watched how the veering flaw did blow
The smoke now West, now South.

Then up and spake an old Sailòr,
Had sailed to the Spanish Main,
"I pray thee, put into yonder port, 15
For I fear a hurricane.

"Last night the moon had a golden ring,
And tonight no moon we see!"
The skipper, he blew a whiff from his pipe,
And a scornful laugh laughed he. 20

Colder and louder blew the wind,
A gale from the Northeast,
The snow fell hissing in the brine,
And the billows frothed like yeast.

Down came the storm, and smote amain
The vessel in its strength; 26
She shuddered and paused, like a frighted steed,
Then leaped her cable's length.

"Come hither! come hither! my little
daughtèr,
And do not tremble so; 30
For I can weather the roughest gale
That ever wind did blow."

He wrapped her warm in his seaman's coat
Against the stinging blast;
He cut a rope from a broken spar, 35
And bound her to the mast.

"O father! I hear the church-bells
ring,
Oh say, what may it be?"
" 'Tis a fog-bell on a rock-bound coast!"—
And he steered for the open sea. 40

"O father! I hear the sound of guns, Oh say, what may it be?"
"Some ship in distress, that cannot live
In such an angry sea!"

"O father! I see a gleaming light, 45
Oh say, what may it be?"
But the father answered never a word,
A frozen corpse was he.

Lashed to the helm, all stiff and stark,
With his face turned to the skies, 50
The lantern gleamed through the gleaming snow,
On his fixed and glassy eyes.

Then the maiden clasped her hands and prayed
That savèd she might be;
And she thought of Christ, who stilled the wave, 55
On the Lake of Galilee.

And fast through the midnight dark and drear,
Through the whistling sleet and snow,
Like a sheeted ghost, the vessel swept Tow'rds the reef of Norman's Woe.

And ever the fitful gusts between 61
A sound came from the land;
It was the sound of the trampling surf
On the rocks and the hard sea-sand.

The breakers were right beneath her bows, 65
She drifted a dreary wreck,
And a whooping billow swept the crew
Like icicles from her deck.

She struck where the white and fleecy
waves
Looked soft as carded wool, 70
But the cruel rocks, they gored her side
Like the horns of an angry bull.

Her rattling shrouds, all sheathed in ice,
With the masts went by the board;
Like a vessel of glass, she stove and sank, 75
Ho! ho! the breakers roared!

At daybreak, on the bleak sea-beach,
A fisherman stood aghast,
To see the form of a maiden fair,
Lashed close to a drifting mast. 80

The salt sea was frozen on her breast,
The salt tears in her eyes;
And he saw her hair, like the brown sea-weed,
On the billows fall and rise.

Such was the wreck of the Hesperus, 85
In the midnight and the snow!
Christ save us all from a death like this,
On the reef of Norman's Woe!

THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH

Under a spreading chestnut-tree
The village smithy stands;
The smith, a mighty man is he,
With large and sinewy hands;
And the muscles of his brawny arms 5
Are strong as iron bands.

His hair is crisp, and black, and long,
His face is like the tan;
His brow is wet with honest sweat,
He earns whate'er he can, 10
And looks the whole world in the face,
For he owes not any man.

Week in, week out, from morn till night,
You can hear his bellows blow;

You can hear him swing his heavy sledge, 15
With measured beat and slow,
Like a sexton ringing the village bell,
When the evening sun is low.

And children coming home from school
Look in at the open door; 20
They love to see the flaming forge,
And hear the bellows roar,
And catch the burning sparks that fly
Like chaff from a threshing-floor.

He goes on Sunday to the church, 25
And sits among his boys;
He hears the parson pray and preach,
He hears his daughter's voice,
Singing in the village choir,
And it makes his heart rejoice. 30

It sounds to him like her mother's voice,
Singing in Paradise!
He needs must think of her once more,
How in the grave she lies;
And with his hard, rough hand he wipes
A tear out of his eyes. 36

Toiling,—rejoicing,—sorrowing,
Onward through life he goes;
Each morning sees some task begin,
Each evening sees it close; 40
Something attempted, something done,
Has earned a night's repose.

Thanks, thanks to thee, my worthy friend,
For the lesson thou hast taught!
Thus at the flaming forge of life 45
Our fortunes must be wrought;
Thus on its sounding anvil shaped
Each burning deed and thought.

THE SKELETON IN ARMOR

"Speak! speak! thou fearful guest!
Who, with thy hollow breast
Still in rude armor drest,
Comest to daunt me!
Wrapt not in Eastern balms, 5
But with thy fleshless palms Stretched, as if asking alms,
Why dost thou haunt me?"

Then from those cavernous eyes
Pale flashes seemed to rise, 10
As when the Northern skies Gleam in December;
And, like the water's flow
Under December's snow, Came a dull voice of woe 15
From the heart's chamber.

"I was a Viking old!
My deeds, though manifold,
No Skald¹ in song has told,
No Saga taught thee! 20
Take heed, that in thy verse
Thou dost the tale rehearse,
Else dread a dead man's curse;
For this I sought thee.

"Far in the Northern Land, 25
By the wild Baltic's strand,
I, with my childish hand,
Tamed the gerfalcon;²
And, with my skates fast-bound,
Skimmed the half-frozen Sound, 30
That the poor whimpering hound Trembled to walk on.

"Oft to his frozen lair
Tracked I the grisly bear,
While from my path the hare 35
Fled like a shadow;
Oft through the forest dark
Followed the were-wolf's bark
Until the soaring lark 40 Sang from the meadow.

"But when I older grew,
Joining a corsair's crew,
O'er the dark sea I flew
With the marauders. 45
Wild was the life we led;
Many the souls that sped,
Many the hearts that bled,
By our stern orders.

"Many a wassail-bout³
Wore the long winter out; 50
Often our midnight shout Set the cocks crowing,
As we the Berserk's⁴ tale
Measured in cups of ale,
Draining the oaken pail 55
Filled to o'erflowing.

¹Scandinavian poet ²a species of falcon
³drinking-bout ⁴savage Teutonic warrior

"Once as I told in glee Tales of the stormy sea,
Soft eyes did gaze on me,
 Burning yet tender; 60
And as the white stars shine
On the dark Norway pine,
On that dark heart of mine
 Fell their soft splendor.

"I wooed the blue-eyed maid, 65
Yielding, yet half afraid,
And in the forest's shade
 Our vows were plighte.
Under its loosened vest
Fluttered her little breast, 70
Like birds within their nest
 By the hawk frightened.

"Bright in her father's hall
Shields gleamed upon the wall,
Loud sang the minstrels all, 75
 Chanting his glory;
When of old Hildebrand
I asked his daughter's hand,
Mute did the minstrels stand
 To hear my story. 80

"While the brown ale he quaffed,
Loud then the champion laughed,
And as the wind-gusts waft
 The sea-foam brightly, 85
So the loud laugh of scorn
Out of those lips unshorn,
From the deep drinking-horn Blew the foam lightly.

"She was a Prince's child,
I but a Viking wild, 90
And though she blushed and smiled,
 I was discarded!
Should not the dove so white
Follow the sea-mew's flight?
Why did they leave that night 95
 Her nest unguarded?

"Scarce had I put to sea,
Bearing the maid with me,
Fairest of all was she Among the Norsemen! 100
When on the white sea-strand,
Waving his armèd hand,
Saw we old Hildebrand,
 With twenty horsemen.

"Then launched they to the blast, 105
Bent like a reed each mast,
Yet we were gaining fast,
 When the wind failed us;
And with a sudden flaw
Came round the gusty Skaw,¹ 110
So that our foe we saw Laugh as he hailed us.

"And as to catch the gale Round veered the flapping sail,
'Death!' was the helmsman's hail, 115
 'Death without quarter!
Midships with iron keel
Struck we her ribs of steel;
Down her black hulk did reel
 Through the black water! 120

"As with his wings aslant,
Sails the fierce cormorant,
Seeking some rocky haunt,
 With his prey laden,— 125
So toward the open main,
Beating to sea again,
Through the wild hurricane,
 Bore I the maiden.

"Three weeks we westward bore,
And when the storm was o'er, 130
Cloud-like we saw the shore Stretching to leeward;
There for my lady's bower
Built I the lofty tower,
Which, to this very hour, 135
 Stands looking seaward.

"There lived we many years;
Time dried the maiden's tears;
She had forgot her fears,
 She was a mother; 140
Death closed her mild blue eyes;
Under that tower she lies;
Ne'er shall the sun arise
 On such another!

"Still grew my bosom then, 145
Still as a stagnant fen!
Hateful to me were men,
 The sunlight hateful!
In the vast forest here,
Clad in my warlike gear, 150
Fell I upon my spear,
 Oh, death was grateful!

"Thus, seamed with many scars,
 Bursting these prison bars
 Up to its native stars 155
 My soul ascended!
 There from the flowing bowl
 Deep drinks the warrior's soul,
Skoal! to the Northland! skoal!"¹
 Thus the tale ended. 160

EXCELSIOR

The shades of night were falling fast,
 As through an Alpine village passed
 A youth, who bore, 'mid snow and ice,
 A banner with the strange device,
 Excelsior! 5

His brow was sad; his eye beneath,
 Flashed like a falchion from its sheath,
 And like a silver clarion rung
 The accents of that unknown tongue,
 Excelsior! 10

In happy homes he saw the light Of household fires gleam warm and bright;
 Above, the spectral glaciers shone,
 And from his lips escaped a groan,
 Excelsior! 15

"Try not the Pass!" the old man said;
 "Dark lowers the tempest overhead,
 The roaring torrent is deep and wide!"
 And loud that clarion voice replied,
 Excelsior! 20

"O stay," the maiden said, "and rest
 Thy weary head upon this breast!"
 A tear stood in his bright blue eye,
 But still he answered, with a sigh,
 Excelsior! 25

"Beware the pine tree's withered branch!
 Beware the awful avalanche!"
 This was the peasant's last Good-night,
 A voice replied far up the height,
 Excelsior! 30

At break of day, as heavenward
 The pious monks of Saint Bernard Uttered the oft-repeated prayer,
 A voice cried through the startled air,
 Excelsior! 35

¹a salutation in drinking a health

A traveler, by the faithful hound,
 Half-buried in the snow was found,
 Still grasping in his hand of ice
 That banner with the strange device,
 Excelsior! 40

There in the twilight cold and gray,
 Lifeless, but beautiful, he lay,
 And from the sky, serene and far,
 A voice fell, like a falling star,
 Excelsior! 45

SERENADE

Stars of the summer night!
 Far in yon azure deeps,
 Hide, hide your golden light!
 She sleeps!
 My lady sleeps! 5
 Sleeps!

Moon of the summer night!
 Far down yon western steeps,
 Sink, sink in silver light!
 She sleeps! 10
 My lady sleeps!
 Sleeps!

Wind of the summer night!
 Where yonder woodbine creeps,
 Fold, fold thy pinions light!
 She sleeps! 15
 My lady sleeps!
 Sleeps!

Dreams of the summer night!
 Tell her, her lover keeps 20
 Watch! while in slumbers light
 She sleeps!
 My lady sleeps!
 Sleeps!

THE BELFRY OF BRUGES

CARILLON

In the ancient town of Bruges,
 In the quaint old Flemish city,
 As the evening shades descended,
 Low and loud and sweetly blended, 5
 Low at times and loud at times,
 And changing like a poet's rhymes,
 Rang the beautiful wild chimes
 From the Belfry in the market
 Of the ancient town of Bruges.

Then, with deep sonorous clangor 10
 Calmly answering their sweet anger,
 When the wrangling bells had ended,
 Slowly struck the clock eleven,
 And, from out the silent heaven,
 Silence on the town descended. 15
 Silence, silence everywhere,
 On the earth and in the air,
 Save that footsteps here and there
 Of some burgher home returning,
 By the street lamps faintly burning, 20
 For a moment woke the echoes
 Of the ancient town of Bruges.

But amid my broken slumbers
 Still I heard those magic numbers,
 As they loud proclaimed the flight 25
 And stolen marches of the night;
 Till their chimes in sweet collision
 Mingled with each wandering vision,
 Mingled with the fortune-telling Gypsy-bands of dreams and fancies, 30
 Which amid the waste expanses
 Of the silent land of trances
 Have their solitary dwelling;
 All else seemed asleep in Bruges,
 In the quaint old Flemish city. 35

And I thought how like these chimes
 Are the poet's airy rhymes,
 All his rhymes and roundelays,
 His conceits, and songs, and ditties,
 From the belfry of his brain, 40
 Scattered downward, though in vain,
 On the roofs and stones of cities!
 For by night the drowsy ear
 Under its curtains cannot hear,
 And by day men go their ways, 45
 Hearing the music as they pass,
 But deeming it no more, alas!
 Than the hollow sound of brass.

Yet perchance a sleepless wight,
 Lodging at some humble inn 50
 In the narrow lanes of life,
 When the dusk and hush of night
 Shut out the incessant din
 Of daylight and its toil and strife,
 May listen with a calm delight 55
 To the poet's melodies,
 Till he hears, or dreams he hears,
 Intermingled with the song,
 Thoughts that he has cherished long;
 Hears amid the chime and singing 60

The bells of his own village ringing,
 And wakes, and finds his slumberous
 eyes
 Wet with most delicious tears.
 Thus dreamed I, as by night I lay
 In Bruges, at the Fleur-de-Blé, 65
 Listening with a wild delight
 To the chimes that, through the night,
 Rang their changes from the Belfry
 Of that quaint old Flemish city.

THE ARSENAL AT SPRINGFIELD

This is the Arsenal. From floor to ceiling,
 Like a huge organ, rise the burnished
 arms;
 But from their silent pipes no anthem
 pealing
 Startles the villages with strange alarms.

Ah! what a sound will rise, how wild and dreary, 5
 When the death-angel touches those swift keys!
 What loud lament and dismal Miserere
 Will mingle with their awful symphonies!

I hear even now the infinite fierce
 chorus,
 The cries of agony, the endless groan,
 Which, through the ages that have gone before us, 11
 In long reverberations reach our own.

On helm and harness rings the Saxon hammer,
 Through Cimbric forest roars the Norseman's song,
 And loud, amid the universal clamor, 15
 O'er distant deserts sounds the Tartar gong.

I hear the Florentine, who from his palace Wheels out his battle-bell with dreadful din,
 And Aztec priests upon their teocallis¹ Beat the wild war-drum made of ser-pent's skin; 20

The tumult of each sacked and burning village;
 The shout that every prayer for mercy drowns;
 The soldiers' revels in the midst of pillage;
 The wail of famine in beleaguered towns;
 The bursting shell, the gateway
 wrenched asunder, ²⁵
 The rattling musketry, the clashing blade;
 And ever and anon, in tones of thunder,
 The diapason of the cannonade.
 Is it, O man, with such discordant noises,
 With such accursed instruments as these, ³⁰
 Thou drownest Nature's sweet and kindly voices,
 And jarrest the celestial harmonies?
 Were half the power that fills the world with terror,
 Were half the wealth bestowed on camps and courts,
 Given to redeem the human mind from error, ³⁵
 There were no need of arsenals nor forts:
 The warrior's name would be a name abhorred!
 And every nation, that should lift
 again
 Its hand against a brother, on its forehead
 Would wear forevermore the curse of Cain! ⁴⁰
 Down the dark future, through long generations,
 The echoing sounds grow fainter and then cease;
 And like a bell, with solemn, sweet vibrations,
 I hear once more the voice of Christ say, "Peace!"
 Peace! and no longer from its brazen portals ⁴⁵
 The blast of War's great organ shakes the skies!

But beautiful as songs of the immor-
 tals,
 The holy melodies of love arise.

THE DAY IS DONE

The day is done, and the darkness
 Falls from the wings of Night,
 As a feather is wafted downward
 From an eagle in his flight.

I see the lights of the village ⁵
 Gleam through the rain and the mist,
 And a feeling of sadness comes o'er me
 That my soul cannot resist:

A feeling of sadness and longing, ¹⁰
 That is not akin to pain,
 And resembles sorrow only
 As the mist resembles the rain.

Come, read to me some poem,
 Some simple and heartfelt lay,
 That shall soothe this restless feeling, ¹⁵
 And banish the thoughts of day.

Not from the grand old masters,
 Not from the bards sublime,
 Whose distant footsteps echo
 Through the corridors of Time. ²⁰

For, like strains of martial music,
 Their mighty thoughts suggest Life's endless toil and endeavor;
 And to-night I long for rest.

Read from some humbler poet, ²⁵
 Whose song gushed from his heart,
 As showers from the clouds of summer,
 Or tears from the eyelids start;

Who, through long days of labor,
 And nights devoid of ease, ³⁰
 Still heard in his soul the music
 Of wonderful melodies.

Such songs have power to quiet
 The restless pulse of care,
 And come like the benediction ³⁵
 That follows after prayer.

Then read from the treasured volume
 The poem of thy choice,
 And lend to the rhyme of the poet
 The beauty of thy voice. ⁴⁰

And the night shall be filled with music,
 And the cares, that infest the day,
 Shall fold their tents, like the Arabs,
 And as silently steal away.

THE BRIDGE

I stood on the bridge at midnight,
 As the clocks were striking the hour,
 And the moon rose o'er the city,
 Behind the dark church-tower.

I saw her bright reflection 5
 In the waters under me,
 Like a golden goblet falling
 And sinking into the sea.

And far in the hazy distance 10
 Of that lovely night in June,
 The blaze of the flaming furnace
 Gleamed redder than the moon.

Among the long, black rafters
 The wavering shadows lay,
 And the current that came from the 15 ocean
 Seemed to lift and bear them away;

As, sweeping and eddying through 20
 them,
 Rose the belated tide,
 And, streaming into the moonlight,
 The seaweed floated wide.

And like those waters rushing
 Among the wooden piers,
 A flood of thoughts came o'er me
 That filled my eyes with tears.

How often, oh how often, 25
 In the days that had gone by,
 I had stood on that bridge at midnight
 And gazed on that wave and sky!

How often, oh how often, 30
 I had wished that the ebbing tide
 Would bear me away on its bosom
 O'er the ocean wild and wide!

For my heart was hot and restless,
 And my life was full of care,
 And the burden laid upon me 35
 Seemed greater than I could bear.

But now it has fallen from me,
 It is buried in the sea;
 And only the sorrow of others 40
 Throws its shadow over me.

Yet whenever I cross the river
 On its bridge with wooden piers,
 Like the odor of brine from the ocean
 Comes the thought of other years.

And I think how many thousands 45
 Of care-encumbered men,
 Each bearing his burden of sorrow,
 Have crossed the bridge since then.

I see the long procession 50
 Still passing to and fro,
 The young heart hot and restless,
 And the old subdued and slow!

And forever and forever,
 As long as the river flows,
 As long as the heart has passions, 55
 As long as life has woes;

The moon and its broken reflection
 And its shadows shall appear,
 As the symbol of love in heaven, 60
 And its wavering image here.

EVANGELINE

A TALE OF ACADIE

This is the forest primeval. The murmuring pines and the hemlocks, Bearded with moss, and in garments
 green, indistinct in the twilight Stand like Druids of eld, with voices sad and prophetic, Stand like harpers hoar, with beards
 that rest on their bosoms.
 Loud from its rocky caverns, the deep-voiced neighbouring ocean 5
 Speaks, and in accents disconsolate answers the wail of the forest.
 This is the forest primeval; but where are the hearts that beneath it Leaped like the roe when he hears in the woodland the voice of the hunts-
 man?
 Where is the thatch-roofed village, the home of Acadian farmers,

Men whose lives glided on like rivers that water the woodlands, 10 Darkened by shadows of earth but reflecting an image of heaven?
 Waste are those pleasant farms, and the farmers forever departed!
 Scattered like dust and leaves when the mighty blasts of October Seize them, and whirl them aloft, and sprinkle them far o'er the ocean, Naught but tradition remains of the beautiful village of Grand-Pré. 15 Ye who believe in affection that hopes and endures and is patient, Ye who believe in the beauty and strength of woman's devotion, List to the mournful tradition still sung
 by the pines of the forest;
 List to a Tale of Love in Acadie, home of the happy.

PART THE FIRST

I

In the Acadian land, on the shores of the Basin of Minas, Distant, secluded, still, the little village
 of Grand-Pré Lay in the fruitful valley. Vast meadows stretched to the eastward, Giving the village its name, and pasture
 to flocks without number.
 Dikes, that the hands of the farmers had raised with labor incessant, 5 Shut out the turbulent tides; but at stated seasons the flood-gates Opened, and welcomed the sea to wander
 at will o'er the meadows.
 West and south there were fields of flax,
 and orchards and cornfields Spreading afar and unfenced o'er the plain; and away to the northward Blomidon¹ rose and the forests old,
 and aloft on the mountains 10
 Sea-fogs pitched their tents, and mists from the mighty Atlantic Looked on the happy valley but ne'er from their station descended.
 There, in the midst of its farms, reposed
 the Acadian village.
 Strongly built were the houses, with frames of oak and of chestnut,

¹a rocky headland

Such as the peasants of Normandy built in the reign of the Henries. 15 Thatched were the roofs, with dormer-windows; and gables projecting Over the basement below protected and shaded the door-way.
 There in the tranquil evenings of summer,
 when brightly the sunset Lighted the village street and gilded the vanes on the chimneys, Matrons and maidens sat, in snow-white caps and in kirtles 20
 Scarlet and blue and green, with distaffs spinning the golden Flax for the gossiping looms, whose noisy shuttles within doors Mingled their sound with the whirl of the wheels and the songs of the maidens.
 Solemnly down the street came the parish priest, and the children Paused in their play to kiss the hand he extended to bless them: 25 Reverend walked he among them; and up rose matrons and maidens, Hailing his slow approach with words of affectionate welcome.
 Then came the laborers home from the field; and serenely the sun
 sank
 Down to his rest, and twilight prevailed. Anon from the belfry Softly the Angelus sounded, and over the roofs of the village 30 Columns of pale blue smoke, like clouds of incense ascending, Rose from a hundred hearths, the homes of peace and contentment.
 Thus dwelt together in love these simple Acadian farmers,
 Dwelt in the love of God and of man.
 Alike were they free from Fear, that reigns with the tyrant, and envy, the vice of republics: 35 Neither locks had they to their doors
 nor bars to their windows,
 But their dwellings were open as day
 and the hearts of the owners;
 There the richest was poor, and the poorest lived in abundance.
 Somewhat apart from the village,
 and nearer the Basin of Minas, Benedict Bellefontaine, the wealthiest farmer of Grand-Pré, 40

Dwelt on his goodly acres; and with him, directing his household, Gentle Evangeline lived, his child, and the pride of the village.

Stalworth and stately in form was the man of seventy winters;

Hearty and hale was he, an oak that is covered with snow-flakes;

White as the snow were his locks, and his cheeks as brown as the oak-leaves. 45

Fair was she to behold, that maiden of seventeen summers.

Black were her eyes as the berry that grows on the thorn by the wayside—

Black, yet how softly they gleamed beneath the brown shade of her tresses!

Sweet was her breath as the breath of kine that feed in the meadows.

When in the harvest heat she bore to the reapers at noontide 50

Flagons of home-brewed ale, ah, fair in sooth was the maiden.

Fairer was she when, on Sunday morn,
while the bell from its turret

Sprinkled with holy sounds the air, as the priest with his hyssop

Sprinkles the congregation and scatters blessings upon them,

Down the long street she passed with her chaplet of beads and her missal,

Wearing her Norman cap, and her kirtle of blue, and the ear-rings 56

Brought in the olden time from France,
and since, as an heirloom,

Handed down from mother to child,
through long generations.

But a celestial brightness, a more ethereal beauty,

Shone on her face and encircled her form, when after confession, 40

Homeward serenely she walked with God's benediction upon her:

When she had passed, it seemed like the ceasing of exquisite music.

Firmly builded with rafters of oak,
the house of the farmer

Stood on the side of a hill commanding
the sea; and a shady

Sycamore grew by the door, with a woodbine wreathing around it. 65

Rudely carved was the porch, with seats beneath; and a footpath Led through an orchard wide, and disappeared in the meadow.

Under the sycamore-tree were hives
overhung by a penthouse,

Such as the traveller sees in regions remote by the road-side,

Built o'er a box for the poor, or the blessed image of Mary. 70

Farther down, on the slope of the hill, was the well with its moss-grown

Bucket, fastened with iron, and near it a trough for the horses.

Shielding the house from storms, on the north, were the barns and the farm-yard.

There stood the broad-wheeled wains¹ and the antique ploughs and the harrows;

There were the folds for the sheep; and there, in his feathered seraglio, 75

Strutted the lordly turkey, and crowed
the cock with the self-same

Voice that in ages of old had startled
the penitent Peter.

Bursting with hay were the barns, themselves a village: in each one

Far o'er the gable projected a roof of thatch; and a staircase,

Under the sheltering eaves, led up to the odorous corn-loft. 80

There too the dove-cot stood, with its meek and innocent inmates

Murmuring ever of love, while above in the variant breezes

Numberless noisy weathercocks rattled and sang of mutation.

Thus, at peace with God and the world, the farmer of Grand-Pré

Lived on his sunny farm, and Evangeline governed his household. 85

Many a youth, as he knelt in the church and opened his missal,

Fixed his eyes upon her, as the saint of his deepest devotion;

Happy was he who might touch her hand or the hem of her garment!

Many a suitor came to her door, by the darkness befriended,

And as he knocked and waited to hear the sound of her footsteps, 90

¹ wagons

Knew not which beat the louder, his heart or the knocker of iron;
 Or at the joyous feast of the Patron
 Saint of the village, Bolder grew, and pressed her hand in the dance as he whispered Hurried words of love, that seemed a part of the music.
 But among all who came young Gabriel only was welcome, 95
 Gabriel Lajeunesse, the son of Basil the blacksmith,
 Who was a mighty man in the village,
 and honored of all men—
 For since the birth of time, throughout all ages and nations,
 Has the craft of the smith been held in repute by the people.
 Basil was Benedict's friend. Their children from earliest childhood 100 Grew up together as brother and sister;
 and Father Felician, Priest and pedagogue both in the village, had taught them their letters
 Out of the selfsame book, with the hymns of the church and the plain-
 song.
 But when the hymn was sung, and the daily lesson completed, Swiftly they hurried away to the forge
 of Basil the blacksmith. 105
 There at the door they stood, with wondering eyes to behold him Take in his leathern lap the hoof of the horse as a plaything, Nailing the shoe in its place; while near him the tire of the cartwheel Lay like a fiery snake, coiled round in a circle of cinders.
 Oft on autumnal eves, when without in the gathering darkness 110
 Bursting with light seemed the smithy through every cranny and crevice, Warm by the forge within they watched the laboring bellows;
 And as its panting ceased, and the sparks expired in the ashes, Merrily laughed, and said they were nuns going into the chapel.
 Oft on sledges in winter, as swift as the swoop of the eagle, 115 Down the hill-side bounding, they glided away o'er the meadow.

Oft in the barns they climbed to the populous nests on the rafters, Seeking with eager eyes that wondrous stone which the swallow Brings from the shore of the sea to restore the sight of its fledglings, Lucky was he who found that stone in the nest of the swallow! 120
 Thus passed a few swift years, and they no longer were children.
 He was a valiant youth; and his face,
 like the face of the morning, Gladdened the earth with its light, and ripened thought into action.
 She was a woman now, with the heart and hopes of a woman.
 "Sunshine of Saint Eulalie" was she called; for that was the sunshine Which, as the farmers believed, would load their orchards with apples: 126
 She, too, would bring to her husband's house delight and abundance, Filling it full of love and the ruddy faces of children.

II

Now had the season returned when the nights grow colder and longer,
 And the retreating sun the sign of the Scorpion enters. 130 Birds of passage sailed through the leaden air from the ice-bound, Desolate northern bays to the shores of tropical islands.
 Harvests were gathered in; and wild with the winds of September Wrestled the trees of the forest, as Jacob of old with the angel.
 All the signs foretold a winter long and inclement: 135
 Bees, with prophetic instinct of want,
 had hoarded their honey Till the hives overflowed; and the Indian hunters asserted Cold would the winter be, for thick was the fur of the foxes.
 Such was the advent of autumn. Then followed that beautiful season Called by the pious Acadian peasants
 the Summer of All-Saints.¹ 140 Filled was the air with a dreamy and magical light; and the landscape

Lay as if new-created in all the freshness of childhood.
 Peace seemed to reign upon earth, and the restless heart of the ocean
 Was for a moment consoled. All sounds were in harmony blended.
 Voices of children at play, the crowing of cocks in the farm-yards, ¹⁴⁵
 Whir of wings in the drowsy air, and the cooing of pigeons,
 All were subdued and low as the murmurs of love; and the great sun
 Looked with the eye of love through the golden vapors around him;
 While, arrayed in its robes of russet and scarlet and yellow,
 Bright with the sheen of the dew, each glittering tree of the forest ¹⁵⁰
 Flashed like the plane-tree the Persian ¹ adorned with mantles and jewels.
 Now recommenced the reign of rest and affection and stillness.
 Day with its burden and heat had departed, and twilight descending Brought back the evening star to the sky, and the herds to the homestead:
 Pawing the ground they came, and resting their necks on each other, ¹⁵⁵
 And with their nostrils distended inhaling the freshness of evening.
 Foremost, bearing the bell, Evangeline's beautiful heifer,
 Proud of her snow-white hide and the ribbon that waved from her collar,
 Quietly paced and slow, as if conscious of human affection.
 Then came the shepherd back with his bleating flocks from the seaside, ¹⁶⁰
 Where was their favorite pasture. Behind them followed the watch-dog, Patient, full of importance, and grand in the pride of his instinct,
 Walking from side to side with a lordly air, and superbly
 Waving his bushy tail, and urging forward the stragglers:
 Regent of flocks was he when the shepherd slept; their protector ¹⁶⁵
 When from the forest at night, through the starry silence, the wolves howled.

¹ Xerxes

Late, with the rising moon, returned the wains from the marshes,
 Laden with briny hay, that filled the air with its odor.
 Cheerily neighed the steeds, with dew on their manes and their fetlocks,
 While aloft on their shoulders the wooden and ponderous saddles, ¹⁷⁰
 Painted with brilliant dyes, and adorned with tassels of crimson, Nodded in bright array, like hollyhocks heavy with blossoms.
 Patiently stood the cows meanwhile, and yielded their udders
 Unto the milkmaid's hand; whilst loud and in regular cadence
 Into the sounding pail the foaming streamlets descended. ¹⁷⁵
 Lowing of cattle and peals of laughter were heard in the farm-yard, Echoed back by the barns. Anon they sank into stillness;
 Heavily closed, with a creaking sound, the valves of the barn-doors,
 Rattled the wooden bars, and all for a season was silent.
 Indoors, warm by the wide-mouthed fireplace, idly the farmer ¹⁸⁰
 Sat in his elbow-chair, and watched how the flames and the smoke-wreaths Struggled together like foes in a burning city. Behind him, Nodding and mocking along the wall, with gestures fantastic,
 Darted his own huge shadow, and vanished away into darkness.
 Faces, clumsily carved in oak, on the back of his arm-chair ¹⁸⁵
 Laughed in the flickering light, and the pewter plates on the dresser Caught and reflected the flame, as shields of armies the sunshine.
 Fragments of song the old man sang, and carols of Christmas,
 Such as at home, in the olden time, his fathers before him
 Sang in their Norman orchards and bright Burgundian vineyards. ¹⁹⁰
 Close at her father's side was the gentle Evangeline seated, Spinning flax for the loom, that stood in the corner behind her.
 Silent awhile were its treadles, at rest was its diligent shuttle,

While the monotonous drone of the wheel, like the drone of a bag-
pipe, Followed the old man's song, and united the fragments together. 195
As in a church, when the chant of the choir at intervals ceases, Footfalls are heard in the aisles, or words of the priest at the altar,
So, in each pause of the song, with measured motion the clock clicked.
Thus as they sat, there were footsteps heard, and, suddenly lifted, Sounded the wooden latch, and the door
swung back on its hinges. 200 Benedict knew by the hob-nailed shoes
it was Basil the blacksmith,
And by her "beating heart" Evangeline knew who was with him.
"Welcome!" the farmer exclaimed, as their footsteps paused on the threshhold,
"Welcome, Basil, my friend! Come, take thy place on the settle Close by the chimney-side, which is always empty without thee; 205 Take from the shelf overhead thy pipe
and the box of tobacco;
Never so much thyself art thou as when through the curling Smoke of the pipe or the forge thy friendly and jovial face gleams Round and red as the harvest moon through the mist of the marshes."
Then, with a smile of content, thus answered Basil the blacksmith, 210 Taking with easy air the accustomed seat by the fireside:
"Benedict Bellefontaine, thou hast ever thy jest and thy ballad!
Ever in cheerfullest mood art thou,
when others are filled with Gloomy forebodings of ill, and see only ruin before them.
Happy art thou, as if every day thou hadst picked up a horseshoe." 215 Pausing a moment, to take the pipe that Evangeline brought him,
And with a coal from the embers had lighted, he slowly continued:
"Four days now are passed since the English ships at their anchors Ride in the Gaspereau's mouth, with their cannon pointed against us.

What their design may be is unknown;
but all are commanded 220
On the morrow to meet in the church, where his Majesty's mandate
Will be proclaimed as law in the land.
Alas, in the mean time
Many surmises of evil alarm the hearts of the people."
Then made answer the farmer:—"Perhaps some friendlier purpose Brings these ships to our shores. Perhaps the harvests in England 225
By the untimely rains or untimelier
heat have been blighted,
And from our bursting barns they would feed their cattle and children."
"Not so thinketh the folk in the village," said warmly the blacksmith,
Shaking his head as in doubt; then,
heaving a sigh, he continued:
"Louisburg is not forgotten, nor Beau-Séjour, nor Port Royal. 230
Many already have fled to the forest,
and lurk on its outskirts, Waiting with anxious hearts the dubious fate of to-morrow.
Arms have been taken from us, and warlike weapons of all kinds;
Nothing is left but the blacksmith's sledge and the scythe of the mower."
Then with a pleasant smile made answer the jovial farmer: 235
"Safer are we unarmed, in the midst of our flocks and our cornfields, Safer within these peaceful dikes, besieged by the ocean,
Than were our fathers in forts, besieged by the enemy's cannon.
Fear no evil, my friend, and to-night
may no shadow of sorrow Fall on this house and hearth; for this is the night of the contract. 240 Built are the house and the barn: the merry lads of the village Strongly have built them and well; and,
breaking the glebe round about
them,
Filled the barn with hay, and the house with food for a twelve-month.
René Leblanc will be here anon, with his papers and ink-horn.

Shall we not, then, be glad, and rejoice in the joy of our children?" 245
 As apart by the window she stood, with her hand in her lover's, Blushing Evangeline heard the words
 that her father had spoken,
 And as they died on his lips the worthy notary entered.

III

Bent like a laboring oar that toils in the surf of the ocean, Bent, but not broken, by age was the form of the notary public; 250 Shocks of yellow hair, like the silken floss of the maize, hung Over his shoulders; his forehead was high; and glasses with hornbows Sat astride on his nose, with a look of wisdom supernal.
 Father of twenty children was he; and more than a hundred Children's children rode on his knee, and heard his great watch tick. 255
 Four long years in the times of the war had he languished a captive, Suffering much in an old French fort as the friend of the English.
 Now, though warier grown, without all
 guile or suspicion, Ripe in wisdom was he, but patient and simple and childlike.
 He was beloved by all, and most of all
 by the children; 260
 For he told them tales of the Loupgarou in the forest,
 And of the goblin that came in the night
 to water the horses,
 And of the white Létiche, the ghost of a child who unchristened Died, and was doomed to haunt unseen
 the chambers of children;
 And how on Christmas eve the oxen talked in the stable, 265 And how the fever was cured by a spider shut up in a nutshell,
 And of the marvellous powers of four-leaved clover and horse-shoes,
 With whatsoever else was writ in the lore of the village.
 Then up rose from his seat by the fireside Basil the blacksmith, Knocked from his pipe the ashes, and slowly extending his right hand, 270

"Father Leblanc," he exclaimed, "thou hast heard the talk in the village,
 And perchance canst tell us some news
 of these ships and their errand."
 Then with modest demeanour made answer the notary public:
 "Gossip enough have I heard, in sooth,
 yet am never the wiser;
 And what their errand may be I know not better than others. 275
 Yet am I not of those who imagine some evil intention Brings them here; for we are at peace,
 and why, then, molest us?"
 "God's name!" shouted the hasty and somewhat irascible blacksmith;
 "Must we in all things look for the how and the why and the wherefore?
 Daily injustice is done, and might is the right of the strongest!" 280
 But, without heeding his warmth, continued the notary public:
 "Man is unjust, but God is just, and finally justice Triumphs; and well I remember a story, that often consoled me,
 When as a captive I lay in the old French fort at Port Royal."
 This was the old man's favorite tale,
 and he loved to repeat it 285 Whenever neighbours complained that any injustice was done them.
 "Once in an ancient city, whose name
 I no longer remember, Raised aloft on a column, a brazen statue of Justice Stood in the public square, upholding
 the scales in its left hand.
 And in its right a sword, as an emblem that justice presided 290
 Over the laws of the land and the hearts and homes of the people.
 Even the birds had built their nests in the scales of the balance, Having no fear of the sword that flashed in the sunshine above
 them.
 But in the course of time the laws of the land were corrupted; Might took the place of right, and the weak were oppressed, and the mighty 295
 Ruled with an iron rod. Then it chanced in a nobleman's palace

That a necklace of pearls was lost, and ere long a suspicion Fell on an orphan girl who lived as maid in the household.
She, after form of trial condemned to die on the scaffold, Patiently met her doom at the foot of the statue of Justice. 300
As to her Father in heaven her innocent spirit ascended, Lo, o'er the city a tempest rose; and the bolts of the thunder Smote the statue of bronze, and hurled in wrath from its left hand Down on the pavement below the clat-tering scales of the balance,
And in the hollow thereof was found
the nest of a magpie, 305
Into whose clay-built walls the necklace of pearls was inwoven." Silenced but not convinced, when the story was ended the blacksmith Stood like a man who fain would speak
but findeth no language;
And all his thoughts were congealed into lines on his face, as the vapors
Freeze in fantastic shapes on the window-panes in the winter. 310
Then Evangeline lighted the brazen lamp on the table,
Filled, till it overflowed, the pewter
tankard with home-brewed Nut-brown ale, that was famed for its strength in the village of Grand-Pré;
While from his pocket the notary drew
his papers and ink-horn, Wrote with a steady hand the date and the age of the parties, 315 Naming the dower of the bride in flocks of sheep and in cattle.
Orderly all things proceeded, and duly
and well were completed,
And the great seal of the law was set
like a sun on the margin.
Then from his leathern pouch the farmer threw on the table
Three times the old man's fee in solid pieces of silver; 320
And the notary, rising, and blessing the bride and the bridegroom, Lifted aloft the tankard of ale and drank to their welfare.

Wiping the foam from his lip, he solemnly bowed and departed, While in silence the others sat and mused by the fireside, Till Evangeline brought the draught-board out of its corner. 325
Soon was the game begun: in friendly contention the old men Laughed at each lucky hit or unsuccessful manœuvre, Laughed when a man was crowned or a breach was made in the king-row.
Meanwhile apart, in the twilight gloom
of a window's embrasure, Sat the lovers and whispered together,
beholding the moon rise 330
Over the pallid sea and the silvery mist of the meadows.
Silently, one by one, in the infinite meadows of heaven,
Blossomed the lovely stars, the forget-me-nots of the angels.
Thus passed the evening away.
Anon the bell from the belfry Rang out the hour of nine, the village curfew, and straightway 335
Rose the guests and departed; and silence reigned in the household.
Many a farewell word and sweet goodnight on the door-step Lingered long in Evangeline's heart,
and filled it with gladness.
Carefully then were covered the embers that glowed on the hearthstone,
And on the oaken stairs resounded the tread of the farmer. 340
Soon with a soundless step the foot of Evangeline followed:
Up the staircase moved a luminous
space in the darkness, Lighted less by the lamp than the shining face of the maiden.
Silent she passed through the hall, and entered the door of her chamber.
Simple that chamber was, with its curtains of white, and its clothes-press 345
Ample and high, on whose spacious shelves were carefully folded Linen and woollen stuffs, by the hand of Evangeline woven:
This was the precious dower she would bring to her husband in marriage,

Better than flocks and herds, being proofs of her skill as a housewife.
Soon she extinguished her lamp, for the mellow and radiant moonlight 350 Streamed through the windows and lighted the room, till the heart of the maiden Swelled and obeyed its power, like the tremulous tides of the ocean.
Ah, she was fair, exceeding fair to behold, as she stood with Naked snow-white feet on the gleaming floor of her chamber!
Little she dreamed that below, among the trees of the orchard, 355 Waited her lover and watched for the gleam of her lamp and her shadow.
Yet were her thoughts of him, and at times a feeling of sadness Passed o'er her soul, as the sailing shade of clouds in the moonlight Flitted across the floor and darkened the room for a moment.
And as she gazed from the window she saw serenely the moon pass 360 Forth from the folds of a cloud, and one star follow her footsteps,
As out of Abraham's tent young Ishmael wandered with Hagar!

IV

Pleasantly rose next morn the sun on the village of Grand-Pré.
Pleasantly gleamed in the soft, sweet
air the Basin of Minas,
Where the ships, with their wavering shadows, were riding at anchor. 365 Life had long been astir in the village, and clamorous labor Knocked with its hundred hands at the golden gates of the morning.
Now from the country around, from the farms and neighbouring hamlets,
Came in their holiday dresses the blithe
Acadian peasants.
Many a glad good-morrow and jocund laugh from the young folk 370
Made the bright air brighter, as up from the numerous meadows,
Where no path could be seen but the track of wheels in the greensward, Group after group appeared, and joined, or passed on the highway.

Long ere noon, in the village all sounds of labor were silenced.
Thronged were the streets with people;
and noisy groups at the house-doors 375
Sat in the cheerful sun, and rejoiced and gossiped together.
Every house was an inn, where all were welcomed and feasted;
For with this simple people, who lived like brothers together,
All things were held in common, and what one had was another's.
Yet under Benedict's roof hospitality seemed more abundant: 380
For Evangeline stood among the guests of her father;
Bright was her face with smiles, and words of welcome and gladness Fell from her beautiful lips and blessed the cup as she gave it.
Under the open sky, in the odorous air of the orchard Bending with golden fruit, was spread the feast of betrothal. 385
There in the shade of the porch were the priest and the notary seated;
There good Benedict sat, and sturdy Basil the blacksmith.
Not far withdrawn from these, by the cider-press and the beehives, Michael the fiddler was placed, with the gayest of hearts and of waistcoats.
Shadow and light from the leaves alternately played on his snow-white 390 Hair, as it waved in the wind; and the jolly face of the fiddler Glowed like a living coal when the ashes are blown from the embers.
Gayly the old man sang to the vibrant sound of his fiddle, Tous les Bourgeois de Chartres and Le
Carillon de Dunkerque,
And anon with his wooden shoes beat time to the music. 395 Merrily, merrily whirled the wheels of the dizzying dances
Under the orchard-trees and down the path to the meadows;
Old folk and young together, and children mingled among them.
Fairest of all the maids was Evangeline,
Benedict's daughter!

Noblest of all the youths was Gabriel,
 son of the blacksmith! 400
 So passed the morning away. And,
 lo, with a summons sonorous Sounded the bell from its tower, and over the meadows a drum beat.
 Thronged ere long was the church with men. Without, in the churchyard, Waited the women: they stood by the graves, and hung on the head-stones
 Garlands of autumn-leaves and evergreens fresh from the forest. 405
 Then came the guard from the ships, and, marching proudly among
 them,
 Entered the sacred portal. With loud and dissonant clangor Echoed the sound of their brazen drums from ceiling and casement,— Echoed a moment only, and slowly the ponderous portal
 Closed, and in silence the crowd awaited the will of the soldiers. 410
 Then up rose their commander, and spake from the steps of the altar, Holding aloft in his hands, with its seals, the royal commission:
 "You are convened this day," he said,
 "by his Majesty's orders.
 Clement and kind has he been; but how you have answered his kindness, Let your own hearts reply! To my natural make and my temper 415 Painful the task is I do, which to you
 I know must be grievous;
 Yet must I bow and obey, and deliver the will of our monarch:
 Namely, that all your lands and dwellings and cattle of all kinds Forfeited be to the crown; and that you yourselves from this province Be transported to other lands. God grant you may dwell there 420 Ever as faithful subjects, a happy and peaceable people!
 Prisoners now I declare you, for such is his Majesty's pleasure!"
 As, when the air is serene in the sultry solstice of summer, Suddenly gathers a storm, and the deadly sling of the hailstones Beats down the farmer's corn in the field and shatters his windows, 425

Hiding the sun and strewing the ground with thatch from the house-roofs, Bellowing fly the herds and seek to break their inclosures;
 So on the hearts of the people descended the words of the speaker.
 Silent a moment they stood in speechless wonder, and then rose Louder and ever louder a wail of sorrow and anger, 430
 And, by one impulse moved, they madly rushed to the door-way.
 Vain was the hope of escape; and cries and fierce imprecations Rang through the house of prayer, and high o'er the heads of the others
 Rose, with his arms uplifted, the figure
 of Basil the blacksmith,
 As, on a stormy sea, a spar is tossed by the billows: 435
 Flushed was his face and distorted with passion, and wildly he shouted,
 "Down with the tyrants of England!
 We never have sworn them allegiance!
 Death to these foreign soldiers, who seize on our homes and our harvests!"
 More he fain would have said, but the merciless hand of a soldier Smote him upon the mouth and dragged him down to the pavement. 440
 In the midst of the strife and tumult of angry contention, Lo, the door of the chancel opened, and Father Felician
 Entered, with serious mien, and ascended the steps of the altar.
 Raising his reverend hand, with a gesture he awed into silence
 All that clamorous throng; and thus he spake to his people; 445 Deep were his tones and solemn; in accents measured and mournful Spake he, as, after the tocsin's alarum, distinctly the clock strikes:
 "What is this that ye do, my children?
 What madness has seized you?
 Forty years of my life I labored among you, and taught you,
 Not in word alone, but in deed, to love
 one another! 450
 Is this the fruit of my toils, of my vigils and prayers and privations?

Have you so soon forgotten all lessons of love and forgiveness?

This is the house of the Prince of Peace,
and would you profane it

Thus with violent deeds and hearts overflowing with hatred?

Lo! where the crucified Christ from his cross is gazing upon you! 455

See! in those sorrowful eyes what meekness and holy compassion!

Hark! how those lips still repeat the prayer, 'O Father, forgive them!'

Let us repeat that prayer in the hour
when the wicked assail us;

Let us repeat it now, and say, 'O
Father, forgive them!'"

Few were his words of rebuke, but deep in the hearts of his people 460

Sank they, and sobs of contrition succeeded the passionate outbreak;

And they repeated his prayer,
and said, "O Father, forgive
them!"

Then came the evening service. The tapers gleamed from the altar;

Fervent and deep was the voice of the priest, and the people responded,

Not with their lips alone, but their hearts; and the Ave Maria 465

Sang they, and fell on their knees, and their souls, with devotion translated,

Rose on the ardor of prayer, like Elijah ascending to heaven.

Meanwhile had spread in the village the tidings of ill, and on all sides

Wandered, wailing, from house to house
the women and children.

Long at her father's door Evangeline stood, with her right hand 470

Shielding her eyes from the level rays
of the sun, that, descending,

Lighted the village street with mysterious splendor, and roofed each Peasant's cottage with golden thatch, and emblazoned its windows.

Long within had been spread the snow-
white cloth on the table:

There stood the wheaten loaf, and the honey fragrant with wild flowers;

There stood the tankard of ale, and the cheese fresh brought from the dairy; 476

And at the head of the board the great arm-chair of the farmer.

Thus did Evangeline wait at her father's door, as the sunset

Threw the long shadows of trees o'er the broad ambrosial meadows.

Ah! on her spirit within a deeper shadow had fallen, 480

And from the fields of her soul a fragrance celestial ascended—

Charity, meekness, love, and hope, and forgiveness, and patience!

Then, all-forgetful of self, she wandered into the village,

Cheering with looks and words the disconsolate hearts of the women,

As o'er the darkening fields with lingering steps they departed, 485

Urged by their household cares and the weary feet of their children.

Down sank the great red sun, and in golden, glimmering vapors

Veiled the light of his face, like the Prophet descending from Sinai.

Sweetly over the village the bell of the Angelus sounded.

Meanwhile, amid the gloom, by the church Evangeline lingered. 490

All was silent within; and in vain at the door and the windows

Stood she, and listened and looked, until, overcome by emotion,

"Gabriell!" cried she aloud with tremulous voice; but no answer

Came from the graves of the dead nor the gloomier grave of the living.

Slowly at length she returned to the tenantless house of her father: 495

Smouldered the fire on the hearth, on the board stood the supper un-tasted;

Empty and drear was each room, and haunted with phantoms of terror.

Sadly echoed her step on the stair and the floor of her chamber.

In the dead of the night she heard the whispering rain fall

Loud on the withered leaves of the sycamore-tree by the window. 500

Keenly the lightning flashed; and the voice of the neighbouring thunder

Told her that God was in heaven, and governed the world he created!

Then she remembered the tale she had heard of the justice of heaven;
Soothed was her troubled soul, and she peacefully slumbered till morning.

V

Four times the sun had risen and set;
and now on the fifth day ⁵⁰⁵
Cheerily called the cock to the sleeping maids of the farmhouse.
Soon o'er the yellow fields, in silent and mournful procession, Came from the neighbouring hamlets
and farms the Acadian women, Driving in ponderous wains their household goods to the sea-shore, Pausing and looking back to gaze once more on their dwellings, ⁵¹⁰ Ere they were shut from sight by the winding road and the woodland.
Close at their sides their children ran,
and urged on the oxen,
While in their little hands they clasped
some fragments of playthings.
Thus to the Gaspereau's mouth they hurried; and there on the sea-beach
Piled in confusion lay the household goods of the peasants. ⁵¹⁵
All day long between the shore and the ships did the boats ply;
All day long the wains came laboring down from the village.
Late in the afternoon, when the sun
was near to his setting, Echoing far o'er the fields came the roll of drums from the church-yard.
Thither the women and children thronged. On a sudden the church-doors ⁵²⁰
Opened, and forth came the guard, and,
marching in gloomy procession, Followed the long-imprisoned, but patient, Acadian farmers.
Even as pilgrims, who journey afar
from their homes and their country, Sing as they go, and in singing forget
they are weary and way-worn,
So with songs on their lips the Acadian peasants descended ⁵²⁵
Down from the church to the shore, amid their wives and their daughters.

Foremost the young men came; and,
raising together their voices, Sang they with tremulous lips a chant
of the Catholic Missions:—
"Sacred heart of the Saviour! O inexhaustible fountain!
Fill our hearts this day with strength and submission and patience!" ⁵³⁰
Then the old men, as they marched,
and the women that stood by the way-side Joined in the sacred psalm, and the birds in the sunshine above them Mingled their notes therewith, like voices of spirits departed.
Half-way down to the shore Evangeline waited in silence,
Not overcome with grief, but strong in the hour of affliction; ⁵³⁵ Calmly and sadly waited, until the procession approached her
And she beheld the face of Gabriel pale with emotion.
Tears then filled her eyes, and, eagerly running to meet him, Clasped she his hands, and laid her head on his shoulder, and whispered,
"Gabriel, be of good cheer! for if we love one another, ⁵⁴⁰ Nothing, in truth, can harm us, whatever mischances may happen!"
Smiling she spake these words; then suddenly paused, for her father Saw she slowly advancing. Alas, how changed was his aspect!
Gone was the glow from his cheek, and the fire from his eye, and his footstep Heavier seemed with the weight of the weary heart in his bosom. ⁵⁴⁵
But with a smile and a sigh she clasped
his neck and embraced him, Speaking words of endearment where words of comfort availed not.
Thus to the Gaspereau's mouth moved on that mournful procession.
There disorder prevailed, and the tumult and stir of embarking.
Busily plied the freighted boats; and in the confusion ⁵⁵⁰
Wives were torn from their husbands, and mothers, too late, saw their children

Left on the land, extending their arms with wildest entreaties.
 So unto separate ships were Basil and Gabriel carried,
 While in despair on the shore Evangeline stood with her father.
 Half the task was not done when the sun went down, and the twilight ⁵⁵⁵ Deepened and darkened around; and in haste the reflux ocean Fled away from the shore, and left the line of the sand-beach Covered with waifs of the tide, with kelp and the slippery sea-weed.
 Farther back, in the midst of the household goods and the wagons,
 Like to a gypsy camp or a leaguer ¹
 after a battle, ⁵⁶⁰
 All escape cut off by the sea and the sentinels near them,
 Lay encamped for the night the houseless Acadian farmers.
 Back to its nethermost caves retreated
 the bellowing ocean, Dragging adown the beach the rattling pebbles, and leaving Inland and far up the shore the stranded boats of the sailors. ⁵⁶⁵
 Then, as the night descended, the herds returned from their pastures;
 Sweet was the moist still air with the odor of milk from their udders; Lowing they waited, and long, at the well-known bars of the farmyard, Waited and looked in vain for the voice
 and the hand of the milkmaid.
 Silence reigned in the streets; from the church no Angelus sounded, ⁵⁷⁰ Rose no smoke from the roofs, and gleamed no lights from the windows.
 But on the shores meanwhile the evening fires had been kindled, Built of the drift-wood thrown on the sands from wrecks in the tempest.
 Round them shapes of gloom and sorrowful faces were gathered, Voices of women were heard, and of men, and the crying of children. ⁵⁷⁵ Onward from fire to fire, as from hearth
 to hearth in his parish, Wandered the faithful priest, consoling and blessing and cheering,

Like unto shipwrecked Paul on Melita's desolate sea-shore.
 Thus he approached the place where Evangeline sat with her father,
 And in the flickering light beheld the face of the old man, ⁵⁸⁰ Haggard and hollow and wan, and without either thought or emotion, E'en as the face of a clock from which the hands have been taken.
 Vainly Evangeline strove with words
 and caresses to cheer him, Vainly offered him food; yet he moved not, he looked not, he spake not,
 But with a vacant stare ever gazed at the flickering fire-light. ⁵⁸⁵
 "Benedicite!" murmured the priest, in tones of compassion.
 More he fain would have said; but his heart was full, and his accents Faltered and paused on his lips, as the feet of a child on a threshold, Hushed by the scene he beholds, and the awful presence of sorrow.
 Silently, therefore, he laid his hand on the head of the maiden, ⁵⁹⁰ Raising his eyes, full of tears, to the silent stars that above them Moved on their way, unperturbed by the wrongs and sorrows of mortals;
 Then sat he down at her side, and they wept together in silence.
 Suddenly rose from the south a light,
 as in autumn the blood-red Moon climbs the crystal walls of heaven, and o'er the horizon ⁵⁹⁵ Titan-like stretches its hundred hands
 upon mountain and meadow, Seizing the rocks and the rivers, and piling huge shadows together.
 Broader and ever broader it gleamed
 on the roofs of the village, Gleamed on the sky and the sea, and the ships that lay in the roadstead.
 Columns of shining smoke uprose, and flashes of flame were ⁶⁰⁰ Thrust through their folds and withdrawn, like the quivering hands of a martyr.
 Then as the wind seized the gleeds ² and the burning thatch, and, uplifting, Whirled them aloft through the air, at once from a hundred housetops

² glowing coals

Started the sheeted smoke with flashes of flame intermingled.

These things beheld in dismay the crowd on the shore and on shipboard: 605

Speechless at first they stood, then cried aloud in their anguish,

"We shall behold no more our homes in the village of Grand-Pré!"

Loud on a sudden the cocks began to crow in the farm-yards,

Thinking the day had dawned; and
anon the lowing of cattle

Came on the evening breeze, by the barking of dogs interrupted. 610

Then rose a sound of dread, such as startles the sleeping encampments,

Far in the western prairies or forests that skirt the Nebraska,

When the wild horses affrighted sweep by with the speed of the whirlwind,

Or the loud bellowing herds of buffaloes
rush to the river: 614

Such was the sound that arose on the night, as the herds and the horses

Broke through their folds and fences, and madly rushed o'er the meadows.

Overwhelmed with the sight, yet speechless, the priest and the maiden

Gazed on the scene of terror that reddened and widened before them;

And as they turned at length to speak to their silent companion,

Lo, from his seat he had fallen, and,
stretched abroad on the seashore,

Motionless lay his form, from which the soul had departed! 621

Slowly the priest uplifted the lifeless head, and the maiden

Knelt at her father's side, and wailed aloud in her terror;

Then in a swoon she sank, and lay with her head on his bosom.

Through the long night she lay in deep,
oblivious slumber; 625

And when she woke from the trance,
she beheld a multitude near her;

Faces of friends she beheld, that were mournfully gazing upon her,

Pallid, with tearful eyes and looks of saddest compassion.

Still the blaze of the burning village illuminated the landscape,

Reddened the sky overhead, and gleamed on the faces around her,

And like the day of doom it seemed to her wavering senses. 631

Then a familiar voice she heard, as it said to the people,

"Let us bury him here by the sea: when a happier season

Brings us again to our homes from the unknown land of our exile,

Then shall his sacred dust be piously laid in the church-yard." 635

Such were the words of the priest; and there in haste by the sea-side,

Having the glare of the burning village
for funeral torches,

But without bell or book, they buried
the farmer of Grand-Pré.

And as the voice of the priest repeated
the service of sorrow,

Lo, with a mournful sound, like the voice of a vast congregation, 640

Solemnly answered the sea and mingled its roar with the dirges:

'T was the returning tide, that afar
from the waste of the ocean,

With the first dawn of the day, came heaving and hurrying landward.

Then recommenced once more the stir and noise of embarking;

And with the ebb of that tide the ships sailed out of the harbour, 645

Leaving behind them the dead on the shore and the village in ruins.

PART THE SECOND

I

Many a weary year had passed since the burning of Grand-Pré,

When on the falling tide the freighted vessels departed,

Bearing a nation, with all its household
gods, into exile,

Exile without an end and without an example in story.

Far asunder, on separate coasts, the Acadians landed; 5

Scattered were they, like flakes of snow
when the wind from the northeast

Strikes aslant through the fogs that darken the banks of Newfoundland.

Friendless, homeless, hopeless, they wandered from city to city,
From the cold lakes of the North to sultry Southern savannas,
From the bleak shores of the sea to the lands where the Father of Waters Seizes the hills in his hands and drags them down to the ocean, 11 Deep in their sands to bury the scattered bones of the mammoth.

Friends they sought and homes; and many, despairing, heartbroken, Asked of the earth but a grave, and no longer a friend nor a fireside:

Written their history stands on tablets of stone in the church-yards. 15
Long among them was seen a maiden who waited and wandered, Lowly and meek in spirit, and patiently suffering all things.

Fair was she and young; but, alas,
before her extended Dreary and vast and silent, the desert of life, with its pathway

Marked by the graves of those who had sorrowed and suffered before her, 20 Passions long extinguished, and hopes long dead and abandoned,

As the emigrant's way o'er the Western desert is marked by Camp-fires long consumed and bones that bleach in the sunshine.

Something there was in her life incomplete, imperfect, unfinished;
As if a morning of June, with all its music and sunshine, 25

Suddenly paused in the sky, and, fading, slowly descended Into the east again, from whence it late had arisen.

Sometimes she lingered in towns, till,
urged by the fever within her,
Urged by a restless longing, the hunger
and thirst of the spirit,
She would commence again her endless search and endeavor: 30

Sometimes in church-yards strayed, and gazed on the crosses and tomb-
stones;

Sat by some nameless grave, and thought that perhaps in its bosom

He was already at rest, and she longed to slumber beside him.

Sometimes a rumor, a hearsay, an inarticulate whisper, Came with its airy hand to point and beckon her forward. 35

Sometimes she spake with those who had seen her belovèd and known
him,

But it was long ago, in some far-off
place or forgotten.

"Gabriel Lajeunesse!" said they; "O,
yes! we have seen him.

He was with Basil the blacksmith, and both have gone to the prairies; Coureurs-des-Bois¹ are they, and famous hunters and trappers." 40

"Gabriel Lajeunesse!" said others; "O,
yes! we have seen him.

He is a Voyageur in the lowlands of Louisiana."

Then would they say, "Dear child, why dream and wait for him longer?

Are there not other youths as fair as Gabriel? others

Who have hearts as tender and true,
and spirits as loyal? 45

Here is Baptiste Leblanc, the notary's son, who has loved thee

Many a tedious year; come, give him thy hand and be happy!

Thou art too fair to be left to braid St.
Catherine's tresses."

Then would Evangeline answer, serenely but sadly, "I cannot!

Whither my heart has gone, there follows my hand and not elsewhere; 50

For when the heart goes before, like a lamp, and illumines the pathway,
Many things are made clear, that else lie hidden in darkness."

And thereupon the priest, her friend
and father-confessor,

Said with a smile, "O daughter, thy God
thus speaketh within thee!

Talk not of wasted affection: affection never was wasted; 55

If it enrich not the heart of another, its waters, returning

Back to their springs, like the rain, shall fill them full of refreshment;
That which the fountain sends forth returns again to the fountain.

¹literally, runners of the woods

Patience! accomplish thy labor; accomplish thy work of affection!
 Sorrow and silence are strong, and patient endurance is godlike. 60
 Therefore accomplish thy labor of love,
 till the heart is made godlike, Purified, strengthened, perfected, and rendered more worthy of heaven!"
 Cheered by the good man's words,
 Evangeline labored and waited.
 Still in her heart she heard the funeral
 dirge of the ocean,
 But with its sound there was mingled a voice that whispered, "Despair not!" 65
 Thus did that poor soul wander in want
 and cheerless discomfort, Bleeding, barefooted, over the shards
 and thorns of existence.
 Let me essay, O Muse, to follow the wanderer's footsteps—
 Not through each devious path, each changeful year of existence,
 But as a traveller follows a streamlet's course through the valley: 70 Far from its margin at times, and seeing the gleam of its water Here and there, in some open space, and at intervals only;
 Then, drawing nearer its banks, through sylvan glooms that conceal it, Though he behold it not, he can hear its continuous murmur;
 Happy, at length, if he find the spot where it reaches an outlet. 75

II

It was the month of May. Far down
 the Beautiful¹ River, Past the Ohio shore and past the mouth of the Wabash,
 Into the golden stream of the broad and swift Mississippi, Floated a cumbrous boat, that was rowed by Acadian boatmen.
 It was a band of exiles, a raft, as it were, from the shipwrecked 80 Nation, scattered along the coast, now floating together,
 Bound by the bonds of a common belief
 and a common misfortune;

Men and women and children, who,
 guided by hope or by hearsay, Sought for their kith and their kin
 among the few-acred farmers
 On the Acadian Coast,² and the prairies of fair Opelousas. 85
 With them Evangeline went, and her guide the Father Felician.
 Onward o'er sunken sands, through a wilderness sombre with forests, Day after day they glided adown the turbulent river;
 Night after night, by their blazing fires,
 encamped on its borders.
 Now through rushing chutes, among green islands, where plume-like 90
 Cotton-trees nodded their shadowy crests, they swept with the current;
 Then emerged into broad lagoons, where silvery sand-bars
 Lay in the stream, and along the wimpling waves of their margin, Shining with snow-white plumes, large flocks of pelicans waded.
 Level the landscape grew; and along the shores of the river, 95 Shaded by china-trees, in the midst of luxuriant gardens,
 Stood the houses of planters with negro-cabins and dove-cots.
 They were approaching the region where reigns perpetual summer, Where through the Golden Coast, and groves of orange and citron, Sweeps with majestic curve the river
 away to the eastward. 100
 They, too, swerved from their course;
 and, entering the Bayou of Plaque-mine,
 Soon were lost in a maze of sluggish and devious waters,
 Which, like a network of steel, extended in every direction.
 Over their heads the towering and ten-ebrous boughs of the cypress Met in a dusky arch, and trailing mosses in midair 105 Waved like banners that hang on the walls of ancient cathedrals.
 Deathlike the silence seemed, and unbroken save by the herons Home to their roosts in the cedar-trees returning at sunset,

² the lower Mississippi

Or by the owl as he greeted the moon
 with demoniac laughter.
 Lovely the moonlight was as it glanced and gleamed on the water, 110 Gleamed on the columns of cypress and cedar sustaining the arches, Down through whose broken vaults it fell as through chinks in a ruin.
 Dreamlike and indistinct and strange were all things around them;
 And o'er their spirits there came a feeling of wonder and sadness—Strange forebodings of ill, unseen and that cannot be compassed. 115
 As, at the tramp of a horse's hoof on the turf of the prairies, Far in advance are closed the leaves of the shrinking mimosa,
 So, at the hoof-beats of fate, with sad
 forebodings of evil, Shrinks and closes the heart ere the stroke of doom has attained it.
 But Evangeline's heart was sustained by a vision, that faintly 120 Floated before her eyes and beckoned her on through the moonlight:
 It was the thought of her brain that assumed the shape of a phantom—
 Through those shadowy aisles had Gabriel wandered before her,
 And every stroke of the oar now brought him nearer and nearer.
 Then, in his place at the prow of the boat, rose one of the oarsmen, 125
 And, as a signal sound, if others like them peradventure
 Sailed on those gloomy and midnight streams, blew a blast on his bugle.
 Wild through the dark colonnades and corridors leafy the blast rang, Breaking the seal of silence and giving tongues to the forest:
 Soundless above them the banners of moss just stirred to the music; 130 Multitudinous echoes awoke and died in the distance,
 Over the watery floor and beneath the reverberant branches.
 But not a voice replied; no answer came from the darkness;
 And when the echoes had ceased, like a sense of pain was the silence.
 Then Evangeline slept; but the boatmen rowed through the midnight,

Silent at times, and then singing familiar Canadian boat-songs, 136
 Such as they sang of old on their own
 Acadian rivers,
 And through the night were heard the mysterious sounds of the desert,
 Far off, indistinct, as of wave or wind
 in the forest,
 Mixed with the whoop of the crane and the roar of the grim alligator. 140
 Thus ere another noon they emerged from those shades; and before
 them
 Lay, in the golden sun, the lakes of the Atchafalaya.
 Water-lilies in myriads rocked on the slight undulations
 Made by the passing oars, and, resplendent in beauty, the lotus Lifted her golden crown above the heads of the boatmen. 145
 Faint was the air with the odorous breath of magnolia blossoms,
 And with the heat of noon; and num-
 berless sylvan islands, Fragrant and thickly embowered with blossoming hedges of roses, Near to whose shores they glided along,
 invited to slumber.
 Soon by the fairest of these their weary oars were suspended: 150
 Under the boughs of Wachita willows
 that grew by the margin, Safely their boat was moored; and,
 scattered about on the green-sward, Tired with their midnight toil, the weary travellers slumbered.
 Over them vast and high extended the cope of a cedar:
 Swinging from its great arms, the trumpet-flower and the grape-vine 155 Hung their ladder of ropes aloft like the ladder of Jacob,
 On whose pendulous stairs the angels ascending, descending,
 Were the swift humming-birds, that flitted from blossom to blossom.
 Such was the vision Evangeline saw as she slumbered beneath it; Filled was her heart with love, and the dawn of an opening heaven 160 Lighted her soul in sleep with the glory of regions celestial.

Nearer and ever nearer, among the numberless islands,
 Darted a light, swift boat, that sped away o'er the water, Urged on its course by the sinewy arms
 of hunters and trappers;
 Northward its prow was turned, to the land of the bison and beaver. 165
 At the helm sat a youth, with countenance thoughtful and careworn:
 Dark and neglected locks overshadowed his brow, and a sadness
 Somewhat beyond his years on his face was legibly written.
 Gabriel was it, who, weary with waiting, unhappy and restless, Sought in the Western wilds oblivion of self and of sorrow. 170 Swiftly they glided along, close under the lee of the island,
 But by the opposite bank and behind a screen of palmettos,
 So that they saw not the boat where it lay concealed in the willows,
 And undisturbed by the dash of their oars, and unseen, were the sleepers:
 Angel of God was there none to awaken
 the slumbering maiden. 175 Swiftly they glided away, like the shade of a cloud on the prairie.
 After the sound of their oars on the tholes had died in the distance,
 As from a magic trance the sleepers awoke; and the maiden
 Said with a sigh to the friendly priest,
 "O Father Felician!
 Something says in my heart that near me Gabriel wanders. 180
 Is it a foolish dream, an idle and vague superstition?
 Or has an angel passed, and revealed
 the truth to my spirit?"
 Then, with a blush; she added, "Alas for my credulous fancy!
 Unto ears like thine such words as these have no meaning."
 But made answer the reverend man,
 and he smiled as he answered, 185
 "Daughter, thy words are not idle, nor are they to me without meaning.
 Feeling is deep and still; and the word that floats on the surface Is as the tossing buoy that betrays where the anchor is hidden:

Therefore trust to thy heart and to what the world calls illusions.
 Gabriel truly is near thee; for not far away to the southward, 190
 On the banks of the Têche, are the towns of St. Maur and St. Martin.
 There the long-wandering bride shall be given again to her bridegroom,
 There the long-absent pastor regain his flock and his sheepfold.
 Beautiful is the land, with its prairies
 and forests of fruit-trees;
 Under the feet a garden of flowers, and the bluest of heavens 195 Bending above and resting its dome on the walls of the forest.
 They who dwell there have named it
 the Eden of Louisiana."
 And with these words of cheer they arose and continued their journey.
 Softly the evening came: the sun from the western horizon
 Like a magician extended his golden wand o'er the landscape; 200 Twinkling vapors arose; and sky and water and forest Seemed all on fire at the touch, and melted and mingled together; Hanging between two skies, a cloud
 with edges of silver, Floated the boat, with its dripping oars,
 on the motionless water.
 Filled was Evangeline's heart with inexpressible sweetness: 205 Touched by the magic spell, the sacred fountains of feeling Glowed with the light of love, as the skies and waters around her.
 Then from a neighbouring thicket the mocking-bird, wildest of singers, Swinging aloft on a willow spray that hung o'er the water, Shook from his little throat such floods of delirious music 210
 That the whole air and the woods and the waves seemed silent to listen:
 Plaintive at first were the tones and sad; then, soaring to madness, Seemed they to follow or guide the revel of frenzied Bacchantes;¹ Then single notes were heard, in sorrowful, low lamentation;

Till, having gathered them all, he flung them abroad in derision, ²¹⁵
 As when, after a storm, a gust of wind through the tree-tops Shakes down the rattling rain in a crystal shower on the branches.
 With such a prelude as this, and hearts that throbbed with emotion, Slowly they entered the Têche, where it flows through the green Ope-lousas,
 And through the amber air, above the crest of the woodland, ²²⁰
 Saw the column of smoke that arose from a neighbouring dwelling:
 Sounds of a horn they heard, and the distant lowing of cattle.

III

Near to the bank of the river, o'ershadowed by oaks, from whose branches
 Garlands of Spanish moss and of mystic mistletoe flaunted, Such as the Druids cut down with golden hatchets at Yule-tide, ²²⁵ Stood, secluded and still, the house of the herdsman. A garden Girded it round about with a belt of luxuriant blossoms, Filling the air with fragrance. The house itself was of timbers Hewn from the cypress-tree, and carefully fitted together.
 Large and low was the roof; and on slender columns supported, ²³⁰ Rose-wreathed, vine-encircled, a broad and spacious veranda, Haunt of the humming-bird and the bee, extended around it.
 At each end of the house, amid the flowers of the garden, Stationed the dove-cots were, as love's perpetual symbol,
 Scenes of endless wooing and endless contentions of rivals. ²³⁵
 Silence reigned o'er the place. The line of shadow and sunshine Ran near the tops of the trees; but the house itself was in shadow,
 And from its chimney-top, ascending and slowly expanding

Into the evening air, a thin blue column of smoke rose.
 In the rear of the house, from the garden gate, ran a pathway ²⁴⁰
 Through the great groves of oak to the skirts of the limitless prairie, Into whose sea of flowers the sun was slowly descending.
 Full in his track of light, like ships with shadowy canvas Hanging loose from their spars in a motionless calm in the tropics, Stood a cluster of cotton-trees, with cordage of grape-vines. ²⁴⁵ Just where the woodlands met the flowery surf of the prairie, Mounted upon his horse, with Spanish saddle and stirrups, Sat a herdsman, arrayed in gaiters and doublet of deerskin.
 Broad and brown was the face that from under the Spanish sombrero Gazed on the peaceful scene, with the lordly look of its master. ²⁵⁰
 Round about him were numberless herds of kine, that were grazing Quietly in the meadows, and breathing the vapory freshness That uprose from the river and spread itself over the landscape.
 Slowly lifting the horn that hung at his side, and expanding Fully his broad, deep chest, he blew a blast, that resounded ²⁵⁵ Wildly and sweet and far, through the still damp air of the evening.
 Suddenly out of the grass the long white horns of the cattle
 Rose like flakes of foam on the adverse currents of ocean:
 Silent a moment they gazed, then bel-lowing rushed o'er the prairie,
 And the whole mass became a cloud, a shade in the distance. ²⁶⁰
 Then, as the herdsman turned to the house, through the gate of the garden Saw he the forms of the priest and the maiden advancing to meet him.
 Suddenly down from his horse he sprang in amazement, and forward Rushed with extended arms and exclamations of wonder;

When they beheld his face, they recognized Basil the blacksmith. 265
 Hearty his welcome was, as he led his guests to the garden.
 There, in an arbour of roses, with endless question and answer
 Gave they vent to their hearts, and renewed their friendly embraces,
 Laughing and weeping by turns, or sitting silent and thoughtful—
 Thoughtful, for Gabriel came not: and now dark doubts and misgivings 270
 Stole o'er the maiden's heart; and Basil, somewhat embarrassed, Broke the silence and said, "If you came by the Atchafalaya,
 How have you nowhere encountered my Gabriel's boat on the bayous?"
 Over Evangeline's face at the words of Basil a shade passed;
 Tears came into her eyes, and she said, with a tremulous accent, 275
 "Gone? is Gabriel gone?" and, concealing her face on his shoulder,
 All her o'erburdened heart gave way, and she wept and lamented.
 Then the good Basil said,—and his voice grew blithe as he said it,—
 "Be of good cheer, my child; it is only to-day he departed.
 Foolish boy! he has left me alone with my herds and my horses. 280
 Moody and restless grown, and tried and troubled, his spirit
 Could no longer endure the calm of this quiet existence.
 Thinking ever of thee, uncertain and sorrowful ever,
 Ever silent, or speaking only of thee and his troubles,
 He at length had become so tedious to men and to maidens, 285
 Tedious even to me, that at length I bethought me, and sent him
 Unto the town of Adayes to trade for mules with the Spaniards.
 Thence he will follow the Indian trails to the Ozark Mountains,
 Hunting for furs in the forests, on rivers trapping the beaver.
 Therefore be of good cheer: we will follow the fugitive lover; 290
 He is not far on his way, and the Fates and the streams are against him.

Up and away to-morrow, and through the red dew of the morning
 We will follow him fast, and bring him back to his prison."
 Then glad voices were heard, and up from the banks of the river,
 Borne aloft on his comrades' arms, came Michael the fiddler. 295
 Long under Basil's roof had he lived like a god on Olympus,
 Having no other care than dispensing music to mortals:
 Far renowned was he for his silver locks and his fiddle.
 "Long live Michael," they cried, "our brave Acadian minstrel!"
 As they bore him aloft in triumphal procession; and straightway 300
 Father Felician advanced with Evangeline, greeting the old man
 Kindly and oft, and recalling the past, while Basil, enraptured,
 Hailed with hilarious joy his old companions and gossips,
 Laughing loud and long, and embracing mothers and daughters.
 Much they marvelled to see the wealth of the ci-devant¹ blacksmith, 305
 All his domains and his herds, and his patriarchal demeanour;
 Much they marvelled to hear his tales of the soil and the climate,
 And of the prairies, whose numberless herds were his who would take them;
 Each one thought in his heart that he, too, would go and do likewise.
 Thus they ascended the steps, and, crossing the airy veranda, 310
 Entered the hall of the house, where already the supper of Basil Waited his late return; and they rested and feasted together.
 Over the joyous feast the sudden darkness descended.
 All was silent without, and, illuming the landscape with silver,
 Fair rose the dewy moon and the myriad stars; but within doors, 315
 Brighter than these, shone the faces of friends in the glimmering lamp-light.

¹ former

Then from his station aloft, at the head of the table, the herdsman Poured forth his heart and his wine together in endless profusion.
 Lighting his pipe, that was filled with sweet Natchitoches tobacco, Thus he spake to his guests, who listened, and smiled as they listened: 320
 "Welcome once more, my friends, who so long have been friendless and homeless,
 Welcome once more to a home, that is better perchance than the old one!
 Here no hungry winter congeals our blood like the rivers;
 Here no stony ground provokes the wrath of the farmer—Smoothly the ploughshare runs through the soil as a keel through the water; 325
 All the year round the orange-groves are in blossom, and grass grows
 More in a single night than a whole Canadian summer.
 Here, too, numberless herds run wild and unclaimed in the prairies; Here, too, lands may be had for the asking, and forests of timber
 With a few blows of the axe are hewn and framed into houses. 330
 After your houses are built, and your fields are yellow with harvests,
 No King George of England shall drive
 you away from your homesteads, Burning your dwellings and barns, and stealing your farms and your cattle."
 Speaking these words, he blew a wrathful cloud from his nostrils,
 And a huge, brawny hand came thundering down on the table, 335
 So that the guests all started; and Father Felician, astounded, Suddenly paused, with a pinch of snuff half-way to his nostrils.
 But the brave Basil resumed, and his words were milder and gayer:
 "Only beware of the fever, my friends,
 beware of the fever!
 For it is not like that of our cold
 Acadian climate, 340
 Cured by wearing a spider hung round one's neck in a nutshell!"

Then there were voices heard at the door, and footsteps approaching Sounded upon the stairs and the floor of the breezy veranda:
 It was the neighbouring Creoles and small Acadian planters, Who had been summoned all to the house of Basil the Herdsman. 345 Merry the meeting was of ancient comrades and neighbours:
 Friend clasped friend in his arms;
 and they who before were as — strangers,
 Meeting in exile, became straightway
 as friends to each other,
 Drawn by the gentle bond of a common country together.
 But in the neighbouring hall a strain of music, proceeding 350
 From the accordant strings of Michael's melodious fiddle,
 Broke up all further speech: away, like children delighted,
 All things forgotten beside, they gave themselves to the maddening Whirl of the dizzy dance, as it swept and swayed to the music, Dreamlike, with beaming eyes and the rush of fluttering garments. 355 Meanwhile, apart, at the head of the hall, the priest and the herdsman Sat, conversing together of past and present and future;
 While Evangeline stood like one entranced, for within her Olden memories rose, and loud in the midst of the music Heard she the sound of the sea, and an irrepressible sadness 360 Came o'er her heart, and unseen she stole forth into the garden.
 Beautiful was the night: behind the black wall of the forest, Tipping its summit with silver, arose
 the moon; on the river Fell here and there through the branches a tremulous gleam of the moonlight,
 Like the sweet thoughts of love on a darkened and devious spirit; 365 Nearer and round about her, the manifold flowers of the garden Poured out their souls in odors, that were their prayers and confessions

Unto the night, as it went its way like a silent Carthusian.
 Fuller of fragrance than they, and as heavy with shadows and night-dews, Hung the heart of the maiden. The calm and the magical moonlight 370 Seemed to inundate her soul with indefinable longings,
 As, through the gardengate, beneath the brown shade of the oak-
 trees,
 Passed she along the path to the edge of the measureless prairie.
 Silent it lay, with a silvery haze upon it, and fire-flies Gleaming and floating away in mingled and infinite numbers. 375
 Over her head the stars, the thoughts of God in the heavens, Shone on the eyes of man, who had ceased to marvel and worship, Save when a blazing comet was seen on the walls of that temple,
 As if a hand had appeared and written upon them, "Upharsin."
 And the soul of the maiden, between the stars and the fire-flies, 380 Wandered alone, and she cried, "O Gabriel! O my beloved!
 Art thou so near unto me, and yet I cannot behold thee?
 Art thou so near unto me, and yet thy voice does not reach me?
 Ah, how often thy feet have trod this path to the prairie!
 Ah, how often thine eyes have looked on the woodlands around me! 385
 Ah, how often beneath this oak, returning from labor,
 Thou hast lain down to rest and to dream of me in thy slumbers!
 When shall these eyes behold, these arms be folded about thee?"
 Loud and sudden and near the note of a whippoorwill sounded
 Like a flute in the woods; and anon,
 through the neighbouring thickets, Farther and farther away it floated and dropped into silence. 391
 "Patience!" whispered the oaks from oracular caverns of darkness;
 And from the moonlit meadow a sigh responded, "To-morrow!"

Bright rose the sun next day; and all the flowers of the garden Bathed his shining feet with their tears, and anointed his tresses 395
 With the delicious balm that they bore in their vases of crystal.
 "Farewell!" said the priest, as he stood at the shadowy threshold;
 "See that you bring back the Prodigal Son from his fasting and famine,
 And, too, the Foolish Virgin, who slept when the bridegroom was coming."
 "Farewell!" answered the maiden, and,
 smiling, with Basil descended 400 Down to the river's brink, where the boatmen already were waiting.
 Thus beginning their journey with morning and sunshine and gladness,
 Swiftly they followed the flight of him who was speeding before them, Blown by the blast of fate like a dead leaf over the desert.
 Not that day, nor the next, nor yet the day that succeeded, 405 Found they trace of his course, in lake or forest or river,
 Nor after many days had they found him; but vague and uncertain Rumours alone were their guides through a wild and desolate country,
 Till at the little inn of the Spanish town
 of Adayes, Weary and worn, they alighted, and learned from the garrulous landlord 410
 That on the day before, with horses
 and guides and companions, Gabriel left the village and took the road of the prairies.

IV

Far in the West there lies a desert land, where the mountains Lift, through perpetual snows, their lofty and luminous summits.
 Down from their desolate, deep ravines,
 where the gorge, like a gateway, 415 Opens a passage rude to the wheels of the emigrant's wagon,
 Westward the Oregon flows, and the Walleway and Owyhee.

Eastward, with devious course, among the Wind-river Mountains, Through the Sweet-water Valley precipitate leaps the Nebraska;
 And to the south, from Fontaine-qui-bout and the Spanish sierras, 420 Fretted with sands and rocks, and swept by the wind of the desert, Numberless torrents with ceaseless sound descend to the ocean
 Like the great chords of a harp, in loud and solemn vibrations.
 Spreading between these streams are the wondrous, beautiful prairies, Billowy bays of grass ever rolling in shadow and sunshine, 425 Bright with luxuriant clusters of roses and purple amorphas.
 Over them wander the buffalo herds
 and the elk and the roebuck; Over them wander the wolves and herds of riderless horses;
 Fires that blast and blight, and winds that are weary with travel;
 Over them wander the scattered tribes of Ishmael's children, 430 Staining the desert with blood; and above their terrible war-trails Circles and sails aloft, on pinions majestic, the vulture,
 Like the implacable soul of a chieftain slaughtered in battle,
 By invisible stairs ascending and scaling the heavens.
 Here and there rise smokes from the camps of these savage marauders;
 Here and there rise groves from the margins of swift-running rivers; 436
 And the grim, taciturn bear, the anchorite monk of the desert, Climbs down their dark ravines to dig for roots by the brookside;
 And over all is the sky, the clear and crystalline heaven,
 Like the protecting hand of God inverted above them. 440
 Into this wonderful land, at the base of the Ozark Mountains, Gabriel far had entered, with hunters and trappers behind him.
 Day after day, with their Indian guides,
 the maiden and Basil Followed his flying steps, and thought each day to o'ertake him.

Sometimes they saw, or thought they saw, the smoke of his campfire 445 Rise in the morning air from the distant plain; but at nightfall,
 When they had reached the place, they found only embers and ashes.
 And, though their hearts were sad at times and their bodies were weary,
 Hope still guided them on, as the magic Fata Morgana 1 Showed them her lakes of light, that retreated and vanished before
 them. 450
 Once, as they sat by their evening fire, there silently entered Into the little camp an Indian woman, whose features
 Wore deep traces of sorrow, and patience as great as her sorrow.
 She was a Shawnee woman returning home to her people,
 From the far-off hunting-grounds of the cruel Camanches, 455
 Where her Canadian husband, a Coureur-des-Bois, had been murdered.
 Touched were their hearts at her story,
 and warmest and friendliest welcome Gave they, with words of cheer; and she sat and feasted among them
 On the buffalo-meat and the venison cooked on the embers.
 But when their meal was done, and Basil and all his companions, 460 Worn with the long day's march and the chase of the deer and the bison, Stretched themselves on the ground,
 and slept where the quivering fire-
 light
 Flashed on their swarthy cheeks and their forms wrapped up in their blankets,
 Then at the door of Evangeline's tent
 she sat and repeated Slowly, with soft, low voice and the charm of her Indian accent, 465
 All the tale of her love, with its pleasures and pains and reverses.
 Much Evangeline wept at the tale, and to know that another Hapless heart like her own had loved and had been disappointed.

Moved to the depths of her soul by pity
 and woman's compassion, Yet in her sorrow pleased that one who had suffered was near her, 470
 She in turn related her love and all its disasters.
 Mute with wonder the Shawnee sat,
 and when she had ended Still was mute; but at length, as if a mysterious horror
 Passed through her brain, she spake, and repeated the tale of the Mowis—Mowis, the bridegroom of snow, who won and wedded a maiden, 475
 But, when the morning came, arose and passed from the wigwam, Fading and melting away and dissolving into the sunshine, Till she beheld him no more, though she followed far into the forest.
 Then, in those sweet, low tones, that seemed like a weird incantation, Told she the tale of the fair Lilinau,
 who was wooed by a phantom, 480
 That, through the pines o'er her father's lodge, in the hush of the twilight, Breathed like the evening wind, and whispered love to the maiden, Till she followed his green and waving plume through the forest,
 And never more returned, nor was seen again by her people.
 Silent with wonder and strange surprise, Evangeline listened 485
 To the soft flow of her magical words, till the region around her Seemed like enchanted ground, and her swarthy guest the enchantress.
 Slowly over the tops of the Ozark Mountains the moon rose, Lighting the little tent, and with a mysterious splendor
 Touching the sombre leaves and embracing and filling the wood-
 land. 490
 With a delicious sound the brook rushed by, and the branches Swayed and sighed overhead in scarcely audible whispers.
 Filled with the thoughts of love was Evangeline's heart, but a secret, Subtile sense crept in of pain and indefinite terror,

As the cold, poisonous snake creeps into
 the nest of the swallow. 495
 It was no earthly fear: a breath from the region of spirits Seemed to float in the air of night; and she felt for a moment That, like the Indian maid, she too was pursuing a phantom.
 And with this thought she slept, and the fear and the phantom had vanished.
 Early upon the morrow the march was resumed; and the Shawnee 500 Said, as they journeyed along, "On the western slope of these mountains
 Dwells in his little village the Black Robe chief of the Mission.
 Much he teaches the people, and tells them of Mary and Jesus:
 Loud laugh their hearts with joy, and weep with pain, as they hear him."
 Then, with a sudden and secret emotion, Evangeline answered, 505
 "Let us go to the Mission, for there good tidings await us!"
 Thither they turned their steeds; and behind a spur of the mountains,
 Just as the sun went down, they heard a murmur of voices,
 And in a meadow green and broad, by the bank of a river, Saw the tents of the Christians, the tents of the Jesuit Mission. 510 Under a towering oak, that stood in the midst of the village, Knelt the Black Robe chief with his children. A crucifix fastened High on the trunk of the tree, and overshadowed by grape-vines, Looked with its agonized face on the multitude kneeling beneath it.
 This was their rural chapel: aloft,
 through the intricate arches 515
 Of its aerial roof, arose the chant of their vespers,
 Mingling its notes with the soft susur-rus² and sighs of the branches.
 Silent, with heads uncovered, the travellers, nearer approaching, Knelt on the swarded floor and joined in the evening devotions.
 But when the service was done, and the benediction had fallen 520

² whispering

From the hands of the priest, like seed from the hands of the sower, Slowly the reverend man advanced to the strangers, and bade them Welcome; and when they replied, he smiled with benignant expression, Hearing the homelike sounds of his mother-tongue in the forest,
 And with words of kindness conducted them into his wigwam. 525
 There upon mats and skins they reposed, and on cakes of the maize-ear
 Feasted, and slaked their thirst from the water-gourd of the teacher.
 Soon was their story told; and the priest
 with solemnity answered,
 "Not six suns have risen and set since Gabriel, seated
 On this mat by my side, where now the maiden reposes, 530
 Told me this same sad tale; then arose and continued his journey!"
 Soft was the voice of the priest, and he spake with an accent of kindness;
 But on Evangeline's heart fell his words
 as in winter the snowflakes Fall into some lone nest from which the birds have departed.
 "Far to the north he has gone," continued the priest; "but in autumn,
 When the chase is done, will return
 again to the Mission." 536
 Then Evangeline said, and her voice was meek and submissive,
 "Let me remain with thee, for my soul is sad and afflicted."
 So seemed it wise and well unto all;
 and betimes on the morrow,
 Mounting his Mexican steed, with his Indian guides and companions 540
 Homeward Basil returned, and Evangeline stayed at the Mission.
 Slowly, slowly, slowly the days succeeded each other—Days and weeks and months; and the fields of maize that were springing Green from the ground when a stranger
 she came, now waving above her, Lifted their slender shafts, with leaves interlacing and forming 545 Cloisters for mendicant crows and granaries pillaged by squirrels.

Then in the golden weather the maize was husked; and the maidens Blushed at each blood-red ear, for that betokened a lover.
 But at the crooked laughed, and called it a thief in the corn-field.
 Even the blood-red ear to Evangeline brought not her lover. 550
 "Patience!" the priest would say; "have faith, and thy prayer will be answered!"
 Look at this delicate flower that lifts its head from the meadow;
 See how its leaves all point to the north, as true as the magnet:
 It is the compass-flower, that the finger of God has suspended Here on its fragile stalk, to direct the traveller's journey 555
 Over the sea-like, pathless, limitless waste of the desert.
 Such in the soul of man is faith. The blossoms of passion,
 Gay and luxuriant flowers, are brighter
 and fuller of fragrance,
 But they beguile us and lead us astray,
 and their odor is deadly.
 Only this humble plant can guide us here, and hereafter 560 Crown us with asphodel flowers, that are wet with the dews of nepenthe."
 So came the autumn, and passed, and the winter; yet Gabriel came
 not.
 Blossomed the opening spring, and the notes of the robin and blue-bird Sounded sweet upon wold and in wood;
 yet Gabriel came not.
 But on the breath of the summer winds
 a rumor was wafted, 565 Sweeter than song of bird, or hue or odor of blossom:
 Far to the north and east, it said, in the Michigan forests, Gabriel had his lodge by the banks of the Saginaw river.
 And, with returning guides, that sought
 the lakes of St. Lawrence, Saying a sad farewell, Evangeline went from the Mission. 570
 When over weary ways, by long and perilous marches,
 She had attained at length the depths of the Michigan forests,

Found she the hunter's lodge deserted and fallen to ruin!

Thus did the long sad years glide on,
and in seasons and places

Divers and distant far was seen the wandering maiden: 575

Now in the tents of grace of the meek
Moravian Missions,

Now in the noisy camps and the battle-fields of the army,

Now in secluded hamlets, in towns and populous cities.

Like a phantom she came, and passed away unremembered.

Fair was she and young, when in hope began the long journey; 580

Faded was she and old, when in disappointment it ended.

Each succeeding year stole something away from her beauty,

Leaving behind it, broader and deeper,
the gloom and the shadow.

Then there appeared and spread faint streaks of gray o'er her forehead,

Dawn of another life, that broke o'er her earthly horizon, 585

As in the eastern sky the first faint streaks of the morning.

V

In that delightful land which is washed
by the Delaware's waters,

Guarding in sylvan shades the name of Penn the apostle,

Stands on the banks of its beautiful stream the city he founded.

There all the air is balm, and the peach is the emblem of beauty; 590

And the streets still re-echo the names of the trees of the forest,

As if they fain would appease the Dryads whose haunts they molest.

There from the troubled sea had Evangeline landed, an exile,

Finding among the children of Penn a home and a country.

There old René Leblanc had died; and when he departed, 595

Saw at his side only one of all his hundred descendants.

Something at least there was in the friendly streets of the city,

Something that spake to her heart and made her no longer a stranger;

And her ear was pleased with the "Thee" and "Thou" of the Quakers,

For it recalled the past, the old Acadian country, 600

Where all men were equal and all were brothers and sisters.

So, when the fruitless search, the disappointed endeavour,

Ended, to recommence no more upon earth, uncomplaining,

Thither, as leaves to the light, were turned her thoughts and her footsteps.

As from a mountain's top the rainy mists of the morning 605

Roll away, and afar we behold the landscape below us,

Sun-illumined, with shining rivers and cities and hamlets,

So fell the mists from her mind, and she saw the world far below her,

Dark no longer but all illumined with love, and the pathway

Which she had climbed so far, lying smooth and fair in the distance. 610

Gabriel was not forgotten. Within her heart was his image,

Clothed in the beauty of love and youth, as last she beheld him,

Only more beautiful made by his death-
like silence and absence:

Into her thoughts of him time entered not, for it was not;

Over him years had no power; he was not changed but transfigured; 615

He had become to her heart as one who is dead and not absent.

Patience and abnegation of self and devotion to others,

This was the lesson a life of trial and sorrow had taught her.

So was her love diffused, but, like to some odorous spices,

Suffered no waste nor loss though filling the air with aroma. 620

Other hope had she none, nor wish in life, but to follow

Meekly, with reverent steps, the sacred feet of her Saviour.

Thus many years she lived as a Sister of Mercy, frequenting

Lonely and wretched roofs in the crowded lanes of the city, Where distress and want concealed themselves from the sunlight, ⁶²⁵
Where disease and sorrow in garrets languished neglected.
Night after night, when the world was asleep, as the watchman repeated Loud, through the gusty streets, that all was well in the city, High at some lonely window he saw the light of her taper.
Day after day, in the gray of the dawn,
as slow through the suburbs ⁶³⁰ Plodded the German farmer, with flowers and fruits for the market, Met he that meek, pale face, returning home from its watchings.
Then it came to pass that a pestilence fell on the city, Presaged by wondrous signs, and mostly by flocks of wild pigeons Darkening the sun in their flight, with naught in their craws but an acorn.
And, as the tides of the sea arise in the month of September, ⁶³⁶ Flooding some silver stream till it spreads to a lake in the meadow,
So death flooded life, and, o'erflowing
its natural margin, Spread to a brackish lake the silver stream of existence.
Wealth had no power to bribe, nor beauty to charm, the oppressor, ⁶⁴⁰
But all perished alike beneath the scourge of his anger;
Only, alas, the poor, who had neither friends nor attendants, Crept away to die in the almshouse,
home of the homeless.
Then in the suburbs it stood, in the midst of meadows and woodlands;
Now the city surrounds it; but still,
with its gateway and wicket ⁶⁴⁵ Meek, in the midst of splendor, its humble walls seem to echo Softly the words of the Lord, "The poor ye always have with you."
Thither, by night and by day, came the Sister of Mercy. The dying Looked up into her face, and thought, indeed, to behold there Gleams of celestial light encircle her forehead with splendor, ⁶⁵⁰

Such as the artist paints o'er the brows
of saints and apostles,
Or such as hangs by night o'er a city
seen at a distance.
Unto their eyes it seemed the lamps of the city celestial,
Into whose shining gates ere long their spirits would enter.
Thus, on a Sabbath morn, through the streets deserted and silent, ⁶⁵⁵ Wending her quiet way, she entered the door of the almshouse.
Sweet on the summer air was the odor
of flowers in the garden;
And she paused on her way to gather
the fairest among them,
That the dying once more might rejoice
in their fragrance and beauty.
Then, as she mounted the stairs to the corridors, cooled by the east wind, ⁶⁶⁰
Distant and soft on her ear fell the chimes from the belfry of Christ Church,
And, intermingled with these, across the meadows were wafted
Sounds of psalms that were sung by the Swedes in their church at Wicaco.
Soft as descending wings fell the calm of the hour on her spirit; Something within her said, "At length thy trials are ended"; ⁶⁶⁵
And with light in her looks she entered the chambers of sickness.
Noiselessly moved about the assiduous,
careful attendants,
Moistening the feverish lip and the aching brow, and in silence
Closing the sightless eyes of the dead,
and concealing their faces,
Where on their pallets they lay, like drifts of snow by the road-side. ⁶⁷⁰
Many a languid head, upraised as Evangeline entered,
Turned on its pillow of pain to gaze
while she passed, for her presence Fell on their hearts like a ray of the sun on the walls of a prison.
And, as she looked around, she saw how Death, the consoler, Laying his hand upon many a heart,
had healed it for ever. ⁶⁷⁵
Many familiar forms had disappeared
in the night-time;

Vacant their places were, or filled already by strangers.

Suddenly, as if arrested by fear or a feeling of wonder,

Still she stood, with her colorless lips apart, while a shudder

Ran through her frame, and forgotten the flowerets dropped from her fingers, 680

And from her eyes and cheeks the light and bloom of the morning.

Then there escaped from her lips a cry of such terrible anguish

That the dying heard it, and started up from their pillows.

On the pallet before her was stretched the form of an old man.

Long and thin and gray were the locks that shaded his temples; 685

But, as he lay in the morning light, his face for a moment

Seemed to assume once more the forms of its earlier manhood—

So are wont to be changed the faces of those who are dying.

Hot and red on his lips still burned the flush of the fever,

As if life, like the Hebrew, with blood had besprinkled its portals, 690

That the Angel of Death might see the sign and pass over.

Motionless, senseless, dying, he lay, and his spirit exhausted

Seemed to be sinking down through infinite depths in the darkness,

Darkness of slumber and death, for ever sinking and sinking.

Then through those realms of shade, in multiplied reverberations, 695

Heard he that cry of pain; and through the hush that succeeded

Whispered a gentle voice, in accents tender and saint-like,

"Gabriel! O my beloved!" and died away into silence.

Then he beheld, in a dream, once more the home of his childhood;

Green Acadian meadows, with sylvan rivers among them, 700

Village and mountain and woodlands; and, walking under their shadow,

As in the days of her youth, Evangeline rose in his vision.

Tears came into his eyes; and, as slowly he lifted his eyelids,

Vanished the vision away, but Evangeline knelt by his bedside.

Vainly he strove to whisper her name, for the accents unuttered 705

Died on his lips, and their motion revealed what his tongue would have spoken.

Vainly he strove to rise; and Evangeline, kneeling beside him,

Kissed his dying lips, and laid his head on her bosom.

Sweet was the light of his eyes; but it suddenly sank into darkness,

As when a lamp is blown out by a gust of wind at a casement. 710

All was ended now, the hope and the fear and the sorrow,

All the aching of heart, the restless, unsatisfied longing,

All the dull, deep pain, and constant anguish of patience!

And, as she pressed once more the lifeless head to her bosom,

Meekly she bowed her own, and murmured, "Father, I thank thee!" 715

Still stands the forest primeval; but far away from its shadow,

Side by side in their nameless graves, the lovers are sleeping.

Under the humble walls of the little Catholic church-yard,

In the heart of the city, they lie unknown and unnoticed.

Daily the tides of life go ebbing and flowing beside them: 720

Thousands of throbbing hearts, where theirs are at rest and for ever;

Thousands of aching brains, where theirs no longer are busy;

Thousands of toiling hands, where theirs have ceased from their labors;

Thousands of weary feet, where theirs have completed their journey!

Still stands the forest primeval; but under the shade of its branches 725

Dwells another race, with other customs and language.

Only along the shore of the mournful and misty Atlantic Linger a few Acadian peasants whose fathers from exile

 Wandered back to their native land to die in its bosom.
 In the fisherman's cot the wheel and the loom are still busy; 730 Maidens still wear their Norman caps
 and their kirtles of homespun,
 And by the evening fire repeat Evangeline's story,
 While from its rocky caverns the deep-
 voiced, neighbouring ocean Speaks, and in accents disconsolate answers the wail of the forest.

THE SONG OF HIAWATHA

III

HIAWATHA'S CHILDHOOD

Downward through the evening twi-
 light,

In the days that are forgotten,
 In the unremembered ages,
 From the full moon fell Nokomis,
 Fell the beautiful Nokomis, 5
 She a wife but not a mother.

She was sporting with her women,
 Swinging in a swing of grape-vines,
 When her rival, the rejected,
 Full of jealousy and hatred, 10
 Cut the leafy swing asunder,
 Cut in twain the twisted grape-vines,
 And Nokomis fell affrighted Downward through the evening twi-
 light,

On the Muskoday, the meadow, 15
 On the prairie full of blossoms.
 "See! a star falls!" said the people;
 "From the sky a star is falling!"

There among the ferns and mosses,
 There among the prairie lilies, 20
 On the Muskoday, the meadow,
 In the moonlight and the starlight,
 Fair Nokomis bore a daughter.
 And she called her name Wenonah,
 As the first-born of her daughters. 25
 And the daughter of Nokomis
 Grew up like the prairie lilies,
 Grew a tall and slender maiden,
 With the beauty of the moonlight,
 With the beauty of the starlight. 30

And Nokomis warned her often,

Saying oft, and oft repeating,
 "Oh, beware of Mudjekeewis,
 Of the West-Wind, Mudjekeewis;
 Listen not to what he tells you; 35
 Lie not down upon the meadow,
 Stoop not down among the lilies,
 Lest the West-Wind come and harm
 you!"

But she heeded not the warning,
 Heeded not those words of wisdom. 40
 And the West-Wind came at evening,
 Walking lightly o'er the prairie,
 Whispering to the leaves and blossoms,
 Bending low the flowers and grasses,
 Found the beautiful Wenonah, 45
 Lying there among the lilies,
 Wooed her with his words of sweetness,
 Wooed her with his soft caresses,
 Till she bore a son in sorrow,
 Bore a son of love and sorrow. 50

Thus was born my Hiawatha,
 Thus was born the child of wonder;
 But the daughter of Nokomis,
 Hiawatha's gentle mother,
 In her anguish died deserted 55
 By the West-Wind, false and faithless,
 By the heartless Mudjekeewis.

For her daughter, long and loudly
 Wailed and wept the sad Nokomis;
 "Oh that I were dead!" she murmured,
 "Oh that I were dead, as thou art! 61
 No more work, and no more weeping,
 Wahonowin! Wahonowin!"

By the shores of Gitche Gumee,
 By the shining Big-Sea-Water, 65
 Stood the wigwam of Nokomis,
 Daughter of the Moon, Nokomis.
 Dark behind it rose the forest,
 Rose the black and gloomy pine-trees,
 Rose the firs with cones upon them: 70
 Bright before it beat the water,
 Beat the clear and sunny water,
 Beat the shining Big-Sea-Water.

There the wrinkled old Nokomis
 Nursed the little Hiawatha, 75
 Rocked him in his linden cradle,
 Bedded soft in moss and rushes,
 Safely bound with reindeer sinews;
 Stilled his fretful wail by saying,
 "Hush! the Naked Bear will hear thee!"
 Lulled him into slumber, singing, 81
 "Ewa-yea! my little owlet!
 Who is this, that lights the wigwam?
 With his great eyes lights the wigwam?"

Ewa-yea! my little owlet!" 85

Many things Nokomis taught him
Of the stars that shine in heaven;
Showed him Ishkoodah, the comet,
Ishkoodah, with fiery tresses;
Showed the Death-Dance of the spirits,
Warriors with their plumes and war-clubs, 91

Flaring far away to northward
In the frosty nights of Winter;
Showed the broad white road in heaven,
Pathway of the ghosts, the shadows, 95
Running straight across the heavens,
Crowded with the ghosts, the shadows.

At the door on summer evenings
Sat the little Hiawatha; Heard the whispering of the pine-
trees. 100

Heard the lapping of the waters,
Sounds of music, words of wonder;
"Minne-wawa!" said the pine-trees.
"Mudway-aushka!" said the water.

Saw the fire-fly, Wah-wah-taysee, 105
Flitting through the dusk of evening,
With the twinkle of its candle

Lighting up the brakes and bushes,
And he sang the song of children,
Sang the song Nokomis taught him: 110
"Wah-wah-taysee, little fire-fly,
Little, flitting, white-fire insect,
Little, dancing, white-fire creature,
Light me with your little candle,
Ere upon my bed I lay me, 115
Ere in sleep I close my eyelids!"

Saw the moon rise from the water
Rippling, rounding from the water,
Saw the flecks and shadows on it,
Whispered, "What is that, Nokomis?"
And the good Nokomis answered: 121
"Once a warrior, very angry,
Seized his grandmother, and threw her
Up into the sky at midnight;
Right against the moon he threw her;
'Tis her body that you see there." 126

Saw the rainbow in the heaven,
In the eastern sky, the rainbow,
Whispered, "What is that, Nokomis?"
And the good Nokomis answered: 130
"'Tis the heaven of flowers you see
there;

All the wild-flowers of the forest,
All the lilies of the prairie,
When on earth they fade and perish,
Blossom in that heaven above us." 135

When he heard the owls at midnight, Hooting, laughing in the forest,
"What is that?" he cried in terror,
"What is that," he said, "Nokomis?"
And the good Nokomis answered: 140
"That is but the owl and owlet,
Talking in their native language,
Talking, scolding at each other."

Then the little Hiawatha
Learned of every bird its language, 145 Learned their names and all their secrets,

How they built their nests in Summer,
Where they hid themselves in Winter,
Talked with them whene'er he met
them,

Called them "Hiawatha's Chickens."
Of all beasts he learned the language, 151

Learned their names and all their
secrets,

How the beavers built their lodges,
Where the squirrels hid their acorns,
How the reindeer ran so swiftly, 155
Why the rabbit was so timid,
Talked with them whene'er he met
them,

Called them "Hiawatha's Brothers."

Then Iagoo, the great boaster,
He the marvellous story-teller, 160
He the traveller and the talker,
He the friend of old Nokomis,
Made a bow for Hiawatha;
From a branch of ash he made it,
From an oak-bough made the arrows, Tipped with flint, and winged with feathers, 166

And the cord he made of deer-skin.

Then he said to Hiawatha:
"Go, my son, into the forest,
Where the red deer herd together, 170
Kill for us a famous roebuck, Kill for us a deer with antlers!"

Forth into the forest straightway
All alone walked Hiawatha
Proudly, with his bow and arrows; 175
And the birds sang round him, o'er him,
"Do not shoot us, Hiawatha!"
Sang the robin, the Opechee,
Sang the bluebird, the Owaissa,
"Do not shoot us, Hiawatha!" 180

Up the oak-tree, close beside him,
Sprang the squirrel, Adjidaumo,
In and out among the branches,

Coughed and chattered from the oak-tree,
 Laughed, and said between his laughing, 185

"Do not shoot me, Hiawatha!"

And the rabbit from his pathway
 Leaped aside, and at a distance
 Sat erect upon his haunches,
 Half in fear and half in frolic, 190
 Saying to the little hunter,
 "Do not shoot me, Hiawatha!"

But he heeded not, nor heard them,
 For his thoughts were with the red deer;
 On their tracks his eyes were fastened, 195

Leading downward to the river,
 To the ford across the river,
 And as one in slumber walked he.

Hidden in the alder-bushes,
 There he waited till the deer came, 200
 Till he saw two antlers lifted,
 Saw two eyes look from the thicket,
 Saw two nostrils point to windward,
 And a deer came down the pathway,
 Flecked with leafy light and shadow.
 And his heart within him fluttered, 206
 Trembled like the leaves above him,
 Like the birch-leaf palpitated,
 As the deer came down the pathway.

Then, upon one knee uprising, 210
 Hiawatha aimed an arrow;
 Scarce a twig moved with his motion,
 Scarce a leaf was stirred or rustled,
 But the wary roebuck started,
 Stamped with all his hoofs together, 215
 Listened with one foot uplifted,
 Leaped as if to meet the arrow;
 Ah! the singing, fatal arrow;
 Like a wasp it buzzed and stung him!

Dead he lay there in the forest, 220
 By the ford across the river;
 Beat his timid heart no longer,
 But the heart of Hiawatha
 Throbbled and shouted and exulted,
 As he bore the red deer homeward, 225
 And Iagoo and Nokomis
 Hailed his coming with applauses.

From the red deer's hide Nokomis
 Made a cloak for Hiawatha,
 From the red deer's flesh Nokomis 230
 Made a banquet in his honor.
 All the village came and feasted,
 All the guests praised Hiawatha,

Called him Strong-Heart, Soan-ge-tahal

Called him Loon-Heart, 'Mahn-go-taysee! 235

VII

HIAWATHA'S SAILING

"Give me of your bark, O Birch-Tree,
 Of your yellow bark, O Birch-Tree!
 Growing by the rushing river,
 Tall and stately in the valley!
 I a light canoe will build me, 5
 Build a swift Cheemaun for sailing,
 That shall float upon the river,
 Like a yellow leaf in Autumn,
 Like a yellow water-lily!

"Lay aside your cloak, O Birch-Tree! 10

Lay aside your white-skin wrapper,
 For the Summer-time is coming,
 And the sun is warm in heaven,
 And you need no white-skin wrapper!"

Thus aloud cried Hiawatha 15
 In the solitary forest,
 By the rushing Taquamenaw,
 When the birds were singing gayly,
 In the Moon of Leaves were singing,
 And the sun, from sleep awaking, 20
 Started up and said, "Behold me!
 Gheezis, the great Sun, behold me!"

And the tree with all its branches
 Rustled in the breeze of morning,
 Saying, with a sigh of patience, 25
 "Take my cloak, O Hiawatha!"

With his knife the tree he girdled
 Just beneath its lowest branches,
 Just above the roots, he cut it,
 Till the sap came oozing outward; 30
 Down the trunk from top to bottom,
 Sheer he cleft the bark asunder,
 With a wooden wedge he raised it,
 Stripped it from the trunk unbroken.

"Give me of your boughs, O Cedar! 35
 Of your strong and pliant branches,
 My canoe to make more steady,
 Make more strong and firm beneath me!"

Through the summit of the Cedar Went a sound, a cry of horror, 40
 Went a murmur of resistance;
 But it whispered, bending downward,
 "Take my boughs, O Hiawatha!"

Down he hewed the boughs of cedar,
Shaped them straightway to a framework, 45

Like two bows he formed and shaped
them,

Like two bended bows together.

"Give me of your roots, O Tamarack!
Of your fibrous roots, O Larch-Tree!

My canoe to bind together, 50
So to bind the ends together

That the water may not enter,
That the river may not wet me!"

And the Larch, with all its fibres,
Shivered in the air of morning, 55

Touched his forehead with its tassels,
Said, with one long sigh of sorrow,

"Take them all, O Hiawatha!"

From the earth he tore the fibres,
Tore the tough roots of the Larch-
Tree, 60

Closely sewed the bark together,
Bound it closely to the framework.

"Give me of your balm, O Fir-Tree!

Of your balsam and your resin,
So to close the seams together 65

That the water may not enter,
That the river may not wet me!"

And the Fir-Tree, tall and sombre, Sobbed through all its robes of dark-
ness,

Rattled like a shore with pebbles, 70
Answered wailing, answered weeping,

"Take my balm, O Hiawatha!"

And he took the tears of balsam,
Took the resin of the Fir-Tree, Smeared therewith each seam and fissure, 75

Made each crevice safe from water.

"Give me of your quills, O Hedgehog!

All your quills, O Kagh, the Hedgehog!
I will make a necklace of them,

Make a girdle for my beauty, 80
And two stars to deck her bosom!"

From a hollow tree the Hedgehog
With his sleepy eyes looked at him,

Shot his shining quills, like arrows,
Saying, with a drowsy murmur, 85

Through the tangle of his whiskers,
"Take my quills, O Hiawatha!"

From the ground the quills he gathered,

All the little shining arrows,

Stained them red and blue and yellow, 90

With the juice of roots and berries;
Into his canoe he wrought them,

Round its waist a shining girdle,
Round its bows a gleaming necklace,

On its breast two stars resplendent. 95
Thus the Birch Canoe was builded

In the valley, by the river,

In the bosom of the forest;

And the forest's life was in it,

All its mystery and its magic, 100

All the lightness of the birch-tree,

All the toughness of the cedar,

All the larch's supple sinews;

And it floated on the river,

Like a yellow leaf in Autumn, 105

Like a yellow water-lily.

Paddles none had Hiawatha,

Paddles none he had or needed,

For his thoughts as paddles served him,

And his wishes served to guide him; 110

Swift or slow at will he glided,

Veered to right or left at pleasure.

Then he called aloud to Kwasind,

To his friend, the strong man, Kwasind.

Saying, "Help me clear this river 115

Of its sunken logs and sand-bars."

Straight into the river Kwasind

Plunged as if he were an otter,

Dived as if he were a beaver,

Stood up to his waist in water, 120

To his arm-pits in the river,

Swam and shouted in the river,

Tugged at sunken logs and branches,

With his hands he scooped the sand-
bars,

With his feet the ooze and tangle. 125

And thus sailed my Hiawatha

Down the rushing Taquamenaw,

Sailed through all its bends and wind-
ings,

Sailed through all its deeps and shal-lows,

While his friend, the strong man,
Kwasind, 130

Swam the deeps, the shallows waded.

Up and down the river went they,

In and out among its islands,

Cleared its bed of root and sand-bar,

Dragged the dead trees from its channel, 130

Made its passage safe and certain,

Made a pathway for the people,

From its springs among the mountains,
To the waters of Pauwating
To the bay of Taquamenaw. 140

X

HIAWATHA'S WOOING

"As unto the bow the cord is,
So unto the man is woman
Though she bends him, she obeys him,
Though she draws him, yet she follows,
Useless each without the other!" 5

Thus the youthful Hiawatha
Said within himself and pondered,
Much perplexed by various feelings,
Listless, longing, hoping, fearing,
Dreaming still of Minnehaha, 10
Of the lovely Laughing Water,
In the land of the Dacotahs.

"Wed a maiden of your people,"
Warning said the old Nokomis;
"Go not eastward, go not westward, 15
For a stranger, whom we know not!
Like a fire upon the hearth-stone
Is a neighbor's homely daughter,
Like the starlight or the moonlight
Is the handsomest of strangers!" 20

Thus dissuading spake Nokomis,
And my Hiawatha answered
Only this: "Dear old Nokomis,
Very pleasant is the firelight,
But I like the starlight better, 25
Better do I like the moonlight!"

Gravely then said old Nokomis:
"Bring not here an idle maiden,
Bring not here a useless woman,
Hands unskilful, feet unwilling; 30
Bring a wife with nimble fingers,
Heart and hand that move together,
Feet that run on willing errands!"

Smiling answered Hiawatha:
"In the land of the Dacotahs 35
Lives the Arrow-maker's daughter,
Minnehaha, Laughing Water,
Handsomest of all the women
I will bring her to your wigwam,
She shall run upon your errands, 40
Be your starlight, moonlight, firelight,
Be the sunlight of my people!"

Still dissuading said Nokomis:
"Bring not to my lodge a stranger
From the land of the Dacotahs! 45
Very fierce are the Dacotahs,

Often is there war between us,
There are feuds yet unforgotten,
Wounds that ache and still may open!"

Laughing answering Hiawatha: 50
"For that reason, if no other,
Would I wed the fair Dacotah,
That our tribes might be united,
That old feuds might be forgotten,
And old wounds be healed forever!" 55

Thus departed Hiawatha
To the land of the Dacotahs,
To the land of handsome women;
Striding over moor and meadow,
Through interminable forests, 60
Through uninterrupted silence.

With his moccasins of magic,
At each stride a mile he measured;
Yet the way seemed long before him,
And his heart outran his footsteps; 65
And he journeyed without resting,
Till he heard the cataract's laughter,
Heard the Falls of Minnehaha
Calling to him through the silence.

"Pleasant is the sound!" he murmured,
"Pleasant is the voice that calls me!" 71

On the outskirts of the forest,
Twixt the shadow and the sunshine,
Herds of fallow deer were feeding,
But they saw not Hiawatha; 75
To his bow he whispered, "Fail not!"
To his arrow whispered, "Swerve not!"
Sent it singing on its errand,
To the red heart of the roebuck;
Threw the deer across his shoulder, 80
And sped forward without pausing.

At the doorway of his wigwam
Sat the ancient Arrow-maker,
In the land of the Dacotahs,
Making arrow-heads of jasper, 85
Arrow-heads of chalcedony.
At his side, in all her beauty,
Sat the lovely Minnehaha,
Sat his daughter, Laughing Water.
Plaiting mats of flags and rushes; 90
Of the past the old man's thoughts were,
And the maiden's of the future.

He was thinking, as he sat there,
Of the days when with such arrows
He had struck the deer and bison, 95
On the Muskoday, the meadow;
Shot the wild goose, flying southward,
On the wing, the clamorous Wawa;
Thinking of the great war-parties,
How they came to buy his arrows, 100

Could not fight without his arrows.
 Ah, no more such noble warriors
 Could be found on earth as they were!
 Now the men were all like women,
 Only used their tongues for weapons!

She was thinking of a hunter, 106
 From another tribe and country,
 Young and tall and very handsome,
 Who one morning, in the Spring-time,
 Came to buy her father's arrows, 110
 Sat and rested in the wigwam,
 Lingered long about the doorway,
 Looking back as he departed.
 She had heard her father praise him,
 Praise his courage and his wisdom; 115
 Would he come again for arrows
 To the Falls of Minnehaha?
 On the mat her hands lay idle,
 And her eyes were very dreamy.

Through their thoughts they heard a footstep, 120
 Heard a rustling in the branches,
 And with glowing cheek and forehead,
 With the deer upon his shoulders,
 Suddenly from out the woodlands
 Hiawatha stood before them. 125

Straight the ancient Arrow-maker
 Looked up gravely from his labor,
 Laid aside the unfinished arrow,
 Bade him enter at the doorway,
 Saying, as he rose to meet him, 130
 "Hiawatha, you are welcome!"

At the feet of Laughing Water
 Hiawatha laid his burden,
 Threw the red deer from his shoulders;
 And the maiden looked up at him, 135
 Looked up from her mat of rushes,
 Said with gentle look and accent,
 "You are welcome, Hiawatha!"

Very spacious was the wigwam,
 Made of deer-skin dressed and whitened, 140

With the Gods of the Dacotahs
 Drawn and painted on its curtains,
 And so tall the doorway, hardly Hiawatha stooped to enter,
 Hardly touched his eagle-feathers 145
 As he entered at the doorway.

Then uprose the Laughing Water,
 From the ground fair Minnehaha,
 Laid aside her mat unfinished, 149
 Brought forth food and set before them,
 Water brought them from the brooklet,
 Gave them food in earthen vessels,

Gave them drink in bowls of bass-wood,
 Listened while the guest was speaking,
 Listened while her father answered, 155
 But not once her lips she opened,
 Not a single word she uttered.

Yes, as in a dream she listened
 To the words of Hiawatha,
 As he talked of old Nokomis, 160
 Who had nursed him in his childhood,
 As he told of his companions,
 Chibiabos, the musician,
 And the very strong man, Kwasind,
 And of happiness and plenty 165
 In the land of the Ojibways,
 In the pleasant land and peaceful.

"After many years of warfare,
 Many years of strife and bloodshed,
 There is peace between the Ojibways 170
 And the tribe of the Dacotahs."
 Thus continued Hiawatha,
 And then added, speaking slowly,
 "That this peace may last forever,
 And our hands be clasped more closely
 And our hearts be more united, 176
 Give me as my wife this maiden,
 Minnehaha, Laughing Water,
 Loveliest of Dacotah women!"

And the ancient Arrow-maker 180
 Paused a moment ere he answered,
 Smoked a little while in silence,
 Looked at Hiawatha proudly,
 Fondly looked at Laughing Water,
 And made answer very gravely: 185
 "Yes, if Minnehaha wishes;
 Let your heart speak, Minnehaha!"

And the lovely Laughing Water
 Seemed more lovely, as she stood there,
 Neither willing nor reluctant, 190
 As she went to Hiawatha,
 Softly took the seat beside him,
 While she said, and blushed to say it,
 "I will follow you, my husband!"

This was Hiawatha's wooing! 195
 Thus it was he won the daughter Of the ancient Arrow-maker,
 In the land of the Dacotahs!

From the wigwam he departed,
 Leading with him Laughing Water; 200
 Hand in hand they went together,
 Through the woodland and the meadow,
 Left the old man standing lonely
 At the doorway of his wigwam,
 Heard the Falls of Minnehaha 205
 Calling to them from the distance,

Crying to them from afar off,
 "Fare thee well, O Minnehaha!"

And the ancient Arrow-maker
 Turned again unto his labor, 210
 Sat down by his sunny doorway,
 Murmuring to himself, and saying:
 "Thus it is our daughters leave us,
 Those we love, and those who love us!
 Just when they have learned to help us, 215

When we are old and lean upon them,
 Comes a youth with flaunting feathers,
 With his flute of reeds, a stranger
 Wanders piping through the village,
 Beckons to the fairest maiden, 220
 And she follows where he leads her,
 Leaving all things for the stranger!"

Pleasant was the journey homeward,
 Through interminable forests,
 Over meadow, over mountain, 225
 Over river, hill, and hollow.
 Short it seemed to Hiawatha,
 Though they journeyed very slowly,
 Though his pace he checked and slack-
 ened

To the steps of Laughing Water. 230

Over wide and rushing rivers
 In his arms he bore the maiden;
 Light he thought her as a feather,
 As the plume upon his head-gear;
 Cleared the tangled pathway for her, 235
 Bent aside the swaying branches,
 Made at night a lodge of branches,
 And a bed with boughs of hemlock,
 And a fire before the doorway
 With the dry cones of the pine-tree. 240

All the travelling winds went with
 them,

O'er the meadow, through the forest:
 All the stars of night looked at them,
 Watched with sleepless eyes their slumber;

From his ambush in the oak-tree 245
 Peeped the squirrel, Adjidaumo,
 Watched with eager eyes the lovers;
 And the rabbit, the Wabasso,
 Scampered from the path before them,
 Peering, peeping from his burrow, 250
 Sat erect upon his haunches,
 Watched with curious eyes the lovers.

Pleasant was the journey homeward!
 All the birds sang loud and sweetly
 Songs of happiness and heart's-ease; 255
 Sang the bluebird, the Owaisa,

"Happy are you, Hiawatha, Having such a wife to love you!"
 Sang the robin, the Opechee,
 "Happy are you, Laughing Water, 260 Having such a noble husband!"

From the sky the sun benignant Looked upon them through the branches,
 Saying to them, "O my children,
 Love is sunshine, hate is shadow, 265
 Life is chequered shade and sunshine,
 Rule by love, O Hiawatha!"

From the sky the moon looked at
 them,

Filled the lodge with mystic splendors,
 Whispered to them, "O my children, 270
 Day is restless, night is quiet,
 Man imperious, woman feeble;
 Half is mine, although I follow;
 Rule by patience, Laughing Water!"

Thus it was they journeyed homeward; 275

Thus it was that Hiawatha
 To the lodge of old Nokomis Brought the moonlight, starlight, fire-
 light,

Brought the sunshine of his people,
 Minnehaha, Laughing Water, 280
 Handsomest of all the women
 In the land of the Dacotahs,
 In the land of handsome women.

THE FAMINE

O the long and dreary Winter!
 O the cold and cruel Winter!
 Ever thicker, thicker, thicker Froze the ice on lake and river,
 Ever deeper, deeper, deeper 5
 Fell the snow o'er all the landscape,
 Fell the covering snow, and drifted
 Through the forest, round the village.

Hardly from his buried wigwam
 Could the hunter force a passage; 10
 With his mittens and his snow-shoes
 Vainly walked he through the forest, Sought for bird or beast and found none,

Saw no track of deer or rabbit,
 In the snow beheld no footprints, 15
 In the ghastly, gleaming forest
 Fell, and could not rise from weakness,

Perished there from cold and hunger.

O the famine and the fever!
O the wasting of the famine! 20
O the blasting of the fever!
O the wailing of the children;
O the anguish of the women!

All the earth was sick and famished;
Hungry was the air around them, 25
Hungry was the sky above them,
And the hungry stars in heaven
Like the eyes of wolves glared at them!

Into Hiawatha's wigwam
Came two other guests as silent 30
As the ghosts were, and as gloomy,
Waited not to be invited,
Did not parley at the doorway,
Sat there without word of welcome
In the seat of Laughing Water; 35
Looked with haggard eyes and hollow
At the face of Laughing Water.

And the foremost said: "Behold me!
I am Famine, Bukadawin!"
And the other said: "Behold me! 40
I am Fever, Ahkosewin!"

And the lovely Minnehaha
Shuddered as they looked upon her,
Shuddered at the words they uttered,
Lay down on her bed in silence, 45
Hid her face, but made no answer:
Lay there trembling, freezing, burning
At the looks they cast upon her,
At the fearful words they uttered.

Forth into the empty forest 50
Rushed the maddened Hiawatha;
In his heart was deadly sorrow,
In his face a stony firmness;
On his brow the sweat of anguish
Started, but it froze and fell not. 55

Wrapped in furs and armed for hunting,

With his mighty bow of ash-tree,
With his quiver full of arrows,
With his mittens, Minjekahwun,
Into the vast and vacant forest 60
On his snow-shoes strode he forward.

"Gitche Manito, the Mighty!"
Cried he with his face uplifted
In that bitter hour of anguish,
"Give your children food, O father! 65
Give us food, or we must perish!
Give me food for Minnehaha,
For my dying Minnehaha!"

Through the far-resounding forest,
Through the forest vast and vacant 70

Rang that cry of desolation,
But there came no other answer
Than the echo of his crying,
Than the echo of the woodlands,
"Minnehaha! Minnehaha!" 75

All day long roved Hiawatha
In that melancholy forest,
Through the shadow of whose thickets,
In the pleasant days of Summer,
Of that ne'er forgotten Summer, 80
He had brought his young wife homeward

From the land of the Dacotahs;
When the birds sang in the thickets,
And the streamlets laughed and glistened,

And the air was full of fragrance, 85
And the lovely Laughing Water
Said with voice that did not tremble,
"I will follow you, my husband!"

In the wigwam with Nokomis,
With those gloomy guests that watched her, 90

With the Famine and the Fever,
She was lying, the Beloved,
She the dying Minnehaha.

"Hark!" she said; "I hear a rushing,
Hear a roaring and a rushing, 95
Hear the Falls of Minnehaha Calling to me from a distance!"

"No, my child!" said old Nokomis,
" 'Tis the night-wind in the pine-trees!"

"Look!" she said; "I see my father 100
Standing lonely at his doorway,
Beckoning to me from his wigwam
In the land of the Dacotahs!"

"No, my child!" said old Nokomis,
" 'Tis the smoke, that waves and beckons!" 105

"Ah!" said she, "the eyes of Pauguk
Glare upon me in the darkness,
I can feel his icy fingers
Clasping mine amid the darkness!
Hiawatha! Hiawatha!" 110

And the desolate Hiawatha,
Far away amid the forest,
Miles away among the mountains,
Heard that sudden cry of anguish,
Heard the voice of Minnehaha 115
Calling to him in the darkness,
"Hiawatha! Hiawatha!"

Over snow-fields waste and pathless,
Under snow-encumbered branches,
Homeward hurried Hiawatha, 120

Empty-handed, heavy-hearted,
 Heard Nokomis moaning, wailing:
 "Wahonowin! Wahonowin!
 Would that I had perished for you,
 Would that I were dead as you are! 125
 Wahonowin! Wahonowin!"

And he rushed into the wigwam,
 Saw the old Nokomis slowly
 Rocking to and fro and moaning,
 Saw his lovely Minnehaha 130
 Lying dead and cold before him,
 And his bursting heart within him
 Uttered such a cry of anguish,
 That the forest moaned and shuddered,
 That the very stars in heaven 135
 Shook and trembled with his anguish.

Then he sat down, still and speech-
 less,

On the bed of Minnehaha,
 At the feet of Laughing Water,
 At those willing feet, that never 140
 More would lightly run to meet him,
 Never more would lightly follow.

With both hands his face he covered,
 Seven long days and nights he sat there,
 As if in a swoon he sat there, 145
 Speechless, motionless, unconscious
 Of the daylight or the darkness.

Then they buried Minnehaha;
 In the snow a grave they made her,
 In the forest deep and darksome, 150
 Underneath the moaning hemlocks;
 Clothed her in her richest garments,
 Wrapped her in her robes of ermine,
 Covered her with snow, like ermine;
 Thus they buried Minnehaha. 155

And at night a fire was lighted,
 On her grave four times was kindled,
 For her soul upon its journey
 To the Islands of the Blessed.
 From his doorway Hiawatha 160
 Saw it burning in the forest,
 Lighting up the gloomy hemlocks;
 From his sleepless bed uprising,
 From the bed of Minnehaha,
 Stood and watched it at the doorway,
 That it might not be extinguished, 166
 Might not leave her in the darkness.

"Farewell!" said he, "Minnehaha!
 Farewell, O my Laughing Water!
 All my heart is buried with you, 170
 All my thoughts go onward with you!
 Come not back again to labor,
 Come not back again to suffer,

Where the Famine and the Fever
 Wear the heart and waste the body. 175
 Soon my task will be completed,
 Soon your footsteps I shall follow
 To the Islands of the Blessed,
 To the Kingdom of Ponemah,
 To the Land of the Hereafter!" 180

MY LOST YOUTH

Often I think of the beautiful town¹
 That is seated by the sea;
 Often in thought go up and down
 The pleasant streets of that dear old town,
 And my youth comes back to me. 5
 And a verse of a Lapland song
 Is haunting my memory still:
 "A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long,
 long thoughts." 10

I can see the shadowy lines of its trees,
 And catch, in sudden gleams, 11
 The sheen of the far-surrounding seas,
 And islands that were the Hesperides
 Of all my boyish dreams.
 And the burden of that old song, 15
 It murmurs and whispers still:
 "A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long,
 long thoughts." 20

I remember the black wharves and the slips,
 And the sea-tides tossing free; 20
 And Spanish sailors with bearded lips,
 And the beauty and mystery of the ships,
 And the magic of the sea.
 And the voice of that wayward
 song
 Is singing and saying still: 25
 "A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long,
 long thoughts." 30

I remember the bulwarks by the shore,
 And the fort upon the hill;
 The sunrise gun, with its hollow roar, 30
 The drum-beat repeated o'er and o'er,
 And the bugle wild and shrill.
 And the music of that old song

Throbs in my memory still:
 "A boy's will is the wind's will, 35
 And the thoughts of youth are long,
 long thoughts."

I remember the sea-fight far away,
 How it thundered o'er the tide!
 And the dead captains, as they lay
 In their graves, o'erlooking the tranquil 40 bay
 Where they in battle died.
 And the sound of that mournful
 song
 Goes through me with a thrill:
 "A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long,
 long thoughts." 45

I can see the breezy dome of groves,
 The shadows of Deering's Woods;
 And the friendships old and the early loves Come back with a Sabbath sound, as of doves
 In quiet neighborhoods. 50
 And the verse of that sweet old
 song,
 It flutters and murmurs still:
 "A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long,
 long thoughts."

I remember the gleams and glooms that dart 55
 Across the school-boy's brain;
 The song and the silence in the heart,
 That in part are prophecies, and in part
 Are longings wild and vain.
 And the voice of that fitful song 60
 Sings on, and is never still:
 "A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long,
 long thoughts."

There are things of which I may not speak;
 There are dreams that cannot die; 65
 There are thoughts that make the strong heart weak,
 And bring a pallor into the cheek,
 And a mist before the eye.
 And the words of that fatal song

Come over me like a chill: 70
 "A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long,
 long thoughts."

Strange to me now are the forms I meet
 When I visit the dear old town;
 But the native air is pure and sweet, 75
 And the trees that o'ershadow each well-known street,
 As they balance up and down,
 Are singing the beautiful song,
 Are sighing and whispering still:
 "A boy's will is the wind's will, 80
 And the thoughts of youth are long,
 long thoughts."

And Deering's Woods are fresh and fair,
 And with joy that is almost pain
 My heart goes back to wander there,
 And among the dreams of the days that were, 85
 I find my lost youth again.
 And the strange and beautiful
 song,
 The groves are repeating it still:
 "A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long,
 long thoughts." 90

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR

Between the dark and the daylight,
 When the night is beginning to lower,
 Comes a pause in the day's occupations,
 That is known as the Children's Hour.

I hear in the chamber above me 5
 The patter of little feet,
 The sound of a door that is opened,
 And voices soft and sweet.

From my study I see in the lamplight,
 Descending the broad hall stair, 10
 Grave Alice, and laughing Allegra,
 And Edith with golden hair.

A whisper, and then a silence:
 Yet I know by their merry eyes
 They are plotting and planning together
 To take me by surprise. 16

A sudden rush from the stairway,
 A sudden raid from the hall!
 By three doors left unguarded
 They enter my castle wall! 20

They climb up into my turret
 O'er the arms and back of my chair;
 If I try to escape, they surround me;
 They seem to be everywhere.

They almost devour me with kisses, 25
 Their arms about me entwine,
 Till I think of the Bishop of Bingen
 In his Mouse-Tower on the Rhine!

Do you think, O blue-eyed banditti,
 Because you have scaled the wall, 30
 Such an old mustache as I am
 Is not a match for you all!

I have you fast in my fortress,
 And will not let you depart,
 But put you down into the dungeon 35
 In the round-tower of my heart.

And there will I keep you forever,
 Yes, forever and a day,
 Till the walls shall crumble to ruin,
 And molder in dust away. 40

PAUL REVERE'S RIDE

Listen, my children, and you shall hear
 Of the midnight ride of Paul Revere,
 On the eighteenth of April, in Seventy-five;
 Hardly a man is now alive
 Who remembers that famous day and year. 5

He said to his friend, "If the British march
 By land or sea from the town tonight,
 Hang a lantern aloft in the belfry arch
 Of the North Church tower as a signal
 light,—
 One, if by land, and two, if by sea; 10
 And I on the opposite shore will be,
 Ready to ride and spread the alarm Through every Middlesex village and farm,
 For the country folk to be up and to arm."

Then he said, "Good night!" and with muffled oar 15
 Silently rowed to the Charlestown
 shore,

Just as the moon rose over the bay,
 Where swinging wide at her moorings
 lay
 The Somerset, British man-of-war;
 A phantom ship, with each mast and spar 20

Across the moon like a prison bar,
 And a huge black hulk that was magnified
 By its own reflection in the tide.

Meanwhile, his friend, through alley and street, 24
 Wanders and watches with eager ears,
 Till in the silence around him he hears
 The muster of men at the barrack door,
 The sound of arms, and the tramp of feet,
 And the measured tread of the gren-adiers,
 Marching down to their boats on the shore. 30

Then he climbed the tower of the Old North Church,
 By the wooden stairs, with stealthy
 tread,
 To the belfry chamber overhead,
 And startled the pigeons from their perch
 On the somber rafters, that round him made 35
 Masses and moving shapes of shade,—
 By the trembling ladder, steep and tall,
 To the highest window in the wall,
 Where he paused to listen and look down

A moment on the roofs of the town, 40
 And the moonlight flowing over all.

Beneath, in the churchyard, lay the dead,
 In their night-encampment on the hill,
 Wrapped in silence so deep and still
 That he could hear, like a sentinel's
 tread, 45
 The watchful night-wind, as it went Creeping along from tent to tent,
 And seeming to whisper, "All is well!"
 A moment only he feels the spell

Of the place and the hour, and the secret dread 50
Of the lonely belfry and the dead;
For suddenly all his thoughts are bent
On a shadowy something far away,
Where the river widens to meet the bay,—

A line of black that bends and floats 55
On the rising tide, like a bridge of boats.

Meanwhile, impatient to mount and ride,

Booted and spurred, with a heavy stride
On the opposite shore walked Paul Revere.

Now he patted his horse's side, 60
Now gazed at the landscape far and near,

Then, impetuous, stamped the earth,
And turned and tightened his saddle-girth;

But mostly he watched with eager search

The belfry-tower of the Old North
Church, 65

As it rose above the graves on the hill, Lonely and spectral and sombre and still.

And lo! as he looks, on the belfry's height

A glimmer, and then a gleam of light!
He springs to the saddle, the bridle he turns, 70

But lingers and gazes, till full on his sight

A second lamp in the belfry burns!

A hurry of hoofs in a village street,
A shape in the moonlight, a bulk in the dark,

And beneath, from the pebbles, in passing, a spark 75

Struck out by a steed flying fearless and fleet:

That was all! And yet, through the gloom and the light,

The fate of a nation was riding that
night;

And the spark struck out by that steed,
in his flight,

Kindled the land into flame with its heat. 80

He has left the village and mounted the steep,

And beneath him, tranquil and broad and deep,

Is the Mystic, meeting the ocean tides;
And under the alders, that skirt its edge,

Now soft on the sand, now loud on the ledge, 85

Is heard the tramp of his steed as he rides.

It was twelve by the village clock,
When he crossed the bridge into Medford town.

He heard the crowing of the cock,
And the barking of the farmer's dog, 90
And felt the damp of the river fog,
That rises after the sun goes down.

It was one by the village clock,
When he galloped into Lexington.

He saw the gilded weathercock 95
Swim in the moonlight as he passed,
And the meeting-house windows, blank
and bare,

Gaze at him with a spectral glare,
As if they already stood aghast

At the bloody work they would look upon. 100

It was two by the village clock,
When he came to the bridge in Concord town.

He heard the bleating of the flock,
And the twitter of birds among the
trees,

And felt the breath of the morning
breeze 105

Blowing over the meadows brown.
And one ¹ was safe and asleep in his bed

Who at the bridge would be first to fall,
Who that day would be lying dead,

Pierced by a British musket-ball. 110

You know the rest. In the books you have read,

How the British Regulars fired and fled,—

How the farmers gave them ball for ball,

From behind each fence and farm-yard
wall,

Chasing the red-coats down the lane, 115
Then crossing the fields to emerge again
Under the trees at the turn of the road,
And only pausing to fire and load.

So through the night rode Paul Revere;
And so through the night went his cry of alarm 120

To every Middlesex village and farm,—
A cry of defiance and not of fear,
A voice in the darkness, a knock at the
door,

And a word that shall echo forever-
more!

For, borne on the night-wind of the Past, 125

Through all our history, to the last,
In the hour of darkness and peril and need,

The people will waken and listen to hear

The hurrying hoof-beats of that steed,
And the midnight message of Paul Revere. 130

KING ROBERT OF SICILY

Robert of Sicily, brother of Pope
Urbane

And Valmond, Emperor of Allemaine,
Appareled in magnificent attire,
With retinue of many a knight and squire,

On St. John's eve,¹ at vespers, proudly sat 5

And heard the priests chant the Magni-ficat.

And as he listened, o'er and o'er again
Repeated, like a burden or refrain,

He caught the words, "Deposuit potentes

De sede, et exaltavit humiles;" 10

And slowly lifting up his kingly head
He to a learned clerk beside him said,

"What mean these words?" The clerk made answer meet,

"He has put down the mighty from
their seat,

And has exalted them of low degree." 15
Thereat King Robert muttered scorn-
fully,

"'Tis well that such seditious words are sung

Only by priests and in the Latin tongue;

For unto priests and people be it known,
There is no power can push me from my throne!" 20

And leaning back, he yawned and fell asleep,

Lulled by the chant monotonous and deep.

When he awoke, it was already night;
The church was empty, and there was no light,

Save where the lamps, that glimmered few and faint, 25

Lighted a little space before some saint.
He started from his seat and gazed around,

But saw no living thing and heard no
sound.

He groped towards the door, but it was locked;

He cried aloud, and listened, and then knocked, 30

And uttered awful threatenings and complaints,

And imprecations upon men and saints.
The sounds reëchoed from the roof and walls

As if dead priests were laughing in their stalls!

At length the sexton hearing from without 35

The tumult of the knocking and the shout,

And thinking thieves were in the house
of prayer,

Came with his lantern, asking, "Who is
there?"

Half choked with rage, King Robert fiercely said,

"Open: 'tis I, the King! Art thou afraid?" 40

The frightened sexton, muttering, with a curse,

"This is some drunken vagabond, or worse!"

Turned the great key and flung the portal wide;

A man rushed by him at a single stride,

Haggard, half naked, without hat or cloak, 45

Who neither turned, nor looked at him, nor spoke,
But leaped into the blackness of the
night,
And vanished like a specter from his sight.

Robert of Sicily, brother of Pope
Urbane

And Valmond, Emperor of Allemaine,
Despoiled of his magnificent attire, 51
Bareheaded, breathless, and besprent with mire,

With sense of wrong and outrage
desperate,
Strode on and thundered at the palace
gate;

Rushed through the courtyard, thrusting in his rage 55

To right and left each seneschal and page,

And hurried up the broad and sounding stair,

His white face ghastly in the torches' glare.

From hall to hall he passed with breathless speed;

Voices and cries he heard, but did not heed, 60

Until at last he reached the banquet-room,

Blazing with light, and breathing with perfume.

There on the dais sat another king,
Wearing his robes, his crown, his signet-
ring,

King Robert's self in features, form,
and height, 65

But all transfigured with angelic light!
It was an Angel; and his presence there

With a divine effulgence filled the air,
An exaltation, piercing the disguise,

Though none the hidden Angel recognize. 70

A moment speechless, motionless,
amazed,

The throneless monarch on the Angel
gazed,

Who met his looks of anger and surprise

With the divine compassion of his
eyes;

Then said, "Who art thou and why com'st thou here?" 75

To which King Robert answered with a sneer,

"I am the King, and come to claim my own

From an impostor, who usurps my throne!"

And suddenly, at these audacious
words,

Up sprang the angry guests, and drew their swords; 80

The Angel answered, with unruffled
brow,

"Nay, not the King, but the King's Jester, thou

Henceforth shalt wear the bells and scalloped cape,

And for thy counselor shalt lead an ape;

Thou shalt obey my servants when they
call 85

And wait upon my henchmen in the hall!"

Deaf to King Robert's threats and cries and prayers,

They thrust him from the hall and down the stairs;

A group of tittering pages ran before,
And as they opened wide the folding-
door, 90

His heart failed, for he heard, with strange alarms,

The boisterous laughter of the men-at-
arms,

And all the vaulted chamber roar and
ring

With the mock plaudits of "Long live
the King!"

Next morning, waking with the day's first beam, 95

He said within himself, "It was a dream!"

But the straw rustled as he turned his
head,

There were the cap and bells beside his bed,

Around him rose the bare, discolored
walls,

Close by, the steeds were champing in their stalls, 100

And in the corner, a revolting shape,

Shivering and chattering sat the wretched ape.
It was no dream; the world he loved so much
Had turned to dust and ashes at his touch!
Days came and went; and now returned
again 105
To Sicily the old Saturnian reign;
Under the Angel's governance benign
The happy island danced with corn and wine,
And deep within the mountain's burning breast
Enceladus, the giant, was at rest. 110

Meanwhile King Robert yielded to his fate,
Sullen and silent and disconsolate.
Dressed in the motley garb that Jesters wear,
With look bewildered and a vacant
stare,
Close shaven above the ears, as monks are shorn, 115
By courtiers mocked, by pages laughed to scorn,
His only friend the ape, his only food
What others left,—he still was unsubdued.
And when the Angel met him on his
way,
And half in earnest, half in jest, would say, 120
Sternly, though tenderly, that he might feel
The velvet scabbard held a sword of steel,
“Art thou the King?” the passion of his woe
Burst from him in resistless overflow,
And, lifting high his forehead, he would fling 125
The haughty answer back, “I am, I am
the King!”

Almost three years were ended; when there came Ambassadors of great repute and name
From Valmond, Emperor of Allemaine, Unto King Robert, saying that Pope
Urbane 130
By letter summoned them forthwith to
come

On Holy Thursday to his city of Rome.
The Angel with great joy received his guests,
And gave them presents of embroidered
vests,
And velvet mantles with rich ermine
lined, 135
And rings and jewels of the rarest kind.
Then he departed with them o'er the sea
Into the lovely land of Italy, Whose loveliness was more resplendent
made
By the mere passing of that cavalcade,
With plumes, and cloaks, and housings,
and the stir 141
Of jeweled bridle and of golden spur.
And lo! among the menials, in mock
state,
Upon a piebald steed, with shambling
gait,
His cloak of fox-tails flapping in the
wind, 145
The solemn ape demurely perched behind,
King Robert rode, making huge merri-
ment
In all the country towns through which they went.

The Pope received them with great pomp, and blare
Of bannered trumpets, on Saint Peter's square, 150
Giving his benediction and embrace,
Fervent, and full of apostolic grace.
While with congratulations and with prayers
He entertained the Angel unawares, Robert, the Jester, bursting through the crowd, 155
Into their presence rushed, and cried
aloud,
“I am the King! Look, and behold in
me
Robert, your brother, King of Sicily!
This man, who wears my semblance to your eyes,
Is an impostor in a king's disguise. 160
Do you not know me? does no voice within Answer my cry, and say we are akin?”
The Pope in silence, but with troubled mien,

Gazed at the Angel's countenance serene;
 The Emperor, laughing, said, "It is strange sport 165
 To keep a madman for thy Fool at court!"
 And the poor, baffled Jester in disgrace
 Was hustled back among the populace.

In solemn state the Holy Week went
 by,
 And Easter Sunday gleamed upon the sky; 170
 The presence of the Angel, with its
 light,
 Before the sun rose, made the city
 bright,
 And with new fervor filled the hearts of
 men,
 Who felt that Christ indeed had risen
 again.
 Even the Jester, on his bed of straw, 175
 With haggard eyes the unwonted splendor saw,
 He felt within a power unfelt before,
 And, kneeling humbly on his chamber
 floor,
 He heard the rushing garments of the Lord
 Sweep through the silent air, ascending heavenward. 180

And now the visit ending, and once
 more Valmond returning to the Danube's
 shore,
 Homeward the Angel journeyed, and
 again
 The land was made resplendent with his train,
 Flashing along the towns of Italy 185
 Unto Salerno, and from thence by sea.
 And when once more within Palermo's
 wall,
 And, seated on the throne in his great
 hall,
 He heard the Angelus from convent
 towers,
 As if the better world conversed with ours, 190
 He beckoned to King Robert to draw
 nigher,
 And with a gesture bade the rest retire;

And when they were alone, the Angel
 said,
 "Art thou the King?" Then bowing down his head,
 King Robert crossed both hands upon his breast, 195
 And meekly answered him: "Thou knowest best!
 My sins as scarlet are; let me go hence,
 And in some cloister's school of penitence,
 Across those stones, that pave the way
 to heaven,
 Walk barefoot, till my guilty soul is shriven!" 200

The Angel smiled, and from his radiant face
 A holy light illumined all the place,
 And through the open window, loud and clear,
 They heard the monks chant in the chapel near,
 Above the stir and tumult of the street:
 "He has put down the mighty from
 their seat, 206
 And has exalted them of low degree!"
 And through the chant a second melody Rose like the throbbing of a single string:
 "I am an Angel, and thou art the King!" 210

King Robert, who was standing near
 the throne,
 Lifted his eyes, and lo! he was alone
 But all appareled as in days of old,
 With ermined mantle and with cloth of
 gold;
 And when his courtiers came, they found him there 215 Kneeling upon the floor, absorbed in silent prayer.

WEARINESS

O little feet! that such long years Must wander on through hopes and
 fears,
 Must ache and bleed beneath your load;
 I, nearer to the wayside inn
 Where toil shall cease and rest begin, 5
 Am weary, thinking of your road!

O little hands! that, weak or strong,
 Have still to serve or rule so long,
 Have still so long to give or ask;
 I, who so much with book and pen ¹⁰
 Have toiled among my fellow-men,
 Am weary, thinking of your task.

O little hearts! that throb and beat
 With such impatient, feverish heat,
 Such limitless and strong desires; ¹⁵ Mine, that so long has glowed and burned,
 With passions into ashes turned,
 Now covers and conceals its fires.

O little souls! as pure and white
 And crystalline as rays of light ²⁰
 Direct from heaven, their source
 divine;
 Refracted through the mist of years,
 How red my setting sun appears,
 How lurid looks this soul of mine!

DIVINA COMMEDIA

I

Oft have I seen at some cathedral door
 A laborer, pausing in the dust and
 heat,
 Lay down his burden, and with reverent feet
 Enter, and cross himself, and on the floor
 Kneel to repeat his paternoster o'er; ⁵
 Far off the noises of the world retreat;
 The loud vociferations of the street
 Become an undistinguishable roar.
 So, as I enter here from day to day,
 And leave my burden at this minster gate, ¹⁰
 Kneeling in prayer, and not ashamed
 to pray,
 The tumult of the time disconsolate
 To inarticulate murmurs dies away, While the eternal ages watch and wait.

II

How strange the sculptures that adorn these towers!
 This crowd of statues, in whose folded sleeves
 Birds build their nests; while canopied with leaves

Parvis ¹ and portal bloom like trel-lised bowers,
 And the vast minster seems a cross of flowers! ⁵
 But fiends and dragons on the gar-goyle eaves
 Watch the dead Christ between the living thieves,
 And, underneath, the traitor Judas lowers!
 Ah! from what agonies of heart and
 brain,
 What exultations trampling on despair, ¹⁰
 What tenderness, what tears, what hate of wrong,
 What passionate outcry of a soul in pain, Uprose this poem of the earth and
 air,
 This mediæval miracle of song!

III

I enter, and I see thee in the gloom
 Of the long aisles, O poet saturnine!
 And strive to make my steps keep pace with thine.
 The air is filled with some unknown
 perfume;
 The congregation of the dead make room ⁵
 For thee to pass; the votive tapers shine;
 Like rooks that haunt Ravenna's groves of pine
 The hovering echoes fly from tomb to tomb.
 From the confessionals I hear arise
 Rehearsals of forgotten tragedies, ¹⁰
 And lamentations from the crypts below;
 And then a voice celestial that begins With the pathetic words, "Although your sins
 As scarlet be," and ends with "as the snow."

IV

With snow-white veil and garments as of flame,
 She stands before thee, who so long ago

Filled thy young heart with passion and the woe
From which thy song and all its splendors came;
And while with stern rebuke she speaks thy name, 5
The ice about thy heart melts as the snow
On mountain heights, and in swift overflow Comes gushing from thy lips in sobs of shame.
Thou makest full confession; and a gleam,
As of the dawn on some dark forest
cast, 10
Seems on thy lifted forehead to increase;
Lethe and Eunoë—the remembered
dream
And the forgotten sorrow—bring at last
That perfect pardon which is perfect peace.

V

I lift mine eyes, and all the windows blaze
With forms of Saints and holy men who died,
Here martyred and hereafter glori-
fied;
And the great Rose upon its leaves displays Christ's Triumph, and the angelic roundelays, 5
With splendor upon splendor multiplied;
And Beatrice again at Dante's side
No more rebukes, but smiles her words of praise.
And then the organ sounds, and unseen choirs
Sing the old Latin hymns of peace and love, 10
And benedictions of the Holy Ghost;
And the melodious bells among the spires O'er all the house-tops and through heaven above
Proclaim the elevation of the Host!

VI

O star of morning and of liberty!
O bringer of the light, whose splendor shines
Above the darkness of the Apennines, Forerunner of the day that is to be!
The voices of the city and the sea, 5
The voices of the mountains and the pines,
Repeat thy song, till the familiar lines
Are footpaths for the thought of Italy!
Thy fame is blown abroad from all the heights,
Through all the nations, and a sound is heard, 10
As of a mighty wind, and men devout,
Strangers of Rome, and the new proselytes,
In their own language hear thy wondrous word,
And many are amazed, and many doubt.

CHAUCER

An old man in a lodge within a park;
The chamber walls depicted all around
With portraitures of huntsman,
hawk, and hound,
And the hurt deer. He listeneth to the lark,
Whose song comes with the sunshine through the dark 5
Of painted glass in leaden lattice bound;
He listeneth and he laugheth at the
sound,
Then writeth in a book like any clerk.
He is the poet of the dawn, who wrote
The Canterbury Tales, and his old age 10
Made beautiful with song; and as I read
I hear the crowing cock, I hear the note
Of lark and linnet, and from every page
Rise odors of ploughed field or flowery mead.

THE CROSS OF SNOW

In the long, sleepless watches of the
 night,
 A gentle face—the face of one long
 dead—
 Looks at me from the wall, where round its head
 The night-lamp casts a halo of pale
 light.
 Here in this room she died; and soul
 more white 5
 Never through martyrdom of fire was led
 To its repose; nor can in books be read
 The legend of a life more benedict.
 There is a mountain in the distant West
 That, sun-defying, in its deep ravines Displays a cross of snow upon its
 side. 11
 Such is the cross I wear upon my breast These eighteen years, through all the changing scenes
 And seasons, changeless since the day she died.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL
 (1819-1891)

SONG

O moonlight deep and tender,
 A year and more ago,
 Your mist of golden splendor
 Round my betrothal shone!

O elm-leaves dark and dewy, 5
 The very same ye seem,
 The low wind trembles through ye,
 Ye murmur in my dream!

O river, dim with distance,
 Flow thus forever by, 10
 A part of my existence
 Within your heart doth lie!

O stars, ye saw our meeting,
 Two beings and one soul,
 Two hearts so madly beating 15
 To mingle and be whole!

O happy night, deliver
 Her kisses back to me,
 Or keep them all, and give her
 A blissful dream of me! 20

SONNET: WENDELL PHILLIPS

He stood upon the world's broad threshold; wide
 The din of battle and of slaughter rose;
 He saw God stand upon the weaker
 side,
 That sank in seeming loss before its foes:
 Many there were who made great haste and sold 5
 Unto the cunning enemy their swords;
 He scorned their gifts of fame, and power, and gold,
 And, underneath their soft and flowery
 words,
 Heard the cold serpent hiss; therefore he went
 And humbly joined him to the weaker part, 10
 Fanatic named, and fool, yet well content
 So he could be the nearer to God's heart,
 And feel its solemn pulses sending blood
 Through all the widespread veins of endless good.

RHÆCUS

God sends his teachers unto every age,
 To every clime, and every race of men,
 With revelations fitted to their growth
 And shape of mind, nor gives the realm of Truth
 Into the selfish rule of one sole race: 5
 Therefore each form of worship that hath swayed
 The life of man, and given it to grasp
 The master-key of knowledge, reverence,
 Infolds some germs of goodness and of right;
 Else never had the eager soul, which loathes 10
 The slothful down of pampered ignorance,
 Found in it even a moment's fitful rest.

There is an instinct in the human heart
 Which makes that all the fables it hath coined,
 To justify the reign of its belief 15
 And strengthen it by beauty's right
 divine,
 Veil in their inner cells a mystic gift,
 Which, like the hazel twig, in faithful hands,
 Points surely to the hidden springs of truth.
 For, as in nature naught is made in vain, 20
 But all things have within their hull of use
 A wisdom and a meaning which may speak
 Of spiritual secrets to the ear
 Of spirit; so, in whatso'er the heart
 Hath fashioned for a solace to itself, 25
 To make its inspirations suit its creed,
 And from the niggard hands of falsehood wring
 Its needful food of truth, there ever is A sympathy with Nature, which reveals,
 Not less than her own works, pure gleams of light 30
 And earnest parables of inward lore.
 Hear now this fairy legend of old Greece,
 As full of gracious youth; and beauty
 still
 As the immortal freshness of that grace Carved for all ages on some Attic frieze. 35

A youth named Rhœcus, wandering
 in the wood,
 Saw an old oak just trembling to its fall,
 And, feeling pity of so fair a tree,
 He propped its gray trunk with admiring care,
 And with a thoughtless footstep loitered
 on. 40
 But, as he turned, he heard a voice behind
 That murmured "Rhœcus!" 'Twas as if the leaves,
 Stirred by a passing breath, had murmured it,

And, while he paused bewildered, yet
 again
 It murmured "Rhœcus!" softer than a breeze. 45
 He started and beheld with dizzy eyes
 What seemed the substance of a happy
 dream
 Stand there before him, spreading a warm glow
 Within the green glooms of the shadowy oak.
 It seemed a woman's shape, yet far too
 fair 50
 To be a woman, and with eyes too meek
 For any that were wont to mate with gods.
 All naked like a goddess stood she
 there,
 And like a goddess all too beautiful
 To feel the guilt-born earthliness of shame. 55
 "Rhœcus, I am the Dryad of this tree,"
 Thus she began, dropping her low-toned
 words
 Serene, and full, and clear, as drops of dew,
 "And with it I am doomed to live and die; 59
 The rain and sunshine are my caterers,
 Nor have I other bliss than simple life;
 Now ask me what thou wilt, that I can give,
 And with a thankful joy it shall be thine."

Then Rhœcus, with a flutter at the
 heart,
 Yet by the prompting of such beauty
 bold, 65
 Answered: "What is there that can satisfy
 The endless craving of the soul but love?
 Give me thy love, or but the hope of that
 Which must be evermore my nature's goal."
 After a little pause she said again, 70
 But with a glimpse of sadness in her tone,
 "I give it, Rhœcus, though a perilous gift;
 An hour before the sunset meet me
 here."

And straightway there was nothing he could see
But the green glooms beneath the shadowy oak, 75
And not a sound came to his straining ears
But the low trickling rustle of the leaves,
And far away upon an emerald slope
The falter of an idle shepherd's pipe.

Now, in those days of simpleness and faith, 80
Men did not think that happy things were dreams
Because they overstepped the narrow bourn
Of likelihood, but reverently deemed Nothing too wondrous or too beautiful
To be the guerdon of a daring heart. 85
So Rhœcus made no doubt that he was blest,
And all along unto the city's gate Earth seemed to spring beneath him as he walked,
The clear, broad sky looked bluer than its wont,
And he could scarce believe he had not wings, 90
Such sunshine seemed to glitter through his veins
Instead of blood, so light he felt and strange.

Young Rhœcus had a faithful heart
enough,
But one that in the present dwelt too
much,
And, taking with blithe welcome whatsoever 95
Chance gave of joy, was wholly bound in that,
Like the contented peasant of a vale, Deemed it the world, and never looked beyond.
So, haply meeting in the afternoon
Some comrades who were playing at the dice, 100
He joined them, and forgot all else beside.

The dice were rattling at the merriest,
And Rhœcus, who had met but sorry luck,

Just laughed in triumph at a happy throw,
When through the room there hummed
a yellow bee 105
That buzzed about his ear with down-dropped legs
As if to light. And Rhœcus laughed and said,
Feeling how red and flushed he was with loss,
"By Venus! does he take me for a rose?"
And brushed him off with rough, impatient hand. 110
But still the bee came back, and thrice
again
Rhœcus did beat him off with growing wrath.
Then through the window flew the wounded bee,
And Rhœcus, tracking him with angry
eyes,
Saw a sharp mountain-peak of Thessaly Against the red disk of the setting
sun,— 116
And instantly the blood sank from his
heart,
As if its very walls had caved away.
Without a word he turned, and, rushing forth,
Ran madly through the city and the gate, 120
And o'er the plain, which now the wood's long shade,
By the low sun thrown forward broad and dim,
Darkened wellnigh unto the city's wall.

Quite spent and out of breath he reached the tree,
And, listening fearfully, he heard once
more 125
The low voice murmur "Rhœcus!" close at hand:
Whereat he looked around him, but could see Naught but the deepening glooms beneath the oak.
Then sighed the voice, "O Rhœcus!
nevermore
Shalt thou behold me or by day or
night, 130
Me, who would fain have blessed thee with a love

More ripe and bounteous than ever yet
Filled up with nectar any mortal heart:
But thou didst scorn my humble messenger,

And sent'st him back to me with bruised wings. 135

We spirits only show to gentle eyes,
We ever ask an undivided love,
And he who scorns the least of Nature's works

Is thenceforth exiled and shut out from all.

Farewell! for thou canst never see me
more." 140

Then Rhœcus beat his breast, and groaned aloud,
And cried, "Be pitiful! forgive me yet
This once, and I shall never need it
more!"

"Alas!" the voice returned, "'tis thou art blind,

Not I unmerciful; I can forgive, 145
But have no skill to heal thy spirit's
eyes;

Only the soul hath power o'er itself."
With that again there murmured
"Nevermore!"

And Rhœcus after heard no other
sound,

Except the rattling of the oak's crisp
leaves, 150

Like the long surf upon a distant shore, Raking the sea-worn pebbles up and
down.

The night had gathered round him: o'er
the plain

The city sparkled with its thousand lights,

And sounds of revel fell upon his ear 155 Harshly and like a curse; above, the sky,

With all its bright sublimity of stars,
Deepened, and on his forehead smote
the breeze:

Beauty was all around him and delight,
But from that eve he was alone on earth. 160

COLUMBUS

The cordage creaks and rattles in the
wind,
With whims of sudden hush; the reeling
sea

Now thumps like solid rock beneath the stern,

Now leaps with clumsy wrath, strikes short, and, falling

Crumbled to whispery foam, slips rustling down 5

The broad backs of the waves, which jostle and crowd

To fling themselves upon that unknown
shore,

Their used familiar ¹ since the dawn of
time,

Whither this foredoomed life is guided
on

To sway on triumph's hushed, aspiring poise 10

One glittering moment, then to break fulfilled.

How lonely is the sea's perpetual swing,
The melancholy wash of endless waves,
The sigh of some grim monster undescribed, 14

Fear-painted on the canvas of the dark,
Shifting on his uneasy pillow of brine!
Yet night brings more companions than
the day

To this drear waste; new constellations
burn,

And fairer stars, with whose calm height my soul

Finds nearer sympathy than with my herd 20

Of earthen souls, whose vision's scanty
ring

Makes me its prisoner to beat my wings
Against the cold bars of their unbelief, Knowing in vain my own free heaven
beyond.

O God! this world, so crammed with eager life, 25

That comes and goes and wanders back to silence

Like the idle wind, which yet man's shaping mind

Can make his drudge to swell the longing sails

Of highest endeavor,—this mad, un-
thrif world,

Which, every hour, throws life enough
away 30

To make her deserts kind and hospitable,

Lets her great destinies be waved aside
 By smooth, lip-reverent, formal infidels,
 Who weigh the God they not believe with gold, 34
 And find no spot in Judas, save that he,
 Driving a duller bargain than he ought,
 Saddled his guild with too cheap precedent.
 O Faith! if thou art strong, thine opposite
 Is mighty also, and the dull fool's sneer Hath ofttimes shot chill palsy through the arm 40
 Just lifted to achieve its crowning deed,
 And made the firm-based heart, that would have quailed
 The rack or fagot, shudder like a leaf
 Wrinkled with frost, and loose upon its stem.
 The wicked and the weak, by some dark law, 45
 Have a strange power to shut and rivet down
 Their own horizon round us, to unwing
 Our heaven-aspiring visions, and to blur
 With surly clouds the Future's gleaming peaks, Far seen across the brine of thankless
 years. 50
 If the chosen soul could never be alone
 In deep mid-silence, open-doored to God,
 No greatness ever had been dreamed or done;
 Among dull hearts a prophet never grew;
 The nurse of full-grown souls is solitude. 55
 The old world is effete; there man with man
 Jostles, and, in the brawl for means to live,
 Life is trod underfoot,—Life, the one block
 Of marble that's vouchsafed wherefrom to carve
 Our great thoughts, white and godlike, to shine down 60
 The future, Life, the irredeemable block,
 Which one o'er-hasty chisel-dint oft mars,

Scanting our room to cut the features out
 Of our full hope, so forcing us to crown
 With a mean head the perfect limbs, or leave 65
 The god's face glowing o'er a satyr's trunk,
 Failure's brief epitaph.

Yes, Europe's world
 Reels on to judgment; there the common need,
 Losing God's sacred use, to be a bond
 'Twixt Me and Thee, sets each one scowlingly 70
 O'er his own selfish hoard at bay; no state,
 Knit strongly with eternal fibres up
 Of all men's separate and united weals,
 Self-poised and sole as stars, yet one as light,
 Holds up a shape of large Humanity 75
 To which by natural instinct every man
 Pays loyalty exulting, by which all Mould their own lives, and feel their pulses filled
 With the red, fiery blood of the general life, Making them mighty in peace, as now
 in war 80
 They are, even in the flush of victory, weak, Conquering that manhood which should them subdue.
 And what gift bring I to this untried world?
 Shall the same tragedy be played anew,
 And the same lurid curtain drop at last
 On one dread desolation, one fierce crash 86
 Of that recoil which on its makers God
 Lets Ignorance and Sin and Hunger make,
 Early or late? Or shall that common-wealth Whose potent unity and concentric force 90
 Can draw these scattered joints and parts of men
 Into a whole ideal man once more,
 Which sucks not from its limbs the life away,
 But sends it flood-tide and creates itself

Over again in every citizen, 95
 Be there built up? For me, I have no choice;
 I might turn back to other destinies,
 For one sincere key opes all Fortune's
 doors;
 But whoso answers not God's earliest
 call Forfeits or dulls that faculty supreme
 Of lying open to his genius 101
 Which makes the wise heart certain of its ends.

Here am I; for what end God knows,
 not I;
 Westward still points the inexorable
 soul:
 Here am I, with no friend but the sad
 sea, 105
 The beating heart of this great enterprise,
 Which, without me, would stiffen in swift death;
 This have I mused on, since mine eye could first Among the stars distinguish and with joy
 Rest on that God-fed Pharos of the north, 110
 On some blue promontory of heaven lighted
 That juts far out into the upper sea;
 To this one hope my heart hath clung for years,
 As would a foundling to the talisman Hung round his neck by hands he knew not whose; 115
 A poor, vile thing and dross to all be-
 side,
 Yet he therein can feel a virtue left
 By the sad pressure of a mother's hand,
 And unto him it still is tremulous
 With palpitating haste and wet with tears, 120
 The key to him of hope and human-
 ness,
 The coarse shell of life's pearl, Expectancy.
 This hope hath been to me for love and fame,
 Hath made me wholly lonely on the earth,
 Building me up as in a thick-ribbed tower, 125

Wherewith enwalled my watching spirit
 burned,
 Conquering its little island from the Dark,
 Sole as a scholar's lamp, and heard
 men's steps,
 In the far hurry of the outward world,
 Pass dimly forth and back, sounds heard in dream. 130
 As Ganymede by the eagle was snatched up
 From the gross sod to be Jove's cupbearer,
 So was I lifted by my great design:
 And who hath trod Olympus, from his eye
 Fades not that broader outlook of the gods; 135
 His life's low valleys overbrow earth's clouds,
 And that Olympian spectre of the past Looms towering up in sovereign memory,
 Beckoning his soul from meaner heights of doom.
 Had but the shadow of the Thunderer's
 bird, 140
 Flashing athwart my spirit, made of
 me
 A swift-betraying vision's Ganymede,
 Yet to have greatly dreamed precludes
 low ends;
 Great days have ever such a morning-
 red,
 On such a base great futures are built up, 145
 And aspiration, though not put in act,
 Comes back to ask its plighted troth
 again,
 Still watches round its grave the un-laid ghost
 Of a dead virtue, and makes other hopes,
 Save that implacable one, seem thin and bleak 150
 As shadows of bare trees upon the snow,
 Bound freezing there by the un pitying
 moon.
 While other youths perplexed their mandolins,
 Praying that Thetis would her fingers twine
 In the lose glories of her lover's hair, 155

And wile another kiss to keep back day,
 I, stretched beneath the many-cen-turied shade
 Of some writhed oak, the wood's Laocoön,
 Did of my hope a dryad mistress make,
 Whom I would woo to meet me privily,
 Or underneath the stars, or when the moon 161
 Flecked all the forest floor with scattered pearls.
 O days whose memory tames to fawn-
 ing down
 The surly fell of Ocean's bristled neck!

I know not when this hope enthralled me first, 165
 But from my boyhood up I loved to
 hear
 The tall pine-forests of the Apennine
 Murmur their hoary legends of the sea,
 Which hearing, I in vision clear beheld
 The sudden dark of tropic night shut
 down 170
 O'er the huge whisper of great watery wastes,
 The while a pair of herons trailingy Flapped inland, where some league-wide river hurled
 The yellow spoil of unconjectured
 realms
 Far through a gulf's green silence, never scarred 175
 By any but the North-wind's hurrying keels.
 And not the pines alone; all sights and sounds
 To my world-seeking heart paid fealty,
 And catered for it as the Cretan bees
 Brought honey to the baby Jupiter, 180
 Who in his soft hand crushed a violet, Godlike foremusing the rough thunder's
 gripe;
 Then did I entertain the poet's song,
 My great Idea's guest, and, passing o'er That iron bridge the Tuscan built to hell, 185
 I heard Ulysses tell of mountain-chains
 Whose adamantine links, his manacles,
 The western main shook growling, and still gnawed.
 I brooded on the wise Athenian's tale
 Of happy Atlantis, and heard Björne's keel 190

Crunch the gray pebbles of the Vinland
 shore:
 I listened, musing, to the prophecy
 Of Nero's tutor-victim; lo, the birds
 Sing darkling, conscious of the climbing dawn.
 And I believed the poets; it is they 195
 Who utter wisdom from the central
 deep,
 And, listening to the inner flow of
 things,
 Speak to the age out of eternity.

Ah me! old hermits sought for solitude
 In caves and desert places of the earth,
 Where their own heart-beat was the only stir 201
 Of living thing that comforted the year;
 But the bald pillar-top of Simeon,
 In midnight's blankest waste, were populous,
 Matched with the isolation drear and
 deep 205
 Of him who pines among the swarm of
 men,
 At once a new thought's king and prisoner,
 Feeling the truer life within his life,
 The fountain of his spirit's prophecy, Sinking away and wasting, drop by drop, 210
 In the ungrateful sands of sceptic ears.
 He in the palace-aisles of untrod woods
 Doth walk a king; for him the pent-up cell
 Widens beyond the circles of the stars,
 And all the sceptred spirits of the past Come thronging in to greet him as their peer; 216
 But in the market-place's glare and throng
 He sits apart, an exile, and his brow Aches with the mocking memory of its crown.
 Yet to the spirit select there is no
 choice; 220
 He cannot say, This will I do, or that,
 For the cheap means putting Heaven's ends in pawn,
 And bartering his bleak rocks, the freehold stern
 Of destiny's first-born, for smoother fields
 That yield no crop of self-denying will;

A hand is stretched to him from out the dark, 226
 Which grasping without question, he is led
 Where there is work that he must do for God.
 The trial still is the strength's comple-
 ment,
 And the uncertain, dizzy path that scales 230
 The sheer heights of supremest purposes
 Is steeper to the angel than the child.
 Chances have laws as fixed as planets have,
 And disappointment's dry and bitter root,
 Envy's harsh berries, and the choking pool 235
 Of the world's scorn, are the right mother-milk
 To the tough hearts that pioneer their kind,
 And break a pathway to those unknown
 realms
 That in the earth's broad shadow lie enthralled;
 Endurance is the crowning quality, 240
 And patience all the passion of great hearts;
 These are their stay, and when the leaden world
 Sets its hard face against their fateful thought,
 And brute strength, like the Gaulish conqueror, Clangs his huge glaive¹ down in the other scale, 245
 The inspired soul but flings his patience
 in,
 And slowly that outweighs the ponderous globe,—
 One faith against a whole earth's unbelief,
 One soul against the flesh of all mankind.
 Thus ever seems it when my soul can
 hear 250
 The voice that errs not; then my triumph gleams,
 O'er the blank ocean beckoning, and all
 night
 My heart flies on before me as I sail;
 Far on I see my lifelong enterprise,

¹ sword

That rose like Ganges mid the freezing snows 255
 Of a world's solitude, sweep broadening
 down,
 And, gathering to itself a thousand streams,
 Grow sacred ere it mingle with the sea;
 I see the ungated wall of chaos old,
 With blocks Cyclopean hewn of solid
 night, 260
 Fade like a wreath of unreturning mist
 Before the irreversible feet of light;—
 And lo, with what clear omen in the east
 On day's gray threshold stands the eager dawn,
 Like young Leander rosy from the sea
 Glowing at Hero's lattice! 266

One day more

These muttering shoalbrains leave the helm to me:
 God, let me not in their dull ooze be stranded;
 Let not this one frail bark, to hollow which I have dug out the pith and sinewy
 heart 270
 Of my aspiring life's fair trunk, be so
 Cast up to warp and blacken in the sun,
 Just as the opposing wind 'gins whistle off
 His cheek-swollen pack, and from the leaning mast
 Fortune's full sail strains forward! 275

One poor day!—

Remember whose and not how short it is!
 It is God's day, it is Columbus's.
 A lavish day! One day, with life and
 heart,
 Is more than time enough to find a world.

TO THE DANDELION

Dear common flower, that grow'st beside the way,
 Fringing the dusty road with harmless
 gold,
 First pledge of blithesome May,
 Which children pluck, and, full of pride uphold,

High-hearted buccaneers, o'erjoyed that they 5
 An Eldorado in the grass have found,
 Which not the rich earth's ample round
 May match in wealth, thou art more
 dear to me
 Than all the prouder summer-blooms
 may be:

Gold such as thine ne'er drew the Spanish prow 10
 Through the primeval hush of Indian
 seas,
 Nor wrinkled the lean brow
 Of age, to rob the lover's heart of ease;
 'Tis the Spring's largess, which she scatters now
 To rich and poor alike, with lavish
 hand, 15
 Though most hearts never understand
 To take it at God's value, but pass by The offered wealth with unrewarded
 eye.

Thou art my tropics and mine Italy;
 To look at thee unlocks a warmer clime; 20
 The eyes thou givest me
 Are in the heart, and heed not space or
 time:
 Not in mid June the golden-cuirassed bee
 Feels a more summer-like warm ravish-
 ment
 In the white lily's breezy tent, 25
 His fragrant Sybaris, than I, when first
 From the dark green thy yellow circles burst.

Then think I of deep shadows on the grass,
 Of meadows where in sun the cattle
 graze,
 Where, as the breezes pass, 30
 The gleaming rushes lean a thousand ways,
 Of leaves that slumber in a cloudy
 mass,
 Or whiten in the wind, of waters blue
 That from the distance sparkle
 through

Some woodland gap, and of a sky
 above, 35
 Where one white cloud like a stray lamb doth move.
 My childhood's earliest thoughts are linked with thee;
 The sight of thee calls back the robin's
 song,
 Who, from the dark old tree
 Beside the door, sang clearly all day long, 40
 And I, secure in childish piety,
 Listened as if I heard an angel sing
 With news from heaven, which he could bring
 Fresh every day to my untainted ears
 When birds and flowers and I were happy peers. 45

How like a prodigal doth nature
 seem,
 When thou, for all thy gold, so common
 art!
 Thou teachest me to deem
 More sacredly of every human heart,
 Since each reflects in joy its scanty
 gleam 50
 Of heaven, and could some wondrous secret show,
 Did we but pay the love we owe,
 And with a child's undoubting wisdom look
 On all these living pages of God's book.

A LETTER

FROM MR. EZEKIEL BIGLOW OF JAALAM
 TO THE HON. JOSEPH T. BUCKING-HAM, EDITOR OF THE BOSTON COURIER, INCLOSING A POEM OF HIS SON, MR.
 HOSEA BIGLOW

JAYLEM, june 1846.

MISTER EDDYTER:—Our Hosea wuz down to Boston last week, and he see a cruetin Sarjunt a struttin round as popler as a hen with 1 chicking, with 2 fellers a drummin and fifin arter him like all nater. the sarjunt
 he thout Hosea hedn't gut his i teeth cut cos he looked a kindo 's though he'd jest com down, so he cal'lated to hook him in, but Hosity woodn't take none o' his sarse for all he hed much as 20 Rooster's tales stuck onto his hat and eenamost enuf brass a bobbin up and down on his shoulders and figured onto his coat and trousis, let alone wut nater hed sot in his featers, to make a 6 pounder out on.

wal, Hosea he com home considerabal riled, and arter I'd gone to bed I heern Him a thrashin round like a short-tailed Bull in flit-time. The old Woman ses she to me ses she, Zekle, ses she, our Hosee 's gut the chollery or suthin anuther ses she, don't you Bee skeered, ses I, he's oney amakin pottery ' ses i, he's ollers on hand at that ere busynes like Da & martin, and shure enuf, cum mornin, Hosity he cum down stares full chizzle, hare on eend and cote tales flyin, and sot rite of to go reed his vases to Parson Wilbur bein he haint aney grate shows o' book larnin himself, bimeby 'he cum back and sed the parson wuz dreffle tickled with 'em as i hoop you will Be, and said they wuz True grit.

Hosea ses taint hardly fair to call 'em hisn now, cos the parson kind o' slicked off sum o' the last vases, but he told Hosee he didn't want to put his ore in to tetch to the Rest on 'em, bein they wuz very well. As thay wuz, and then Hosity ses he sed suthin a nuther about Simplex Mundishes or sum sech feller, but I guess Hosea kind o' didn't hear him, for I never hearn o' nobody o' that name in this villadge, and I've lived here man and boy 76 year cum next tater diggin, and thair aint no wheres a kitting spryer'n I be.

If you print 'em I wish you'd jest let folks know who hosity's father is, cos my ant Keziah used to say it's nater to be curus ses she, she aint livin though and he's a likely kind o' lad.

EZEKIEL BIGLOW.

Thrash away, you 'll hev to rattle

On them kittle-drums o' yourn,—

'Taint a knowin' kind o' cattle

Thet is ketched with mouldy corn;

Put in stiff, you fifer feller, 5

Let folks see how spry you be,—

Guess you 'll toot till you are yellor

'Fore you git ahold o' me!

Thet air flag 's a leetle rotten,

Hope it aint your Sunday's best;— 10

Fact! it takes a sight o' cotton

To stuff out a soger's chest:

See we farmers hev to pay fer 't,

Ef you must wear humps like these,

S'posin' you should try salt hay fer 't,
It would du ez slick ez grease. 16

'T would n't suit them Southun fellers,

They 're a dreffle graspin' set,

We must ollers blow the bellers

Wen they want their irons het; 20

May be it 's all right ez preachin',

But my narves it kind o' grates,

Wen I see the overreachin'

O' them nigger-drivin' States. 24

Them thet rule us, them slave-traders,

Haint they cut a thunderin' swarth

(Helped by Yankee renegaders),

Thru the vartu o' the North!

We begin to think it 's nater

To take sarse an' not be riled;— 30

Who 'd expect to see a tater

All on eend at bein' biled?

Ez fer war, I call it murder,—

There you hev it plain an' flat;

I don't want to go no furdur 35

Than my Testymnt fer that;

God hez sed so plump an' fairly,

It 's ez long ez it is broad,

An' you 've gut to git up airly

Ef you want to take in God. 40

'Taint your eppyletts an' feathers

Make the thing a grain more right;

'Taint afollerin' your bell-wethers

Will excuse ye in His sight;

Ef you take a sword an' dror it, 45

An' go stick a feller thru,

Guv'ment aint to answer for it,

God 'll send the bill to you.

Wut 's the use o' meetin'-goin'

Every Sabbath, wet or dry, 50

Ef it 's right to go amowin'

Feller-men like oats an' rye?

I dunno but wut it 's pooty

Trainin' round in bobtail coats,—

But it 's curus Christian dooty 55

This 'ere cuttin' folks's throats.

They may talk o' Freedom's airy

Tell they 're pupple in the face,—

It 's a grand gret cemetary

Fer the barthrights of our race; 60

They jest want this Californy

So 's to lug new slave-states in

To abuse ye, an' to scorn ye,
An' to plunder ye like sin.

Aint it cute to see a Yankee 65
Take sech everlastin pains,
All to get the Devil's thankee
Helpin' on 'em weld their chains?
Wy, it 's jest ez clear ez figgers,
Clear ez one an' one make two, 70
Chaps thet make black slaves o' niggers
Want to make wite slaves o' you.

Tell ye jest the eend I 've come to Arter cipherin' plaguy smart,
An' it makes a handy sum, tu, 75
Any gump could larn by heart;
Laborin' man an' laborin' woman
Hev one glory an' one shame.
Ev'y thin' thet 's done inhuman
Injers all on 'em the same. 80

'Taint by turnin' out to hack folks
You 're agoin' to git your right,
Nor by lookin' down on black folks
Coz you 're put upon by wite;
Slavery aint o' nary color, 85
'Taint the hide thet makes it wus,
All it keers fer in a feller
'S jes to make him fill its pus.

Want 'to tackle me in, du ye?
I expect you 'll hev to wait; 90
Wen cold lead puts daylight thru ye
You 'll begin to kal'late;
S'pose the crows wun't fall to pickin'
All the carkiss from your bones,
Coz you helped to give a lickin' 95
To them poor half-Spanish drones?

Jest go home an' ask our Nancy Wether I 'd be sech a goose
Ez to jine ye,—guess you'd fancy
The eternal bung wuz loose! 100
She wants me fer home consumption,
Let alone the hay 's to mow,—
Ef you 're arter folks o' gumption,
You 've a darned long row to hoe.

Take them editors thet 's crowin' 105
Like a cockerel three months old,—
Don't ketch any on 'em goin',
Though they be so blasted bold;
Aint they a prime lot o' fellers?
'Fore they think on 't guess they 'll sprout 110

(Like a peach thet 's got the yellers),
With the meanness bustin' out.

Wal, go 'long to help 'em stealin'
Bigger pens to cram with slaves,
Help the men thet 's ollers dealin' 115
Insults on your fathers' graves;
Help the strong to grind the feeble,
Help the many agin the few,
Help the men thet call your people
Witewashed slaves an' peddlin' crew!

Massachusetts, God forgive her, 121
She 's akneelin' with the rest,
She, thet ough' to ha' clung ferever
In her grand old eagle-nest;
She thet ough' to stand so fearless 125
W'ile the wracks are round her hurled,
Holdin' up a beacon peerless
To the oppressed of all the world!

Ha'n't they sold your colored seamen?
Ha'n't they made your env'ys w'iz? 1
Wut 'll make ye act like freemen? 131
Wut 'll git your dander riz?
Come, I 'll tell ye wut I 'm thinkin'
Is our dooty in this fix,
They 'd ha' done 't ez quick ez winkin'
In the days o' seventy-six. 136

Clang the bells in every steeple,
Call all true men to disown
The tradooers of our people,
The enslavers o' their own; 140
Let our dear old Bay State proudly
Put the trumpet to her mouth,
Let her ring this messidge loudly
In the ears of all the South:—

"I 'll return ye good for evil 145
Much ez we frail mortils can,
But I wun't go help the Devil
Makin' man the cus o' man;
Call me coward, call me traider,
Jest ez suits your mean idees,— 150
Here I stand a tyrant-hater,
An' the friend o' God an' Peace!"

Ef I 'd my way I hed ruther
We should go to work an' part,
They take one way, we take t' other, 155
Guess it would n't break my heart;

Man hed ough' to put asunder
Them thet God has noways jined;
An' I should n't gretly wonder
Ef there's thousands o' my mind. 160

WHAT MR. ROBINSON THINKS

Guvener B. is a sensible man;
He stays to his home an' looks arter
his folks;
He draws his furrer ez straight ez he can,
An' into nobody's tater-patch pokes;
But John P. 5
Robinson he
Sez he wunt vote for Guvener B.

My! aint it terrible? Wut shall we du?
We can't never choose him o' course,
—thet's flat;
Guess we shall hev to come round,
(don't you?) 10
An' go in fer thunder an' guns, an'
all that;
Fer John P.
Robinson he
Sez he wunt vote fer Guvener B.

General C. is a drefle smart man: 15
He 's ben on all sides thet give places or pelf;
But consistency still wuz a part of his plan,—
He 's ben true to one party,—an' thet is himself;—
So John P.
Robinson he 20
Sez he shall vote for General C.

General C. he goes in fer the war;
He don't vally princerple more 'n an old cud;
Wut did God make us raytional cree-turs fer,
But glory an' gunpowder, plunder an'
blood? 25
So John P.
Robinson he
Sez he shall vote fer General C.

We were gittin' on nicely up here to our village,
With good old idees o' wut's right an'
wut aint, 30

We kind o' thought Christ went agin
war an' pillage,
An' thet eppyletts worn't the best mark of a saint;
But John P.
Robinson he Sez this kind o' thing's an exploded idee. 35

The side of our country must ollers be took,
An' President Polk, you know, he is our country.
An' the angel thet writes all our sins in a book Puts the debit to him, an' to us the per contry;
An' John P. 40
Robinson he Sez this is his view o' the thing to a T.

Parson Wilbur he calls all these argi-munts lies;
Sez they 're nothin' on airth but jest
fee, faw, fum;
An' thet all this big talk of our destinies 45
Is half on it ign'ance, an' t'other half rum;
But John P.
Robinson he Sez it aint no sech thing; an', of course, so must we.

Parson Wilbur sez he never heerd in his life 50
Thet th' Apostles rigged out in their swaller-tail coats,
An' marched round in front of a drum
an' a fife,
To git some on 'em office, an' some on
'em votes;
But John P.
Robinson he 55
Sez they did n't know everythin' down in Judee.

Wal, it's a marcy we've gut folks to tell us
The rights an' the wrongs o' these matters, I vow,— God sends country lawyers, an' other wise fellers,

To start the world's team wen it gits
in a slough; 60

Fer John P.
Robinson he Sez the world'll go right, ef he hollers out Gee!

SHE CAME AND WENT

As a twig trembles, which a bird
Lights on to sing, then leaves unbent,
So is my memory thrilled and stirred;—
I only know she came and went. 4

As clasps some lake, by gusts unripen,
The blue dome's measureless content;
So my soul held that moment's heaven;—
I only know she came and went.

As, at one bound, our swift spring heaps
The orchards full of bloom and scent,
So clove her May my wintry sleep;— 11
I only know she came and went.

An angel stood and met my gaze,
Through the low doorway of my tent;
The tent is struck, the vision stays;— 15
I only know she came and went.

Oh, when the room grows slowly dim,
And life's last oil is nearly spent,
Cne gush of light these eyes will brim
Only to think she came and went. 20

From A FABLE FOR CRITICS

*Reader! walk up at once (it will soon be too late),
and buy at a perfectly ruinous rate*

A FABLE FOR CRITICS:

OR, BETTER,

(I LIKE, AS A THING THAT THE READER'S FIRST FANCY
MAY STRIKE, AN OLD-FASHIONED TITLE-PAGE, SUCH AS PRESENTS A TABULAR VIEW OF THE VOLUME'S CONTENTS),

A GLANCE AT A FEW OF OUR LITERARY PROGENIES

(MRS. MALAPROP'S WORD)

FROM THE TUB OF DIOGENES;

A VOCAL AND MUSICAL MEDLEY,

THAT IS,

A SERIES OF JOKES

By A Wonderful Quiz,

WHO ACCOMPANIES HIMSELF WITH A RUB-A-DUB-DUB, FULL OF SPIRIT AND GRACE, ON THE TOP OF THE TUB.

*Set forth in October, the 21st day,
In the year '48, G. P. Putnam, Broadway.*

It being the commonest mode of procedure,
I premise a few candid remarks

TO THE READER:—

This trifle, begun to please only myself and my own private fancy, was laid on the shelf. But some friends, who had seen it, induced me, by dint of saying they liked it, to put it in print. That is, having come to that very conclusion, I asked their advice when 't would make no confusion. For though (in the gentlest of ways) they had hinted it was scarce worth the while, I should doubtless have printed it.

I began it, intending a Fable, a frail, slender thing, rhyme-ywinged, with a sting in its tail. But, by addings and alterings not previously planned, digressions chance-hatched, like birds' eggs in the sand, and dawdlings to suit every whimsey's demand (always freeing the bird which I held in my hand, for the two perched, perhaps out of reach, in the tree),—it grew by degrees to the size which you see. I was like the old woman that carried the calf, and my neighbors, like hers, no doubt, wonder and laugh; and when, my strained arms with their grown burthen full, I call it my Fable, they call it a bull.

Having scrawled at full gallop (as far as that goes) in a style that is neither good verse nor bad prose, and being a person whom nobody knows, some people will say I am rather more free with my readers than it is becoming to be, that I seem to expect them to wait on my leisure in following wherever I wander at pleasure, that, in short, I take more than a young author's lawful ease, and laugh in a queer way so like Mephistopheles, that the Public will doubt, as they grope through my rhythm, if in truth I am making fun of them or with them.

So the excellent Public is hereby assured that the sale of my book is already secured. For there is not a poet throughout the whole land but will purchase a copy or two out of hand, in the fond expectation of being amused in it, by seeing his betters cut up and abused in it. Now, I find, by a pretty exact calculation, there are something like ten thousand bards in the nation, of that special variety whom the Review and Magazine critics call lofty and true, and about thirty thousand (this tribe is increasing) of the kinds who are termed full of promise and pleasing. The Public will see by a glance at this schedule, that they cannot expect me to be over-sedulous about courting them, since it seems I have got enough fuel made sure of for boiling my pot.

As for such of our poets as find not their names mentioned once in my pages, with praises or blames, let them SEND IN THEIR CARDS, without further DELAY, to my friend G. P. PUTNAM, Esquire, in Broadway, where a list will be kept with the strictest regard to the day and the hour of receiving the card. Then, taking them up as I chance to have time (that is, if their names can be twisted in rhyme), I will honestly give each his PROPER POSITION, at the rate of ONE AUTHOR to each NEW EDITION. Thus a PREMIUM is offered sufficiently HIGH (as the magazines say when they tell their best lie) to induce bards to CLUB their resources and buy the balance of every edition, until they have all of them fairly been run through the mill.

One word to such readers (judicious and wise) as read books with something behind the mere eyes, of whom in the country, perhaps, there are two, including myself, gentle reader, and you. All the characters sketched in this slight jeu d'esprit, though, it may be, they seem, here and there, rather free, and drawn from a somewhat too cynical standpoint, are meant to be faithful, for that is the grand point, and none but an owl would feel sore at a rub from a jester who tells you, without any subterfuge, that he sits in Diogenes' tub.

"There comes Emerson first, whose rich words, every one,
Are like gold nails in temples to hang trophies on,
Whose prose is grand verse, while his verse, the Lord knows,
Is some of it pr— No, 't is not even prose; 530
I'm speaking of metres; some poems have welled
From those rare depths of soul that have ne'er been excelled;
They're not epics, but that does n't matter a pin,
In creating, the only hard thing's to begin;
A grass-blade's no easier to make than an oak; 535
If you've once found the way, you've achieved the grand stroke;
In the worst of his poems are mines of rich matter,
But thrown in a heap with a crash and a clatter;
Now it is not one thing nor another alone
Makes a poem, but rather the general tone, 540
The something pervading, uniting the whole,
The before unconceived, unconceivable soul,
So that just in removing this trifle or that, you

Take away, as it were, a chief limb of the statue;
Roots, wood, bark, and leaves singly perfect may be, 545
But, clapt hodge-podge together, they don't make a tree.

"But, to come back to Emerson (whom, by the way,
I believe we left waiting),—his is, we may say,
A Greek head on right Yankee shoulders, whose range
Has Olympus for one pole, for t' other the Exchange; 550
He seems, to my thinking (although I'm afraid
The comparison must, long ere this, have been made),
A Plotinus-Montaigne, where the Egyptian's gold mist
And the Gascon's shrewd wit cheek-by-jowl coexist;
All admire, and yet scarcely six converts he's got 555
To I don't (nor they either) exactly know what;
For though he builds glorious temples, 't is odd
He leaves never a doorway to get in a god.
'T is refreshing to old-fashioned people like me
To meet such a primitive Pagan as he,
In whose mind all creation is duly respected 561
As parts of himself—just a little projected;
And who's willing to worship the stars and the sun,
A convert to—nothing but Emerson. So perfect a balance there is in his head, 565
That he talks of things sometimes as if they were dead;
Life, nature, love, God, and affairs of that sort,
He looks at as merely ideas; in short,
As if they were fossils stuck round in a cabinet,
Of such vast extent that our earth's a mere dab in it; 570
Composed just as he is inclined to conjecture her,

Namely, one part pure earth, ninety-nine parts pure lecturer;
 You are filled with delight at his clear demonstration,
 Each figure, word, gesture, just fits the occasion,
 With the quiet precision of science he 'll sort 'em, 575
 But you can't help suspecting the whole a post mortem.

"There are persons, mole-blind to the
 soul's make and style,
 Who insist on a likeness 'twixt him and Carlyle;
 To compare him with Plato would be vastly fairer,
 Carlyle's the more burly, but E. is the rarer; 580
 He sees fewer objects, but clearer,
 truelier,
 If C.'s as original, E.'s more peculiar;
 That he 's more of a man you might say
 of the one,
 Of the other he 's more of an Emerson;
 C.'s the Titan, as shaggy of mind as of
 limb,— 585
 E. the clear-eyed Olympian, rapid and slim;
 The one's two thirds Norseman, the other half Greek,
 Where the one's most abounding, the other 's to seek;
 C.'s generals¹ require to be seen in the mass,— E.'s specialties gain if enlarged by the glass; 590
 C. gives nature and God his own fits of the blues,
 And rims common-sense things with mystical hues,—
 E. sits in a mystery calm and intense,
 And looks coolly around him with sharp
 common-sense;
 C. shows you how every-day matters
 unite 595
 With the dim transdiurnal recesses of
 night,—
 While E., in a plain, preternatural way, Makes mysteries matters of mere every day;
 C. draws all his characters quite à la Fuseli,—

Not sketching their bundles of muscles and thews illy, 600
 He paints with a brush so untamed and profuse,
 They seem nothing but bundles of muscles and thews;
 E. is rather like Flaxman, lines strait
 and severe,
 And a colorless outline, but full, round,
 and clear;—
 To the men he thinks worthy he frankly accords 605
 The design of a white marble statue in
 words.
 C. labors to get at the centre, and then Take a reckoning from there of his actions and men;
 E. calmly assumes the said centre as granted,
 And, given himself, has whatever is wanted. 610

"He has imitators in scores, who omit
 No part of the man but his wisdom and wit,—
 Who go carefully o'er the sky-blue of his brain,
 And when he has skimmed it once, skim
 it again;
 If at all they resemble him, you may be sure it is 615
 Because their shoals mirror his mists and obscurities,
 As a mud-puddle seems deep as heaven
 for a minute,
 While a cloud that floats o'er is reflected within it.

"There is Bryant, as quiet, as cool,
 and as dignified,
 As a smooth, silent iceberg, that never is ignified, 815
 Save when by reflection 't is kindled o'
 nights
 With a semblance of flame by the chill
 Northern Lights.
 He may rank (Griswold says so) first bard of your nation (There's no doubt that he stands in supreme iceolation),
 Your topmost Parnassus he may set his heel on, 820
 But no warm applauses come, peal following peal on,—

He's too smooth and too polished to hang any zeal on:
Unqualified merits, I'll grant, if you choose, he has 'em,
But he lacks the one merit of kindling enthusiasm;
If he stir you at all, it is just, on my
soul, 825
Like being stirred up with the very North Pole.

"He is very nice reading in summer,
but inter
Nos,¹ we don't want extra freezing in winter;
Take him up in the depth of July, my advice is,
When you feel an Egyptian devotion to ices. 830
But, deduct all you can, there's enough
that's right good in him,
He has a true soul for field, river, and wood in him;
And his heart, in the midst of brick walls, or where'er it is,
Glow, softens, and thrills with the tenderest charities—
To you mortals that delve in this trade-ridden planet? 835
No, to old Berkshire's hills, with their limestone and granite.

"But, my dear little bardlings, don't prick up your ears
Nor suppose I would rank you and Bryant as peers;
If I call him an iceberg, I don't mean
to say 865
There is nothing in that which is grand in its way;
He is almost the one of your poets that knows How much grace, strength, and dignity lie in Repose;
If he sometimes fall short, he is too
wise to mar
His thought's modest fulness by going too far; 870
'T would be well if your authors should all make a trial
Of what virtue there is in severe self-denial,

And measure their writings by Hesiod's
staff,
Which teaches that all has less value than half.

"There is Whittier, whose swelling and vehement heart 875 Strains the strait-breasted drab of the Quaker apart,
And reveals the live Man, still supreme and erect,
Underneath the bemummifying wrappers
of sect;
There was ne'er a man born who had more of the swing
Of the true lyric bard and all that kind of thing; 880
And his failures arise (though he seem not to know it)
From the very same cause that has made him a poet,—
A fervor of mind which knows no separation
'Twixt simple excitement and pure inspiration,
As my Pythoness erst sometimes erred from not knowing 885
If 't were I or mere wind through her tripod was blowing;
Let his mind once get head in its favorite direction
And the torrent of verse bursts the dams of reflection, While, borne with the rush of the metre along,
The poet may chance to go right or go
wrong, 890
Content with the whirl and delirium of
song;
Then his grammar's not always correct, nor his rhymes,
And he's prone to repeat his own lyrics sometimes,
Not his best, though, for those are struck off at white-heats
When the heart in his breast like a triphammer beats, 895
And can ne'er be repeated again any
more
Than they could have been carefully plotted before:
Like old what's-his-name there at the battle of Hastings

(Who, however, gave more than mere rhythmical bastings),
Our Quaker leads off metaphorical flights 900
For reform and whatever they call human rights,
Both singing and striking in front of the war,
And hitting his foes with the mallet of Thor;
Anne haec, one exclaims, on beholding
his knocks,
Vestis filii tui, O leather-clad Fox? 905
Can that be thy son, in the battle's mid din,
Preaching brotherly love and then driving it in
To the brain of the tough old Goliath
of sin,
With the smoothest of pebbles from Castaly's spring Impressed on his hard moral sense with a sling? 910

"All honor and praise to the right-hearted bard
Who was true to The Voice when such service was hard,
Who himself was so free he dared sing
for the slave
When to look but a protest in silence was brave;
All honor and praise to the women and
men 915
Who spoke out for the dumb and the down-trodden then!

"There is Hawthorne, with genius so shrinking and rare
That you hardly at first see the strength that is there;
A frame so robust, with a nature so
sweet,
So earnest, so graceful, so lithe and so
fleet, 1000
Is worth a descent from Olympus to meet;
'T is as if a rough oak that for ages had stood,
With his gnarled bony branches like ribs of the wood,
Should bloom, after cycles of struggle
and scathe,

With a single anemone trembly and rathe; ¹ 1005
His strength is so tender, his wildness
so meek,
That a suitable parallel sets one to seek,—
He's a John Bunyan Fouqué, a Puritan Tieck;
When Nature was shaping him, clay was not granted
For making so full-sized a man as she wanted, 1010
So, to fill out her model, a little she spared
From some finer-grained stuff for a woman prepared,
And she could not have hit a more excellent plan
For making him fully and perfectly
man.

"Here's Cooper, who's written six volumes to show
He's as good as a lord: well, let's grant that he's so;
If a person prefer that description of praise,
Why, a coronet's certainly cheaper than bays;
But he need take no pains to convince us he's not 1025
(As his enemies say) the American Scott.
Choose any twelve men, and let C. read aloud
That one of his novels of which he's most proud,
And I'd lay any bet that, without ever quitting
Their box, they'd be all, to a man, foracquitting. 1030
He has drawn you one character,
though, that is new,
One wildflower he's plucked that is wet with the dew
Of this fresh Western world, and, the thing not to mince,
He has done naught but copy it ill ever since;
His Indians, with proper respect be it
said, 1035
Are just Natty Bumppo, daubed over with red,

¹ early

And his very Long Toms are the same useful Nat,
 Rigged up in duck pants and a sou'- wester hat (Though once in a Coffin, a good chance was found To have slipped the old fellow away underground). 1040
 All his other men-figures are clothes
 upon sticks,
 The *dernière chemise*¹ of a man in a fix (As a captain besieged, when his garrison's small,
 Sets up caps upon poles to be seen o'er
 the wall);
 And the women he draws from one model don't vary, 1045
 All sappy as maples and flat as a prairie.
 When a character's wanted, he goes to the task
 As a cooper would do in composing a cask;
 He picks out the staves, of their qualities heedful,
 Just hoops them together as tight as is needful, 1050
 And, if the best fortune should crown the attempt, he Has made at the most something wooden and empty.

"Don't suppose I would underrate
 Cooper's abilities;
 If I thought you'd do that, I should feel very ill at ease;
 The men who have given to one character life 1055
 And objective existence are not very rife;
 You may number them all, both prose-writers and singers, Without overrunning the bounds of your fingers,
 And Natty won't go to oblivion quicker Than Adams the parson or Primrose
 the Vicar. 1060

"There comes Poe, with his raven,
 like Barnaby Rudge,
 Three fifths of him genius and two fifths sheer fudge,

¹literally, last shirt

Who talks like a book of iambs and pentameters,
 In a way to make people of common sense damn metres, 1300
 Who has written some things quite the best of their kind,
 But the heart somehow seems all squeezed out by the mind,
 Who— But hey-dey! What's this?
 Messieurs Mathews and Poe,
 You must n't fling mud-balls at Longfellow so, 1305
 Does it make a man worse that his character's such As to make his friends love him (as you think) too much?
 Why, there is not a bard at this moment alive
 More willing than he that his fellows should thrive;
 While you are abusing him thus, even now 1310
 He would help either one of you out of a slough;
 You may say that he's smooth and all that till you're hoarse,
 But remember that elegance also is
 force;
 After polishing granite as much as you will,
 The heart keeps its tough old persistency still; 1315
 Deduct all you can, that still keeps you
 at bay;
 Why, he'll live till men weary of Collins and Gray.
 I'm not over-fond of Greek metres in English,
 To me rhyme's a gain, so it be not too
 jinglish,
 And your modern hexameter verses are
 no more 1320
 Like Greek ones than sleek Mr. Pope is like Homer;
 As the roar of the sea to the coo of a pigeon is,
 So, compared to your moderns, sounds
 old Melesigenes;²
 I may be too partial, the reason, perhaps, o't is
 That I've heard the old blind man recite his own rhapsodies, 1325

²Homer

And my ear with that music impregnate
 may be,
 Like the poor exiled shell with the soul of the sea,
 Or as one can't bear Strauss when his nature is cloven
 To its deeps within deeps by the stroke of Beethoven;
 But, set that aside, and 't is truth that I speak, ¹³³⁰
 Had Theocritus written in English, not Greek,
 I believe that his exquisite sense would scarce change a line
 In that rare, tender, virgin-like pastoral Evangeline.
 That's not ancient nor modern, its place is apart
 Where time has no sway, in the realm of pure Art, ¹³³⁵
 'T is a shrine of retreat from Earth's hubbub and strife
 As quiet and chaste as the author's own life.

“What! Irving? thrice welcome, warm heart and fine brain, ¹⁴⁴⁰
 You bring back the happiest spirit from Spain,
 And the gravest sweet humor, that ever were there Since Cervantes met death in his gentle despair;
 Nay, don't be embarrassed, nor look so beseeching,
 I sha'n't run directly against my own preaching, ¹⁴⁴⁵
 And, having just laughed at their Raphaels and Dantes,
 Go to setting you up beside matchless
 Cervantes;
 But allow me to speak what I honestly
 feel,—
 To a true poet-heart add the fun of Dick Steele, Throw in all of Addison, minus the chill, ¹⁴⁵⁰
 With the whole of that partnership's stock and good-will,
 Mix well, and while stirring, hum o'er,
 as a spell,
 The fine old English Gentleman, simmer it well,

Sweeten just to your own private liking,
 then strain,
 That only the finest and clearest remain, ¹⁴⁵⁵
 Let it stand out of doors till a soul it receives
 From the warm lazy sun loitering down through green leaves,
 And you'll find a choice nature, not wholly deserving
 A name either English or Yankee,— just Irving.

“There is Lowell, who 's striving Par-nassus to climb
 With a whole bale of isms tied together with rhyme,
 He might get on alone, spite of bram-bles and boulders,
 But he can't with that bundle he has on his shoulders,
 The top of the hill he will ne'er come nigh reaching ¹⁵⁸⁵
 Till he learns the distinction 'twixt singing and preaching;
 His lyre has some chords that would ring pretty well,
 But he'd rather by half make a drum
 of the shell,
 And rattle away till he 's old as Methusalem,
 At the head of a march to the last new Jerusalem.” ¹⁵⁹⁰

THE FIRST SNOW-FALL

The snow had begun in the gloaming,
 And busily all the night
 Had been heaping field and highway
 With a silence deep and white.
 Every pine and fir and hemlock ⁵
 Wore ermine too dear for an earl,
 And the poorest twig on the elm-tree
 Was ridged inch deep with pearl.
 From sheds new-roofed with Carrara
 Came Chanticleer's muffled crow, ¹⁰
 The stiff rails softened to swan's-down,
 And still fluttered down the snow.
 I stood and watched by the window
 The noiseless work of the sky,

And the sudden flurries of snow-birds,
Like brown leaves whirling by. 16

I thought of a mound in sweet Auburn
Where a little headstone stood;
How the flakes were folding it gently,
As did robins the babes in the wood.

Up spoke our own little Mabel, 21 Saying, "Father, who makes it
snow?"

And I told of the good All-father
Who cares for us here below.

Again I looked at the snow-fall, 25
And thought of the leaden sky
That arched o'er our first great sorrow,
When that mound was heaped so high.

I remembered the gradual patience
That fell from that cloud like snow,
Flake by flake, healing and hiding 31
The scar that renewed our woe.

And again to the child I whispered,
"The snow that husheth all,
Darling, the merciful Father 35
Alone can make it fall!"

Then, with eyes that saw not, I kissed
her,
And she, kissing back, could not know
That my kiss was given to her sister,
Folded close under deepening snow. 40

THE WASHERS OF THE SHROUD

OCTOBER, 1861

Along a river-side, I know not where,
I walked one night in mystery of
dream;
A chill creeps curdling yet beneath my
hair,
To think what chanced me by the pallid
gleam
Of a moon-wraith that waned through haunted air. . 5

Pale fireflies pulsed within the meadow-mist
Their halos, wavering thistle downs of
light;
The loon, that seemed to mock some goblin tryst,

Laughed; and the echoes, huddling in affright,
Like Odin's hounds, fled baying down
the night. 10

Then all was silent, till there smote my ear
A movement in the stream that checked
my breath:
Was it the slow splash of a wading deer?
But something said, "This water is of Death?
The Sisters wash a shroud,—ill thing to
hear!" 15

I, looking then, beheld the ancient
Three
Known to the Greek's and to the North-man's creed,
That sit in shadow of the mystic Tree,
Still crooning, as they weave their endless brede,¹
One song: "Time was, Time is, and Time shall be." 20

No wrinkled crones were they, as I had deemed,
But fair as yesterday, to-day, to-morrow,
To mourner, lover, poet, ever seemed;
Something too high for joy, too deep for sorrow,
Thrilled in their tones, and from their faces gleamed. 25

"Still men and nations reap as they have strawn,"
So sang they, working at their task the while;
"The fatal raiment must be cleansed
ere dawn:
For Austria? Italy? the Sea-Queen's isle?
O'er what quenched grandeur must our shroud be drawn?" 30

"Or is it for a younger, fairer corse,
That gathered States like children round his knees,
That tamed the wave to be his posting-
horse,
Feller of forests, linker of the seas, Bridge-builder, hammerer, youngest son of Thor's?" 35

¹ fabric

"What make we, murmur'st thou? and what are we?

When empires must be wound, we bring the shroud,

The time-old web of the implacable
Three:

Is it too coarse for him, the young and proud?

Earth's mightiest deigned to wear it,— why not he?" 40

"Is there no hope?" I moaned, "so strong, so fair!

Our Fowler whose proud bird would brook erewhile

No rival's swoop in all our western air!
Gather the ravens, then, in funeral file

For him, life's morn yet golden in his
hair? 45

"Leave me not hopeless, ye un pitying dames!

I see, half seeing. Tell me, ye who scanned

The stars, Earth's elders, still must noblest aims

Be traced upon oblivious ocean-sands?
Must Hesper join the wailing ghosts of names?" 50

"When grass-blades stiffen with red battle-dew,

Ye deem we choose the victor and the slain:

Say, choose we them that shall be leal
and true

To the heart's longing, the high faith of
brain?

Yet there the victory lies, if ye but knew. 55

"Three roots bear up Dominion:
Knowledge, Will,—

These twain are strong, but stronger
yet the third,—

Obedience,—'t is the great tap-root that still,

Knit round the rock of Duty, is not stirred,

Though Heaven-loosed tempests spend their utmost skill. 60

"Is the doom sealed for Hesper? 'T is not we

Denounce it, but the Law before all
time:

The brave makes danger opportunity;
The waverer, paltering with the chance
sublime,

Dwarfs it to peril: which shall Hesper
be? 65

"Hath he let vultures climb his eagle's seat

To make Jove's bolts purveyors of their maw?

Hath he the Many's plaudits found more sweet

Than Wisdom? held Opinion's wind for Law?

Then let him hearken for the dooms-ter's feet! 70

"Rough are the steps, slow-hewn in flintiest rock,

States climb to power by; slippery those with gold

Down which they stumble to eternal mock:

No chafferer's hand shall long the sceptre hold,

Who, given a Fate to shape, would sell the block. 75

"We sing old Sagas, songs of weal and
woe,

Mystic because too cheaply understood;

Dark sayings are not ours; men hear and know,

See Evil weak, see strength alone in Good,

Yet hope to stem God's fire with walls of tow. 80

"Time Was unlocks the riddle of Time
Is,

That offers choice of glory or of gloom;
The solver makes Time Shall Be surely his.

But hasten, Sisters! for even now the tomb

Grates its slow hinge and calls from the abyss." 85

"But not for him," I cried, "not yet for
him,
Whose large horizon, westering, star by star
Wins from the void to where on Ocean's rim
The sunset shuts the world with golden bar,
Not yet his thews shall fail, his eye grow dim!" 90

"His shall be larger manhood, saved for those
That walk unblenching through the trial-fires;
Not suffering, but faint heart, is worst of woes,
And he no base-born son of craven
sires,
Whose eye need blench confronted with his foes." 95

"Tears may be ours, but proud, for those who win
Death's royal purple in the foeman's
lines;
Peace, too, brings tears; and mid the battle-din,
The wiser ear some text of God divinès,
For the sheathed blade may rust with darker sin." 100

"God, give us peace! not such as lulls
to sleep,
But sword on thigh, and brow with purpose knit!
And let our Ship of State to harbor sweep,
Her ports all up, her battle-lanterns lit,
And her leashed thunders gathering for their leap!" 105

So cried I with clenched hands and passionate pain,
Thinking of dear ones by Potomac's
side;
Again the loon laughed mocking, and
again
The echoes bayed far down the night and died,
While waking I recalled my wandering
brain." 110

From THE BIGLOW PAPERS

[SECOND SERIES]

THE COURTIN'

God makes sech nights, all white an'
still

Fur 'z you can look or listen,
Moonshine an' snow on field an' hill,
All silence an' all glisten.

Zekle crep' up quite unbeknown 5
An' peeked in thru' the winder,
An' there sot Huldý all alone,
'ith no one nigh to hender.

A fireplace filled the room's one side
With half a cord o' wood in— 10
There warn't no stoves (tell comfort died)
To bake ye to a puddin'.

The wa'nut logs shot sparkles out
Towards the pootiest, bless her,
An' leetle flames danced all about 15
The chiny on the dresser.

Agin the chimbley crook-necks¹ hung,
An' in amongst 'em rusted
The ole queen's-arm thet gran'ther
Young
Fetched back f'om Concord busted. 20

The very room, coz she was in,
Seemed warm f'om floor to ceilin',
An' she looked full ez rosy agin
Ez the apples she was peelin'.

'T was kin' o' kingdom-come to look 25
On sech a blessed cretur,
A dogrose blushin' to a brook
Ain't modester nor sweeter.

He was six foot o' man, A 1,
Clear grit an' human natur', 30
None couldn't quicker pitch a ton
Nor dror a furrer straighter.

He'd sparked it with full twenty gals,
Hed squired 'em, danced 'em, druv
'em,
Fust this one, an' then thet, by spells—
All is, he couldn't love 'em. 36

¹ squashes

But long o' her his veins 'ould run
 All crinkly like curled maple,
 The side she breshed felt full o' sun
 Ez a south slope in Ap'il. 40

She thought no v'ice hed sech a swing
 Ez hisn in the choir;
 My! when he made Old Hunderd ring,
 She knowed the Lord was nigher. 44

An' she'd blush scarlit, right in prayer,
 When her new meetin'-bunnet
 Felt somehow thru' its crown a pair
 O' blue eyes sot upon it.

Thet night, I tell ye, she looked some!
 She seemed to 've gut a new soul, 50
 For she felt sartin-sure he'd come,
 Down to her very shoe-sole.

She heered a foot, an' knowed it tu,
 A-raspin' on the scraper,—
 All ways to once her feelins flew 55
 Like sparks in burnt-up paper.

He kin' o' l'itered on the mat,
 Some doubtfle o' the sekle,¹
 His heart kep' goin' pity-pat,
 But hern went pity Zekle. 60

An' yit she gin her cheer a jerk
 Ez though she wished him funder,
 An' on her apples kep' to work,
 Parin' away like murder.

"You want to see my Pa, I s'pose?" 65
 "Wal . . . no . . . I come disign-
 in'"—

"To see my Ma? She's sprinklin' clo'es
 Agin to-morrer's i'nin'."

To say why gals acts so or so,
 Or don't, 'ould be persumin'; 70
 Mebby to mean yes an' say no
 Comes nateral to women.

He stood a spell on one foot fust,
 Then stood a spell on 't other,
 An' on which one he felt the wust 75
 He couldn't ha' told ye nuther.

Says he, "I'd better call agin;"
 Says she, "Think likely, Mister."

¹ sequel, outcome

Thet last word pricked him like a pin,
 An' . . . Wal, he up an' kist her. 80

When Ma bimeby upon 'em slips,
 Huldys sot pale ez ashes,
 All kin' o' smily roun' the lips
 An' teary roun' the lashes.

For she was jes' the quiet kind 85
 Whose natures never vary,
 Like streams that keep a summer mind
 Snowhid in Jenooary.

The blood clost roun' her heart felt glued
 Too tight for all expressin', 90
 Tell mother see how metters stood,
 An' gin 'em both her blessin'.

Then her red come back like the tide
 Down to the Bay o' Fundy,
 An' all I know is they was cried 95
 In meetin' come nex' Sunday.

JONATHAN TO JOHN

It don't seem hardly right, John,
 When both my hands was full,
 To stump me to a fight, John,—
 Your cousin, tu, John Bull!
 Ole Uncle S. sez he, "I guess 5
 We know it now," sez he,
 "The lion's paw is all the law,
 Accordin' to J. B., Thet's fit for you an' me!"

You wonder why we're hot, John? 10
 Your mark wuz on the guns,
 The neutral guns, thet shot, John,
 Our brothers an' our sons:
 Ole Uncle S. sez he, "I guess
 There's human blood," sez he, 15
 "By fits an' starts, in Yankee hearts,
 Though 't may surprise J. B.
 More'n it would you an' me."

Ef I turned mad dogs loose, John,
 On your front-parlor stairs, 20
 Would it jest meet your views, John,
 To wait an' sue their heirs?
 Ole Uncle S. sez he, "I guess,
 I on'y guess," sez he,
 "Thet ef Vattel on his toes fell, 25
 'Twould kind o' rile J. B., Ez wal ez you an' me!"

Who made the law thet hurts, John,
Heads I win,—ditto tails?

"J. B." was on his shirts, John,
 Unless my memory fails.

Ole Uncle S. sez he, "I guess
 (I'm good at thet)," sez he,

"Thet sauce for goose ain't jest the juice

For ganders with J. B., 35
 No more'n with you or me!"

When your rights was our wrongs, John,
 You didn't stop for fuss,—

Britanny's trident prongs, John,
 Was good 'nough law for us. 40

Ole Uncle S. sez he, "I guess, Though physic's good," sez he,

"It doesn't foller thet he can swaller
 Prescriptions signed 'J. B.,'

Put up by you an' me!" 45

We own the ocean, tu, John:

You mus'n' take it hard,

Ef we can't think with you, John,
 It's jest your own back-yard.

Ole Uncle S. sez he, "I guess, 50
 Ef thet's his claim," sez he,

"The fencin'-stuff 'll cost enough
 To bust up friend J. B.,

Ez wal ez you an' me!"

Why talk so drefle big, John, 55
 Of honor when it meant

You didn't care a fig, John,
 But jest for ten per cent?

Ole Uncle S. sez he, "I guess
 He's like the rest," sez he: 60

"When all is done, it's number one

Thet's nearest to J. B., Ez wal ez t' you an' me!"

We give the critters back, John,
 Cos Abram thought 't was right; 65

It warn't your bullyin' clack, John,
 Provokin' us to fight.

Ole Uncle S. sez he, "I guess
 We've a hard row," sez he,

"To hoe jes now; but thet, somehow, 70
 May happen to J. B.,

Ez wal ez you an' me!"

We ain't so weak an' poor, John,

With twenty million people,

An' close to every door, John, 75

A school-house an' a steeple.

Ole Uncle S. sez he, "I guess,

It is a fact," sez he,

"The surest plan to make a Man

Is, think him so, J. B., 80

Ez much ez you or me!"

Our folks believe in Law, John;

An' it's for her sake, now,

They've left the axe an' saw, John,

The anvil an' the plough. 85

Ole Uncle S. sez he, "I guess,

Ef 't warn't for law," sez he,

"There'd be one shindy from here to

Indy;

An' thet don't suit J. B.

(When 't ain't 'twixt you an' me!)"

We know we've got a cause, John, 91

Thet's honest, just, an' true;

We thought 't would win applause,
 John,

Ef nowheres else, from you.

Ole Uncle S. sez he, "I guess 95

His love of right," sez he,

"Hangs by a rotten fibre o' cotton:

There's natur' in J. B.,

Ez wal'z in you an' me!"

The South says, "Poor folks down!"

John, 100

An' "All men up" say we,—

White, yaller, black, an' brown, John:

Now which is your idee?

Ole Uncle S. sez he, "I guess,

John preaches wal," sez he; 105

"But, sermon thru, an' come to du,

Why, there's the old J. B.

A-crowdin' you an' me!"

Shall it be love, or hate, John?

It's you thet's to decide; 110

Ain't your bonds held by Fate, John,

Like all the world's beside?

Ole Uncle S. sez he, "I guess

Wise men forgive," sez he,

"But not forgit; an' some time yit 115

Thet truth may strike J. B.,

Ez wal ez you an' me!"

God means to make this land, John,

Clear thru, from sea to sea,

Believe an' understand, John, 120

The wuth o' bein' free.

Ole Uncle S. sez he, "I guess,

God's price is high," sez he;

"But nothin' else than wut He sells Wears long, an' thet J. B. 125
May larn, like you an' me!"

SUNTHIN' IN THE PASTORAL LINE

Once git a smell o' musk into a draw,
An' it clings hold like precerents in
law:

Your gra'ma'am put it there,—when,
goodness knows,—

To jes' this-worldify her Sunday-clo'es;
But the old chist wun't sarve her gran'- son's wife 5

(For, 'thout new funnitoo, wut good in life?),

An' so ole clawfoot, from the precinks dread

O' the spare chamber, slinks into the shed,

Where, dim with dust, it fust or last subsides

To holdin' seeds an' fifty things besides; 10

But better days stick fast in heart an'
husk,

An' all you keep in 't gits a scent o'
musk.

Jes' so with poets: wut they've airly
read

Gits kind o' worked into their heart
an' head,

So 's 't they can't seem to write but jest on sheers 15

With furrin countries or played-out
ideers,

Nor hev a feelin', ef it doosn't smack
O' wut some critter chose to feel 'way back:

This makes 'em talk o' daisies, larks,
an' things,

Ez though we'd nothin' here that blows
an' sings 20

(Why, I'd give more for one live bobo-link

Than a square mile o' larks in printer's ink),—

This makes 'em think our fust o' May is May,

Which 't ain't, for all the almanicks can say.

O little city-gals, don't never go it 25
Blind on the word o' noospaper or poet!
They're apt to puff, an' May-day seldom looks

Up in the country ez it doos in books;
They're no more like than hornets'- nests an' hives,

Or printed sarmons be to holy lives. 30
I, with my trousers perched on cowhide
boots,

Tuggin' my foundered feet out by the roots,

Hev seen ye come to fling on April's hearse

Your muslin nosegays from the milli-
ner's,

Puzzlin' to find dry ground your queen to choose, 35

An' dance your throats sore in morocker shoes:

I've seen ye an' felt proud, thet, come wut would,

Our Pilgrim stock wuz pethed¹ with hardihood.

Pleasure doos make us Yankees kind
o' winch,

Ez though 't wuz sunthin' paid for by the inch; 40

But yit we du contrive to worry thru,
Ef Dooty tells us thet the thing's to du,

An' kerry a hollerday, if we set out,
Ez stiddily ez though 't wuz a redoubt.

I, country-born an' bred, know where to find 45

Some blooms thet make the season suit
the mind,

An' seem to metch² the doubtin' bluebird's notes,—

Half-vent'rin' liverworts in furry coats, Bloodroots, whose rolled-up leaves ef
you oncurl,

Each on 'em's cradle to a baby-pearl,—
But these are jes' Spring's pickets; sure

ez sin, 51

The rebbel frosts 'll try to drive 'em in;
For half our May 's so awfully like
May n't,

't would rile a Shaker or an evrige saint;

Though I own up I like our back'ard springs 55

Thet kind o' haggel with their greens
 an' things,
 An' when you 'most give up, 'uthout
 more words
 Toss the fields full o' blossoms, leaves,
 an' birds:
 Thet's Northun natur', slow an' apt
 to doubt,
 But when it doos git stirred, ther' 's no
 gin-out! 60

Fust come the blackbirds clatt'rin' in tall trees,
 An' settlin' things in windy Conggresses,— Queer politicians, though, for I'll be skinned Ef all on 'em don't head against the wind.
 'fore long the trees begin to show belief,— 65
 The maple crimsons to a coral-reef,
 Then saffern swarms swing off from all the willers
 So plump they look like yaller caterpillars,
 Then gray hossches'nuts leetle hands
 unfold
 Softer 'n a baby's be at three days
 old: 70
 Thet's robin-redbreast's almanick; he knows
 Thet arter this ther' 's only blossom-
 snows;
 So, choosin' out a handy crotch an'
 spouse,
 He goes to plast'rin' his adobe house.
 Then seems to come a hitch,—things lag behind, 75
 Till some fine mornin' Spring makes up her mind,
 An' ez, when snow-swelled rivers cresh their dams
 Heaped-up with ice that dovetails in an' jams,
 A leak comes spirtin' thru some pin-hole cleft,
 Grows stronger, fercer, tears out right
 an' left, 80
 Then all the waters bow themselves an' come,
 Suddin, in one gret slope o' shedderin'
 foam,

Jes' so our Spring gits everythin' in tune
 An' gives one leap from Aperl into
 June:
 Then all comes crowdin' in; afore you think, 85
 Young oak-leaves mist the side-hill woods with pink;
 The catbird in the laylock¹-bush is loud;
 The orchards turn to heaps o' rosy
 cloud;
 Red-cedars blossom tu, though few folks know it,
 An' look all dipt in sunshine like a poet; 90
 The lime-trees pile their solid stacks
 o' shade
 An' drows'ly simmer with the bees'
 sweet trade;
 In ellum-shrouds the flashin' hangbird clings
 An' for the summer vy'ge his hammock slings;
 All down the loose-walled lanes in archin' bowers 95
 The barb'ry droops its strings o' golden
 flowers,
 Whose shrinkin' hearts the school-gals
 love to try
 With pins,—they'll worry yourn so,
 boys, bimeby!
 But I don't love your cat'logue style,
 —do you?—
 Ez ef to sell off Natur' by vendoo; 100
 One word with blood in 't 's twice ez good ez two:
 'nuff sed, June's bridesman, poet o' the
 year,
 Gladness on wings, the bobolink, is
 here;
 Half-hid in tip-top apple-blooms he swings,
 Or climbs against the breeze with quiv-erin' wings, 105
 Or, givin' way to 't in a mock despair, Runs down, a brook o' laughter, thru
 the air.
 I ollus feel the sap start in my veins
 In Spring, with curus heats an' prickly pains,
 Thet drive me, when I git a chance, to walk 110

¹ lilac

Off by myself to hev a privit talk
With a queer critter thet can't seem to
'gree

Along o' me like most folks,—Mister
Me.

Ther' 's times when I'm onsoshle ez a stone,

An' sort o' suffercate to be alone,— 115

I'm crowded jes' to think thet folks are nigh,

An' can't bear nothin' closer than the
sky;

Now the wind 's full ez shifty in the mind

Ez wut it is ou'-doors, ef I ain't blind,
An' sometimes, in the fairest sou'west

weather, 120

My innard vane pints east for weeks
together,

My natur' gits all goose-flesh, an' my sins

Come drizzlin' on my conscience sharp
ez pins:

Wal, et sech times I jes' slip out o'
sight

An' take it out in a fair stan'-up fight 125

With the one cuss I can't lay on the shelf,

The crook'dest stick in all the heap,— Myself.

'T wuz so las' Sabbath arter meetin'-
time:

Findin' my feelin's wouldn't noways
rhyme

With nobody's, but off the hendle flew

An' took things from an east-wind pint o' view, 131

I started off to lose me in the hills

Where the pines be, up back o' 'Siah's Mills:

Pines, ef you're blue, are the best friends I know,

They mope an' sigh an' sheer your feelin's so,— 135

They hesh the ground beneath so, tu,
I swan,

You half-forgit you've gut a body on.
Ther' 's a small school'us' there where four roads meet,

The door-steps hollered out by little
feet,

An' side-posts carved with names whose owners grew 140

To gret men, some on 'em, an' deacons, tu;

't ain't used no longer, coz the town
hez gut

A high-school, where they teach the Lord knows wut:

Three-story larnin' 's pop'lar now; I guess

We thriv' ez wal on jes' two stories
less, 145

For it strikes me ther's such a thing ez sinnin'

By overloadin' children's underpinnin':
Wal, here it wuz I larned my A B C,

An it's a kind o' favorite spot with me.

We're curus critters: Now ain't jes the minute 150

Thet ever fits us easy while we're in it;
Long ez 'twuz futur', 'twould be perfect bliss,—

Soon ez it's past, thet time's wuth ten o' this;

An' yet there ain't a man thet need be told

Thet Now's the only bird lays eggs
o' gold. 155

A knee-high lad, I used to plot an' plan
An think 'twuz life's cap-sheaf to be a

man;

Now, gittin gray, there's nothin I enjoy
Like dreamin' back along into a boy:

So the ole school'us' is a place I choose Afore all others, ef I want to muse; 161

I set down where I used to set, an'
git

My boyhood back, an' better things with it,—

Faith, Hope, an' sunthin', ef it isn't Cherity,

It's want o' guile, an' thet's ez gret a rerrity, 165

While Fancy's cushin', free to Prince and Clown,

Makes the hard bench ez soft ez milk-
weed-down.

Now, 'fore I knowed, thet Sabbath
arternoon

When I sot out to tramp myself in tune,
I found me in the school'us' on my

seat, 170

Drummin' the march to No-wheres with my feet.
 Thinkin' o' nothin', I've heerd ole folks
 say,
 Is a hard kind o' dooty in its way:
 It's thinkin' everythin' you ever knew,
 Or ever hearn, to make your feelin's
 blue. 175

I sot there tryin' thet on for a spell:
 I thought o' the Rebellion, then o' Hell,
 Which some folks tell ye now is jest a metterfor
 (A the'ry, p'raps, it wun't feel none the better for);
 I thought o' Reconstruction, wut we'd win 180

Patchin' our patent self-blow-up agin:
 I thought ef this 'ere milkin' o' the wits,
 So much a month, warn't givin' Natur' fits,— Ef folks warn't druv, findin' their own milk fail,
 To work the cow thet hez an iron tail, 185

An' ef idees 'thout ripenin' in the pan
 Would send up cream to humor ary
 man:
 From this to thet I let my worryin'
 creep,
 Till finally I must ha' fell asleep.

Our lives in sleep are some like streams thet glide 190
 'twixt flesh an' sperrit boundin' on each
 side,
 Where both shores' shadders kind o'
 mix an' mingle
 In sunthin' thet ain't jes' like either single;
 An' when you cast off moorin's from
 To-day,
 An' down towards To-morrer drift
 away, 195

The imiges thet tingle on the stream
 Make a new upside-down'ard world o'
 dream:
 Sometimes they seem like sunrisestreaks an' warnin's
 O' wut'll be in Heaven on Sabbath-mornin's,
 An', mixed right in ez ef jest out o' spite, 200

Sunthin' thet says your supper ain't gone right.

I'm gret on dreams, an' often when I wake,
 I've lived so much it makes my mem'ry ache,
 An' can't skurce take a cat-nap in my cheer
 'thout hevin' 'em, some good, some bad,
 all queer. 205

Now I wuz settin' where I'd ben, it seemed,
 An' ain't sure yit whether I r'ally dreamed,
 Nor, ef I did, how long I might ha'
 slep',
 When I hearn some un stompin' up the
 step,
 An' lookin' round, ef two an' two make four, 210

I see a Pilgrim Father in the door,
 He wore a steeple-hat, tall boots, an'
 spurs
 With rowels to 'em big ez ches'nutburrs,
 An' his gret sword behind him sloped
 away
 Long'z a man's speech thet dunno wut
 to say.— 215

"Ef your name's Biglow, an' your given-name Hosce," sez he, "it's arter you I came;
 I'm your gret-gran'ther multiplied by three."—
 "My wut?" sez I.—"Your gret-gretgret," sez he:
 "You wouldn't ha' never been here but
 for me. 220

Two hundred an' three year ago this
 May
 The ship I come in sailed up Boston
 Bay;
 I'd been a cunnle in our Civil War,—
 But wut on airth hev you got up one for?
 Coz we du things in England, 'tain't for you 225

To git a notion you can du 'em tu:
 I'm told you write in public prints: ef
 true,
 It's nateral you should know a thing or two."—
 "Thet air's an argymunt I can't endorse,—

'twould prove, coz you wear spurs, you kep' a horse: 230

For brains," sez I, "wutever you may think,

Ain't boun' to cash the drafs o' pen-an'-ink,—

Though mos' folks write ez ef they hoped jes' quickenin'

The churn would argoo skim-milk into thickenin';

But skim-milk ain't a thing to change its view 235

O' wut it's meant for more'n a smoky flue.

But du pray tell me, 'fore we furdur go,
How in all Natur' did you come to know

'bout our affairs," sez I, "in Kingdom-
Come?"—

"Wal, I worked round at sperrit-rappin' some, 240

An' danced the tables till their legs wuz gone,

In hopes o' larnin' wut wuz goin' on,"
Sez he, "but mejums lie so like all-split
Thet I concluded it wuz best to quit.

But, come now, ef you wun't confess to knowin', 245

You've some conjectures how the thing's a-goin'."—

"Gran'ther," sez I, "a vane warn't never known

Nor asked to hev a jedgment of its
own;

An yit, ef 'tain't gut rusty in the jints,

It's safe to trust its say on certin pints:
It knows the wind's opinions to a T, 251

An' the wind settles wut the weather'll
be."

"I never thought a scion of our stock Could grow the wood to make a weathercock;

When I wuz younger'n you, skurce
more'n a shaver, 255

No airthly wind," sez he, "could make me waver!"

(Ez he said this, he clinched his jaw
an' forehead,

Hitchin' his belt to bring his swordhilt forrard.)—

"Jes so it wuz with me," sez I, "I swow,
When I wuz younger'n wut you see me now,— 260

Nothin' from Adam's fall to Huld'y's bonnet,

Thet I warn't full-cocked with my jedgment on it;

But now I'm gittin' on in life, I find It's a sight harder to make up my mind,—

Nor I don't often try tu, when events
Will du it for me free of all expense. 266

The moral question's ollus plain
enough,—

It's jes' the human-natur' side thet's tough:

Wut's best to think mayn't puzzle me
nor you,—

The pinch comes in decidin' wut to du; 270

Ef you read History, all runs smooth
ez grease,

Coz there the men ain't nothin' more'n idees,—

But come to make it, ez we must today,

Th' idees hev arms an' legs an' stop
the way:

It's easy fixin' things in facts an' fig-
gers,— 275

They can't resist, nor warn't brought up with niggers;

But come to try your the'ry on,—why,
then

Your facts an' figgers change to ign'ant
men

Actin' ez ugly—"Smite 'em hip an' thigh!"

Sez gran'ther, "and let every man-child
die! 280

Oh for three weeks o' Crommle an'
the Lord!

Up, Isr'el, to your tents an' grind the sword!"—

"Thet kind o' thing worked wal in ole Judee,

But you forgit how long it's ben A.D.;
You think thet's ellerkence,—I call it

shoddy, 285

A thing," sez I, "wun't cover soul nor body;

I like the plain all-wool o' common-
sense,

Thet warms ye now, an' will a twelvemonth hence.

You took to follerin' where the Prophets beckoned,

An', fust you knowed on, back come
 Charles the Second; 290
 Now wut I want's to hev all we gain stick,
 An' not to start Millennium too quick;
 We hain't to punish only, but to keep,
 An' the cure's gut to go a cent'ry deep."
 "Wall, milk-an'-water ain't the best o' glue, 295
 Sez he, "an' so you'll find afore you're thru;
 Ef reshness venters sunthin', shillyshally
 Loses ez often wut's ten times the vally.
 Thet exe of ourn, when Charles's neck
 gut split,
 Opened a gap thet ain't bridged over yit: 300
 Slav'ry's your Charles, the Lord hez gin the exe"—
 "Our Charles," sez I, "hez gut eight million necks.
 The hardest question ain't the black man's right,
 The trouble is to 'mancipate the white;
 One's chained in body an' can be sot
 free, 305
 But t'other's chained in soul to an idee:
 It's a long job, but we shall worry thru
 it;
 Ef bagnets fail, the spellin'-book must du it."
 "Hosee," sez he, "I think you're goin'
 to fail:
 The rattlesnake ain't dangerous in the tail; 310
 This 'ere rebellion's nothing but the rattle,— You'll stomp on thet an' think you've won the bettle;
 It's Slavery thet's the fangs an' thinkin'
 head,
 An' ef you want selvation, cresh it
 dead,—
 An' cresh it suddin, or you'll larn by waitin' 315
 Thet Chance wun't stop to listen to de-batin'!"—
 "God's truth!" sez I,—“an' ef I held the club,
 An' knowed jes' where to strike,—but there's the rub!”—
 "Strike soon," sez he, "or you'll be deadly ailin',—

Folks thet's afear'd to fail are sure o' failin'; 320
 God hates your sneakin' creturs thet believe He'll settle things they run away an'
 leave!"
 He brought his foot down fercely, ez he spoke,
 An' give me sech a startle thet I woke.

ODE RECITED AT THE HARVARD COMMEMORATION

JULY 21, 1865

I

Weak-winged is song,
 Nor aims at that clear-ethered height Whither the brave deed climbs for
 light:
 We seem to do them wrong,
 Bringing our robin's-leaf to deck their hearse 5
 Who in warm life-blood wrote their nobler verse,
 Our trivial song to honor those who come
 With ears attuned to strenuous trump and drum,
 And shaped in squadron-strophes their desire,
 Live battle-odes whose lines were steel and fire: 10
 Yet sometimes feathered words are strong,
 A gracious memory to buoy up and save From Lethe's¹ dreamless ooze, the common grave
 Of the unventurous throng.

II

To-day our Reverend Mother welcomes
 back 15
 Her wisest Scholars, those who understood
 The deeper teaching of her mystic tome,
 And offered their fresh lives to make it good:
 No lore of Greece or Rome,
 No science peddling with the names of
 things, 20

¹ the river of forgetfulness

Or reading stars to find inglorious fates,
 Can lift our life with wings Far from Death's idle gulf that for the many waits,
 And lengthen out our dates
 With that clear fame whose memory sings 25
 In manly hearts to come, and nerves them and dilates:
 Nor such thy teaching, Mother of us
 all!
 Not such the trumpet-call
 Of thy diviner mood,
 That could thy sons entice 30
 From happy homes and toils, the fruitful nest
 Of those half-virtues which the world calls best,
 Into War's tumult rude;
 But rather far that stern device
 The sponsors chose that round thy cradle stood 35
 In the dim, unventured wood,
 The VERITAS that lurks beneath
 The letter's unprolific sheath,
 Life of whate'er makes life worth living,
 Seed-grain of high emprise, immortal food, 40
 One heavenly thing whereof earth hath the giving.

III

Many loved Truth, and lavished life's best oil
 Amid the dust of books to find her, Content at last, for guerdon of their toil,
 With the cast mantle she hath left behind her. 45
 Many in sad faith sought for her,
 Many with crossed hands sighed
 for her;
 But these, our brothers, fought for
 her,
 At life's dear peril wrought for her,
 So loved her that they died for her,
 Tasting the raptured fleetness 51
 Of her divine completeness:
 Their higher instinct knew Those love her best who to themselves are true,

And what they dare to dream of, dare to do; 55
 They followed her and found her
 Where all may hope to find,
 Not in the ashes of the burnt-out mind,
 But beautiful, with danger's sweetness round her.
 Where faith made whole with deed
 Breathes its awakening breath 61
 Into the lifeless creed,
 They saw her plumed and mailed,
 With sweet, stern face unveiled,
 And all-repaying eyes, look proud on them in death. 65

IV

Our slender life runs rippling by, and glides
 Into the silent hollow of the past;
 What is there that abides
 To make the next age better for the last?
 Is earth too poor to give us 70
 Something to live for here that shall outlive us?
 Some more substantial boon
 Than such as flows and ebbs with Fortune's fickle moon?
 The little that we see
 From doubt is never free; 75
 The little that we do
 Is but half-nobly true;
 With our laborious hiving
 What men call treasure, and the gods
 call dross,
 Life seems a jest of Fate's contriv-
 ing, 80
 Only secure in every one's conniving,
 A long account of nothings paid with loss,
 Where we poor puppets, jerked by unseen wires,
 After our little hour of strut and rave,
 With all our pasteboard passions and desires, 85
 Loves, hates, ambitions, and immortal
 fires,
 Are tossed pell-mell together in the grave.
 But stay! no age was e'er degenerate,
 Unless men held it at too cheap a rate,

For in our likeness still we shape our fate. 90
Ah, there is something here
Unfathomed by the cynic's sneer,
Something that gives our feeble light
A high immunity from Night,
Something that leaps life's narrow
bars 95
To claim its birthright with the hosts of heaven;
A seed of sunshine that can leaven
Our earthly dullness with the beams
of stars,
And glorify our clay
With light from fountains elder than
the Day; 100
A conscience more divine than we,
A gladness fed with secret tears,
A vexing, forward-reaching sense
Of some more noble permanence;
A light across the sea, 105
Which haunts the soul and will not let it be,
Still beaconing from the heights of undegenerate years.

V

Whither leads the path
To ampler fates that leads?
Not down through flowery
meads, 110
To reap an aftermath
Of youth's vainglorious weeds,
But up the steep, amid the wrath
And shock of deadly-hostile creeds,
Where the world's best hope and stay 115
By battle's flashes gropes a desperate
way,
And every turf the fierce foot clings to bleeds.
Peace hath her not ignoble wreath,
Ere yet the sharp, decisive word Light the black lips of cannon, and the sword 120
Dreams in its easeful sheath;
But some day the live coal behind the
thought,
Whether from Baäl's stone obscene,
Or from the shrine serene
Of God's pure altar brought, 125

Bursts up in flame; the war of tongue and pen Learns with what deadly purpose it was fraught,
And, helpless in the fiery passion
caught,
Shakes all the pillared state with shock
of men:
Some day the soft Ideal that we wooed Confronts us fiercely; foe-beset, pursued, 131
And cries reproachful: "Was it, then,
my praise,
And not myself was loved? Prove now thy truth;
I claim of thee the promise of thy
youth;
Give me thy life, or cower in empty phrase, 135
The victim of thy genius, not its mate!"
Life may be given in many ways,
And loyalty to Truth be sealed
As bravely in the closet as the field,
So bountiful is Fate; 140
But then to stand beside her,
When craven churls deride her,
To front a lie in arms and not to yield,
This shows, methinks, God's plan
And measure of a stalwart man, 145
Limbed like the old heroic breeds,
Who stands self-poised on man-
hood's solid earth,
Not forced to frame excuses for his birth,
Fed from within with all the strength
he needs.

VI

Such was he, our Martyr-Chief, 150 Whom late the Nation he had led,
With ashes on her head,
Wept with the passion of an angry
grief:
Forgive me, if from present things I turn
To speak what in my heart will beat and burn, 155
And hang my wreath on his world-honored urn.
Nature, they say, doth dote,
And cannot make a man
Save on some worn-out plan,
Repeating us by rote: 160

For him her Old-World moulds aside
 she threw,
 And, choosing sweet clay from the breast
 Of the unexhausted West,
 With stuff untainted shaped a hero new,
 Wise, steadfast in the strength of God,
 and true. 165
 How beautiful to see Once more a shepherd of mankind indeed,
 Who loved his charge, but never loved to lead;
 One whose meek flock the people joyed
 to be,
 Not lured by any cheat of birth, 170
 But by his clear-grained human worth,
 And brave old wisdom of sincerity!
 They knew that outward grace is dust;
 They could not choose but trust
 In that sure-footed mind's unfaltering skill, 175
 And supple-tempered will
 That bent like perfect steel to spring
 again and thrust.
 His was no lonely mountain-peak
 of mind,
 Thrusting to thin air o'er our cloudy bars,
 A sea-mark now, now lost in vapors blind; 180
 Broad prairie rather, genial, level-
 lined,
 Fruitful and friendly for all human
 kind,
 Yet also nigh to heaven and loved of loftiest stars.
 Nothing of Europe here,
 Or, then, of Europe fronting mornward
 still, 185
 Ere any names of Serf and Peer Could Nature's equal scheme de-
 face
 And thwart her genial will;
 Here was a type of the true elder race,
 And one of Plutarch's men talked with us face to face. 190
 I praise him not; it were too late;
 And some innative weakness there must
 be
 In him who condescends to victory

Such as the Present gives, and cannot wait,
 Safe in himself as in a fate. 195
 So always firmly he;
 He knew to bide his time,
 And can his fame abide,
 Still patient in his simple faith sublime,
 Till the wise years decide. 200 Great captains, with their guns and drums,
 Disturb our judgment for the hour,
 But at last silence comes;
 These all are gone, and, standing like
 a tower,
 Our children shall behold his fame. 205
 The kindly-earnest, brave, foresee-
 ing man,
 Sagacious, patient, dreading praise, not blame,
 New birth of our new soil, the first American.

VII

Long as man's hope insatiate can discern
 Or only guess some more inspiring
 goal 210
 Outside of Self, enduring as the pole,
 Along whose course the flying axles
 burn
 Of spirits bravely-pitched, earth's manlier brood;
 Long as below we cannot find
 The meed that stills the inexorable
 mind; 215
 So long this faith to some ideal Good,
 Under whatever mortal names it masks,
 Freedom, Law, Country, this ethereal mood
 That thanks the Fates for their severer tasks,
 Feeling its challenged pulses leap, 220
 While others skulk in subterfuges cheap,
 And, set in Danger's van, has all the boon it asks,
 Shall win man's praise and woman's
 love,
 Shall be a wisdom that we set above
 All other skills and gifts to culture
 dear, 225

A virtue round whose forehead we inwreathe
 Laurels that with a living passion breathe
 When other crowns grow, while we twine them, sear.
 What brings us thronging these high rites to pay,
 And seal these hours the noblest of our year, ²³⁰
 Save that our brothers found this better way?

VIII

We sit here in the Promised Land That flows with Freedom's honey and milk;
 But 't was they won it, sword in
 hand,
 Making the nettle danger soft for us
 as silk. ²³⁵
 We welcome back our bravest and our best;—
 Ah me! not all! some come not with the rest,
 Who went forth brave and bright as any here!
 I strive to mix some gladness with my strain,
 But the sad strings complain,
 And will not please the ear: ²⁴¹
 I sweep them for a pæan, but they wane
 Again and yet again
 Into a dirge, and die away, in pain.
 In these brave ranks I only see the gaps, ²⁴⁵
 Thinking of dear ones whom the dumb
 turf wraps,
 Dark to the triumph which they died
 to gain:
 Fitlier may others greet the living,
 For me the past is unforgiving;
 I with uncovered head ²⁵⁰
 Salute the sacred dead,
 Who went, and who return not.—Say not so!
 'Tis not the grapes of Canaan that repay,
 But the high faith that failed not by
 the way;
 Virtue treads paths that end not in the grave; ²⁵⁵
 No ban of endless night exiles the
 brave;

And to the saner mind
 We rather seem the dead that stayed behind.
 Blow, trumpets, all your exultations
 blow!
 For never shall their aureoled presence lack: ²⁶⁰
 I see them muster in a gleaming row,
 With ever-youthful brows that nobler
 show;
 We find in our dull road their shining track;

In every nobler mood
 We feel the orient of their spirit glow,
 Part of our life's unalterable good, ²⁶⁶
 Of all our saintlier aspiration;
 They come transfigured back,
 Secure from change in their high-hearted ways,
 Beautiful evermore, and with the rays
 Of morn on their white Shields of Expectation! ²⁷¹

IX

But is there hope to save Even this ethereal essence from the grave?
 What ever 'scaped Oblivion's subtle
 wrong
 Save a few clarion names, or golden threads of song? ²⁷⁵
 Before my musing eye
 The mighty ones of old sweep by,
 Disvoicèd now and insubstantial
 things,
 As noisy once as we; poor ghosts of
 kings,
 Shadows of empire wholly gone to dust, ²⁸⁰
 And many races, nameless long ago,
 To darkness driven by that imperious gust
 Of ever-rushing Time that here doth
 blow:
 O visionary world, condition strange,
 Where naught abiding is but only change, ²⁸⁵
 Where the deep-bolted stars themselves still shift and range!
 Shall we to more continuance make pretence?
 Renown builds tombs; a life-estate is Wit;

And, bit by bit,
The cunning years steal all from us
but woe; 290

Leaves are we, whose decays no harvest sow.

But, when we vanish hence,
Shall they lie forceless in the dark below,

Save to make green their little length of sods,

Or deepen pansies for a year or two,
Who now to us are shining-sweet as gods? 296

Was dying all they had the skill to do?

That were not fruitless: but the Soul resents

Such short-lived service, as if blind events

Ruled without her, or earth could so endure; 300

She claims a more divine investiture
Of longer tenure than Fame's airy rents;

Whate'er she touches doth her nature share;

Her inspiration haunts the ennobled air,

Gives eyes to mountains blind,
Ears to the deaf earth, voices to the wind, 306

And her clear trump sings succor everywhere

By lonely bivouacs to the wakeful mind;

For soul inherits all that soul could dare:

Yea, Manhood hath a wider span 310

And larger privilege of life than man.
The single deed, the private sacrifice,

So radiant now through proudly-hidden tears,

Is covered up erelong from mortal eyes

With thoughtless drift of the deciduous years; 315

But that high privilege that makes all men peers,

That leap of heart whereby a people rise

Up to a noble anger's height,
And, flamed on by the Fates, not shrink, but grow more bright,

That swift validity in noble veins,
Of choosing danger and disdaining shame, 321

Of being set on flame
By the pure fire that flies all contact base

But wraps its chosen with angelic might, 324

These are imperishable gains,
Sure as the sun, medicinal as light,

These hold great futures in their lusty reins

And certify to earth a new imperial race.

X

Who now shall sneer?

Who dare again to say we trace 330
Our lines to a plebeian race?

Roundhead and Cavalier!

Dumb are those names erewhile in battle loud;

Dream-footed as the shadow of a cloud,
They flit across the ear: 335

That is best blood that hath most iron in 't.

To edge resolve with, pouring without stint

For what makes manhood dear.

Tell us not of Plantagenets,

Hapsburgs, and Guelfs, whose thin bloods crawl 340

Down from some victor in a border-brawl!

How poor their outworn coronets,
Matched with one leaf of that plain civic wreath

Our brave for honor's blazon shall bequeath,

Through whose desert a rescued Nation sets 345

Her heel on treason, and the trumpet hears

Shout victory, tingling Europe's sullen ears

With vain resentments and more vain regrets!

XI

Not in anger, not in pride,

Pure from passion's mixture rude
Ever to base earth allied, 351

But with far-heard gratitude,
Still with heart and voice renewed,

To heroes living and dear martyrs
 dead,
 The strain should close that consecrates
 our brave. 355
 Lift the heart and lift the head!
 Lofty be its mood and grave,
 Not without a martial ring,
 Not without a prouder tread
 And a peal of exultation: 360
 Little right has he to sing Through whose heart in such an hour
 Beats no march of conscious power,
 Sweeps no tumult of elation!
 'Tis no Man we celebrate. 365
 By his country's victories great,
 A hero half, and half the whim of Fate,
 But the pith and marrow of a Nation
 Drawing force from all her men,
 Highest, humblest, weakest, all, 370
 For her time of need, and then Pulsing it again through them,
 Till the basest can no longer cower,
 Feeling his soul spring up divinely tall, Touched but in passing by her mantle-hem. 375
 Come back, then, noble pride, for 'tis her dower!
 How could poet ever tower,
 If his passions, hopes, and fears,
 If his triumphs and his tears,
 Kept not measure with his people? 380
 Boom, cannon, boom to all the winds and waves!
 Clash out, glad bells, from every rock-ing steeple!
 Banners, adance with triumph, bend your staves!
 And from every mountain-peak
 Let beacon-fire to answering beacon speak, 385
 Katahdin tell Monadnock, White-face he,
 And so leap on in light from sea to sea,
 Till the glad news be sent Across a kindling continent, Making earth feel more firm and air breathe braver: 390
 "Be proud! for she is saved, and all have helped to save her!

She that lifts up the manhood of
 the poor,
 She of the open soul and open door,
 With room about her hearth for all mankind!
 The fire is dreadful in her eyes no
 more; 395
 From her bold front the helm she doth unbind,
 Sends all her handmaid armies
 back to spin,
 And bids her navies, that so lately
 hurled
 Their crashing battle, hold their thunders in,
 Swimming like birds of calm along the unarmful shore. 400
 No challenge sends she to the elder
 world,
 That looked askance and hated; a light scorn Plays o'er her mouth, as round her mighty knees
 She calls her children back, and waits the morn
 Of nobler day, enthroned between her subject seas." 405

XII

Bow down, dear Land, for thou hast found release!
 Thy God, in these distempered days,
 Hath taught thee the sure wisdom of His ways,
 And through thine enemies hath wrought thy peace!
 Bow down in prayer and praise! 410
 No poorest in thy borders but may now Lift to the juster skies a man's enfranchised brow.
 O Beautiful! my Country! ours once
 more!
 Smoothing thy gold of war-dishevelled
 hair
 O'er such sweet brows as never other wore, 415
 And letting thy set lips,
 Freed from wrath's pale eclipse,
 The rosy edges of their smile lay bare,
 What words divine of lover or of poet
 Could tell our love and make thee know
 it, 420

Among the Nations bright beyond compare?

What were our lives without thee?
What all our lives to save thee?
We reck not what we gave thee;
We will not dare to doubt thee, ⁴²⁵

But ask whatever else, and we will dare!

AFTER THE BURIAL

Yes, faith is a goodly anchor;
When skies are sweet as a psalm,
At the bows it lolls so stalwart,
In its bluff, broad-shouldered calm.

And when over breakers to leeward ⁵
The tattered surges are hurled,
It may keep our head to the tempest,
With its grip on the base of the world.

But, after the shipwreck, tell me
What help in its iron thews, ¹⁰
Still true to the broken hawser,
Deep down among sea-weed and ooze?

In the breaking gulfs of sorrow,
When the helpless feet stretch out
And find in the deeps of darkness ¹⁵
No footing so solid as doubt,

Then better one spar of Memory,
One broken plank of the Past,
That our human heart may cling to,
Though hopeless of shore at last! ²⁰

To the spirit its splendid conjectures,
To the flesh its sweet despair,
Its tears o'er the thin-worn locket
With its anguish of deathless hair!

Immortal? I feel it and know it, ²⁵
Who doubts it of such as she?
But that is the pang's very secret,—
Immortal away from me.

There's a narrow ridge in the graveyard
Would scarce stay a child in his race,
But to me and my thought it is wider ³¹
Than the star-sown vague of Space.

Your logic, my friend, is perfect,
Your moral most dearly true;
But, since the earth clashed on her ³⁵
coffin,
I keep hearing that, and not you.

Console if you will, I can bear it;
'Tis a well-meant alms of breath;
But not all the preaching since Adam
Has made Death other than Death. ⁴⁰

It is pagan; but wait till you feel it,—
That jar of our earth, that dull shock
When the ploughshare of deeper passion
Tears down to our primitive rock.

Communion in spirit! Forgive me, ⁴⁵
But I, who am earthly and weak, Would give all my incomes from dreamland
For a touch of her hand on my cheek.

That little shoe in the corner,
So worn and wrinkled and brown, ⁵⁰
With its emptiness confutes you,
And argues your wisdom down.

DEMOCRACY ¹

He must be a born leader or mis-leader of men, or must have been sent into the world unfurnished with that modulating and restraining balance-wheel which we call a sense of humor, who, in old age, has as strong a confidence in his opinions and in the necessity of bringing the universe into conformity with them as he had in youth.
In a world the very condition of whose being is that it should be in a perpetual flux, where all seems mirage, and the one abiding thing is the effort to distinguish realities from appearances, the elderly man must be indeed of a singularly tough and valid fibre who is certain that he has any clarified residuum of experience, any assured verdict of reflection, that deserves to be called an opinion, or who, even if he had, feels that he is justified in holding mankind by the button while he is expounding it. And in a world of daily—nay, almost hourly—journalism, where every clever man, every man who thinks himself clever, or whom anybody else thinks clever, is called upon to deliver his judgment point-blank and at the word of command on every conceivable subject of human thought, or, on what sometimes seems to him very much the same 10 everything, on every inconceivable display of human want of thought, there is such a spendthrift waste of all those commonplaces which furnish the permitted staple of public discourse that there is little chance of beguiling a new tune out of the one-stringed instrument on which we have been thrumming so long. In this desperate necessity one is often tempted to think that, if all 20 the words of the dictionary were tumbled down in a heap and then all those fortuitous juxtapositions and combinations that made tolerable sense were picked out and pieced together, we might find among them some poignant suggestions towards novelty of thought or expression. But, alas! it is only the great poets who seem to have this unsolicited profusion of unexpected and 30 incalculable phrase, this infinite variety of topic. For everybody else everything has been said before, and said over again after. He who has read his Aristotle will be apt to think that observation has on most points of general applicability said its last word, and he who has mounted the tower of Plato to look abroad from it will never hope to climb another 40 with so lofty a vantage of speculation. Where it is so simple if not so easy a thing to hold one's peace, why add to the general confusion of tongues? There is something disheartening, too, in being expected to fill up not less than a certain measure of time, as if the mind were an hour-glass, that need only be shaken and set on one end or the other, as the case 50 may be, to run its allotted sixty minutes with decorous exactitude. I recollect being once told by the late eminent naturalist, Agassiz, that when he was to deliver his first lecture as professor (at Zürich, I believe) he had grave doubts of his ability to occupy the prescribed three quarters of an hour. He was speaking without notes, and glancing anxiously from time to time at the watch that lay before him on the desk. "When I had spoken a half hour," he said, "I had told them 10 everything I knew in the world, everything! Then I began to repeat myself," he added, roguishly, "and I have done nothing else ever since." Beneath the humorous exaggeration of the story I seemed to see the face of a very serious and improving moral. And yet if one were to say only what he had to say and then stopped, his audience would feel defrauded of their honest 20 measure. Let us take courage by the example of the French, whose exportation of Bordeaux wines increases as the area of their land in vineyards is diminished.

To me, somewhat hopelessly revolving these things, the undelayable year has rolled round, and I find myself called upon to say something in this place, where so many wiser men have 30 spoken before me. Precluded, in my quality of national guest, by motives of taste and discretion, from dealing with any question of immediate and domestic concern, it seemed to me wisest, or at any rate most prudent, to choose a topic of comparatively abstract interest, and to ask your indulgence for a few somewhat generalized remarks on a matter concerning which 40 I had some experimental knowledge, derived from the use of such eyes and ears as Nature had been pleased to endow me withal, and such report as I had been able to win from them. The subject which most readily suggested itself was the spirit and the working of those conceptions of life and polity which are lumped together, whether for reproach or commendation, under the name of Democracy. By 50 temperament and education of a conservative turn, I saw the last years of that quaint Arcadia which French travellers saw with delighted amazement a century ago, and have watched the change (to me a sad one) from an agricultural to a proletary population. The testimony of Balaam should carry some conviction. I have grown to manhood and am now growing old with the growth of this system of government in my native land; have watched its advances, or what some would call its encroachments, gradual and irresistible as those of a glacier; have been an ear-witness to the forebodings of wise and good and timid men, and have lived to see those forebodings belied by the course of events, which is apt to show itself humorously careless of the reputation of prophets. I recollect hearing a sagacious old gentleman say in 1840 that the doing away with the property qualification for suffrage twenty years before had been the ruin of the State of Massachusetts; that it had put public credit and private estate alike at the mercy of demagogues. I lived to see that Commonwealth twenty odd years later paying the interest on her bonds in gold, though it cost her sometimes nearly three for one to keep her faith, and that while suffering an unparalleled drain of men and treasure in helping to sustain the unity and self-respect of the nation.

If universal suffrage has worked ill in our larger cities, as it certainly has, this has been mainly because the hands that wielded it were untrained to its use. There the election of a majority of the trustees of the public money is controlled by the most ignorant and vicious of a population which has come to us from abroad, wholly unpracticed in self-government and incapable of assimilation by American habits and methods. But the finances of our towns, where the native tradition is still dominant and whose affairs are discussed and settled in a public assembly of the people, have been in general honestly and prudently administered. Even in manufacturing towns, where a majority of the voters live by their daily wages, it is not so often the recklessness as the moderation of public expenditure that surprises an old-fashioned observer. "The beggar is in the saddle at last," cries Proverbial Wisdom. "Why, in the name of all former experience, doesn't he ride to the Devil?" Because in the very act of mounting he ceased to be a beggar and became part owner of the piece of property he bestrides. The last thing we need be anxious about is property. It always has friends or the means of making them. If riches have wings to fly away from their owner, they have wings also to escape danger.

I hear America sometimes playfully accused of sending you all your storms, and am in the habit of parrying the charge by alleging that we are enabled to do this because, in virtue of our protective system, we can afford to make better bad weather than anybody else. And what wiser use could we make of it than to export it in return for the paupers which some European countries are good enough to send over to us who have not attained to the same skill in the manufacture of them? But bad weather is not the worst thing that is laid at our door. A French gentleman, not long ago, forgetting Burke's monition of how unwise it is to draw an indictment against a whole people, has charged us with the responsibility of whatever he finds disagreeable in the morals or manners of his countrymen. If M. Zola or some other competent witness would only go into the box and tell us what those morals and manners were before our example corrupted them! But I confess that I find little to interest and less to edify me in these international bandyings of "You're another."

I shall address myself to a single point only in the long list of offences of which we are more or less gravely accused, because that really includes all the rest. It is that we are infecting the Old World with what seems to be thought the entirely new disease of Democracy. It is generally people who are in what are called easy circumstances who can afford the leisure to treat themselves to a handsome complaint, and these experience an immediate alleviation when once they have found a sonorous Greek name to abuse it by. There is something consolatory also, something flattering to their sense of personal dignity, and to that conceit of singularity which is the natural recoil from our uneasy consciousness of being commonplace, in thinking ourselves victims of a malady by which no one had ever suffered before. Accordingly they find it simpler to class under one comprehensive heading whatever they find offensive to their nerves, their tastes, their interests, or what they suppose to be their opinions, and christen it Democracy, much as physicians label every obscure disease gout, or as cross-grained fellows lay their ill-temper to the weather. But is it really a new ailment, and, if it be, is America answerable for it? Even if she were, would it account for the phylloxera, and hoof-and-mouth disease, and bad harvests, and bad English, and the German bands, and the Boers, and all the other discomforts with which these later days have vexed the souls of them that go in chariots? Yet I have seen the evil example of Democracy in America cited as the source and origin of things quite as heterogeneous and quite as little connected with it by any sequence of cause and effect. Surely this ferment is nothing new. It has been at work for centuries, and we are more conscious of it only because in this age of publicity, where the newspapers offer a rostrum to whoever has a grievance, or fancies that he has, the bubbles and scum thrown up by it are more noticeable on the surface than in those dumb ages when there was a cover of silence and suppression on the cauldron. Bernardo Navagero, speaking of the Provinces of Lower Austria in 1546, tells us that "in them there are five sorts of persons, Clergy, Barons, Nobles, Burghers, and Peasants. Of these last no account is made, because they have no voice in the Diet."

Nor was it among the people that subversive or mistaken doctrines had their rise. A Father of the Church said that property was theft many centuries before Proudhon was born. Bourdaloue reaffirmed it. Montesquieu was the inventor of national workshops, and of the theory that the State owed every man a living. Nay, was not the Church herself the first organized Democracy? A few centuries ago the chief end of man was to keep his soul alive, and then the little kernel of leaven that sets the gases at work was religious, and produced the Reformation. Even in that, far-sighted persons like the Emperor Charles V. saw the germ of political and social revolution. Now that the chief end of man seems to have become the keeping of the body alive, and as comfortably alive as possible, the leaven also has become wholly political and social. But there had also been social upheavals before the Reformation and contemporaneously with it, especially among men of Teutonic race. The Reformation gave outlet and direction to an unrest already existing. Formerly the immense majority of men—our brothers—knew only their sufferings, their wants, and their desires. They are beginning now to know their opportunity and their power. All persons who see deeper than their plates are rather inclined to thank God for it than to bewail it, for the sores of Lazarus have a poison in them against which Dives has no antidote.

There can be no doubt that the spectacle of a great and prosperous Democracy on the other side of the Atlantic must react powerfully on the aspirations and political theories of men in the Old World who do not find things to their mind; but, whether for good or evil, it should not be overlooked that the acorn from which it sprang was ripened on the British oak. Every successive swarm that has gone out from this *officina gentium*¹ has, when left to its own instincts—may I not call them hereditary instincts?—assumed a more or less thoroughly democratic form. This would seem to show, what I believe to be the fact, that the British Constitution, under whatever disguises of prudence or decorum, is essentially democratic. England, indeed, may be called a monarchy with democratic tendencies, the United States a democracy with conservative instincts. People are continually saying that America is in the air, and I am glad to think it is, since this means only that a clearer conception of human claims and human duties is beginning to be prevalent. The discontent with the existing order of things, however, pervaded the atmosphere wherever the conditions were favorable, long before Columbus, seeking the back door of Asia, found himself knocking at the front door of America. I say wherever the conditions were favorable, for it is certain that the germs of disease do not stick or find a prosperous field for their development and noxious activity unless where the simplest sanitary precautions have been neglected. "For this effect defective comes by cause," as Polonius said long ago. It is only by instigation of the wrongs of men that what are called the Rights of Man become turbulent and dangerous. It is then only that they syllogize unwelcome truths. It is not the insurrections of ignorance that are dangerous, but the revolts of intelligence:—

The wicked and the weak rebel in vain,
Slaves by their own compulsion.

Had the governing classes in France during the last century paid as much heed to their proper business as to their pleasures or manners, the guillotine need never have severed that spinal-marrow of orderly and secular tradition through which in a normally constituted state the brain sympathizes with the extremities and sends will and impulsion thither. It is only when the reasonable and practicable are denied that men demand the unreasonable and impracticable; only when the possible is made difficult that they fancy the impossible to be easy. Fairy tales are made out of the dreams of the poor. No; the sentiment which lies at the root of democracy is nothing new. I am speaking always of a sentiment, a spirit, and not of a form of government; for this was but the outgrowth of the other and not its cause. This sentiment is merely an expression of the natural wish of people to have a hand, if need be a controlling hand, in the management of their own affairs. What is new is that they are more and more gaining that control, and learning more and more how to be worthy of it. What we used to call the tendency or drift—what we are being taught to call more wisely the evolution of things—has for some time been setting steadily in this direction. There is no good in arguing with the inevitable. The only argument available with an east wind is to put on your overcoat. And in this case, also, the prudent will prepare themselves to encounter what they cannot prevent. Some people advise us to put on the brakes, as if the movement of which we are conscious were that of a railway train running down an incline. But a metaphor is no argument, though it be sometimes the gunpowder to drive one home and imbed it in the memory. Our disquiet comes of what nurses and other experienced persons call growing-pains, and need not seriously alarm us. They are what every generation before us—certainly every generation since the invention of printing—has gone through with more or less good fortune. To the door of every generation there comes a knocking, and unless the household, like the Thane of Cawdor and his wife, have been doing some deed without a name, they need not shudder. It turns out at worst to be a poor relation who wishes to come in out of the cold. The porter always grumbles and is slow to open. "Who's there, in the name of Beelzebub?" he mutters. Not a change for the better in our human housekeeping has ever taken place that wise and good men have not opposed it,—have not prophesied with the alderman that the world would wake up to find its throat cut in consequence of it. The world, on the contrary, wakes up, rubs its eyes, yawns, stretches itself, and goes about its business as if nothing had happened. Suppression of the slave trade, abolition of slavery, trade unions,—at all of these excellent people shook their heads despondingly, and murmured "Ichabod." But the trade unions are now debating instead of conspiring, and we all read their discussions with comfort and hope, sure that they are learning the business of citizenship and the difficulties of practical legislation.

One of the most curious of these frenzies of exclusion was that against the emancipation of the Jews. All share in the government of the world was denied for centuries to perhaps the ablest, certainly the most tenacious, race that had ever lived in it—the race to whom we owed our religion and the purest spiritual stimulus and consolation to be found in all literature—a race in which ability seems as natural and hereditary as the curve of their noses, and whose blood, furtively mingling with the bluest bloods in Europe, has quickened them with its own indomitable impulsion. We drove them into a corner, but they had their revenge, as the wronged are always sure to have it sooner or later. They made their corner the counter and banking-house of the world, and thence they rule it and us with the ignobler sceptre of finance. Your grandfathers mobbed Priestley only that you might set up his statue and make Birmingham the headquarters of English Unitarianism. We hear it said sometimes that this is an age of transition, as if that made matters clearer; but can any one point us to an age that was not? If he could, he would show us an age of stagnation. The question for us, as it has been for all before us, is to make the transition gradual and easy, to see that our points¹ are right so that the train may not come to grief. For we should remember that nothing is more natural for people whose education has been neglected than to spell evolution with an initial "r." A great man struggling with the storms of fate has been called a sublime spectacle; but surely a great man wrestling with these new forces that have come into the world, mastering them and controlling them to beneficent ends, would be a yet sublimer. Here is not a danger, and if there were it would be only a better school of manhood, a nobler scope for ambition. I have hinted that what people are afraid of in democracy is less the thing itself than what they conceive to be its necessary adjuncts and consequences. It is supposed to reduce all mankind to a dead level of mediocrity in character and culture, to vulgarize men's conceptions of life, and therefore their code of morals, manners, and conduct—to endanger the rights of property and possession. But I believe that the real gravamen² of the charges lies in the habit it has of making itself generally disagreeable by asking the Powers that Be at the most inconvenient moment whether they are the powers that ought to be. If the powers that be are in a condition to give a satisfactory answer to this inevitable question, they need feel in no way discomfited by it.

Few people take the trouble of trying to find out what democracy really is. Yet this would be a great help, for it is our lawless and uncertain thoughts, it is the indefiniteness of our impressions, that fill darkness, whether mental or physical, with spectres and hobgoblins. Democracy is nothing more than an experiment in government, more likely to succeed in a new soil, but likely to be tried in all soils, which must stand or fall on its own merits as others have done before it. For there is no trick of perpetual motion in politics any more than in mechanics. President Lincoln defined democracy to be "the government of the people by the people for the people." This is a sufficiently compact statement of it as a political arrangement.

² weight, substantial part

Theodore Parker said that "Democracy meant not 'I'm as good as you are,' but 'You're as good as I am.'"

And this is the ethical conception of it, necessary as a complement of the other; a conception which, could it be made actual and practical, would easily solve all the riddles that the old sphinx of political and social economy who sits by the roadside has been proposing to mankind from the beginning, and which mankind have shown such a singular talent for answering wrongly. In this sense Christ was the first true democrat that ever breathed, as the old dramatist Dekker said he was the first true gentleman. The characters may be easily doubled, so strong is the likeness between them. A beautiful and profound parable of the Persian poet Jellaladeen tells us that "One knocked at the Beloved's door, and a voice asked from within 'Who is there?' and he answered 'It is I.' Then the voice said, 'This house will not hold me and thee;' and the door was not opened. Then went the lover into the desert and fasted and prayed in solitude, and after a year he returned and knocked again at the door; and again the voice asked 'Who is there?' and he said 'It is thyself;' and the door was opened to him." But that is idealism, you will say, and this is an only too practical world. I grant it; but I am one of those who believe that the real will never find an irremovable basis till it rests on the ideal. It used to be thought that a democracy was possible only in a small territory, and this is doubtless true of a democracy strictly defined, for in such all the citizens decide directly upon every question of public concern in a general assembly. An example still survives in the tiny Swiss canton of Appenzell. But this immediate intervention of the people in their own affairs is not of the essence of democracy; it is not necessary, nor indeed, in most cases, practicable. Democracies to which Mr. Lincoln's definition would fairly enough apply have existed, and now exist, in which, though the supreme authority reside in the people, yet they can act only indirectly on the national policy. This generation has seen a democracy with an imperial figurehead, and in all that have ever existed the body politic has never embraced all the inhabitants included within its territory: the right to share in the direction of affairs has been confined to citizens, and citizenship has been further restricted by various limitations, sometimes of property, sometimes of nativity, and always of age and sex.

The framers of the American Constitution were far from wishing or intending to found a democracy in the strict sense of the word, though, as was inevitable, every expansion of the scheme of government they elaborated has been in a democratical direction. But this has been generally the slow result of growth, and not the sudden innovation of theory; in fact, they had a profound disbelief in theory, and knew better than to commit the folly of breaking with the past. They were not seduced by the French fallacy that a new system of government could be ordered like a new suit of clothes. They would as soon have thought of ordering a new suit of flesh and skin. It is only on the roaring loom of time that the stuff is woven for such a vesture of their thought and experience as they were meditating. They recognized fully the value of tradition and habit as the great allies of permanence and stability. They all had that distaste for innovation which belonged to their race, and many of them a distrust of human nature derived from their creed. The day of sentiment was over, and no dithyrambic affirmations or fine-drawn analyses of the Rights of Man would serve their present turn. This was a practical question, and they addressed themselves to it as men of knowledge and judgment should. Their problem was how to adapt English principles and precedents to the new conditions of American life, and they solved it with singular discretion. They put as many obstacles as they could contrive, not in the way of the people's will, but of their whim. With few exceptions they probably admitted the logic of the then accepted syllogism,—democracy, anarchy, despotism. But this formula was framed upon the experience of small cities shut up to stew within their narrow walls, where the number of citizens made but an inconsiderable fraction of the inhabitants, where every passion was reverberated from house to house and from man to man with gathering rumor till every impulse became gregarious and therefore inconsiderate, and every popular assembly needed but an infusion of eloquent sophistry to turn it into a mob, all the more dangerous because sanctified with the formality of law.¹

Fortunately their case was wholly different. They were to legislate for a widely scattered population and for States already practised in the discipline of a partial independence. They had an unequalled opportunity and enormous advantages. The material they had to work upon was already democratical by instinct and habitude. It was tempered to their hands by more than a century's schooling in self-government. They had but to give permanent and conservative form to a ductile mass. In giving impulse and direction to their new institutions, especially in supplying them with checks and balances, they had a great help and safeguard in their federal organization. The different, sometimes conflicting, interests and social systems of the several States made existence as a Union and coalescence into a nation conditional on a constant practice of moderation and compromise. The very elements of disintegration were the best guides in political training. Their children learned the lesson of compromise only too well, and it was the application of it to a question of fundamental morals that cost us our civil war. We learned once for all that compromise makes a good umbrella but a poor roof; that it is a temporary expedient, often wise in party politics, almost sure to be unwise in statesmanship.

Has not the trial of democracy in America proved, on the whole, successful? If it had not, would the Old World be vexed with any fears of its proving contagious? This trial would have been less severe could it have been made with a people homogeneous in race, language, and traditions, whereas the United States have been called on to absorb and assimilate enormous masses of foreign population, heterogeneous in all these respects, and drawn mainly from that class which might fairly say that the world was not their friend, nor the world's law. The previous condition too often justified the traditional Irishman, who, landing in New York and asked what his politics were, inquired if there was a Government there, and on being told that there was, retorted, "Thin I'm agin it!" We have taken from Europe the poorest, the most ignorant, the most turbulent of her people, and have made them over into good citizens, who have added to our wealth, and who are ready to die in defence of a country and of institutions which they know to be worth dying for. The exceptions have been (and they are lamentable exceptions) where these hordes of ignorance and poverty have coagulated in great cities. But the social system is yet to seek which has not to look the same terrible wolf in the eyes. On the other hand, at this very moment Irish peasants are buying up the worn-out farms of Massachusetts, and making them productive again by the same virtues of industry and thrift that once made them profitable to the English ancestors of the men who are deserting them. To have achieved even these prosaic results (if you choose to call them so), and that out of materials the most discordant,—I might say the most recalcitrant,—argues a certain beneficent virtue in the system

that could do it, and is not to be accounted for by mere luck. Carlyle said scornfully that America meant only roast turkey every day for everybody. He forgot that States, as Bacon said of wars, go on their bellies. As for the security of property, it should be tolerably well secured in a country where every other man hopes to be rich, even though the only property qualification be the ownership of two hands that add to the general wealth. Is it not the best security for anything to interest the largest possible number of persons in its preservation and the smallest in its division? In point of fact, far-seeing men count the increasing power of wealth and its combinations as one of the chief dangers with which the institutions of the United States are threatened in the not distant future. The right of individual property is no doubt the very corner-stone of civilization as hitherto understood, but I am a little impatient of being told that property is entitled to exceptional consideration because it bears all burdens of the State. It bears those, indeed, which can most easily be borne, but poverty pays with its person the chief expenses of war, pestilence, and famine. Wealth should not forget this, for poverty is beginning to think of it now and then. Let me not be misunderstood. I see as clearly as any man possibly can, and rate as highly, the value of wealth, and of hereditary wealth, as the security of refinement, the feeder of all those arts that ennoble and beautify life, and as making a country worth living in. Many an ancestral hall here in England has been a nursery of that culture which has been of example and benefit to all. Old gold has a civilizing virtue which new gold must grow old to be capable of secreting.

I should not think of coming before you to defend or to criticise any form of government. All have their virtues, all their defects, and all have illustrated one period or another in the history of the race, with signal services to humanity and culture. There is not one that could stand a cynical cross-examination by an experienced criminal lawyer, except that of a perfectly wise and perfectly good despot, such as the world has never seen, except in that white-haired king of Brown-ing's, who Lived long ago

In the morning of the world,
When Earth was nearer Heaven than now.

The English race, if they did not invent government by discussion, have at least carried it nearest to perfection in practice. It seems a very safe and reasonable contrivance for occupying the attention of the country, and is certainly a better way of settling questions than by push of pike. Yet, if one should ask it why it should not rather be called government by gabble, it would have to fumble in its pocket a good while before it found the change for a convincing reply. As matters stand, too, it is beginning to be doubtful whether Parliament and Congress sit at Westminster and Washington or in the editors' rooms of the leading journals, so thoroughly is everything debated before the authorized and responsible debaters get on their legs. And what shall we say of government by a majority of voices? To a person who in the last century would have called himself an Impartial Observer, a numerical preponderance seems, on the whole, as clumsy a way of arriving at truth as could well be devised, but experience has apparently shown it to be a convenient arrangement for determining what may be expedient or advisable or practicable at any given moment. Truth, after all, wears a different face to everybody, and it would be too tedious to wait till all were agreed. She is said to lie at the bottom of a well, for the very reason, perhaps, that whoever looks down in search of her sees his own image at the bottom, and is persuaded not only that he has seen the goddess, but that she is far better-looking than he had imagined.

The arguments against universal suffrage are equally unanswerable.

"What," we exclaim, "shall Tom, Dick, and Harry have as much weight in the scale as I?" Of course, nothing could be more absurd. And yet universal suffrage has not been the instrument of greater unwisdom than contrivances of a more select description. Assemblies could be mentioned composed entirely of Masters of Arts and Doctors in Divinity which have sometimes shown traces of human passion or prejudice in their votes. Have the Serene Highnesses and Enlightened Classes carried on the business of Mankind so well, then, that there is no use in trying a less costly method? The democratic theory is that those Constitutions² are likely to prove steadiest which have the broadest base, that the right to vote makes a safety-valve of every voter, and that the best way of teaching a man how to vote is to give him the chance of practice. For the question is no longer the academic one, "Is it wise to give every man the ballot?" but rather the practical one, "Is it prudent to deprive whole classes of it any longer?" It may be conjectured that it is cheaper in the long run to lift men up than to hold them down, and that the ballot in their hands is less dangerous to society than a sense of wrong in their heads. At any rate this is the dilemma to which the drift of opinion has been for some time sweeping us, and in politics a dilemma is a more unmanageable thing to hold by the horns than a wolf by the ears. It is said that the right of suffrage is not valued when it is indiscriminately bestowed, and there may be some truth in this, for I have observed that what men prize most is a privilege, even if it be that of chief mourner at a funeral. But is there not danger that it will be valued at more than its worth if denied, and that some illegitimate way will be sought to make up for the want of it? Men who have a voice in public affairs are at once affiliated with one or other of the great parties between which society is divided, merge their individual hopes and opinions in its safer, because more generalized, hopes and opinions, are disciplined by its tactics, and acquire, to a certain degree, the orderly qualities of an army. They no longer belong to a class, but to a body corporate. Of one thing, at least, we may be certain that, under whatever method of helping things to go wrong man's wit can contrive, those who have the divine right to govern will be found to govern in the end, and that the highest privilege to which the majority of mankind can aspire is that of being governed by those wiser than they. Universal suffrage has in the United States sometimes been made the instrument of inconsiderate changes, under the notion of reform, and this from a misconception of the true meaning of popular government. One of these has been the substitution in many of the States of popular election for official selection in the choice of judges. The same system applied to military officers was the source of much evil during our civil war, and, I believe, had to be abandoned. But it has been also true that on all great questions of national policy a reserve of prudence and discretion has been brought out at the critical moment to turn the scale in favor of a wiser decision. An appeal to the reason of the people has never been known to fail in the long run. It is, perhaps, true that, by effacing the principle of passive obedience, democracy, ill understood, has slackened the spring of that ductility to discipline which is essential to "the unity and married calm of States." But I feel assured that experience and necessity will cure this evil, as they have shown their power to cure others. And under what frame of policy have evils ever been remedied till they became intolerable, and shook men out of their indolent indifference through their fears?

We are told that the inevitable result of democracy is to sap the foundations of personal independence, to weaken the principle of authority, to lessen the respect due to eminence, whether in station, virtue, or genius.

If these things were so, society could not hold together. Perhaps the best forcing-house of robust individuality would be where public opinion is inclined to be most overbearing, as he must be of heroic temper who should walk along Piccadilly at the height of the season in a soft hat. As for authority, it is one of the symptoms of the time that the religious reverence for it is declining everywhere, but this is due partly to the fact that statecraft is no longer looked upon as a mystery, but as a business, and partly to the decay of superstition, by which I mean the habit of respecting what we are told to respect rather than what is respectable in itself. There is more rough and tumble in the American democracy than is altogether agreeable to people of sensitive nerves and refined habits, and the people take their political duties lightly and laughingly, as is, perhaps, neither unnatural nor unbecoming in a young giant. Democracies can no more jump away from their own shadows than the rest of us can. They no doubt sometimes make mistakes and pay honor to men who do not deserve it. But they do this because they believe them worthy of it, and though it be true that the idol is the measure of the worshipper, yet the worship has in it the germ of a nobler religion. But is it democracies alone that fall into these errors? I, who have seen it proposed to erect a statue to Hudson, the railway king, and have heard Louis Napoleon hailed as the saviour of society by men who certainly had no democratic associations or leanings, am not ready to think so. But democracies have likewise their finer instincts. I have also seen the wisest statesman and most pregnant speaker of our generation, a man of humble birth and ungainly manners, of little culture beyond what his own genius supplied, become more absolute in power than any monarch of modern times through the reverence of his countrymen for his honesty, his wisdom, his sincerity, his faith in God and man, and the nobly humane simplicity of his character. And I remember another whom popular respect enveloped as with a halo, the least vulgar of men, the most austere genial, and the most independent of opinion. Wherever he went he never met a stranger, but everywhere neighbors and friends proud of him as their ornament and decoration. Institutions which could bear and breed such men as Lincoln and Emerson had surely some energy for good. No, amid all the fruitless turmoil and miscarriage of the world, if there be one thing steadfast and of favorable omen, one thing to make optimism distrust its own obscure distrust, it is the rooted instinct in men to admire what is better and more beautiful than themselves. The touchstone of political and social institutions is their ability to supply them with worthy objects of this sentiment, which is the very tap-root of civilization and progress. There would seem to be no readier way of feeding it with the elements of growth and vigor than such an organization of society as will enable men to respect themselves, and so to justify them in respecting others.

Such a result is quite possible under other conditions than those of an avowedly democratical Constitution. For I take it that the real essence of democracy was fairly enough defined by the First Napoleon when he said that the French Revolution meant "la carrière ouverte aux talents"—a clear pathway for merit of whatever kind. I should be inclined to paraphrase this by calling democracy that form of society, no matter what its political classification, in which every man had a chance and knew that he had it. If a man can climb, and feels himself encouraged to climb, from a coalpit to the highest position for which he is fitted, he can well afford to be indifferent what name is given to the government under which he lives. The Bailli of Mirabeau, uncle of the more famous tribune of that name, wrote in 1771: "The English are, in my opinion, a hundred times more agitated and more unfortunate than the very Algerines themselves, because they do not know and will not know till the destruction of their over-swollen power, which I believe very near, whether they are monarchy, aristocracy, or democracy, and wish to play the part of all three." England has not been obliging enough to fulfil the Bailli's prophecy, and perhaps it was this very carelessness about the name, and concern about the substance of popular government, this skill in getting the best out of things as they are, in utilizing all the motives which influence men, and in giving one direction to many impulses, that has been a principal factor of her greatness and power. Perhaps it is fortunate to have an unwritten Constitution, for men are prone to be tinkering the work of their own hands, whereas they are more willing to let time and circumstance mend or modify what time and circumstance have made. All free governments, whatever their name, are in reality governments by public opinion, and it is on the quality of this public opinion that their prosperity depends. It is, therefore, their first duty to purify the element from which they draw the breath of life. With the growth of democracy grows also the fear, if not the danger, that this atmosphere may be corrupted with poisonous exhalations from lower and more malarious levels, and the question of sanitation becomes more instant and pressing. Democracy in its best sense is merely the letting in of light and air. Lord Sherbrooke, with his usual epigrammatic terseness, bids you educate your future rulers. But would this alone be a sufficient safeguard? To educate the intelligence is to enlarge the horizon of its desires and wants. And it is well that this should be so. But the enterprise must go deeper and prepare the way for satisfying those desires and wants in so far as they are legitimate. What is really ominous of danger to the existing order of things is not democracy (which, properly understood, is a conservative force), but the Socialism which may find a fulcrum in it. If we cannot equalize conditions and fortunes any more than we can equalize the brains of men—and a very sagacious person has said that "where two men ride on a horse one must ride behind"—we can yet, perhaps, do something to correct those methods and influences that lead to enormous inequalities, and to prevent their growing more enormous. It is all very well to pooh-pooh Mr. George and to prove him mistaken in his political economy. I do not believe that land should be divided because the quantity of it is limited by nature. Of what may this not be said? A fortiori, we might on the same principle insist on a division of human wit, for I have observed that the quantity of this has been even more inconveniently limited. Mr. George himself has an inequitably large share of it. But he is right in his impelling motive; right, also, I am convinced, in insisting that humanity makes a part, by far the most important part, of political economy; and in thinking man to be of more concern and more convincing than the longest column of figures in the world. For unless you include human nature in your addition, your total is sure to be wrong and your deductions from it fallacious. Communism means barbarism, but Socialism means, or wishes to mean, co-operation and community of interests, sympathy, the giving to the hands not so large a share as to the brains, but a larger share than hitherto in the wealth they must combine to produce—means, in short, the practical application of Christianity to life, and has in it the secret of an orderly and benign reconstruction. State Socialism would cut off the very roots in personal character—self-help, forethought, and frugality—which nourish and sustain the trunk and branches of every vigorous Commonwealth.

I do not believe in violent changes, nor do I expect them. Things in possession have a very firm grip. One of the strongest cements of society is the conviction of mankind that the state of things into which they are born is a part of the order of the universe, as natural, let us say, as that the sun should go round the earth. It is a conviction that they will not surrender except on compulsion, and a wise society should look to it that this compulsion be not put upon them. For the individual man there is no radical cure, outside of human nature itself, for the evils to which human nature is heir. The rule will always hold good that you must

Be your own palace or the world's your gaol.

But for artificial evils, for evils that spring from want of thought, thought must find a remedy somewhere. There has been no period of time in which wealth has been more sensible of its duties than now. It builds hospitals, it establishes missions among the poor, it endows schools. It is one of the advantages of accumulated wealth, and of the leisure it renders possible, that people have time to think of the wants and sorrows of their fellows. But all these remedies are partial and palliative merely. It is as if we should apply plasters to a single pustule of the small-pox with a view of driving out the disease. The true way is to discover and to extirpate the germs. As society is now constituted these are in the air it breathes, in the water it drinks, in things that seem, and which it has always believed, to be the most innocent and healthful. The evil elements it neglects corrupt these in their springs and pollute them in their courses. Let us be of good cheer, however, remembering that the misfortunes hardest to bear are those which never come. The world has outlived much, and will outlive a great deal more, and men have contrived to be happy in it. It has shown the strength of its constitution in nothing more than in surviving the quack medicines it has tried. In the scales of the destinies brawn will never weigh so much as brain. Our healing is not in the storm or in the whirlwind, it is not in monarchies, or aristocracies, or democracies, but will be revealed by the still small voice that speaks to the conscience and the heart, prompting us to a wider and wiser humanity.

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER (1807-1892)

TO WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON

Champion of those who groan beneath
Oppression's iron hand:
In view of penury, hate, and death,
I see thee fearless stand.
Still bearing up thy lofty brow, 5
In the steadfast strength of truth,
In manhood sealing well the vow
And promise of thy youth.

Go on, for thou hast chosen well;
On in the strength of God! 10
Long as one human heart shall swell
Beneath the tyrant's rod.
Speak in a slumbering nation's ear,
As thou hast ever spoken,
Until the dead in sin shall hear, 15
The fetter's link be broken!

I love thee with a brother's love,
I feel my pulses thrill,
To mark thy spirit soar above
The cloud of human ill. 20
My heart hath leaped to answer thine,
And echo back thy words,
As leaps the warrior's at the shine
And flash of kindred swords!

They tell me thou art rash and vain, 25
A searcher after fame;
That thou art striving but to gain
A long-enduring name;
That thou hast nerved the Afric's
hand
And steeled the Afric's heart, 30
To shake aloft his vengeful brand,
And rend his chain apart.

Have I not known thee well, and read
Thy mighty purpose long?
And watched the trials which have made 35

Thy human spirit strong?
And shall the slanderer's demon breath
Avail with one like me,
To dim the sunshine of my faith
And earnest trust in thee? 40

Go on, the dagger's point may glare
Amid thy pathway's gloom;
The fate which sternly threatens there
Is glorious martyrdom!
Then onward with a martyr's zeal; 45
And wait thy sure reward
When man to man no more shall kneel,
And God alone be Lord!

PENTUCKET

How sweetly on the wood-girt town
The mellow light of sunset shone!
Each small, bright lake, whose waters
still

Mirror the forest and the hill,
Reflected from its waveless breast 5
The beauty of a cloudless west,
Glorious as if a glimpse were given
Within the western gates of heaven,
Left, by the spirit of the star
Of sunset's holy hour, ajar! 10

Beside the river's tranquil flood
The dark and low-walled dwellings
stood,

Where many a rood of open land
Stretched up and down on either hand,
With corn-leaves waving freshly green
The thick and blackened stumps between. 16

Behind, unbroken, deep and dread,
The wild, untravelled forest spread,
Back to those mountains, white and cold,
Of which the Indian trapper told, 20
Upon whose summits never yet
Was mortal foot in safety set.

Quiet and calm without a fear
Of danger darkly lurking near,
The weary laborer left his plough, 25
The milkmaid carolled by her cow;
From cottage door and household hearth

Rose songs of praise, or tones of mirth.
At length the murmur died away,
And silence on that village lay. 30

—So slept Pompeii, tower and hall,
Ere the quick earthquake swallowed
all,
Undreaming of the fiery fate
Which made its dwellings desolate!

Hours passed away. By moonlight sped 35

The Merrimac along his bed.
Bathed in the pallid lustre, stood
Dark cottage-wall and rock and wood,
Silent, beneath that tranquil beam,
As the hushed grouping of a dream. 40
Yet on the still air crept a sound,
No bark of fox, nor rabbit's bound,
Nor stir of wings, nor waters flowing,
Nor leaves in midnight breezes blowing.

Was that the tread of many feet, 45
Which downward from the hillside beat?

What forms were those which darkly stood

Just on the margin of the wood?
Charred tree-stumps in the moonlight dim,

Or paling rude, or leafless limb? 50
No,—through the trees fierce eyeballs glowed,

Dark human forms in moonshine showed,

Wild from their native wilderness,
With painted limbs and battle-dress!

A yell the dead might wake to hear 55
Swelled on the night air, far and clear;
Then smote the Indian tomahawk
On crashing door and shattering lock;
Then rang the rifle-shot, and then
The shrill death-scream of stricken
men,— 60

Sank the red axe in woman's brain,
And childhood's cry arose in vain.
Bursting through roof and window
came,

Red, fast, and fierce, the kindled flame,
And blended fire and moonlight glared
On still dead men and scalp-knives bared. 66

The morning sun looked brightly
through
The river willows, wet with dew.

No sound of combat filled the air,
 No shout was heard, nor gunshot there;
 Yet still the thick and sullen smoke 71
 From smouldering ruins slowly broke;
 And on the greensward many a stain,
 And, here and there, the mangled slain,
 Told how that midnight bolt had sped,
 Pentucket, on thy fated head! 76

Even now the villager can tell
 Where Rolfe beside his hearthstone fell,
 Still show the door of wasting oak,
 Through which the fatal death-shot broke, 80
 And point the curious stranger where De Rouville's corse lay grim and bare; Whose hideous head, in death still feared,
 Bore not a trace of hair or beard;
 And still, within the churchyard
 ground, 85
 Heaves darkly up the ancient mound,
 Whose grass-grown surface overlies
 The victims of that sacrifice.

HAMPTON BEACH

The sunlight glitters keen and bright,
 Where, miles away,
 Lies stretching to my dazzled sight
 A luminous belt, a misty light, Beyond the dark pine bluffs and wastes of sandy gray. 5

The tremulous shadow of the Sea!
 Against its ground
 Of silvery light, rock, hill, and tree,
 Still as a picture, clear and free,
 With varying outline mark the coast for miles around. 10

On—on—we tread with loose-flung rein
 Our seaward way,
 Through dark-green fields and blossoming grain,
 Where the wild brier-rose skirts the lane,
 And bends above our heads the flowering locust spray. 15

Ha! like a kind hand on my brow
 Comes this fresh breeze,

Cooling its dull and feverish glow, While through my being seems to flow
 The breath of a new life, the healing of the seas! 20

Now rest we, where this grassy mound
 His feet hath set
 In the great waters, which have bound
 His granite ankles greenly round
 With long and tangled moss, and weeds with cool spray wet. 25

Good-by to Pain and Care! I take Mine ease to-day:
 Here where these sunny waters break,
 And ripples this keen breeze, I shake
 All burdens from the heart, all weary thoughts away. 30

I draw a freer breath, I seem Like all I see—
 Waves in the sun, the white-winged gleam
 Of sea-birds in the slanting beam,
 And far-off sails which flit before the south-wind free. 35

So when Time's veil shall fall
 asunder,
 The soul may know
 No fearful change, nor sudden wonder,
 Nor sink the weight of mystery under,
 But with the upward rise, and with the vastness grow. 40

And all we shrink from now may seem
 No new revealing;
 Familiar as our childhood's stream,
 Or pleasant memory of a dream
 The loved and cherished Past upon the new life stealing. 45

Serene and mild the untried light
 May have its dawning;
 And, as in summer's northern night
 The evening and the dawn unite,
 The sunset hues of Time blend with the soul's new morning. 50

I sit alone; in foam and spray
 Wave after wave Breaks on the rocks which, stern and gray,
 Shoulder the broken tide away,
 Or murmurs hoarse and strong through mossy cleft and cave. 55

What heed I of the dusty land
 And noisy town?
 I see the mighty deep expand
 From its white line of glimmering sand
 To where the blue of heaven on bluer waves shuts down! 60

In listless quietude of mind,
 I yield to all
 The change of cloud and wave and
 wind;
 And passive on the flood reclined,
 I wander with the waves, and with them rise and fall. 65

But look, thou dreamer! wave and
 shore
 In shadow; lie;
 The night-wind warns me back once
 more
 To where, my native hill-tops o'er, Bends like an arch of fire the glowing sunset sky. 70

So then, beach, bluff, and wave, farewell!
 I bear with me
 No token stone nor glittering shell,
 But long and oft shall Memory tell
 Of this brief thoughtful hour of musing by the Sea. 75

MASSACHUSETTS TO VIRGINIA

The blast from Freedom's Northern hills, upon its Southern way, Bears greeting to Virginia from Massachusetts Bay;
 No word of haughty challenging, nor battle bugle's peal, Nor steady tread of marching files, nor clang of horsemen's steel.

No trains of deep-mouthed cannon along our highways go; 5 Around our silent arsenals untrodden lies the snow;

And to the land-breeze of our ports,
 upon their errands far,
 A thousand sails of commerce swell,
 but none are spread for war.

We hear thy threats, Virginia! thy stormy words and high Swell harshly on the Southern winds which melt along our sky; 10
 Yet, not one brown, hard hand fore-goes its honest labor here,
 No hewer of our mountain oaks suspends his axe in fear.

Wild are the waves which lash the reefs along St. George's bank; Cold on the shores of Labrador the fog lies white and dank;
 Through storm, and wave, and blinding mist, stout are the hearts which
 man 15
 The fishing-smacks of Marblehead, the sea-boats of Cape Ann.

The cold north light and wintry sun
 glare on their icy forms, Bent grimly o'er their straining lines or wrestling with the storms;
 Free as the winds they drive before,
 rough as the waves they roam,
 They laugh to scorn the slaver's threat against their rocky home. 20

What means the Old Dominion? Hath she forgot the day
 When o'er her conquered valleys swept the Briton's steel array?
 How side by side, with sons of hers,
 the Massachusetts men Encountered Tarleton's charge of fire, and stout Cornwallis, then?

Forgets she how the Bay State, in answer to the call 25
 Of her old House of Burgesses, spoke out from Faneuil Hall?
 When, echoing back her Henry's cry,
 came pulsing on each breath
 Of Northern winds the thrilling sounds of "Liberty or Death!"

What asks the Old Dominion? If now her sons have proved False to their fathers' memory, false to the faith they loved; 30

If she can scoff at Freedom, and its great charter spurn, Must we of Massachusetts from truth and duty turn?

We hunt your bondmen, flying from Slavery's hateful hell;
Our voices, at your bidding, take up the bloodhound's yell;
We gather, at your summons, above our fathers' graves, 35
From Freedom's holy altar-horns to tear your wretched slaves!

Thank God! not yet so vilely can Massachusetts bow;
The spirit of her early time is with her
even now;
Dream not because her Pilgrim blood
moves slow and calm and cool,
She thus can stoop her chainless neck,
a sister's slave and tool! 40

All that a sister State should do, all that a free State may, Heart, hand, and purse we proffer, as
in our early day;
But that one dark loathsome burden
ye must stagger with alone,
And reap the bitter harvest which ye yourselves have sown!

Hold, while ye may, your struggling slaves, and burden God's free air 45
With woman's shriek beneath the lash,
and manhood's wild despair;
Cling closer to the "cleaving curse" that writes upon your plains
The blasting of Almighty wrath against a land of chains.

Still shame your gallant ancestry, the cavaliers of old,
By watching round the shambles where human flesh is sold; 50 Gloat o'er the new-born child, and count his market value, when The maddened mother's cry of woe shall pierce the slaver's den!

Lower than plummet soundeth, sink
the Virginia name;
Plant, if ye will, your fathers' graves
with rankest weeds of shame;

Be, if ye will, the scandal of God's fair universe; 55
We wash our hands forever of your sin and shame and curse.

A voice from lips whereon the coal from Freedom's shrine hath been, Thrilled, as but yesterday, the hearts of Berkshire's mountain men:
The echoes of that solemn voice are sadly lingering still
In all our sunny valleys, on every wind-swept hill. 60

And when the prowling man-thief came hunting for his prey Beneath the very shadow of Bunker's shaft of gray,
How, through the free lips of the son,
the father's warning spoke;
How, from its bonds of trade and sect,
the Pilgrim city broke!

A hundred thousand right arms were lifted up on high, 65
A hundred thousand voices sent back their loud reply;
Through the thronged towns of Essex
the startling summons rang,
And up from bench and loom and wheel her young mechanics sprang!

The voice of free, broad Middlesex, of thousands as of one,
The shaft of Bunker calling to that of Lexington; 70
From Norfolk's ancient villages, from Plymouth's rocky bound To where Nantucket feels the arms of ocean close her round;

From rich and rural Worcester, where through the calm repose
Of cultured vales and fringing woods
the gentle Nashua flows,
To where Wachusett's wintry blasts the mountain larches stir, 75 Swelled up to Heaven the thrilling cry of "God save Latimer!"

And sandy Barnstable rose up, wet with the salt sea spray;
And Bristol sent her answering shout down Narragansett Bay!

Along the broad Connecticut old
Hampden felt the thrill,
And the cheer of Hampshire's woodmen swept down from Holyoke Hill. 80

The voice of Massachusetts! Of her free sons and daughters, Deep calling unto deep aloud, the sound of many waters!
Against the burden of that voice what tyrant power shall stand?
No fetters in the Bay State! No slave upon her land!

Look to it well, Virginians! In calmness we have borne, 85
In answer to our faith and trust, your insult and your scorn; You've spurned our kindest counsels;
you've hunted for our lives;
And shaken round our hearths and homes your manacles and gyves!

We wage no war, we lift no arm, we fling no torch within The fire-damps of the quaking mine beneath your soil of sin; 90
We leave ye with your bondmen, to wrestle, while ye can,
With the strong upward tendencies and godlike soul of man!

But for us and for our children, the vow which we have given For freedom and humanity is registered in heaven;
No slave-hunt in our borders,—no pirate on our strand! 95
No fetters in the Bay State,—no slave
upon our land!

THE SHOEMAKERS

Ho! workers of the old time styled
The Gentle Craft of Leather!
Young brothers of the ancient guild,
Stand forth once more together!
Call out again your long array; 5
In the olden merry manner!
Once more, on gay St. Crispin's day,
Fling out your blazoned banner!

Rap, rap! upon the well-worn stone
How falls the polished hammer! 10 Rap, rap! the measured sound has grown
A quick and merry clamor.
Now shape the sole! now deftly curl
The glossy vamp around it,
And bless the while the bright-eyed girl 15
Whose gentle fingers bound it!

For you, along the Spanish main
A hundred keels are ploughing;
For you, the Indian on the plain
His lasso-coil is throwing; 20
For you, deep glens with hemlock dark
The woodman's fire is lighting;
For you, upon the oak's gray bark,
The woodman's axe is smiting.

For you, from Carolina's pine 25
The rosin-gum is stealing;
For you, the dark-eyed Florentine
Her silken skein is reeling;
For you, the dizzy goatherd roams
His rugged Alpine ledges; 30
For you, round all her shepherd homes,
Bloom England's thorny hedges.

The foremost still, by day or night,
On moated mound or heather,
Where'er the need of trampled right 35
Brought toiling men together;
Where the free burghers from the wall
Defied the mail-clad master,
Than yours, at Freedom's trumpet-call,
No craftsman rallied faster. 40

Let foplings sneer, let fools deride,
Ye heed no idle scorner;
Free hands and hearts are still your pride,
And duty done your honor.
Ye dare to trust, for honest fame, 45
The jury Time empanels,
And leave to truth each noble name
Which glorifies your annals.

Thy songs, Hans Sachs, are living yet,
In strong and hearty German; 50
And Bloomfield's lay, and Gifford's wit,
And patriot fame of Sherman;
Still from his book, a mystic seer,
The soul of Behmen teaches,

And England's priestcraft shakes to
hear 55
Of Fox's leathern breeches.

The foot is yours; where'er it falls,
It treads your well-wrought leather,
On earthen floor, in marble halls
On carpet, or on heather. 60
Still there the sweetest charm is found
Of matron grace or vestal's,
As Hebe's foot bore nectar round
Among the old celestials!

Rap, rap!—your stout and bluff brogan, 65
With footsteps slow and weary,
May wander where the sky's blue span
Shuts down upon the prairie.
On Beauty's foot your slippers glance,
By Saratoga's fountains, 70
Or twinkle down the summer dance
Beneath the Crystal Mountains!

The red brick to the mason's hand,
The brown earth to the tiller's,
The shoe in yours shall wealth command, 75
Like fairy Cinderella's!
As they who shunned the household maid
Beheld the crown upon her,
So all shall see your toil repaid
With hearth and home and honor. 80

Then let the toast be freely quaffed,
In water cool and brimming,—
"All honor to the good old Craft,
Its merry men and women!"
Call out again your long array, 85
In the old time's pleasant manner:
Once more, on gay St. Crispin's day,
Fling out his blazoned banner!

THE HUSKERS

It was late in mild October, and the long autumnal rain
Had left the summer harvest-fields all green with grass again;
The first sharp frosts had fallen, leaving all the woodlands gay
With the hues of summer's rainbow, or the meadow-flowers of May.

Through a thin, dry mist, that morning, the sun rose broad and red, 5
At first a rayless disk of fire, he brightened as he sped;
Yet even his noontide glory fell
chastened and subdued,
On the cornfields and the orchards and softly pictured wood.

And all that quiet afternoon, slow sloping to the night,
He wove with golden shuttle the haze with yellow light; 10
Slanting through the painted beeches,
he glorified the hill;
And, beneath it, pond and meadow lay brighter, greener still.

And shouting boys in woodland haunts caught glimpses of that sky, Flecked by the many-tinted leaves, and laughed, they knew not why;
And school-girls, gay with asterflowers, beside the meadow brooks, Mingled the glow of autumn with the sunshine of sweet looks. 16

From spire and barn looked westerly
the patient weathercocks;
But even the birches on the hill stood motionless as rocks.
No sound was in the woodlands, save the squirrel's dropping shell,
And the yellow leaves among the boughs, low rustling as they fell. 20

The summer grains were harvested;
the stubble-fields lay dry,
Where June winds rolled, in light and shade, the pale green waves of rye;
But still, on gentle hill-slopes, in valleys fringed with wood, Ungathered, bleaching in the sun, the heavy corn crop stood.

Bent low, by autumn's wind and rain,
through husks that, dry and sere, Unfolded from their ripened charge,
shone out the yellow ear; 26 Beneath, the turnip lay concealed, in many a verdant fold,
And glistened in the slanting light the pumpkin's sphere of gold.

There wrought the busy harvesters;
 and many a creaking wain Bore slowly to the long barn-floor its load of husk and grain; 30
 Till broad and red, as when he rose,
 the sun sank down, at last,
 And like a merry guest's farewell, the day in brightness passed.

And lo! as through the western pines,
 on meadow, stream, and pond,
 Flamed the red radiance of a sky, set
 all afire beyond,
 Slowly o'er the eastern sea-bluffs a milder glory shone, 35
 And the sunset and the moonrise were mingled into one!

As thus into the quiet night the twilight lapsed away,
 And deeper in the brightening moon the tranquil shadows lay;
 From many a brown old farm-house,
 and hamlet without name,
 Their milking and their home-tasks done, the merry huskers came. 40

Swung o'er the heaped-up harvest, from pitchforks in the mow, Shone dimly down the lanterns on the pleasant scene below;
 The growing pile of husks behind, the golden ears before,
 And laughing eyes and busy hands and brown cheeks glimmering o'er.

Half hidden, in a quiet nook, serene of look and heart, 45
 Talking their old times over, the old men sat apart;
 While up and down the unhusked pile,
 or nestling in its shade,
 At hide-and-seek, with laugh and shout,
 the happy children played.

Urged by the good host's daughter, a maiden young and fair, Lifting to light her sweet blue eyes and pride of soft brown hair, 50
 The master of the village school, sleek of hair and smooth of tongue,
 To the quaint tune of some old psalm,
 a husking-ballad sung.

THE CORN-SONG

Heap high the farmer's wintry hoard!
 Heap high the golden corn!
 No richer gift has Autumn poured 55
 From out her lavish horn!

Let other lands, exulting, glean
 The apple from the pine,
 The orange from its glossy green,
 The cluster from the vine; 60

We better love the hardy gift
 Our rugged vales bestow,
 To cheer us when the storm shall drift
 Our harvest-fields with snow.

Through vales of grass and meads of
 flowers 65
 Our ploughs their furrows made,
 While on the hills the sun and showers
 Of changeful April played.

We dropped the seed o'er hill and plain
 Beneath the sun of May, 70
 And frightened from our sprouting grain
 The robber crows away.

All through the long, bright days of June
 Its leaves grew green and fair,
 And waved in hot midsummer's noon 75
 Its soft and yellow hair.

And now, with autumn's moonlit eves,
 Its harvest-time has come,
 We pluck away the frosted leaves,
 And bear the treasure home. 80

There, when the snows about us drift,
 And winter winds are cold,
 Fair hands the broken grain shall sift,
 And knead its meal of gold.

Let vapid idlers loll in silk 85
 Around their costly board;
 Give us the bowl of samp and milk,
 By homespun beauty poured!

Where'er the wide old kitchen hearth
 Sends up its smoky curls, 90
 Who will not thank the kindly earth,
 And bless our farmer girls!

Then shame on all the proud and vain,
 Whose folly laughs to scorn
 The blessing of our hardy grain, 95
 Our wealth of golden corn!

Let earth withhold her goodly root,
 Let mildew blight the rye,
 Give to the worm the orchard's fruit,
 The wheat-field to the fly: 100

But let the good old crop adorn
 The hills our fathers trod;
 Still let us, for his golden corn,
 Send up our thanks to God!

PROEM

I love the old melodious lays
 Which softly melt the ages through,
 The songs of Spenser's golden days,
 Arcadian Sidney's silvery phrase, Sprinkling our noon of time with freshest morning dew. 5

Yet, vainly in my quiet hours
 To breathe their marvellous notes I try;
 I feel them, as the leaves and
 flowers

In silence feel the dewy showers,
 And drink with glad, still lips the blessing of the sky. 10

The rigor of a frozen clime,
 The harshness of an untaught ear,
 The jarring words of one whose rhyme
 Beat often Labor's hurried time,
 Or Duty's rugged march through storm and strife, are here. 15

Of mystic beauty, dreamy grace,
 No rounded art the lack supplies;
 Unskilled the subtle lines to trace,
 Or softer shades of Nature's face,
 I view her common forms with un-anointed eyes. 20

Nor mine the seer-like power to show
 The secrets of the heart and mind;
 To drop the plummet-line below
 Our common world of joy and woe,
 A more intense despair or brighter hope
 to find. 25

Yet here at least an earnest sense
 Of human right and weal is shown;
 A hate of tyranny intense,
 And hearty in its vehemence,
 As if my brother's pain and sorrow were my own. 30

O Freedom! if to me belong
 Nor mighty Milton's gift divine,
 Nor Marvell's wit and graceful
 song,
 Still with a love as deep and
 strong
 As theirs, I lay, like them, my best gifts on thy shrine! 35

ICHABOD

So fallen! so lost! the light withdrawn
 Which once he wore!
 The glory from his gray hairs gone Forevermore!

Reville him not, the Tempter hath 5
 A snare for all;
 And pitying tears, not scorn and wrath,
 Befit his fall!

Oh, dumb be passion's stormy rage,
 When he who might 10
 Have lighted up and led his age,
 Falls back in night.

Scorn! would the angels laugh, to mark
 A bright soul driven,
 Fiend-goaded, down the endless dark,
 From hope and heaven! 16

Let not the land once proud of him
 Insult him now,
 Nor brand with deeper shame his dim,
 Dishonored brow. 20

But let its humbled sons, instead,
 From sea to lake,
 A long lament, as for the dead,
 In sadness make.

Of all we loved and honored, naught 25
 Save power remains;
 A fallen angel's pride of thought,
 Still strong in chains.

All else is gone; from those great eyes
 The soul has fled: 30
 When faith is lost, when honor dies,
 The man is dead!

Then, pay the reverence of old days
 To his dead fame;
 Walk backward, with averted gaze, 35
 And hide the shame!

WORDSWORTH

Written on a blank leaf of his Memoirs

Dear friends, who read the world
 aright,
 And in its common forms discern
 A beauty and a harmony
 The many never learn!

Kindred in soul of him who found 5
 In simple flower and leaf and stone
 The impulse of the sweetest lays
 Our Saxon tongue has known,—

Accept this record of a life
 As sweet and pure, as calm and good,
 As a long day of blandest June 11
 In green field and in wood.

How welcome to our ears, long pained
 By strife of sect and party noise,
 The brook-like murmur of his song 15
 Of nature's simple joys!

The violet by its mossy stone,
 The primrose by the river's brim,
 And chance-sown daffodil, have found
 Immortal life through him. 20

The sunrise on his breezy lake,
 The rosy tints his sunset brought,
 World-seen, are gladdening all the vales
 And mountain-peaks of thought.

Art builds on sand; the works of pride 25
 And human passion change and fall;
 But that which shares the life of God
 With Him surviveth all.

SUMMER BY THE LAKESIDE

LAKE WINNIPESAUKEE

I. NOON

White clouds, whose shadows haunt the
 deep,
 Light mists, whose soft embraces keep
 The sunshine on the hills asleep!

O isles of calm! O dark, still wood!
 And stiller skies that overbrood 5
 Your rest with deeper quietude!

O shapes and hues, dim beckoning,
 through
 Yon mountain gaps, my longing view
 Beyond the purple and the blue,

To stiller sea and greener land, 10
 And softer lights and airs more bland,
 And skies,—the hollow of God's hand!

Transfused through you, O mountain
 friends!
 With mine your solemn spirit blends,
 And life no more hath separate ends. 15

I read each misty mountain sign,
 I know the voice of wave and pine,
 And I am yours, and ye are mine.

Life's burdens fall, its discords cease,
 I lapse into the glad release 20
 Of Nature's own exceeding peace.

O welcome calm of heart and mind!
 As falls yon fir-tree's loosened rind
 To leave a tenderer growth behind,

So fall the weary years away; 25
 A child again, my head I lay
 Upon the lap of this sweet day.

This western wind hath Lethean powers,
 Yon noonday cloud nepenthe showers,
 The lake is white with lotus-flowers! 30

Even Duty's voice is faint and low,
 And slumberous Conscience, waking
 slow,
 Forgets her blotted scroll to show.

The Shadow which pursues us all,
Whose ever-nearing steps appall, 35
Whose voice we hear behind us call,—

That Shadow blends with mountain
gray,

It speaks but what the light waves
say,—

Death walks apart from Fear to-day!

Rocked on her breast, these pines and
I 40

Alike on Nature's love rely;
And equal seems to live or die.

Assured that He whose presence fills
With light the spaces of these hills
No evil to His creatures wills, 45

The simple faith remains, that He Will do, whatever that may be,
The best alike for man and tree.

What mosses over one shall grow,
What light and life the other know, 50
Unanxious, leaving Him to show.

II. EVENING

Yon mountain's side is black with
night,

While, broad-orbed, o'er its gleaming crown

The moon, slow-rounding into sight,
On the hushed inland sea looks
down. 55

How start to light the clustering isles,
Each silver-hemmed! How sharply
show

The shadows of their rocky piles,
And tree-tops in the wave below!

How far and strange the mountains
seem, 60

Dim-looming through the pale, still
light!

The vague, vast grouping of a dream,
They stretch into the solemn night.

Beneath, lake, wood, and peopled vale, Hushed by that presence grand and
grave, 65

Are silent, save the cricket's wail,
And low response of leaf and wave.

Fair scenes! whereto the Day and
Night

Make rival love, I leave ye soon,
What time before the eastern light 70
The pale ghost of the setting moon

Shall hide behind yon rocky spines,
And the young archer, Morn, shall break

His arrows on the mountain pines,
And, golden-sandalled, walk the lake! 75

Farewell! around this smiling bay Gay hearted Health, and Life in bloom,
With lighter steps than mine, may stray
In radiant summers yet to come.

But none shall more regretful leave 80
These waters and these hills than I:
Or, distant, fonder dream how eve
Or dawn is painting wave and sky;

How rising moons shine sad and mild
On wooded isle and silvering bay; 85
Or setting suns beyond the piled
And purple mountains lead the day;

Nor laughing girl, nor bearding boy,
Nor full-pulsed manhood, lingering
here,

Shall add, to life's abounding joy, 90
The charmed repose to suffering dear.

Still waits kind Nature to impart
Her choicest gifts to such as gain
An entrance to her loving heart
Through the sharp discipline of pain.

Forever from the Hand that takes 96
One blessing from us, others fall;
And, soon or late, our Father makes
His perfect recompense to all!

Oh, watched by Silence and the Night,
And folded in the strong embrace 101
Of the great mountains, with the light
Of the sweet heavens upon thy face,

Lake of the Northland! keep thy dower
Of beauty still, and while above 105
Thy solemn mountains speak of power,
Be thou the mirror of God's love.

MAUD MULLER

Maud Muller on a summer's day
Raked the meadow sweet with hay.

Beneath her torn hat glowed the wealth
Of simple beauty and rustic health.

Singing, she wrought, and her merry glee⁵
The mock-bird echoed from his tree.

But when she glanced to the far-off
town,
White from its hill-slope looking down,

The sweet song died, and a vague unrest
And a nameless longing filled her breast,—¹⁰

A wish that she hardly dared to own,
For something better than she had known.

The Judge rode slowly down the lane,
Smoothing his horse's chestnut mane.

He drew his bridle in the shade¹⁵
Of the apple-trees, to greet the maid,

And asked a draught from the spring that flowed
Through the meadow across the road.

She stooped where the cool spring bubbled up,
And filled for him her small tin cup,²⁰

And blushed as she gave it, looking down
On her feet so bare, and her tattered gown.

"Thanks!" said the Judge; "a sweeter draught
From a fairer hand was never quaffed."

He spoke of the grass and flowers and trees,²⁵
Of the singing birds and the humming
bees;

Then talked of the haying, and wondered whether
The cloud in the west would bring foul weather.

And Maud forgot her brier-torn gown,
And her graceful ankles bare and brown;³⁰

And listened, while a pleased surprise
Looked from her long-lashed hazel eyes.

At last, like one who for delay
Seeks a vain excuse, he rode away.

Maud Muller looked and sighed: "Ah me!"³⁵
That I the Judge's bride might be!

"He would dress me up in silks so fine,
And praise and toast me at his wine.

"My father should wear a broadcloth
coat;
My brother should sail a painted boat.

"I'd dress my mother so grand and gay,"⁴¹
And the baby should have a new toy
each day.

"And I'd feed the hungry and clothe
the poor,
And all should bless me who left our
door."

The Judge looked back as he climbed the hill,⁴⁵
And saw Maud Muller standing still.

"A form more fair, a face more sweet,
Ne'er hath it been my lot to meet.

"And her modest answer and graceful
air
Show her wise and good as she is fair.

"Would she were mine, and I to-day⁵¹
Like her, a harvester of hay;

"No doubtful balance of rights and wrongs,
Nor weary lawyers with endless
tongues,

"But low of cattle and song of birds, ⁵⁵
And health and quiet and loving
words."

But he thought of his sisters, proud and
cold,
And his mother, vain of her rank and
gold.

So, closing his heart, the Judge rode
on,
And Maud was left in the field alone. ⁶⁰

But the lawyers smiled that afternoon,
When he hummed in court an old love-
tune;

And the young girl mused beside the
well
Till the rain on the unraked clover fell.

He wedded a wife of richest dower, ⁶⁵
Who lived for fashion, as he for power.

Yet oft, in his marble hearth's bright glow,
He watched a picture come and go;

And sweet Maud Muller's hazel eyes
Looked out in their innocent surprise. ⁷⁰

Oft, when the wine in his glass was
red,
He longed for the wayside well instead;

And closed his eyes on his garnished rooms
To dream of meadows and clover-blooms.

And the proud man sighed, with a secret pain, ⁷⁵
"Ah, that I were free again!"

"Free as when I rode that day,
Where the barefoot maiden raked her hay."

She wedded a man unlearned and poor,
And many children played round her door. ⁸⁰

But care and sorrow, and childbirth
pain,
Left their traces on heart and brain.

And oft, when the summer sun shone hot
On the new-mown hay in the meadow
lot,

And she heard the little spring brook fall ⁸⁵
Over the roadside, through the wall,

In the shade of the apple-tree again
She saw a rider draw his rein;

And, gazing down with timid grace,
She felt his pleased eyes read her face.

Sometimes her narrow kitchen walls ⁹¹
Stretched away into stately halls;

The weary wheel to a spinnet turned,
The tallow candle an astral burned,

And for him who sat by the chimney lug, ⁹⁵
Dozing and grumbling o'er pipe and mug,

A manly form at her side she saw,
And joy was duty and love was law.

Then she took up her burden of life
again,
Saying only, "It might have been." ¹⁰⁰

Alas for maiden, alas for Judge,
For rich repiner and household drudge!

God pity them both! and pity us all,
Who vainly the dreams of youth recall.

For of all sad words of tongue or pen, ¹⁰⁵
The saddest are these: "It might have been!"

Ah, well! for us all some sweet hope lies
Deeply buried from human eyes;

And, in the hereafter, angels may Roll the stone from its grave away! ¹¹⁰

THE BAREFOOT BOY

Blessings on thee, little man,
 Barefoot boy, with cheek of tan!
 With thy turned-up pantaloons,
 And thy merry whistled tunes;
 With thy red lip, redder still 5
 Kissed by strawberries on the hill;
 With the sunshine on thy face,
 Through thy torn brim's jaunty grace;
 From my heart I give thee joy,—
 I was once a barefoot boy! 10
 Prince thou art,—the grown-up man
 Only is republican.
 Let the million-dollared ride!
 Barefoot, trudging at his side,
 Thou hast more than he can buy 15
 In the reach-of ear and eye,— Outward sunshine, inward joy:
 Blessings on thee, barefoot boy!

Oh for boyhood's painless play,
 Sleep that wakes in laughing day, 20
 Health that mocks the doctor's rules,
 Knowledge never learned of schools,
 Of the wild bee's morning chase,
 Of the wild-flower's time and place,
 Flight of fowl and habitude 25
 Of the tenants of the wood;
 How the tortoise bears his shell,
 How the woodchuck digs his cell,
 And the ground-mole sinks his well;
 How the robin feeds her young; 30
 How the oriole's nest is hung;
 Where the whitest lilies blow,
 Where the freshest berries grow,
 Where the ground-nut trails its vine,
 Where the wood-grape's clusters shine;
 Of the black wasp's cunning way, 36
 Mason of his walls of clay,
 And the architectural plans
 Of gray hornet artisans!
 For, eschewing books and tasks, 40
 Nature answers all he asks;
 Hand in hand with her he walks,
 Face to face with her he talks,
 Part and parcel of her joy,— Blessings on the barefoot boy! 45

Oh for boyhood's time of June,
 Crowding years in one brief moon,
 When all things I heard or saw,
 Me, their master, waited for.
 I was rich in flowers and trees, 50

Humming-birds and honey-bees;
 For my sport the squirrel played,
 Plied the snouted mole his spade;
 For my taste the blackberry cone
 Purpled over hedge and stone; 55
 Laughed the brook for my delight Through the day and through the
 night,
 Whispering at the garden wall,
 Talked with me from fall to fall;
 Mine the sand-rimmed pickerel pond,
 Mine the walnut slopes beyond, 61
 Mine, on bending orchard trees, Apples of Hesperides!
 Still as my horizon grew,
 Larger grew my riches too; 65
 All the world I saw or knew Seemed a complex Chinese toy,
 Fashioned for a barefoot boy!

Oh for festal dainties spread,
 Like my bowl of milk and bread; 70
 Pewter spoon and bowl of wood,
 On the door-stone, gray and rude!
 O'er me, like a regal tent,
 Cloudy-ribbed, the sunset bent,
 Purple-curtained, fringed with gold, 75
 Looped in many a wind-swung fold;
 While for music came the play
 Of the pied frogs' orchestra;
 And, to light the noisy choir,
 Lit the fly his lamp of fire. 80
 I was monarch: pomp and joy
 Waited on the barefoot boy!
 Cheerily, then, my little man,
 Live and laugh, as boyhood can!
 Though the flinty slopes be hard, 85
 Stubble-speared the new-mown sward,
 Every morn shall lead thee through Fresh baptisms of the dew;
 Every evening from thy feet
 Shall the cool wind kiss the heat: 90
 All too soon these feet must hide
 In the prison cells of pride,
 Lose the freedom of the sod,
 Like a colt's for work be shod,
 Made to tread the mills of toil, 95
 Up and down in ceaseless moil:
 Happy if their track be found
 Never on forbidden ground;
 Happy if they sink not in Quick and treacherous sands of sin. 100
 Ah! that thou couldst know thy joy,
 Ere it passes, barefoot boy!

SKIPPER IRESON'S RIDE

Of all the rides since the birth of time,
Told in story or sung in rhyme,—
On Apuleius's Golden Ass,
Or one-eyed Calender's horse of brass,
Witch astride of a human back, 5
Islam's prophet on Al-Borák,—
The strangest ride that ever was sped
Was Ireson's, out from Marblehead!

Old Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart, Tarred and feathered and carried in
a cart 10

By the women of Marblehead!

Body of turkey, head of owl,
Wings a-droop like a rained-on fowl,
Feathered and ruffled in every part,
Skipper Ireson stood in the cart. 15
Scores of women, old and young,
Strong of muscle, and glib of tongue, Pushed and pulled up the rocky
lane,

Shouting and singing the shrill refrain:
"Here's Flud Oirson, fur his horrd
horrt, 20
Torr'd an' futherr'd an' corr'd in a
corrt

By the women o' Morble'ead!"

Wrinkled scolds with hands on hips,
Girls in bloom of cheek and lips,
Wild-eyed, free-limbed, such as chase
Bacchus round some antique vase, 26
Brief of skirt, with ankles bare,
Loose of kerchief and loose of hair,
With conch-shells blowing and fish-
horns' twang,

Over and over the Mænads¹ sang: 30
"Here's Flud Oirson, fur his horrd
horrt,

Torr'd an' futherr'd an' corr'd in a
corrt

By the women o' Morble'ead!"

Small pity for him!—He sailed away
From a leaking ship in Chaleur Bay,²—
Sailed away from a sinking wreck, 36
With his own town's-people on her deck!

"Lay by! lay by!" they called to him.
Back he answered, "Sink or swim!

¹frenzied women

²an inlet of the gulf of St. Lawrence

Brag of your catch of fish again!" 40
And off he sailed through the fog and rain!

Old Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart, Tarred and feathered and carried in
a cart

By the women of Marblehead!

Fathoms deep in dark Chaleur 45
That wreck shall lie forevermore.

Mother and sister, wife and maid,
Looked from the rocks of Marblehead
Over the moaning and rainy sea,— Looked for the coming that might not
be! 50

What did the winds and the sea-birds
say

Of the cruel captain who sailed
away?—

Old Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart, Tarred and feathered and carried in
a cart

By the women of Marblehead! 55

Through the street, on either side,
Up flew windows, doors swung wide;
Sharp-tongued spinsters, old wives gray,
Treble lent the fish-horn's bray.

Sea-worn grandsires, cripple-bound, 60
Hulks of old sailors run aground,
Shook head, and fist, and hat, and cane,
And cracked with curses the hoarse refrain:

"Here's Flud Oirson, fur his horrd
horrt,

Torr'd an' futherr'd an' corr'd in a
corrt 65

By the women o' Morble'ead!"

Sweetly along the Salem road
Bloom of orchard and lilac showed.
Little the wicked skipper knew
Of the fields so green and the sky so
blue. 70

Riding there in his sorry trim,
Like an Indian idol glum and grim,
Scarcely he seemed the sound to hear
Of voices shouting, far and near:

"Here's Flud Oirson, fur his horrd
horrt, 75

Torr'd an' futherr'd an' corr'd in a
corrt

By the women o' Morble'ead!"

"Hear me, neighbors!" at last he cried,—

"What to me is this noisy ride?
What is the shame that clothes the skin 80

To the nameless horror that lives
within?

Waking or sleeping, I see a wreck,
And hear a cry from a reeling deck!
Hate me and curse me,—I only dread
The hand of God and the face of the
dead!" 85

Said old Floyd Ireson, for his hard
heart,

Tarred and feathered and carried in
a cart

By the women of Marblehead!

Then the wife of the skipper lost at
sea

Said, "God has touched him! why should we!" 90

Said an old wife mourning her only son,

"Cut the rogue's tether and let him run!"

So with soft relentings and rude excuse,

Half scorn, half pity, they cut him
loose,

And gave him a cloak to hide him
in, 95

And left him alone with his shame and sin.

Poor Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart, Tarred and feathered and carried in
a cart

By the women of Marblehead!

THE GARRISON OF CAPE ANN

From the hills of home forth looking, far beneath the tent-like span
Of the sky, I see the white gleam of the headland of Cape Ann.

Well I know its coves and beaches to the ebb-tide glimmering down,
And the white-walled hamlet children
of its ancient fishing-town.

Long has passed the summer morning, and its memory waxes old, 5
When along yon breezy headlands with a pleasant friend I strolled.

Ah! the autumn sun is shining, and the ocean wind blows cool,
And the golden-rod and aster bloom around thy grave, Rantoul!

With the memory of that morning by the summer sea I blend
A wild and wondrous story, by the younger Mather penned, 10
In that quaint Magnalia Christi, with all strange and marvellous things, Heaped up huge and undigested, like the chaos Ovid sings.

Dear to me these far, faint glimpses of the dual life of old, Inward, grand with awe and reverence;
outward, mean and coarse and
cold;
Gleams of mystic beauty playing over dull and vulgar clay, 15 Golden-threaded fancies weaving in a web of hodden gray.

The great eventful Present hides the Past; but through the din
Of its loud life hints and echoes from the life behind steal in;
And the lore of home and fireside, and
the legendary rhyme,
Make the task of duty lighter which the true man owes his time. 20

So, with something of the feeling which the Covenanter knew,
When with pious chisel wandering Scotland's moorland graveyards
through,
From the graves of old traditions I part
the blackberry-vines,
Wipe the moss from off the headstones,
and retouch the faded lines.

Where the sea-waves back and forward, hoarse with rolling pebbles, ran, 25
The garrison-house stood watching on the gray rocks of Cape Ann;
On its windy site uplifting gabled roof
and palisade,
And rough walls of unhewn timber with the moonlight overlaid.

On his slow round walked the sentry,
south and eastward looking forth
O'er a rude and broken coast-line, white with breakers stretching north,—³⁰

Wood and rock and gleaming sand-drift, jagged capes, with bush and
tree,

Leaning inland from the smiting of the wild and gusty sea.

Before the deep-mouthed chimney,
dimly lit by dying brands, Twenty soldiers sat and waited, with their muskets in their hands;
On the rough-hewn oaken table the venison haunch was shared,³⁵
And the pewter tankard circled slowly round from beard to beard.

Long they sat and talked together,— talked of wizards Satan-sold;
Of all ghostly sights and noises,—signs
and wonders manifold;
Of the spectre-ship of Salem, with the dead men in her shrouds, Sailing sheer above the water, in the loom of morning clouds;⁴⁰

Of the marvellous valley hidden in the depths of Gloucester woods, Full of plants that love the summer,— blossoms of warmer latitudes;
Where the Arctic birch is braided by the tropic's flowery vines,
And the white magnolia-blossoms star
the twilight of the pines!

But their voices sank yet lower, sank to husky tones of fear,⁴⁵
As they spake of present tokens of the powers of evil near;—
Of a spectral host, defying stroke of steel and aim of gun;
Never yet was ball to slay them in the mould of mortals run!

Thrice, with plumes and flowing scalp-locks, from the midnight wood they came,—

Thrice around the block-house marching, met, unharmed, its volleyed flame;⁵⁰

Then, with mocking laugh and gesture,
sunk in earth or lost in air,
All the ghostly wonder vanished, and the moonlit sands lay bare.

Midnight came; from out the forest moved a dusky mass that soon Grew to warriors, plumed and painted, grimly marching in the moon.
"Ghosts or witches," said the captain,
"thus I foil the Evil One!"⁵⁵
And he rammed a silver button, from his doublet, down his gun.

Once again the spectral horror moved the guarded wall about;
Once again the levelled muskets through the palisades flashed out,
With that deadly aim the squirrel on his tree-top might not shun, Nor the beach-bird seaward flying with his slant wing to the sun.⁶⁰

Like the idle rain of summer sped the harmless shower of lead.
With a laugh of fierce derision, once again the phantoms fled;
Once again, without a shadow on the sands the moonlight lay,
And the white smoke curling through it drifted slowly down the bay!

"God preserve us!" said the captain;
"never mortal foes were there;⁶⁵
They have vanished with their leader,
Prince and Power of the air!
Lay aside your useless weapons; skill and prowess naught avail;
They who do the Devil's service wear their master's coat of mail!"

So the night grew near to cock-crow,
when again a warning call Roused the score of weary soldiers watching round the dusky hall:⁷⁰
And they looked to flint and priming,
and they longed for break of day;
But the captain closed his Bible: "Let us cease from man, and pray!"

To the men who went before us, all the unseen powers seemed near,
And their steadfast strength of courage struck its roots in holy fear.

Every hand forsook the musket, every head was bowed and bare, 75
Every stout knee pressed the flagstones, as the captain led in prayer.

Ceased thereat the mystic marching of the spectres round the wall,
But a sound abhorred, unearthly, smote
the ears and hearts of all,— Howls of rage and shrieks of anguish!
Never after mortal man Saw the ghostly leaguers marching round the block-house of Cape Ann. 80

So to us who walk in summer through the cool and sea-blown town,
From the childhood of its people comes the solemn legend down.
Not in vain the ancient fiction, in whose moral lives the youth And the fitness and the freshness of an undecaying truth.

Soon or late to all our dwellings come the spectres of the mind, 85 Doubts and fears and dread forebodings, in the darkness undefined;
Round us throng the grim projections of the heart and of the brain,
And our pride of strength is weakness,
and the cunning hand is vain.

In the dark we cry like children; and no answer from on high Breaks the crystal spheres of silence, and no white wings downward fly; 90
But the heavenly help we pray for comes to faith, and not to sight,
And our prayers themselves drive backward all the spirits of the night!

THE PIPES AT LUCKNOW

An incident of the Sepoy mutiny

Pipes of the misty moorlands,
Voice of the glens and hills;
The droning of the torrents,
The treble of the rills!
Not the braes of bloom and heather, 5
Nor the mountains dark with rain,
Nor maiden bower, nor border tower,
Have heard your sweetest strain!

Dear to the Lowland reaper,
And plaided mountaineer,— 10
To the cottage and the castle
The Scottish pipes are dear;—
Sweet sounds the ancient pibroch
O'er mountain, loch, and glade;
But the sweetest of all music 15
The pipes at Lucknow played.

Day by day the Indian tiger
Louder yelled, and nearer crept;
Round and round the jungle-serpent
Near and nearer circles swept. 20
"Pray for rescue, wives and mothers,— Pray to-day!" the soldier said;
"To-morrow, death's between us
And the wrong and shame we dread."

Oh, they listened, looked, and waited,
Till their hope became despair; 26
And the sobs of low bewailing Filled the pauses of their prayer.
Then up spake a Scottish maiden,
With her ear unto the ground— 30
"Dinna ye hear it?—dinna ye hear it?
The pipes o' Havelock sound!"

Hushed the wounded man his groan-
ing;
Hushed the wife her little ones;
Alone they heard the drum-roll 35
And the roar of Sepoy guns.
But to sounds of home and childhood
The Highland ear was true;—
As her mother's cradle-crooning
The mountain pipes she knew. 40

Like the march of soundless music
Through the vision of the seer,
More of feeling than of hearing,
Of the heart than of the ear,
She knew the droning pibroch, 45
She knew the Campbell's call:
"Hark! hear ye no MacGregor's,
The grandest o' them all!"

Oh, they listened, dumb and breath-
less,
And they caught the sound at last;
Faint and far beyond the Goomtee 51
Rose and fell the piper's blast!
Then a burst of wild thanksgiving
Mingled woman's voice and man's;
"God be praised!—the march of Havelock! 55
The piping of the clans!"

Louder, nearer, fierce as vengeance,
 Sharp and shrill as swords at strife,
 Came the wild MacGregor's clan-call,
 Stinging all the air to life. 60

But when the far-off dust-cloud
 To plaided legions grew Full tenderly and blithesomely
 The pipes of rescue blew!

Round the silver domes of Lucknow, 65
 Moslem mosque and Pagan shrine,
 Breathed the air to Britons dearest,
 The air of Auld Lang Syne.
 O'er the cruel roll of war-drums
 Rose that sweet and homelike strain;
 And the tartan clove the turban, 71
 As the Goomtee cleaves the plain.

Dear to the corn-land reaper
 And plaided mountaineer,—
 To the cottage and the castle 75
 The piper's song is dear.
 Sweet sounds the Gaelic pibroch
 O'er mountain, glen, and glade;
 But the sweetest of all music
 The Pipes at Lucknow played! 80

TELLING THE BEES

Here is the place; right over the hill Runs the path I took;
 You can see the gap in the old wall still,
 And the stepping-stones in the shallow brook.

There is the house, with the gate red-barred, 5
 And the poplars tall;
 And the barn's brown length, and the cattleyard,
 And the white horns tossing above
 the wall.

There are the beehives ranged in the
 sun;
 And down by the brink 10
 Of the brook are her poor flowers,
 weed-o'-errun,
 Pansy and daffodil, rose and pink.

A year has gone, as the tortoise goes,
 Heavy and slow;

And the same rose blows, and the same sun glows, 15
 And the same brook sings of a year
 ago.

There's the same sweet clover-smell in
 the breeze;
 And the June sun warm
 Tangles his wings of fire in the trees,
 Setting, as then, over Fernside farm.

I mind me how with a lover's care 21
 From my Sunday coat
 I brushed off the burrs, and smoothed
 my hair,
 And cooled at the brookside my brow
 and throat.

Since we parted, a month had passed,—
 To love, a year; 26 Down through the beeches I looked at
 last
 On the little red gate and the well-sweep near.

I can see it all now,—the slantwise rain
 Of light through the leaves, 30
 The sundown's blaze on her window-pane,
 The bloom of her roses under the eaves.

Just the same as a month before,—
 The house and the trees,
 The barn's brown gable, the vine by
 the door,— 35
 Nothing changed but the hives of bees.

Before them, under the garden wall,
 Forward and back,
 Went drearily singing the chore-girl small,
 Draping each hive with a shred of black. 40

Trembling, I listened: the summer sun
 Had the chill of snow;
 For I knew she was telling the bees of one
 Gone on the journey we all must go!

Then I said to myself, "My Mary weeps 45
 For the dead to-day:

Haply her blind old grandsire sleeps
The fret and the pain of his age
away."

But her dog whined low; on the doorway sill,
With his cane to his chin, 50
The old man sat; and the chore-girl
still
Sung to the bees stealing out and in.

And the song she was singing ever since
In my ear sounds on:—
"Stay at home, pretty bees, fly not hence! 55
Mistress Mary is dead and gone!"

MY PLAYMATE

The pines were dark on Ramoth hill,
Their song was soft and low;
The blossoms in the sweet May wind
Were falling like the snow.

The blossoms drifted at our feet, 5
The orchard birds sang clear;
The sweetest and the saddest day
It seemed of all the year.

For, more to me than birds or flowers,
My playmate left her home, 10
And took with her the laughing spring,
The music and the bloom.

She kissed the lips of kith and kin,
She laid her hand in mine:
What more could ask the bashful boy 15
Who fed her father's kine?

She left us in the bloom of May:
The constant years told o'er Their seasons with as sweet May morns,
But she came back no more. 20

I walk, with noiseless feet, the round
Of uneventful years;
Still o'er and o'er I sow the spring
And reap the autumn ears.

She lives where all the golden year 25
Her summer roses blow;
The dusky children of the sun
Before her come and go.

There haply with her jewelled hands
She smooths her silken gown,— 30
No more the homespun lap wherein
I shook the walnuts down.

The wild grapes wait us by the brook,
The brown nuts on the hill,
And still the May-day flowers make sweet 35
The woods of Follymill.

The lilies blossom in the pond,
The bird builds in the tree,
The dark pines sing on Ramoth hill
The slow song of the sea. 40

I wonder if she thinks of them,
And how the old time seems,—
If ever the pines of Ramoth wood
Are sounding in her dreams.

I see her face, I hear her voice; 45
Does she remember mine?
And what to her is now the boy
Who fed her father's kine?

What cares she that the orioles build
For other eyes than ours,— 50
That other hands with nuts are filled,
And other laps with flowers?

O playmate in the golden time!
Our mossy seat is green,
Its fringing violets blossom yet, 55
The old trees o'er it lean.

The winds so sweet with birch and fern
A sweeter memory blow;
And there in spring the veeries sing
The song of long ago. 60

And still the pines of Ramoth wood
Are moaning like the sea,—
The moaning of the sea of change
Between myself and thee!

LAUS DEO!

It is done!
Clang of bell and roar of gun
Send the tidings up and down.
How the belfries rock and reel!
How the great guns, peal on peal, 5
Fling the joy from town to town!

Ring, O bells!
Every stroke exulting tells
Of the burial hour of crime.
Loud and long, that all may hear, 10
Ring for every listening ear
Of Eternity and Time!

Let us kneel:
God's own voice is in that peal,
And this spot is holy ground. 15
Lord, forgive us! What are we,
That our eyes this glory see,
That our ears have heard the sound!

For the Lord
On the whirlwind is abroad; 20
In the earthquake He has spoken;
He has smitten with His thunder
The iron walls asunder,
And the gates of brass are broken!

Loud and long 25
Lift the old exulting song;
Sing with Miriam by the sea,
He has cast the mighty down;
Horse and rider sink and drown;
"He hath triumphed gloriously!" 30

Did we dare,
In our agony of prayer,
Ask for more than He has done?
When was ever His right hand
Over any time or land 35
Stretched as now beneath the sun?

How they pale,
Ancient myth and song and tale,
In this wonder of our days,
When the cruel rod of war 40
Blossoms white with righteous law,
And the wrath of man is praise!

Blotted out!
All within and all about
Shall a fresher life begin; 45
Freer breathe the universe
As it rolls its heavy curse
On the dead and buried sin!

It is done!
In the circuit of the sun
Shall the sound thereof go forth.
It shall bid the sad rejoice,
It shall give the dumb a voice,
It shall belt with joy the earth!

Ring and swing, 55
Bells of joy! On morning's wing
Send the song of praise abroad!
With a sound of broken chains
Tell the nations that He reigns,
Who alone is Lord and God! 60

THE ETERNAL GOODNESS

O friends! with whom my feet have trod
The quiet aisles of prayer,
Glad witness to your zeal for God
And love of man I bear.

I trace your lines of argument; 5
Your logic linked and strong
I weigh as one who dreads dissent,
And fears a doubt as wrong.

But still my human hands are weak
To hold your iron creeds: 10
Against the words ye bid me speak
My heart within me pleads.

Who fathoms the Eternal Thought?
Who talks of scheme and plan?
The Lord is God! He needeth not 15
The poor device of man.

I walk with bare, hushed feet the
ground
Ye tread with boldness shod;
I dare not fix with mete and bound
The love and power of God. 20

Ye praise His justice; even such
His pitying love I deem:
Ye seek a king; I fain would touch
The robe that hath no seam.

Ye see the curse which overbroods 25
A world of pain and loss;
I hear our Lord's beatitudes
And prayer upon the cross.

More than your schoolmen teach, with-
in Myself, alas! I know: 30
Too dark ye cannot paint the sin,
Too small the merit show.

I bow my forehead to the dust,
I veil mine eyes for shame,

And urge, in trembling self-distrust, 35
A prayer without a claim.

I see the wrong that round me lies,
I feel the guilt within;
I hear, with groan and travail-cries, 40
The world confess its sin.

Yet, in the maddening maze of things,
And tossed by storm and flood,
To one fixed trust my spirit clings;
I know that God is good!

Not mine to look where cherubim 45
And seraphs may not see,
But nothing can be good in Him
Which evil is in me.

The wrong that pains my soul below
I dare not throne above, 50
I know not of His hate,—I know
His goodness and His love.

I dimly guess from blessings known
Of greater out of sight,
And, with the chastened Psalmist, own
His judgments too are right. 56

I long for household voices gone,
For-vanished smiles I long,
But God hath led my dear ones on,
And He can do no wrong. 60

I know not what the future hath
Of marvel or surprise,
Assured alone that life and death
His mercy underlies.

And if my heart and flesh are weak 65
To bear an untried pain,
The bruised reed He will not break,
But strengthen and sustain.

No offering of my own I have,
Nor works my faith to prove; 70
I can but give the gifts He gave,
And plead His love for love.

And so beside the Silent Sea
I wait the muffled oar;
No harm from Him can come to me 75
On ocean or on shore.

I know not where His islands lift
Their fronded palms in air;

I only know I cannot drift
Beyond His love and care. 80

O brothers! if my faith is vain,
If hopes like these betray,
Pray for me that my feet may gain
The sure and safer way.

And Thou, O Lord! by whom are seen
Thy creatures as they be, 86
Forgive me if too close I lean
My human heart on Thee!

SNOW-BOUND

The sun that brief December day
Rose cheerless over hills of gray,
And, darkly circled, gave at noon
A sadder light than waning moon;
Slow tracing down the thickening sky 5
Its mute and ominous prophecy,
A portent seeming less than threat,
It sank from sight before it set.
A chill no coat, however stout,
Of homespun stuff could quite shut out,
A hard, dull bitterness of cold, 11
That checked, mid-vein, the circling race
Of life-blood in the sharpened face,
The coming of the snow-storm told.
The wind blew east: we heard the roar
Of Ocean on his wintry shore, 16
And felt the strong pulse throbbing
there
Beat with low rhythm our inland air.

Meanwhile we did our nightly chores,—
Brought in the wood from out of doors,
Littered the stalls, and from the mows Raked down the herd's-grass for the cows;
Heard the horse whinnying for his corn;
And, sharply clashing horn on horn,
Impatient down the stanchion rows 25
The cattle shake their walnut bows;
While, peering from his early perch
Upon the scaffold's pole of birch,
The cock his crested helmet bent
And down his querulous challenge sent.

Unwarmed by any sunset light 31
The gray day darkened into night,

A night made hoary with the swarm
 And whirl-dance of the blinding storm,
 As, zigzag wavering to and fro, 35
 Crossed and recrossed the wingèd snow;
 And ere the early bed-time came
 The white drift piled the window-frame,
 And through the glass the clothes-line posts 39
 Looked in like tall and sheeted ghosts.

So all night long the storm roared on;
 The morning broke without a sun;
 In tiny spherule traced with lines
 Of Nature's geometric signs,
 In starry flake and pellicle 45
 All day the hoary meteor fell;
 And, when the second morning shone,
 We looked upon a world unknown,
 On nothing we could call our own:
 Around the glistening wonder bent 50
 The blue walls of the firmament,
 No cloud above, no earth below—
 A universe of sky and snow!
 The old familiar sights of ours
 Took marvellous shapes: strange domes and towers 55

Rose up where sty or corn-crib stood,
 Or garden-wall or belt of wood;
 A smooth white mound the brush-pile
 showed,
 A fenceless drift what once was road;
 The bridle-post an old man sat, 60
 With loose-flung coat and high cocked hat;
 The well-curb had a Chinese roof;
 And even the long sweep, high aloof,
 In its slant splendor seemed to tell
 Of Pisa's leaning miracle.¹ 65

A prompt, decisive man, no breath
 Our father wasted: "Boys, a path!"
 Well pleased (for when did farmer boy Count such a summons less than joy?),
 Our buskins on our feet we drew; 70
 With mittened hands, and caps drawn
 low
 To guard our necks and ears from
 snow,

We cut the solid whiteness through;
 And, where the drift was deepest, made
 A tunnel walled and overlaid 75
 With dazzling crystal: we had read
 Of rare Aladdin's wondrous cave,

And to our own his name we gave,
 With many a wish the luck were ours
 To test his lamp's supernal powers. 80
 We reached the barn with merry din,
 And roused the prisoned brutes within.
 The old horse thrust his long head out,
 And, grave with wonder, gazed about;
 The cock his lusty greeting said, 85
 And forth his speckled harem led;
 The oxen lashed their tails, and hooked,
 And mild reproach of hunger looked;
 The hornèd patriarch of the sheep,
 Like Egypt's Amun roused from sleep, 90
 Shook his sage head with gesture mute,
 And emphasized with stamp of foot.

All day the gusty north-wind bore
 The loosening drift its breath before.
 Low circling round its southern zone, 95
 The sun through dazzling snow-mist shone.

No church-bell lent its Christian tone
 To the savage air, no social smoke
 Curled over woods of snow-hung oak:
 A solitude made more intense 100
 By dreary-voicèd elements—
 The shrieking of the mindless wind,
 The moaning tree-boughs swaying blind,

And on the glass the unmeaning beat
 Of ghostly finger-tips of sleet. 105
 Beyond the circle of our hearth
 No welcome sound of toil or mirth
 Unbound the spell, and testified
 Of human life and thought outside.
 We minded that the sharpest ear 110
 The buried brooklet could not hear,
 The music of whose liquid lip
 Had been to us companionship,
 And, in our lonely life, had grown
 To have an almost human tone. 115
 As night drew on, and, from the crest
 Of wooded knolls that ridged the west,
 The sun, a snow-blown traveller, sank
 From sight beneath the smothering
 bank,

We piled with care our nightly stack 120
 Of wood against the chimney-back—
 The oaken log, green, huge, and thick,
 And on its top the stout back-stick;
 The knotty forestick laid apart,
 And filled between with curious art 125
 The ragged brush; then, hovering near,

We watched the first red blaze appear,
Heard the sharp crackle, caught the gleam

On whitewashed wall and sagging beam,
Until the old, rude-furnished room 130
Burst, flower-like, into rosy bloom;
While radiant with a mimic flame
Outside the sparkling drift became,
And through the bare-boughed lilac-tree

Our own warm hearth seemed blazing free. 135

The crane and pendent trammels showed,
The Turk's heads on the andirons glowed.

While childish fancy, prompt to tell
The meaning of the miracle,
Whispered the old rhyme, "Under the tree," 140

*When fire outdoors burns merrily,
There the witches are making tea."*

The moon above the eastern wood Shone at its full; the hill-range stood Transfigured in the silver flood, 145
Its blown snows flashing cold and keen,
Dead white save where some sharp ravine

Took shadow, or the sombre green
Of hemlocks turned to pitchy black
Against the whiteness at their back. 150
For such a world and such a night
Most fitting that unwarming light,
Which only seemed where'er it fell
To make the coldness visible. 154

Shut in from all the world without,
We sat the clean-winged hearth about,
Content to let the north-wind roar
In baffled rage at pane and door,
While the red logs before us beat
The frost-line back with tropic heat;
And ever, when a louder blast 161
Shook beam and rafter as it passed,
The merrier up its roaring draught
The great throat of the chimney laughed.

The house-dog on his paws outspread
Laid to the fire his drowsy head, 166
The cat's dark silhouette on the wall
A couchant tiger's seemed to fall;
And, for the winter fireside meet,
Between the andirons' straddling feet,

The mug of cider simmered slow, 171
The apples sputtered in a row,
And, close at hand, the basket stood
With nuts from brown October's wood.

What matter how the night behaved?
What matter how the north-wind raved? 176

Blow high, blow low, not all its snow
Could quench our hearth-fire's ruddy glow.

O Time and Change!—with hair as gray

As was my sire's that winter day, 180
How strange it seems, with so much gone

Of life and love, to still live on!
Ah, brother! only I and thou
Are left of all that circle now—
The dear home faces whereupon 185

That fitful firelight paled and shone.
Henceforward, listen as we will,
The voices of that hearth are still;
Look where we may, the wide earth o'er,

Those lighted faces smile no more. 190
We tread the paths their feet have worn,

We sit beneath their orchard trees,
We hear, like them, the hum of bees
And rustle of the bladed corn,
We turn the pages that they read, 195

Their written words we linger o'er;
But in the sun they cast no shade,
No voice is heard, no sign is made,
No step is on the conscious floor!

Yet Love will dream, and Faith will trust, 200

(Since He who knows our need is just)
That somehow, somewhere, meet we must.

Alas for him who never sees
The stars shine through his cypress-trees;

Who hopeless lays his dead away, 205
Nor looks to see the breaking day
Across the mournful marbles play!

Who hath not learned, in hours of faith,
The truth to flesh and sense unknown,
That Life is ever lord of Death, 210
And Love can never lose its own!

We sped the time with stories old,
Wrought puzzles out, and riddles told,

Or stammered from our school-book lore
 "The Chief of Gambia's golden shore."
 How often since, when all the land 216
 Was clay in Slavery's shaping hand,
 As if a trumpet called, I've heard Dame Mercy Warren's rousing word:
"Does not the voice of reason cry, 220
'Claim the first right which Nature gave!
From the red scourge of bondage fly,
Nor deign to live a burdened slave!"
 Our father rode again his ride
 On Memphremagog's wooded side; 225
 Sat down again to moose and samp
 In trapper's hut and Indian camp;
 Lived o'er the old idyllic ease
 Beneath St. François' hemlock-trees;
 Again for him the moonlight shone 230
 On Norman cap and bodiced zone;
 Again he heard the violin play
 Which led the village dance away,
 And mingled in its merry whirl
 The grandam and the laughing girl. 235
 Or, nearer home, our steps he led Where Salisbury's level marshes spread Mile-wide as flies the laden bee;
 Where merry mowers, hale and strong,
 Swept, scythe on scythe, their swaths along 240
 The low green prairies of the sea.
 We shared the fishing off Boar's Head,
 And, round the rocky Isles of Shoals,
 The hake-broil on the drift-wood coals;
 The chowder on the sand-beach made,
 Dipped by the hungry, steaming hot, 246
 With spoons of clam-shell from the pot.
 We heard the tales of witchcraft old
 And dream and sign and marvel told
 To sleepy listeners as they lay 250
 Stretched idly on the salted hay,
 Adrift along the winding shores,
 When favoring breezes deigned to blow
 The square sail of the gundalow,
 And idle lay the useless oars. 255
 Our mother, while she turned her wheel
 Or run the new-knit stocking-heel,
 Told how the Indian hordes came down
 At midnight on Cochecho town,
 And how her own great-uncle bore 260
 His cruel scalp-mark to fourscore.

Recalling, in her fitting phrase,
 So rich and picturesque and free
 (The common unrhymed poetry
 Of simple life and country ways), 265
 The story of her early days,
 She made us welcome to her home;
 Old hearths grew wide to give us
 room;
 We stole with her a frightened look
 At the gray wizard's conjuring-book, 270
 The fame whereof went far and wide
 Through all the simple country side;
 We heard the hawks at twilight play,
 The boat-horn on Piscataqua,
 The loon's weird laughter far away. 275
 We fished her little trout-brook, knew What flowers in wood and meadow grew,
 What sunny hillsides autumn-brown
 She climbed to shake the wild nuts
 down,
 Saw where in sheltered cove and bay 280
 The duck's black squadron anchored
 lay,
 And heard the wild-geese calling loud
 Beneath the gray November cloud.

Then, haply, with a look more grave
 And soberer tone, some tale she gave 285
 From painful Sewell's ancient tome,
 Beloved in every Quaker home,
 Of faith fire-winged by martyrdom:
 Or Chalkley's Journal, old and quaint,
 Gentlest of skippers, rare sea-saint! 290
 Who, when the dreary calms prevailed,
 And water-butt and bread-cask failed,
 And cruel, hungry eyes pursued
 His portly presence, mad for food,
 With dark hints muttered under breath 295
 Of casting lots for life or death,
 Offered, if Heaven withheld supplies,
 To be himself the sacrifice;
 Then, suddenly, as if to save
 The good man from his living grave, 300
 A ripple on the water grew,
 A school of porpoise flashed in view;
 "Take, eat," he said, "and be content;
 These fishes in my stead are sent
 By Him who gave the tangled ram 305
 To spare the child of Abraham."

Our uncle, innocent of books,
 Was rich in lore of fields and brooks—

The ancient teachers never dumb
 Of Nature's unhousted lyceum. 310
 In moons and tides and weather wise,
 He read the clouds as prophecies,
 And foul or fair could well divine
 By many an occult hint and sign,
 Holding the cunning-warded keys 315
 To all the woodcraft mysteries; Himself to Nature's heart so near
 That all her voices in his ear
 Of beast or bird had meanings clear,
 Like Apollonius of old, 320
 Who knew the tales the sparrows told,
 Or Hermes, who interpreted
 What the sage cranes of Nilus said.
 A simple, guileless, childlike man,
 Content to live where life began, 325
 Strong only on his native grounds,
 The little world of sights and sounds
 Whose girdle was the parish bounds,
 Whereof his fondly partial pride
 The common features magnified 330
 (As Surrey hills to mountains grew In White of Selborne's loving view),
 He told how teal and loon he shot,
 And how the eagle's eggs he got,
 The feats on pond and river done, 335
 The prodigies of rod and gun;
 Till, warming with the tales he told,
 Forgotten was the outside cold,
 The bitter wind unheeded blew;
 From ripening corn the pigeons flew, 340
 The partridge drummed i' the wood, the mink
 Went fishing down the river-brink,
 In fields with bean or clover gay
 The woodchuck, like a hermit gray, Peered from the doorway of his cell, 345
 The muskrat plied the mason's trade,
 And tier by tier his mud-walls laid,
 And from the shagbark overhead
 The grizzled squirrel dropped his shell.
 Next, the dear aunt, whose smile of cheer 350
 And voice in dreams I see and hear—
 The sweetest woman ever Fate
 Perverse denied a household mate,
 Who, lonely, homeless, not the less
 Found peace in love's unselfishness, 355
 And welcome whereso'er she went,
 A calm and gracious element,

Whose presence seemed the sweet income
 And womanly atmosphere of home—
 Called up her girlhood memories, 360
 The huskings and the apple-bees,
 The sleigh-rides and the summer sails,
 Weaving through all the poor details
 And homespun warp of circumstance
 A golden woof-thread of romance: 365
 For well she kept her genial mood
 And simple faith of maidenhood;
 Before her still a cloud-land lay,
 The mirage loomed across her way;
 The morning dew, that dries so soon 370
 With others, glistened at her noon;
 Though years of toil and soil and care,
 From glossy tress to thin gray hair,
 All unprofaned she held apart
 The virgin fancies of the heart. 375
 Be shame to him of woman born
 Who hath for such but thought of scorn.

There, too, our elder sister plied
 Her evening task the stand beside;
 A full, rich nature, free to trust, 380
 Truthful and almost sternly just,
 Impulsive, earnest, prompt to act
 And make her generous thought a fact,
 Keeping with many a light disguise
 The secret of self-sacrifice. 385
 O heart sore-tried, thou hast the best
 That Heaven itself could give thee—
 rest,
 Rest from all bitter thoughts and
 things!
 How many a poor one's blessing went
 With thee beneath the low green
 tent 390
 Whose curtain never outward swings!

As one who held herself a part
 Of all she saw, and let her heart
 Against the household bosom lean,
 Upon the motley-braided mat 395
 Our youngest and our dearest sat,
 Lifting her large, sweet, asking eyes,
 Now bathed within the fadeless green
 And holy peace of Paradise.
 O, looking from some heavenly hill, 400
 Or from the shade of saintly palms,
 Or silver reach of river calms,
 Do those large eyes behold me still?
 With me one little year ago—
 The chill weight of the winter snow 405

For months upon her grave has lain;
And now, when summer south-winds
blow

And brier and harebell bloom again,
I tread the pleasant paths we trod,
I see the violet-sprinkled sod 410
Whereon she leaned, too frail and weak
The hillside flowers she loved to seek,
Yet following me where'er I went
With dark eyes full of love's content.
The birds are glad; the brier-rose fills
The air with sweetness; all the hills 416
Stretch green to June's unclouded sky:
But still I wait with ear and eye
For something gone which should be nigh,

A loss in all familiar things, 420
In flower that blooms and bird that sings.

And yet, dear heart, remembering thee,
Am I not richer than of old?
Safe in thy immortality,

What change can reach the wealth I
hold? 425

What chance can mar the pearl and
gold

Thy love hath left in trust with me?

And while in life's late afternoon,

Where cool and long the shadows
grow,

I walk to meet the night that soon 430

Shall shape and shadow overflow,

I cannot feel that thou art far,

Since near at need the angels are;

And when the sunset gates unbar,

Shall I not see thee waiting stand, 435

And, white against the evening star,

The welcome of thy beckoning hand?

Brisk wielder of the birch and rule,

The master of the district school

Held at the fire his favored place: 440

Its warm glow lit a laughing face

Fresh-hued and fair, where scarce appeared

The uncertain prophecy of beard.

He played the old and simple games

Our modern boyhood scarcely names,

Sang songs, and told us what befalls 446

In classic Dartmouth's college halls.

Born the wild Northern hills among,

From whence his yeoman father wrung

By patient toil subsistence scant, 450

Not competence and yet not want,

He early gained the power to pay

His cheerful, self-reliant way;

Could doff at ease his scholar's gown

To peddle wares from town to town; 455

Or through the long vacation's reach

In lonely lowland districts teach,

Where all the droll experience found

At stranger hearths in boarding round—

The moonlit skater's keen delight, 460

The sleigh-drive through the frosty
night,

The rustic party with its rough

Accompaniment of blind-man's-buff

And whirling plate and forfeits paid—

His winter task a pastime made. 465

Happy the snow-locked homes wherein

He tuned his merry violin,

Or played the athlete in the barn,

Or held the good dame's winding yarn,

Or mirth-provoking versions told 470

Of classic legends rare and old—

Wherein the scenes of Greece and Rome

Had all the commonplace of home,

And little seemed at best the odds

'Twixt Yankee pedlars and old gods, 475

Where Pindus-born Araxes took

The guise of any grist-mill brook,

And dread Olympus at his will

Became a huckleberry hill.

A careless boy that night he seemed; 480

But at his desk he had the look

And air of one who wisely schemed .

And hostage from the future took

In trained thought and lore of book.

Large-brained, clear-eyed—of such as he 485

Shall Freedom's young apostles be,

Who, following in War's bloody trail,

Shall every lingering wrong assail:

All chains from limb and spirit strike,

Uplift the black and white alike; 490

Scatter before their swift advance

The darkness and the ignorance,

The pride, the lust, the squalid sloth,

Which nurtured Treason's monstrous growth,

Made murder pastime, and the hell 495

Of prison-torture possible;

The cruel lie of caste refute,

Old forms remould, and substitute

For Slavery's lash the freeman's will,

For blind routine, wise-handed skill;

A school-house plant on every hill, 501 Stretching in radiate nerve-lines thence
 The quick wires of intelligence;
 Till North and South, together brought,
 Shall own the same electric thought, 505
 In peace a common flag salute,
 And, side by side in labor's free
 And unresentful rivalry,
 Harvest the fields wherein they fought.

Another guest, that winter night, 510 Flashed back from lustrous eyes the
 light.

Unmarked by time, and yet not young,
 The honeyed music of her tongue
 And words of meekness scarcely told
 A nature passionate and bold, 515
 Strong, self-concentred, spurning guide,
 Its milder features dwarfed beside
 Her unbent will's majestic pride.

She sat among us, at the best
 A not unfear'd, half-welcome guest, 520
 Rebuking with her cultured phrase
 Our homeliness of words and ways.

A certain pard-like, treacherous grace Swayed the lithe limbs and drooped
 the lash,

Lent the white teeth their dazzling flash; 525

And under low brows, black with
 night,

Rayed out at times a dangerous light,
 The sharp heat-lightnings of her face
 Presaging ill to him whom Fate
 Condemned to share her love or hate.
 A woman tropical, intense 531

In thought and act, in soul and sense,
 She blended in a like degree
 The vixen and the devotee,
 Revealing with each freak or feint 535

The temper of Petruchio's Kate,
 The raptures of Siena's saint:
 Her tapering hand and rounded wrist
 Had facile power to form a fist;
 The warm, dark languish of her eyes 540
 Was never safe from wrath's surprise;
 Brows saintly calm and lips devout
 Knew every change of scowl and pout;
 And the sweet voice had notes more
 high

And shrill for social battle-cry. 545

Since then what old cathedral town
 Has missed her pilgrim staff and gown,

What convent-gate has held its lock
 Against the challenge of her knock?
 Through Smyrna's plague-hushed thoroughfares, 550

Up sea-set Malta's rocky stairs,
 Gray olive slopes of hills that hem
 Thy tombs and shrines, Jerusalem,
 Or startling on her desert throne
 The crazy Queen of Lebanon 555

With claims fantastic as her own,
 Her tireless feet have held their way;
 And still, unrestful, bowed, and gray,
 She watches under Eastern skies,

With hope each day renewed and fresh, 560

The Lord's quick coming in the flesh,
 Whereof she dreams and prophesies!

Where'er her troubled path may be,
 The Lord's sweet pity with her go!
 The outward wayward life we see, 565
 The hidden springs we may not
 know;

Nor is it given us to discern
 What threads the fatal sisters spun,
 Through what ancestral years has
 run

The sorrow with the woman born, 570
 What forged her cruel chain of moods,
 What set her feet in solitudes,

And held the love within her mute,
 What mingled madness in the blood,
 A life-long discord and annoy, 575

Water of tears with oil of joy,
 And hid within the folded bud
 Perversities of flower and fruit.

It is not ours to separate
 The tangled skein of will and fate, 580
 To show what metes and bounds should stand

Upon the soul's debatable land,
 And between choice and Providence
 Divide the circle of events;

But He who knows our frame is just,
 Merciful and compassionate, 586
 And full of sweet assurances
 And hope for all the language is That He remembereth we are dust!

At last the great logs, crumbling low,
 Sent out a dull and duller glow: 591
 The bull's-eye watch that hung in view,
 Ticking its weary circuit through,
 Pointed with mutely-warning sign

Its black hand to the hour of nine. 595
 That sign the pleasant circle broke:
 My uncle ceased his pipe to smoke,
 Knocked from its bowl the refuse gray,
 And laid it tenderly away,
 Then roused himself to safely cover 600
 The dull red brands with ashes over.
 And while, with care, our mother laid
 The work aside, her steps she stayed
 One moment, seeking to express
 Her grateful sense of happiness 605
 For food and shelter, warmth and health,
 And love's contentment more than
 wealth,
 With simple wishes (not the weak,
 Vain prayers which no fulfilment seek,
 But such as warm the generous heart,
 O'er-prompt to do with Heaven its part) 611
 That none might lack, that bitter night,
 For bread and clothing, warmth and
 light.

Within our beds awhile we heard
 The wind that round the gables roared,
 With now and then a ruder shock, 616
 Which made our very bedsteads rock;
 We heard the loosened clapboards tost,
 The board-nails snapping in the frost;
 And on us, through the unplastered
 wall, 620
 Felt the light-sifted snow-flakes fall.
 But sleep stole on, as sleep will do
 When hearts are light and life is new;
 Faint and more faint the murmurs
 grew,
 Till in the summer-land of dreams 625
 They softened to the sound of streams,
 Low stir of leaves, and dip of oars,
 And lapsing waves on quiet shores.

Next morn we wakened with the shout
 Of merry voices high and clear, 630
 And saw the teamsters drawing near
 To break the drifted highways out:
 Down the long hillside treading slow
 We saw the half-buried oxen go,
 Shaking the snow from heads upstost,
 Their straining nostrils white with frost. 636
 Before our door the straggling train
 Drew up, an added team to gain:
 The elders threshed their hands a-cold,

Passed, with the cider-mug, their jokes 640
 From lip to lip; the younger folks
 Down the loose snow-banks, wrestling, rolled.
 Then toiled again the cavalcade
 O'er windy hill, through clogged ravine,
 And woodland paths that wound between 645
 Low drooping pine-boughs winter-weighed.
 From every barn a team afoot;
 At every house a new recruit,
 Where, drawn by Nature's subtlest
 law,
 Haply the watchful young men saw 650
 Sweet doorway pictures of the curls
 And curious eyes of merry girls,
 Lifting their hands in mock defence
 Against the snow-ball's compliments,
 And reading in each missive tost 655
 The charm with Eden never lost.
 We heard once more the sleigh-bells'
 sound;
 And, following where the teamsters
 led,
 The wise old Doctor went his round,
 Just pausing at our door to say, 660
 In the brief autocratic way
 Of one who, prompt at Duty's call,
 Was free to urge her claim on all,
 That some poor neighbor sick abed
 At night our mother's aid would need:
 For, one in generous thought and deed, 666
 What mattered in the sufferer's sight
 The Quaker matron's inward light,
 The Doctor's mail of Calvin's creed?
 All hearts confess the saints elect 670
 Who, twain in faith, in love agree,
 And melt not in an acid sect
 The Christian pearl of charity!

So days went on; a week had passed Since the great world was heard from
 last. 675
 The Almanac we studied o'er,
 Read and reread our little store
 Of books and pamphlets, scarce a score:
 One harmless novel, mostly hid
 From younger eyes, a book forbid; 680
 And poetry (or good or bad,
 A single book was all we had)

Where Ellwood's meek, drab-skirted
Muse,

A stranger to the heathen Nine,
Sang, with a somewhat nasal whine,
The wars of David and the Jews. 686
At last the floundering carrier bore
The village paper to our door.

Lo! broadening outward as we read,
To warmer zones the horizon spread;
In panoramic length unrolled 691

We saw the marvels that it told:
Before us passed the painted Creeks,
And daft McGregor on his raids
In Costa Rica's everglades; 695

And up Taygetos winding slow
Rode Ypsilanti's Mainote Greeks,
A Turk's head at each saddle-bow!
Welcome to us its week-old news,
Its corner for the rustic Muse, 700

Its monthly gauge of snow and rain,
Its record mingling in a breath
The wedding knell¹ and dirge of death,
Jest, anecdote, and love-lorn tale,
The latest culprit sent to jail, 705

Its hue and cry of stolen and lost,
Its vendue sales and goods at cost,
And traffic calling loud for gain.
We felt the stir of hall and street,
The pulse of life that round us beat; 710
The chill embargo of the snow
Was melted in the genial glow;
Wide swung again our ice-locked door,
And all the world was ours once more!

Clasp, Angel of the backward look 715
And folded wings of ashen gray
And voice of echoes far away,

The brazen covers of thy book—
The weird palimpsest old and vast, 719
Wherein thou hid'st the spectral past,
Where, closely mingling, pale and glow
The characters of joy and woe,
The monographs of outlived years,
Or smile-illumed or dim with tears, 724

Green hills of life that slope to death,
And haunts of home, whose vistaed
trees

Shade off to mournful cypresses
With the white amaranths underneath.

Even while I look, I can but heed
The restless sands' incessant fall, 730
Importunate hours that hours succeed,

Each clamorous with its own sharp
need,

And duty keeping pace with all.
Shut down and clasp the heavy lids;
I hear again the voice that bids 735
The dreamer leave his dream midway
For larger hopes and graver fears:
Life greatens in these later years,
The century's aloë flowers today!

Yet, haply, in some lull of life, 740
Some Truce of God which breaks its strife,

The worldling's eyes shall gather dew,
Dreaming in throngful city ways
Of winter joys his boyhood knew;
And dear and early friends—the few 745
Who yet remain—shall pause to view

These Flemish pictures of old days,
Sit with me by the homestead hearth,
And stretch the hands of memory forth
To warm them at the wood-fire's blaze! 750

And thanks untraced to lips unknown
Shall greet me like the odors blown
From unseen meadows newly mown,
Or lilies floating in some pond,
Wood-fringed, the wayside gaze beyond; 755

The traveller owns the grateful sense
Of sweetness near, he knows not whence,

And, pausing, takes with forehead bare
The benediction of the air.

OUR MASTER

Immortal Love, forever full,
Forever flowing free,
Forever shared, forever whole,
A never-ebbing sea!

Our outward lips confess the name 5
All other names above;
Love only knoweth whence it came
And comprehendeth love.

Blow, winds of God, awake and blow
The mists of earth away! 10
Shine out, O Light Divine, and show
How wide and far we stray!

Hush every lip, close every book,
The strife of tongues forbear;

Why forward reach, or backward look,
For love that clasps like air? 16

We may not climb the heavenly steeps
To bring the Lord Christ down:
In vain we search the lowest deeps,
For Him no depths can drown. 20

Nor holy bread, nor blood of grape,
The lineaments restore
Of Him we know in outward shape
And in the flesh no more.

He cometh not a king to reign: 25
The world's long hope is dim;
The weary centuries watch in vain
The clouds of heaven for Him.

Death comes, life goes; the asking eye
And ear are answerless; 30
The grave is dumb, the hollow sky
Is sad with silentness.

The letter fails, and systems fall,
And every symbol wanes;
The Spirit over-brooding all 35
Eternal Love remains.

And not for signs in heaven above
Or earth below they look,
Who know with John His smile of love,
With Peter His rebuke. 40

In joy of inward peace, or sense
Of sorrow over sin,
He is His own best evidence,
His witness is within.

No fable old, nor mythic lore, 45
Nor dream of bards and seers,
No dead fact stranded on the shore
Of the oblivious years;—

But warm, sweet, tender, even yet
A present help is He; 50
And faith has still its Olivet,
And love its Galilee.

The healing of His seamless dress
Is by our beds of pain;
We touch Him in life's throng and 55
press,
And we are whole again.

Through Him the first fond prayers are
said
Our lips of childhood frame,
The last low whispers of our dead
Are burdened with His name. 60

Our Lord and Master of us all!
Whate'er our name or sign,
We own Thy sway, we hear Thy call,
We test our lives by Thine.

Thou judgest us; Thy purity 65
Doth all our lusts condemn;
The love that draws us nearer Thee
Is hot with wrath to them.

Our thoughts lie open to Thy sight;
And, naked to Thy glance, 70
Our secret sins are in the light
Of Thy pure countenance.

Thy healing pains, a keen distress
Thy tender light shines in;
Thy sweetness is the bitterness, 75
Thy grace the pang of sin.

Yet, weak and blinded though we be,
Thou dost our service own;
We bring our varying gifts to Thee,
And Thou rejectest none. 80

To Thee our full humanity,
Its joys and pains, belong;
The wrong of man to man on Thee
Inflicts a deeper wrong.

Who hates, hates Thee, who loves becomes 85
Therein to Thee allied;
All sweet accords of hearts and homes
In Thee are multiplied.

Deep strike Thy roots, O heavenly Vine,
Within our earthly sod, 90
Most human and yet most divine,
The flower of man and God!

O Love! O Life! Our faith and sight
Thy presence maketh one,
As through transfigured clouds of white
We trace the noon-day sun. 96

So, to our mortal eyes subdued,
Flesh-veiled, but not concealed,

We know in Thee the fatherhood
And heart of God revealed. 100

We faintly hear, we dimly see,
In differing phrase we pray;
But, dim or clear, we own in Thee
The Light, the Truth, the Way!

The homage that we render Thee 105
Is still our Father's own;
No jealous claim or rivalry Divides the Cross and Throne.

To do Thy will is more than praise,
As words are less than deeds, 110
And simple trust can find Thy ways
We miss with chart of creeds.

No pride of self Thy service hath,
No place for me and mine;
Our human strength is weakness, death
Our life, apart from Thine. 116

Apart from Thee all gain is loss,
All labor vainly done;
The solemn shadow of Thy Cross
Is better than the sun. 120

Alone, O Love ineffable!
Thy saving name is given;
To turn aside from Thee is hell,
To walk with Thee is heaven!

How vain, secure in all Thou art, 125
Our noisy championship!
The sighing of the contrite heart
Is more than flattering lip.

Not Thine the bigot's partial plea,
Nor Thine the zealot's ban; 130
Thou well canst spare a love of Thee
Which ends in hate of man.

Our Friend, our Brother, and our Lord,
What may Thy service be?—
Nor name, nor form, nor ritual word, 135
But simply following Thee.

We bring no ghastly holocaust,
We pile no graven stone;
He serves thee best who loveth most
His brothers and Thy own. 140

Thy litanies, sweet offices
Of love and gratitude;

Thy sacramental liturgies
The joy of doing good.

In vain shall waves of incense drift 145
The vaulted nave around,
In vain the minster turret lift
Its brazen weights of sound.

The heart must ring Thy Christmas bells,
Thy inward altars raise; 150
Its faith and hope Thy canticles,
And its obedience praise!

ABRAHAM DAVENPORT

In the old days (a custom laid aside With breeches and cocked hats) the people sent
Their wisest men to make the public laws.

And so, from a brown homestead, where the Sound

Drinks the small tribute of the Mianas, Waved over by the woods of Rippo-wams, 6

And hallowed by pure lives and tranquil deaths,
Stamford sent up to the councils of the State

Wisdom and grace in Abraham Davenport.

'Twas on a May-day of the far old
year 10
Seventeen hundred eighty, that there fell

Over the bloom and sweet life of the Spring,

Over the fresh earth and the heaven of
noon,

A horror of great darkness, like the
night

In day of which the Norland sagas tell,— 15

The Twilight of the Gods. The low-hung sky

Was black with ominous clouds, save where its rim

Was fringed with a dull glow, like that which climbs

The crater's sides from the red hell below.

Birds ceased to sing, and all the barnyard fowls 20
Roosted; the cattle at the pasture bars Low'd, and look'd homeward; bats on leathern wings
Flitted abroad; the sounds of labor
died;
Men prayed, and women wept; all ears grew sharp
To hear the doom-blast of the trumpet shatter 25
The black sky, that the dreadful face of Christ
Might look from the rent clouds, not as he look'd
A loving guest at Bethany, but stern
As Justice and inexorable Law.

Meanwhile in the old State House, dim as ghosts, 30
Sat the lawgivers of Connecticut, Trembling beneath their legislative robes.
"It is the Lord's Great Day! Let us adjourn,"
Some said; and then, as if with one accord,
All eyes were turned to Abraham
Davenport. 35
He rose, slow cleaving with his steady voice
The intolerable hush. "This well may
be
The Day of Judgment which the world awaits;
But be it so or not, I only know
My present duty, and my Lord's command 40
To occupy till He come. So at the post
Where He hath set me in His providence,
I choose, for one, to meet Him face to face,—
No faithless servant frightened from my task,
But ready when the Lord of the harvest calls; 45
And therefore, with all reverence, I would say,
Let God do His work, we will see to
ours.
Bring in the candles." And they brought them in.

Then by the flaring lights the Speaker read,
Albeit with husky voice and shaking hands, 50
An act to amend an act to regulate
The shad and alewife¹ fisheries.
Whereupon
Wisely and well spake Abraham
Davenport,
Straight to the question, with no figures of speech Save the ten Arab signs, yet not without 55
The shrewd dry humor natural to the
man:
His awe-struck colleagues listening all the while,
Between the pauses of his argument,
To hear the thunder of the wrath of
God Break from the hollow trumpet of the cloud. 60

And there he stands in memory to this day,
Erect, self-poised, a rugged face, half seen
Against the background of unnatural
dark,
A witness to the ages as they pass,
That simple duty hath no place for fear. 65

SUNSET ON THE BEARCAMP

A gold fringe on the purpling hem
Of hills the river runs,
As down its long, green valley falls
The last of summer's suns.
Along its tawny gravel-bed 5
Broad-flowing, swift, and still,
As if its meadow levels felt
The hurry of the hill,
Noiseless between its banks of green
From curve to curve it slips; 10
The drowsy maple-shadows rest
Like fingers on its lips.

A waif from Carroll's wildest hills,
Unstoried and unknown;
The ursine² legend of its name 15
Prowls on its banks alone.

¹ herring

² pertaining to a bear

Yet flowers as fair its slopes adorn
 As ever Yarrow knew,
 Or, under rainy Irish skies,
 By Spenser's Mulla grew; 20
 And through the gaps of leaning trees
 Its mountain cradle shows:
 The gold against the amethyst,
 The green against the rose.

Touched by a light that hath no name,
 A glory never sung, 26
 Aloft on sky and mountain wall
 Are God's great pictures hung.
 How changed the summits vast and old!
 No longer granite-browed, 30
 They melt in rosy mist; the rock
 Is softer than the cloud;
 The valley holds its breath; no leaf
 Of all its elms is twirled:
 The silence of eternity 35
 Seems falling on the world.

The pause before the breaking seals
 Of mystery is this;
 Yon miracle-play of night and day
 Makes dumb its witnesses. 40
 What unseen altar crowns the hills
 That reach up stair on stair?
 What eyes look through, what white wings fan
 These purple veils of air?
 What Presence from the heavenly heights 45
 To those of earth stoops down?
 Not vainly Hellas dreamed of gods
 On Ida's snowy crown!

Slow fades the vision of the sky,
 The golden water pales, 50
 And over all the valley-land
 A gray-winged vapor sails.
 I go the common way of all;
 The sunset fires will burn,
 The flowers will blow, the river flow, 55
 When I no more return.
 No whisper from the mountain pine
 Nor lapsing stream shall tell
 The stranger, treading where I tread,
 Of him who loved them well. 60

But beauty seen is never lost,
 God's colors all are fast;
 The glory of this sunset heaven
 Into my soul has passed,

A sense of gladness unconfined 65
 To mortal date or clime;
 As the soul liveth, it shall live
 Beyond the years of time.
 Beside the mystic asphodels
 Shall bloom the home-born flowers, 70
 And new horizons flush and glow
 With sunset hues of ours.

Farewell! these smiling hills must wear
 Too soon their wintry frown,
 And snow-cold winds from off them
 shake 75
 The maple's red leaves down.
 But I shall see a summer sun
 Still setting broad and low;
 The mountain slopes shall blush and
 bloom,
 The golden water flow. 80
 A lover's claim is mine on all
 I see to have and hold,—
 The rose-light of perpetual hills,
 And sunsets never cold!

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES (1809-1894)

From THE AUTOCRAT OF THE BREAKFAST TABLE

[CONVERSATION]

This business of conversation is a very serious matter. There are men whom it weakens one to talk with an hour more than a day's fasting would do. Mark this which I am going to say, for it is as good as a working professional man's advice, and costs you nothing: It is better to lose a pint of blood from your veins than to have a nerve tapped. Nobody measures your nervous force as it runs away, nor bandages your brain and marrow after the operation.

There are men of esprit who are excessively exhausting to some people. They are the talkers who have what may be called jerky minds. Their thoughts do not run in the natural order of sequence. They say bright things on all possible subjects, but their zigzags rack you to death. After as jolting half-hour with one of these jerky companions, talking with a dull friend affords great relief. It is like taking the cat in your lap after holding a squirrel.

[IMPROMPTUS]

What do you think of these verses, ¹⁰ my friends?—Is that piece an impromptu? said my landlady's daughter. (Act. 19+. Tender-eyed blonde. Long ringlets. Cameo pin. Gold pencil-case on a chain. Locket. Bracelet. Album. Autograph book. Accordeon. Reads Byron, Tupper, and Sylvanus Cobb, Junior, while her mother makes the puddings. Says "Yes?" when you tell her anything.) Oui et non, ma ²⁰ petite,—Yes and no, my child. Five of the seven verses were written off-hand; the other two took a week,—that is, were hanging round the desk in a ragged, forlorn, unrhymed condition as long as that. All poets will tell you just such stories. C'est le DERNIER pas qui coute. Don't you know how hard it is for some people to get out of a room after their visit is really over? They want to be off, and you want to have them off, but they don't know how to manage it. One would think they had been built in your parlor or study, and were waiting to be launched. I have contrived a sort of ceremonial inclined plane for such visitors, which being lubricated with certain smooth phrases, I back them down, metaphorically speaking, ⁴⁰ stern-foremost, into their "native element," the great ocean of out-doors. Well, now, there are poems as hard to get rid of as these rural visitors. They come in glibly, use up all the serviceable rhymes, day, ray, beauty, duty, skies, eyes, other, brother, mountain, fountain, and the like; and so they go on until you think it is time for the wind-up, and the wind-up won't ⁵⁰ come on any terms. So they lie about until you get sick of the sight of them, and end by thrusting some cold scrap of a final couplet upon them, and turning them out of doors. I suspect a good many "impromptus" could tell just such a story as the above.—Here turning to our landlady, I used an illustration which pleased the company much at the time, and has since been highly commended. "Madam," I said, "you can pour three gills and three quarters of honey from that pint jug, if it is full, in less than one minute; but, Madam, you could not empty that last quarter of a gill, though you were turned into a marble Hebe, and held the vessel upside down for a thousand years."

One gets tired to death of the old, old rhymes, such as you see in that copy of verses,—which I don't mean to abuse, or to praise either. I always feel as if I were a cobbler, putting new top-leathers to an old pair of boot-soles and bodies, when I am fitting sentiments to these venerable jingles.

.	youth
.	morning
.	truth
.	warning.

Nine tenths of the "Juvenile Poems" ³⁰ written spring out of the above musical and suggestive coincidences.

"Yes?" said our landlady's daughter.

I did not address the following remark to her, and I trust, from her limited range of reading, she will never see it; I said it softly to my next neighbor.

When a young female wears a flat circular side-curl, gummed on each temple,—when she walks with a male, not arm in arm, but his arm against the back of hers,—and when she says "Yes?" with the note of interrogation, you are generally safe in asking her what wages she gets, and who the "feller" was you saw her with.

"What were you whispering?" said the daughter of the house, moistening her lips, as she spoke, in a very engaging manner.

"I was only laying down a principle of social diagnosis."

"Yes?"

[A LITTLE POEM]

Here is a little poem I sent a short time since to a committee for a certain celebration. I understood that it was to be a festive and convivial occasion, and ordered myself accordingly. It seems the president of the day was what is called a "teetotaller." I received a note from him in the following words, containing the copy subjoined, with the emendations annexed to it.

"Dear Sir,—your poem gives good satisfaction to the committee. The sentiments expressed with reference to liquor are not, however, those generally entertained by this community. I have therefore consulted the clergyman of this place, who has made some slight changes, which he thinks will remove all objections, and keep the valuable portions of the poem. Please to inform me of your charge for said poem. Our means are limited, etc., etc., etc.

"Yours with respect."

Here it is,—with the slight alterations.

Come! fill a fresh bumper,—for why should we go

While the nectar still reddens our cups as they flow!

Pour out the rich juices still bright with the sun,

Till o'er the brimmed crystal the rubies shall run.

The purple glebed clusters their life-dews have bled;

How sweet is the breath of the fragrance they shed!

For summer's last roses lie hid in the wines

That were garnered by maidens who laughed through the vines.

Then a smile, and a glass, and a toast, and a cheer,

strychnine and whiskey, and ratsbane and beer
For all the good wine, and we've some of it here
In cellar, in pantry, in attic, in hall,
Down, down, with the tyrant that masters us all!
Long live the gay servant that laughs for us all!

The company said I had been shabbily treated, and advised me to charge the committee double,—which I did. But as I never got my pay, I don't know that it made much difference.

[COMMENCEMENT DAY]

"Commencement day" always reminds me of the start for the "Derby," when the beautiful high-bred three-year-olds of the season are brought up for trial. That day is the start, and life is the race. Here we are at Cambridge, and a class is just "graduating." Poor Harry! he was to have been there too, but he has paid forfeit; step out here into the grass behind the church; ah! there it is:—

"HUNC LAPIDEM POSUERUNT SOCII MERENTES."

But this is the start, and here they are,—coats bright as silk, and manes as smooth as eau lustrale can make them. Some of the best of the colts are pranced round, a few minutes each, to show their paces. What is that old gentleman crying about? and the old lady by him, and the three girls, what are they all covering their eyes for? Oh, that is their colt which has just been trotted up on the stage. Do they really think those little thin legs can do anything in such a slashing sweepstakes as is coming off in these next forty years? Oh, this terrible gift of second-sight that comes to some of us when we begin to look through the silvered rings of the arcus senilis!

Ten years gone. First turn in the race. A few broken down; two or three bolted. Several show in advance of the ruck. Cassock, a black colt, seems to be ahead of the rest; those black colts commonly get the start, I have noticed, of the others, in the first quarter. Meteor has pulled up.

Twenty years. Second corner turned. Cassock has dropped from the front, and Judex, an iron-gray, has the lead. But look! how they have thinned out! Down flat,—five,—six,—how many? They lie still enough! they will not get up again in this race, be very sure! And the rest of them, what a “tailing off”! Anybody can see who is going to win,—perhaps.

Thirty years. Third corner turned. Dives, bright sorrel, ridden by the fellow in a yellow jacket, begins to make play fast; is getting to be the favorite with many. But who is that other one that has been lengthening his stride from the first, and now shows close up to the front? Don't you remember the quiet brown colt Asteroid, with the star in his forehead? That is he; he is one of the sort that lasts; look out for him. The black “colt,” as we used to call him, is in the background, taking it easily in a gentle trot. There is one they used to call the Filly, on account of a certain feminine air he had; well up, you see; the Filly is not to be despised, my boy!

Forty years. More dropping off,—but places much as before.

Fifty years. Race over. All that are on the course are coming in at a walk; no more running. Who is ahead? Ahead? What! and the winning-post a slab of white or gray stone standing out from that turf where there is no more jockeying or straining for victory! Well, the world marks their places in its betting-book; but be sure that these matter very little, if they have run as well as they knew how!

[A LYRIC CONCEPTION]

A lyric conception—my friend, the Poet, said—hits me like a bullet in the forehead. I have often had the blood drop from my cheeks when it struck, and felt that I turned as white as death. Then comes a creeping as of centipedes running down the spine,—then a gasp and a great jump of the heart,—then a sudden flush and a beating in the vessels of the head,—then a long sigh,—and the poem is written.

It is an impromptu, I suppose, then, if you write it so suddenly,—I replied.

No,—said he,—far from it. I said written, but I did not say copied. Every such poem has a soul and a body, and it is the body of it, or the copy, that men read and publishers pay for. The soul of it is born in an instant in the poet's soul. It comes to him a thought, tangled in the meshes of a few sweet words,—words that have loved each other from the cradle of the language, but have never been wedded until now. Whether it will ever fully embody itself in a bridal train of a dozen stanzas or not is uncertain; but it exists potentially from the instant that the poet turns pale with it. It is enough to stun and scare anybody, to have a hot thought come crashing into his brain, and ploughing up those parallel ruts where the wagon trains of common ideas were jogging along in their regular sequences of association. No wonder the ancient made the poetical impulse wholly external. Μῆνιν ἄειδε Θεά. Goddess,—Muse,—divine afflatus,—something outside always. I never wrote any verses worth reading. I can't. I am too stupid. If I ever copied any that were worth reading, I was only a medium.

(I was talking all this time to our boarders, you understand,—telling them what this poet told me. The company listened rather attentively, I thought, considering the literary character of the remarks.)

The old gentleman opposite all at once asked me if I ever read anything better than Pope's Essay on Man? Had I ever perused McFingal? He was fond of poetry when he was a boy,—his mother taught him to say many little pieces,—he remembered one beautiful hymn;—and the old gentleman began, in a clear, loud voice for his years,—

The spacious firmament on high,
With all the blue ethereal sky,
And spangled heavens,—

He stopped, as if startled by our silence, and a faint flush ran up beneath the thin white hairs that fell upon his cheek. As I looked round, I was reminded of a show I once saw at the Museum,—the Sleeping Beauty, I think they called it. The old man's sudden breaking out in this way turned every face towards him, and each kept his posture as if changed to stone. 10 Our Celtic Bridget, or Biddy, is not a foolish fat scullion to burst out crying for a sentiment. She is of the serviceable, red-handed, broad-and-high-shouldered type; one of those imported female servants who are known in public by their amorphous style of person, their stoop forwards, and a headlong and as it were precipitous walk,—the waist plunging downwards into the rocking pelvis at every heavy footfall. 20 Bridget, constituted for action, not for emotion, was about to deposit a plate heaped with something upon the table, when I saw the coarse arm stretched by my shoulder arrested,—motionless as the arm of a terra-cotta caryatid; she couldn't set the plate down while the old gentleman was speaking!

He was quite silent after this, still wearing the slight flush on his cheek. Don't ever think the poetry is dead in an old man because his forehead is wrinkled, or that his manhood has left him when his hand trembles! If they ever were there, they are there still!

By and by we got talking again.—Does a poet love the verses written 40 through him, do you think, Sir?—said the divinity-student.

So long as they are warm from his mind,—carry any of his animal heat about them, I know he loves them,—I answered. When they have had time to cool, he is more indifferent.

A good deal as it is with buckwheat cakes,—said the young fellow whom they call John.

The last words, only, reached the ear of the economically organized female in black bombazine.—Buckwheat is skerce and high,—she remarked. (Must be a poor relation sponging on our landlady—pays nothing,—so she must stand by the guns and be ready to repel boarders.)

I liked the turn the conversation had taken, for I had some things I wanted to say, and so, after waiting a minute, I began again.—I don't think the poems I read you sometimes can be fairly appreciated, given to you as they are in the green state.

—You don't know what I mean by the green state? Well, then, I will tell you. Certain things are good for nothing until they have been kept a long while; and some are good for nothing until they have been long kept and used. Of the first, wine is the illustrious and immortal example. Of those 20 which must be kept and used I will name three,—meerschaum pipes, violins, and poems. The meerschaum is but a poor affair until it has burned a thousand offerings to the cloud-compelling deities. It comes to us without complexion or flavor,—born of the sea-foam, like Aphrodite, but colorless as *pallida Mors*¹ herself. The fire is lighted in its central shrine, and 30 gradually the juices which the broad leaves of the Great Vegetable had sucked up from an acre and curdled into a drachm are diffused through its thirsting pores. First a discoloration, then a stain, and at last a rich, glowing, umber tint spreading over the whole surface. Nature true to her old brown autumnal hue, you see,—as true in the fire of the meerschaum as in the sunshine of October! And then the cumulative wealth of its fragrant reminiscences! he who inhales its vapors takes a thousand whiffs in a single breath; and one cannot touch it without awakening the old joys that hang around it as the smell of flowers clings to the dresses of the daughters of the house of Farina!

(Don't think I use a meerschaum 50 myself, for I do not, though I have owned a calumet since my childhood, which from a naked Pict, of the Mohawk species, my grandsire won, together with a tomahawk and beaded knife-sheath; paying for the lot with a bullet-mark on his right cheek. On the maternal side I inherit the loveliest silver-mounted tobacco-stopper you ever saw. It is a little box-wood Triton, carved with charming liveliness and truth. I have often compared it to a figure in Raphael's "Triumph of Galatea." It came to me in an ancient shagreen case,—how old it is I do not know,—but it must have been made since Sir Walter Raleigh's time. If you are curious, you shall see it any day. Neither will I pretend that I am so unused to the more perishable smoking contrivance that a few whiffs would make me feel as if I lay in a ground-swell on the Bay of Biscay. I am not unacquainted with that fusiform spiral-wound bundle of chopped stems and miscellaneous incombustibles, the cigar, so called, of the shops,—which to "draw" asks the suction-power of a nursling infant Hercules, and to relish, the leathery palate of an old Silenus. I do not advise you, young man, even if my illustration strike your fancy, to consecrate the flower of your life to painting the bowl of a pipe, for, let me assure you, the stain of a reverie-breeding narcotic may strike deeper than you think for. I have seen the green leaf of early promise grow brown before its time under such Nicotian regimen, and thought the umbered meerschaum was dearly bought at the cost of a brain enfeebled and a will enslaved.)

Violins, too,—the sweet old Amati! —the divine Stradivarius! Played on by ancient *maestros*¹ until the bow-hand lost its power and the flying fingers stiffened. Bequeathed to the passionate young enthusiast, who made it whisper his hidden love, and cry his inarticulate longings, and scream his untold agonies, and wail his monotonous despair. Passed from his dying hand to the cold virtuoso,² who let it slumber in its case for a generation, till, when his hoard was broken up, it came forth once more and rode the stormy symphonies of royal orchestras, beneath the rushing bow of their lord and leader. Into lonely prisons with improvident artists; into convents from which arose, day and night, the holy hymns with which its tones were blended; and back again to orgies in which it learned to howl and laugh as if a legion of devils were shut up in it; then again to the gentle dilettante who calmed it down with easy melodies until it answered him softly as in the days of the old maestros. And so given into our hands, its pores all full of music; stained, like the meerschaum, through and through, with the concentrated hue and sweetness of all the harmonies which have kindled and faded on its strings.

Now I tell you a poem must be kept and used, like a meerschaum, or a violin. A poem is just as porous as the meerschaum;—the more porous it is, the better. I mean to say that a genuine poem is capable of absorbing an indefinite amount of the essence of our own humanity,—its tenderness, its heroism, its regrets, its aspirations, so as to be gradually stained through with a divine secondary color derived from ourselves. So you see it must take time to bring the sentiment of a poem into harmony with our nature, by staining ourselves through every thought and image our being can penetrate.

[THE HYDROSTATIC PARADOX]

If a fellow attacked my opinions in print would I reply? Not I. Do you think I don't understand what my friend, the Professor, long ago called the hydrostatic paradox of controversy?

Don't know what that means?—Well, I will tell you. You know, that, if you had a bent tube, one arm of which was of the size of a pipe-stem, and the other big enough to hold the ocean, water would stand at the same height in one as in the other. Controversy equalizes fools and wise men in the same way,—and the fools know it.

OLD IRONSIDES

Ay, tear her tattered ensign down!
 Long has it waved on high,
 And many an eye has danced to see
 That banner in the sky;
 Beneath it rung the battle shout, 5
 And burst the cannon's roar;—
 The meteor of the ocean air Shall sweep the clouds no more.

Her deck, once red with heroes' blood,
 Where knelt the vanquished foe, 10
 When winds were hurrying o'er the flood,
 And waves were white below,
 No more shall feel the victor's tread,
 Or know the conquered knee;—
 The harpies of the shores shall pluck 15
 The eagle of the sea!

Oh, better that her shattered hulk
 Should sink beneath the wave;
 Her thunders shook the mighty deep, 20
 And there should be her grave;
 Nail to the mast her holy flag,
 Set every threadbare sail,
 And give her to the god of storms,
 The lightning and the gale!

MY AUNT

My aunt! my dear unmarried aunt!
 Long years have o'er her flown;
 Yet still she strains the aching clasp
 That binds her virgin zone;¹
 I know it hurts her,—though she looks 6
 As cheerful as she can;
 Her waist is ampler than her life,
 For life is but a span.

My aunt! my poor deluded aunt!
 Her hair is almost gray; 10
 Why will she train that winter curl
 In such a spring-like way?
 How can she lay her glasses down,
 And say she reads as well,
 When, through a double convex lens, 15
 She just makes out to spell?

Her father—grandpapa! forgive
 This erring lip its smiles—

¹ girdle

Vowed she should make the finest girl
 Within a hundred miles; 20
 He sent her to a stylish school;
 'Twas in her thirteenth June;
 And with her, as the rules required,
 "Two towels and a spoon."

They braced my aunt against a board,
 To make her straight and tall; 26
 They laced her up, they starved her
 down,
 To make her light and small;
 They pinched her feet, they singed her
 hair,
 They screwed it up with pins;— 30
 Oh, never mortal suffered more
 In penance for her sins.

So, when my precious aunt was done,
 My grandsire brought her back;
 (By daylight, lest some rabid youth 35 Might follow on the track;)
 "Ah!" said my grandsire, as he shook
 Some powder in his pan,
 "What could this lovely creature do Against a desperate man!" 40

Alas! nor chariot, nor barouche,
 Nor bandit cavalcade,
 Tore from the trembling father's arms
 His all-accomplished maid.
 For her how happy had it been! 45
 And Heaven had spared to me
 To see one sad, ungathered rose
 On my ancestral tree.

THE LAST LEAF

I saw him once before,
 As he passed by the door,
 And again
 The pavement stones resound
 As he totters o'er the ground 5
 With his cane.

They say that in his prime,
 Ere the pruning-knife of Time
 Cut him down,
 Not a better man was found 10
 By the Crier on his round
 Through the town.

But now he walks the streets,
 And he looks at all he meets Sad and wan, 15

And he shakes his feeble head,
That it seems as if he said,
"They are gone."

The mossy marbles rest
On the lips that he has prest 20
In their bloom,
And the names he loved to hear
Have been carved for many a year
On the tomb.

My grandmamma has said— 25
Poor old lady, she is dead
Long ago—
That he had a Roman nose,
And his cheek was like a rose
In the snow. 30

But now his nose is thin,
And it rests upon his chin
Like a staff,
And a crook is in his back,
And a melancholy crack 35
In his laugh.

I know it is a sin
For me to sit and grin
At him here;
But the old three-cornered hat, 40
And the breeches, and all that,
Are so queer!

And if I should live to be
The last leaf upon the tree
In the spring, 45
Let them smile, as I do now,
At the old forsaken bough
Where I cling.

LEXINGTON

Slowly the mist o'er the meadow was creeping,
Bright on the dewy buds glistened the
sun,
When from his couch, while his children were sleeping,
Rose the bold rebel and shouldered his gun.
Waving her golden veil 5
Over the silent dale,
Blithe looked the morning on cottage
and spire;

Hushed was his parting sigh,
While from his noble eye
Flashed the last sparkle of liberty's
fire. 10

On the smooth green where the fresh leaf is springing Calmly the first-born of glory have met;
Hark! the death-volley around them is ringing!
Look! with their life-blood the young grass is wet!
Faint is the feeble breath, 15
Murmuring low in death,
"Tell to our sons how their fathers have died;"
Nerveless the iron hand,
Raised for its native land, Lies by the weapon that gleams at its
side. 20

Over the hillsides the wild knell is toll-
ing,
From their far hamlets the yeomanry
come;
As through the storm-clouds the thunder-burst rolling,
Circles the beat of the mustering drum.
Fast on the soldier's path 25
Darken the waves of wrath,— Long have they gathered and loud shall they fall;
Red glares the musket's flash,
Sharp rings the rifle's crash, Blazing and clanging from thicket and
wall. 30

Gayly the plume of the horseman was dancing,
Never to shadow his cold brow again;
Proudly at morning the war-steed was prancing, Reeking and panting he droops on the rein;
Pale is the lip of scorn, 35
Voiceless the trumpet horn, Torn is the silken-fringed red cross on
high;
Many a belted breast
Low on the turf shall rest Ere the dark hunters the herd have passed by. 40

Snow-girdled crags where the hoarse
 wind is raving,
 Rocks where the weary floods murmur and wail,
 Wilds where the fern by the furrow is waving,
 Reeled with the echoes that rode on the gale;
 Far as the tempest thrills 45
 Over the darkened hills, Far as the sunshine streams over the
 plain,
 Roused by the tyrant band,
 Woke all the mighty land, Girded for battle, from mountain to main. 50
 Green be the graves where her martyrs are lying!
 Shroudless and tombless they sunk to their rest,
 While o'er their ashes the starry fold flying Wraps the proud eagle they roused from his nest.
 Borne on her Northern pine, 55
 Long o'er the foaming brine Spread her broad banner to storm and to sun;
 Heaven keep her ever free,
 Wide as o'er land and sea Floats the fair emblem her heroes have won! 60

NON-RESISTANCE

Perhaps too far in these considerate
 days
 Has patience carried her submissive
 ways;
 Wisdom has taught us to be calm and meek,
 To take one blow, and turn the other
 cheek;
 It is not written what a man shall do 5
 If the rude caitiff smite the other too!
 Land of our fathers, in thine hour of need
 God help thee, guarded by the passive creed!
 As the lone pilgrim trusts to beads and cowl,
 When through the forest rings the gray
 wolf's howl; 10

As the deep galleon trusts her gilded prow
 When the black corsair slants athwart
 her bow;
 As the poor pheasant, with his peaceful mien,
 Trusts to his feathers, shining golden-
 green,
 When the dark plumage with the crimson beak 15
 Has rustled shadowy from its splintered peak,—
 So trust thy friends, whose babbling tongues would charm
 The lifted saber from thy foe's arm,
 Thy torches ready for the answering peal
 From bellowing fort and thunderfreighted keel! 20

THE CHAMBERED NAUTILUS

This is the ship of pearl, which, poets feign,
 Sails the unshadowed main,—
 The venturous bark that flings
 On the sweet summer wind its purpled
 wings
 In gulfs enchanted, where the siren
 sings, 5
 And coral reefs lie bare,
 Where the cold sea-maids rise to sun their streaming hair.

Its webs of living gauze no more un-furl;
 Wrecked is the ship of pearl!
 And every chambered cell 10
 Where its dim dreaming life was wont to dwell,
 As the frail tenant shaped his growing
 shell,
 Before thee lies revealed,—
 Its irised ceiling rent, its sunless crypt unsealed!

Year after year beheld the silent toil 15
 That spread his lustrous coil;
 Still, as the spiral grew,
 He left the past year's dwelling for the new,
 Stole with soft steps its shining archway through,

Built up its idle door, 20 Stretched in his last-found home, and knew the old no more.

Thanks for the heavenly message brought by thee,
Child of the wandering sea,
Cast from her lap forlorn!
From thy dead lip a clearer note is born 25
Than ever Triton blew from wreathèd horn!

While on mine ear it rings
Through the deep caves of thought I hear a voice that sings:—

Build thee more stately mansions, O
my soul,
As the swift seasons roll! 30
Leave thy low-vaulted past!
Let each, new temple, nobler than the
last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea! 35

THE LIVING TEMPLE

Not in the world of light alone,
Where God has built his blazing throne,
Nor yet alone in earth below,
With belted seas that come and go,
And endless isles of sunlit green, 5
Is all thy Maker's glory seen:
Look in upon thy wondrous frame,—
Eternal wisdom still the same!

The smooth, soft air with pulse-like waves
Flows murmuring through its hidden caves, 10
Whose streams of brightening purple rush,
Fired with a new and livelier blush.
While all their burden of decay
The ebbing current steals away, 14
And red with Nature's flame they start
From the warm fountains of the heart.

No rest that throbbing slave may ask,
Forever quivering o'er his task,
While far and wide a crimson jet Leaps forth to fill the woven net 20

Which in unnumbered crossing tides
The flood of burning life divides,
Then, kindling each decaying part,
Creeps back to find the throbbing heart.

But warmed with that unchanging flame 25
Behold the outward moving frame,
Its living marbles jointed strong
With glistening band and silvery thong,
And linked to reason's guiding reins
By myriad rings in trembling chains, 30
Each graven with the threaded zone
Which claims it as the master's own.

See how yon beam of seeming white
Is braided out of seven-hued light,
Yet in those lucid globes no ray 35
By any chance shall break astray.
Hark how the rolling surge of sound,
Arches and spirals circling round,
Wakes the hushed spirit through thine
ear
With music it is heaven to hear. 40

Then mark the cloven sphere that holds
All thought in its mysterious folds;
That feels sensation's faintest thrill,
And flashes forth the sovereign will; 44
Think on the stormy world that dwells
Locked in its dim and clustering cells!
The lightning gleams of power it sheds
Along its hollow glassy threads!

O Father! grant thy love divine
To make these mystic temples thine! 50
When wasting age and wearying strife
Have sapped the leaning walls of life,
When darkness gathers over all,
And the last tottering pillars fall,
Take the poor dust thy mercy warms, 55
And mold it into heavenly forms!

THE DEACON'S MASTERPIECE

OR, THE WONDERFUL "ONE-HOSS-SHAY"

A LOGICAL STORY

Have you heard of the wonderful onehoss-shay,
That was built in such a logical way

It ran a hundred years to a day,
And then, of a sudden, it—ah, but stay,
I'll tell you what happened without delay, 5
Scaring the parson into fits,
Frightening people out of their wits,—
Have you ever heard of that, I say?

Seventeen hundred and fifty-five.
Georgius Secundus was then alive,— 10
Snuffy old drone from the German hive!
That was the year when Lisbon-town
Saw the earth open and gulp her down,
And Braddock's army was done so
brown,
Left without a scalp to its crown. 15
It was on the terrible Earthquake-day
That the Deacon finished the one-hoss-
shay.

Now in building of chaises, I tell you what,
There is always somewhere a weakest spot,—
In hub, tire, felloe, in spring or thill, 20
In panel, or crossbar, or floor, or sill,
In screw, bolt, thoroughbrace,—lurking
still,
Find it somewhere you must and will,— Above or below, or within or without,—
And that's the reason, beyond a doubt, 25
That a chaise breaks down, but doesn't wear out.

But the Deacon swore (as Deacons do,
With an "I dew vum," or an "I tell yeou,")
He would build one shay to beat the taown
'N' the keounty 'n' all the kentry
raoun'; 30
It should be so built that it couldn't break daown:
—"Fur," said the Deacon, "'t's mighty
plain Thut the weakes' place mus' stan' the strain;
'N' the way t' fix it, uz I maintain,
Is only jest 35
T' make that place uz strong uz the
rest."

So the Deacon inquired of the village folk
Where he could find the strongest oak,
That couldn't be split nor bent nor broke,—
That was for spokes and floor and sills; 40
He sent for lancewood to make the thills;
The crossbars were ash, from the straightest trees;
The panels of white-wood, that cuts like cheese,
But lasts like iron for things like these;
The hubs of logs from the "Settler's ellum,"— 45
Last of its timber,—they couldn't sell
'em,
Never an axe had seen their chips,
And the wedges flew from between their lips,
Their blunt ends frizzled like celery-
tips;
Step and prop-iron, bolt and screw, 50
Spring, tire, axle, and linchpin too,
Steel of the finest, bright and blue; Thoroughbrace bison-skin, thick and wide;
Boot, top, dasher, from tough old hide
Found in the pit when the tanner died.
That was the way he "put her
through." 56
"There!" said the Deacon, "naow she'll dew!"

Do! I tell you, I rather guess
She was a wonder, and nothing less!
Colts grew horses, beards turned
gray, 60
Deacon and deaconess dropped away, Children and grandchildren—where were they?
But there stood the stout old one-hoss-
shay
As fresh as on Lisbon-earthquake-day!

EIGHTEEN HUNDRED;—it came and found 65
The Deacon's masterpiece strong and
sound.
Eighteen hundred increased by ten;—
"Hahnsum kerridge" they called it
then.

Eighteen hundred and twenty came;— Running as usual; much the same. 70
 Thirty and forty at last arrive,
 And then come fifty, and FIFTY-FIVE.

Little of all we value here
 Wakes on the morn of its hundredth
 year
 Without both feeling and looking queer.
 In fact, there's nothing that keeps its youth, 76
 So far as I know, but a tree and truth.
 (This is a moral that runs at large;
 Take it.—You're welcome.—No extra charge.)

FIRST OF NOVEMBER,—the Earthquake-
 day.— 80

There are traces of age in the one-hoss-
 shay,
 A general flavor of mild decay,
 But nothing local, as one may say.
 There couldn't be,—for the Deacon's
 art

Had made it so like in every part 85
 That there wasn't a chance for one to start.

For the wheels were just as strong as the thills,

And the floor was just as strong as the
 sills,

And the panels just as strong as the
 floor,

And the whipple-tree neither less nor
 more, 90

And the back crossbar as strong as the fore,

And spring and axle and hub encore.

And yet, as a whole, it is past a doubt
 In another hour it will be worn out!

First of November, 'Fifty-five! 95

This morning the parson takes a drive.
 Now, small boys, get out of the way!
 Here comes the wonderful one-horse-
 shay,

Drawn by a rat-tailed, ewe-necked bay.
 "Huddup!" said the parson.—Off went they. 100

The parson was working his Sunday's text,—

Had got to fifthly, and stopped perplexed

At what the—Moses—was coming next.
 All at once the horse stood still,
 Close by the meet'n'-house on the hill.
 First a shiver, and then a thrill, 106
 Then something decidedly like a spill,—
 And the parson was sitting upon a rock,
 At half-past nine by the meet'n'-house clock,—

Just the hour of the Earthquake shock!
 What do you think the parson
 found, 111

When he got up and stared around?
 The poor old chaise in a heap or mound,
 As if it had been to the mill and ground!
 You see, of couse, if you're not a dunce, 115

How it went to pieces all at once,—
 All at once and nothing first,—
 Just as bubbles do when they burst.

End of the wonderful one-hoss-shay.
 Logic is logic. That's all I say. 120

CONTENTMENT

"Man wants but little here below."

Little I ask; my wants are few;
 I only wish a hut of stone,
 (A very plain brown stone will do,) 5
 That I may call my own;—
 And close at hand is such a one, 5
 In yonder street that fronts the sun.

Plain food is quite enough for me;
 Three courses are as good as ten;—
 If Nature can subsist on three,
 Thank Heaven for three. Amen!
 I always thought cold victual nice;— 11
 My choice would be vanilla-ice.

I care not much for gold or land;—
 Give me a mortgage here and there,—
 Some good bank-stock,—some note of
 hand, 15

Or trifling railroad share;—
 I only ask that Fortune send A little more than I shall spend.

Honors are silly toys, I know,
 And titles are but empty names;— 20
 I would, perhaps, be Plenipo,—
 But only near St. James;—
 I'm very sure I should not care
 To fill our Gubernator's chair.

Jewels are baubles; 'tis a sin 25
 To care for such unfruitful things;—
 One good-sized diamond in a pin,—
 Some, not so large, in rings,—
 A ruby and a pearl, or so,
 Will do for me;—I laugh at show. 30

My dame should dress in cheap attire;
 (Good, heavy silks are never dear;)
 I own perhaps I might desire
 Some shawls of true cashmere,—
 Some marrowy crapes of China silk 35
 Like wrinkled skins on scalded milk.

I would not have the horse I drive
 So fast that folks must stop and stare;
 An easy gait—two forty-five—
 Suits me; I do not care;— 40
 Perhaps, for just a single spurt,
 Some seconds less would do no hurt.

Of pictures, I should like to own Titians and Raphaels three or four.—
 I love so much their style and tone,— 45
 One Turner, and no more,—
 (A landscape,—foreground golden dirt,
 The sunshine painted with a squirt.)

Of books but few,—some fifty score
 For daily use, and bound for wear; 50
 The rest upon an upper floor;—
 Some little luxury there
 Of red morocco's gilded gleam,
 And vellum rich as country cream.

Busts, cameos, gems,—such things as these, 55
 Which others often show for pride,
 I value, for their power to please,
 And selfish churls deride;—
 One Stradivarius, I confess,
 Two Meerschauts, I would fain possess. 60

Wealth's wasteful tricks I will not learn,
 Nor ape the glittering upstart fool;—
 Shall not carved tables serve my turn,
 But all must be of buhl? ¹
 Give grasping pomp its double share,—
 I ask but one recumbent chair. 65
¹ inlaid work

Thus humble let me live and die,
 Nor long for Midas' golden touch;
 If Heaven more generous gifts deny,
 I shall not miss them much.— 70
 Too grateful for the blessing lent
 Of simple tastes and mind content!

THE BOYS

Has there any old fellow got mixed with the boys?
 If there has, take him out, without making a noise.
 Hang the Almanac's cheat and the Catalogue's spite!
 Old Time is a liar! We're twenty to-
 night!

We're twenty! We're twenty! Who says we are more? 5
 He's tipsy,—young jackanapes!—show him the door!
 "Gray temples at twenty?"—Yes!
 white, if we please;
 Where the snow-flakes fall thickest
 there's nothing can freeze!

Was it snowing I spoke of? Excuse the mistake!
 Look close,—you will see not a sign of a flake; 10
 We want some new garlands for those we have shed,—
 And these are white roses in place of the red!

We've a trick, we young fellows, you may have been told,
 Of talking (in public) as if we were
 old:—
 That boy we call "Doctor," and this we call "Judge"; 15
 It's a neat little fiction,—of course it's all fudge.

That fellow's the "Speaker,"—the one on the right;
 "Mr. Mayor," my young one, how are you tonight?
 That's our "Member of Congress," we say when we chaff;
 There's the "Reverend" What's his name?—don't make me laugh. 20

That boy with the grave mathematical look
Made believe he had written a wonderful book,
And the ROYAL SOCIETY thought it was true!
So they chose him right in; a good joke
it was, too!

There's a boy, we pretend, with a three-decker-brain, 25
That could harness a team with a logical chain;
When he spoke for our manhood in syllabled fire,
We called him "The Justice," but now
he's "The Squire."

And there's a nice youngster of excellent pith,— Fate tried to conceal him by naming him Smith; 30
But he shouted a song for the brave and the free,—
Just read on his medal, "My country, of thee!"

You hear that boy laughing?—You think he's all fun;
But the angels laugh, too, at the good
he has done;
The children laugh loud as they troop to his call, 35
And the poor man that knows him laughs loudest of all!

Yes, we're boys,—always playing with tongue or with pen,—
And I sometimes have asked,—Shall we ever be men?
Shall we always be youthful and laughing and gay,
Till the last dear companion drops
smiling away? 40

Then here's to our boyhood, its gold and its gray!
The stars of its winter, the dews of its
May!
And when we have done with our life-
lasting toys,
Dear Father, take care of thy children,
THE BOYS!

A HYMN OF TRUST

O Love Divine, that stooped to share
Our sharpest pang, our bitterest tear,
On Thee we cast each earth-born care,
We smile at pain when Thou art near.

Though long the weary way we tread, 5
And sorrow crown each lingering
year,
No path we shun, no darkness dread,
Our hearts still whispering, Thou art
near!

When drooping pleasure turns to grief,
And trembling faith is changed to fear, 10
The murmuring wind, the quivering leaf Shall softly tell us, Thou art near!

On Thee we fling our burdening woe,
O Love Divine, forever dear, 15
Content to suffer while we know,
Living and dying, Thou art near!

A SUN-DAY HYMN

Lord of all being! throned afar,
Thy glory flames from sun to star;
Centre and soul of every sphere,
Yet to each loving heart how near!

Sun of our life, thy quickening ray 5
Sheds on our path the glow of day;
Star of our hope, thy softened light
Cheers the longatches of the night.

Our midnight is thy smile withdrawn;
Our noontide is thy gracious dawn; 10
Our rainbow arch thy mercy's sign;
All, save the clouds of sin, are thine!

Lord of all life, below, above, Whose light is truth, whose warmth is love, 15
Before thy ever-blazing throne
We ask no lustre of our own.

Grant us thy truth to make us free,
And kindling hearts that burn for thee,
Till all thy living altars claim
One holy light, one heavenly flame! 20

BROTHER JONATHAN'S LAMENT FOR SISTER CAROLINE

MARCH 25, 1861

She has gone,—she has left us in passion and pride,—

Our stormy-browed sister, so long at our side!

She has torn her own star from our firmament's glow,

And turned on her brother the face of a foe!

Oh, Caroline, Caroline, child of the sun,

We can never forget that our hearts have been one,—

Our foreheads both sprinkled in Liberty's name,

From the fountain of blood with the finger of flame!

You were always too ready to fire at a touch;

But we said, "She is hasty,—she does not mean much."

We have scowled, when you uttered some turbulent threat;

But Friendship still whispered, "Forgive and forget!"

Has our love all died out? Have its altars grown cold?

Has the curse come at last which the fathers foretold?

Then Nature must teach us the strength of the chain

That her petulant children would sever in vain.

They may fight till the buzzards are gorged with their spoil,

Till the harvest grows black as it rots in the soil,

Till the wolves and the catamounts troop from their caves,

And the shark tracks the pirate, the lord of the waves:

In vain is the strife! When its fury is past,

Their fortunes must flow in one channel at last,

As the torrents that rush from the mountains of snow

Roll mingled in peace through the valleys below.

Our Union is river, lake, ocean, and sky:

Man breaks not the medal, when God cuts the die!

Though darkened with sulphur, though cloven with steel,

The blue arch will brighten, the waters will heal!

Oh, Caroline, Caroline, child of the sun,

There are battles with Fate that can never be won!

The star-flowing banner must never be furled,

For its blossoms of light are the hope of the world!

Go, then, our rash sister! afar and aloof,

Run wild in the sunshine away from our roof;

But when your heart aches and your feet have grown sore,

Remember the pathway that leads to our door!

NEARING THE SNOW-LINE

Slow toiling upward from the misty vale,

I leave the bright enamelled zones below;

No more for me their beauteous bloom shall glow,

Their lingering sweetness load the morning gale;

Few are the slender flowerets, scentless, pale,

That on their ice-clad stems all trembling blow

Along the margin of unmelting snow;

Yet with unsaddened voice thy verge I hail,

White realm of peace above the flowering line;

Welcome thy frozen domes, thy rocky spires!

O'er thee undimmed the moon-girt planets shine,
On thy majestic altars fade the fires
That filled the air with smoke of vain
desires,
And all the unclouded blue of heaven is thine!

HOW THE OLD HORSE WON THE BET

Dedicated by a contributor to the Collegian, 1830, to the editors of the Harvard Advocate, 1876

'T was on the famous trotting-ground,
The betting men were gathered round
From far and near; the "cracks" were
there

Whose deeds the sporting prints declare:

The swift g. m., Old Hiram's nag, 5
The fleet s. h., Dan Pfeiffer's brag,
With these a third—and who is he
That stands beside his fast b. g.?
Budd Doble, whose catarrhal name
So fills the nasal trump of fame. 10
There too stood many a noted steed
Of Messenger and Morgan breed;
Green horses also, not a few;
Unknown as yet what they could do;
And all the hacks that know so well 15
The scourgings of the Sunday swell.

Blue are the skies of opening day;
The bordering turf is green with May;
The sunshine's golden gleam is thrown
On sorrel, chestnut, bay, and roan; 20
The horses paw and prance and neigh,
Fillies and colts like kittens play,
And dance and toss their rippled manes
Shining and soft as silken skeins;
Wagons and gigs are ranged about, 25
And fashion flaunts her gay turn-out;
Here stands—each youthful Jehu's
dream—

The jointed tandem, ticklish team!
And there in ampler breadth expand
The splendors of the four-in-hand; 30
On faultless ties and glossy tiles
The lovely bonnets beam their smiles;
(The style's the man, so books avow;
The style's the woman, anyhow);
From flounces frothed with creamy lace 35

Peeps out the pug-dog's smutty face,
Or spaniel rolls his liquid eye,
Or stares the wiry pet of Skye,—
O woman, in your hours of ease
So shy with us, so free with these! 40

"Come on! I'll bet you two to one I'll make him do it!" "Will you?
Done!"

What was it who was bound to do?
I did not hear and can't tell you,—
Pray listen till my story's through. 45
Scarce noticed, back behind the rest,
By cart and wagon rudely prest,
The parson's lean and bony bay
Stood harnessed in his one-horse shay—
Lent to his sexton for the day; 50
(A funeral—so the sexton said;
His mother's uncle's wife was dead).

Like Lazarus bid to Dives' feast,
So looked the poor forlorn old beast;
His coat was rough, his tail was bare, 55
The gray was sprinkled in his hair;
Sportsmen and jockeys knew him not
And yet they say he once could trot
Among the fleetest of the town,
Till something cracked and broke him
down,— 60
The steed's, the statesman's, common
lot!

"And are we then so soon forgot?"
Ah me! I doubt if one of you
Has ever heard the name "Old Blue," Whose fame through all this region rung 65
In those old days when I was young!

"Bring forth the horse!" Alas! he showed
Not like the one Mazeppa rode;
Scant-maned, sharp-backed, and shaky-kneed,
The wreck of what was once a steed, 70
Lips thin, eyes hollow, stiff in joints;
Yet not without his knowing points.
The sexton laughing in his sleeve,
As if 't were all a make-believe,
Led forth the horse, and as he laughed
Unhitched the breeching from a shaft, 75
Unclasped the rusty belt beneath,
Drew forth the snaffle from his teeth,
Slipped off his head-stall, set him free
From strap and rein,—a sight to see! 80

So worn, so lean in every limb,
 It can't be they are saddling him!
 It is! his back the pig-skin strides
 And flaps his lank, rheumatic sides;
 With look of mingled scorn and mirth
 They buckle round the saddle-girth; 86
 With horsy wink and saucy toss
 A youngster throws his leg across,
 And so, his rider on his back,
 They lead him, limping, to the track, 90
 Far up behind the starting-point,
 To limber out each stiffened joint.

As through the jeering crowd he past,
 One pitying look old Hiram cast;
 "Go it, ye cripple, while ye can!" 95
 Cried out unsentimental Dan;
 "A Fast-Day dinner for the crows!"
 Budd Doble's scoffing shout arose.

Slowly, as when the walking-beam
 First feels the gathering head of steam,
 With warning cough and threatening wheeze 101
 The stiff old charger crooks his knees;
 At first with cautious step sedate,
 As if he dragged a coach of state;
 He's not a colt; he knows full well 105
 That time is weight and sure to tell;
 No horse so sturdy but he fears
 The handicap of twenty years.

As through the throng on either hand
 The old horse nears the judges' stand,
 Beneath his jockey's feather-weight 111
 He warms a little to his gait,
 And now and then a step is tried
 That hints of something like a stride.

"Go!"—Through his ear the summons
 stung 115
 As if a battle-trump had rung;
 The slumbering instincts long unstirred
 Start at the old familiar word;
 It thrills like flame through every
 limb—
 What mean his twenty years to him? 120
 The savage blow his rider dealt Fell on his hollow flanks unfelt;
 The spur that pricked his staring hide
 Unheeded tore his bleeding side;
 Alike to him are spur and rein,— 125
 He steps a five-year-old again!

Before the quarter pole was past,
 Old Hiram said, "He's going fast."
 Long ere the quarter was a half,
 The chuckling crowd had ceased to laugh; 130
 Tighter his frightened jockey clung
 As in a mighty stride he swung,
 The gravel flying in his track,
 His neck stretched out, his ears laid
 back,
 His tail extended all the while 135
 Behind him like a rat-tail file!
 Off went a shoe,—away it spun,
 Shot like a bullet from a gun;
 The quaking jockey shapes a prayer
 From scraps of oaths he used to swear;
 He drops his whip, he drops his rein, 141
 He clutches fiercely for a mane;
 He'll lose his hold—he sways and reels—
 He'll slide beneath those trampling heels!
 The knees of many a horseman quake,
 The flowers on many a bonnet shake, 146
 And shouts arise from left and right,
 "Stick on! Stick on!" "Hould tight!
 Hould tight!"
 "Cling round his neck and don't let go—
 That pace can't hold—there! steady!
 whoa!" 150
 But like the sable steed that bore
 The spectral lover of Lenore,
 His nostrils snorting foam and fire,
 No stretch his bony limbs can tire;
 And now the stand he rushes by, 155
 And "Stop him!—stop him!" is the cry.
 Stand back! he's only just begun—
 He's having out three heats in one!

"Don't rush in front! he'll smash your brains;
 But follow up and grab the reins!" 160
 Old Hiram spoke. Dan Pfeiffer heard,
 And sprang impatient at the word;
 Budd Doble started on his bay,
 Old Hiram followed on his gray,
 And off they spring, and round they go,
 The fast ones doing "all they know." 166
 Look! twice they follow at his heels,
 As round the circling course he wheels,
 And whirls with him that clinging boy
 Like Hector rounds the walls of Troy;
 Still on, and on, the third time
 round! 171

They're tailing off! they're losing
ground!

Budd Doble's nag begins to fail!
Dan Pfeiffer's sorrel whisks his tail!
And see! in spite of whip and shout, 175
Old Hiram's mare is giving out!
Now for the finish! at the turn,
The old horse—all the rest astern—
Comes swinging in, with easy trot;
By Jove! he's distanced all the lot! 180

That trot no mortal could explain;
Some said, "Old Dutchman come
again!"

Some took his time,—at least they tried,

But what it was could none decide;
One said he couldn't understand 185

What happened to his second hand;

One said 2:10; that couldn't be—

More like two twenty-two or -three;

Old Hiram settled it at last;

"The time was two—too dee-vel-ish fast!" 190

The parson's horse had won the bet;

It cost him something of a sweat;

Back in the one-horse shay he went;

The parson wondered what it meant,

And murmured, with a mild surprise

And pleasant twinkle of the eyes, 196

"That funeral must have been a trick,

Or corpses drive at double-quick;

I shouldn't wonder, I declare,

If brother—Jehu—made the prayer!"

And this is all I have to say 201

About that tough old trotting bay,

Huddup! Huddup! G'lang! Good day!

Moral for which this tale is told:

A horse can trot, for all he's old. 205

TO JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER

ON HIS EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY

1887

Friend, whom thy fourscore winters leave more dear

Than when life's roseate summer on thy cheek

Burned in the flush of manhood's man-liest year,

Lonely, how lonely! is the snowy peak

Thy feet have reached, and mine have climbed so near! 5

Close on thy footsteps 'mid the landscape drear

I stretch my hand thine answering grasp to seek,

Warm with the love no rippling rhymes can speak!

Look backward! From thy lofty height

Thy years of toil, of peaceful victories
won, 10

Of dreams made real, largest hopes out-
run!

Look forward! Brighter than earth's

DIVISION AND REUNION

JOHN C. CALHOUN (1782-1850)

SPEECH ON THE SLAVERY QUESTION, DELIVERED IN THE SENATE, MARCH 4, 1850

I have, Senators, believed from the first that the agitation of the subject of slavery would, if not prevented by some timely and effective measure, end in disunion. Entertaining this opinion, I have, on all proper occasions, endeavored to call the attention of both the two great parties which divide the country to adopt some measure to prevent so great a disaster, but without success. The agitation has been permitted to proceed with almost no attempt to resist it, until it has reached a point when it can no longer be disguised or denied that the Union is in danger. You have thus had forced upon you the greatest and the gravest question that can ever come under your consideration—How can the Union be preserved?

To give a satisfactory answer to this mighty question, it is indispensable to have an accurate and thorough knowledge of the nature and the character of the cause by which the Union is endangered. Without such knowledge it is impossible to pronounce, with any certainty, by what measure it can be saved; just as it would be impossible for a physician to pronounce, in the case of some dangerous disease, with any certainty, by what remedy the patient could be saved, without similar knowledge of the nature and character of the cause which produced it. The first question, then, presented for consideration, in the investigation I propose to make in order to obtain such knowledge, is—What is it that has endangered the Union?

To this question there can be but one answer,—that the immediate cause is the almost universal discontent which pervades all the States composing the Southern section of the Union. This widely-extended discontent is not of recent origin. It commenced with the agitation of the slavery question, and has been increasing ever since. The next question, going one step further back, is—What has caused this widely diffused and almost universal discontent?

It is a great mistake to suppose, as is by some, that it originated with demagogues, who excited the discontent with the intention of aiding their personal advancement, or with the disappointed ambition of certain politicians, who resorted to it as the means of retrieving their fortunes. On the contrary, all the great political influences of the section were arrayed against excitement, and exerted to the utmost to keep the people quiet. The great mass of the people of the South were divided, as in the other section, into Whigs and Democrats. The leaders and the presses of both parties in the South were very solicitous to prevent excitement and to preserve quiet; because it was seen that the effects of the former would necessarily tend to weaken, if not destroy, the political ties which united them with their respective parties in the other section. Those who know the strength of party ties will readily appreciate the immense force which this cause exerted against agitation, and in favor of preserving quiet. But, great as it was, it was not sufficient to prevent the widespread discontent which now pervades the section. No; some cause, far deeper and more powerful than the one supposed, must exist, to account for discontent so wide and deep. The question then recurs—What is the cause of this discontent? It will be found in the belief of the people of the Southern States, as prevalent as the discontent itself, that they cannot remain, as things now are, consistently with honor and safety, in the Union. The next question to be considered, is—What has caused this belief?

One of the causes is, undoubtedly, to be traced to the long-continued agitation of the slave question on the part of the North, and the many aggressions which they have made on the rights of the South during the time. I will not enumerate them at present, as it will be done hereafter in its proper place.

There is another lying back of it—²⁰ with which this is intimately connected—that may be regarded as the great and primary cause. This is to be found in the fact that the equilibrium between the two sections, in the Government as it stood when the constitution was ratified and the Government put in action, has been destroyed. At that time there was nearly a perfect equilibrium between the two, which afforded ³⁰ ample means to each to protect itself against the aggression of the other; but, as it now stands, one section has the exclusive power of controlling the Government, which leaves the other without any adequate means of protecting itself against its encroachment and oppression. To place this subject distinctly before you, I have, Senators, prepared a brief statistical statement, ⁴⁰ showing the relative weight of the two sections in the Government under the first census of 1790 and the last census of 1840.

According to the former, the population of the United States, including Vermont, Kentucky, and Tennessee, which then were in their incipient condition of becoming States, but were not actually admitted, amounted to ⁵⁰ 3,929,827. Of this number the Northern States had 1,997,899, and the Southern 1,952,072, making a difference of only 45,827 in favor of the former

States. The number of States, including Vermont, Kentucky, and Tennessee, were sixteen; of which eight, including Vermont, belonged to the Northern section, and eight, including Kentucky and Tennessee, to the Southern,—making an equal division of the States between the two sections under the first census. There was a small ¹⁰ preponderance in the House of Representatives, and in the Electoral College, in favor of the Northern, owing to the fact that, according to the provisions of the constitution, in estimating federal numbers five slaves count but three; but it was too small to affect sensibly the perfect equilibrium which, with that exception, existed at the time. Such was the equality of the ²⁰ two sections when the States composing them agreed to enter into a Federal Union. Since then the equilibrium between them has been greatly disturbed.

According to the last census the aggregate population of the United States amounted to 17,063,357, of which the Northern section contained 9,728,920, and the Southern 7,334,437, making a difference, in round numbers, ³⁰ of 2,400,000. The number of States had increased from sixteen to twenty-six, making an addition of ten States. In the mean time the position of Delaware had become doubtful as to which section she properly belonged. Considering her as neutral, the Northern States will have thirteen and the Southern States twelve, making a difference in the Senate of two Senators ⁴⁰ in favor of the former. According to the apportionment under the census of 1840, there were two hundred and twenty-three members of the House of Representatives, of which the Northern States had one hundred and thirty-five, and the Southern States (considering Delaware as neutral) eighty-seven, making a difference in ⁵⁰ favor of the former in the House of Representatives of forty-eight. The difference in the Senate of two members, added to this, gives to the North in the electoral college, a majority of fifty. Since the census of 1840, four States have been added to the Union—Iowa, Wisconsin, Florida, and Texas. They leave the difference in the Senate as it stood when the census was taken; but add two to the side of the North in the House, making the present majority in the House in its favor fifty, and in the electoral college fifty-two.

The result of the whole is to give the Northern section a predominance in every department of the Government, and thereby concentrate in it the two elements which constitute the Federal Government,—majority of States, and a majority of their population, estimated in federal numbers. Whatever section concentrates the two in itself possesses the control of the entire Government.

But we are just at the close of the sixth decade, and the commencement of the seventh. The census is to be taken this year, which must add greatly to the decided preponderance of the North in the House of Representatives and in the electoral college. The prospect is, also, that a great increase will be added to its present preponderance in the Senate, during the period of the decade, by the addition of new States. Two territories, Oregon and Minnesota, are already in progress, and strenuous efforts are making to bring in three additional States from the territory recently conquered from Mexico; which, if successful, will add three other States in a short time to the Northern section, making five States; and increasing the present number of its States from fifteen to twenty, and of its Senators from thirty to forty. On the contrary, there is not a single territory in progress in the Southern section, and no certainty that any additional State will be added to it during the decade. The prospect then is, that the two sections in the Senate, should the efforts now made to exclude the South from the newly acquired territories succeed, will stand, before the end of the decade, twenty Northern States to fourteen Southern (considering Delaware as neutral), and forty Northern Senators to twenty-eight Southern. This great increase of Senators, added to the great increase of members of the House of Representatives and the electoral college on the part of the North, which must take place under the next decade, will effectually and irretrievably destroy the equilibrium which existed when the Government commenced.

Had this destruction been the operation of time, without the interference of Government, the South would have had no reason to complain; but such was not the fact. It was caused by the legislation of this Government, which was appointed, as the common agent of all, and charged with the protection of the interests and security of all. The legislation by which it has been effected, may be classed under three heads. The first, is that series of acts by which the South has been excluded from the common territory belonging to all the States as members of the Federal Union—which have had the effect of extending vastly the portion allotted to the Northern section, and restricting within narrow limits the portion left the South. The next consists in adopting a system of revenue and disbursements, by which an undue proportion of the burden of taxation has been imposed upon the South, and an undue proportion of its proceeds appropriated to the North; and the last is a system of political measures, by which the original character of the Government has been radically changed. I propose to bestow upon each of these, in the order they stand, a few remarks, with the view of showing that it is owing to the action of this Government that the equilibrium between the two sections has been destroyed, and the whole powers of the system centered in a sectional majority.

The first of the series of acts by which the South was deprived of its due share of the territories, originated with the confederacy which preceded the existence of this Government. It is to be found in the provision of the Ordinance of 1787. Its effect was to exclude the South entirely from that vast and fertile region which lies between the Ohio and the Mississippi rivers, now embracing five States and one territory. The next of the series is the Missouri compromise, which excluded the South from that large portion of Louisiana which lies north of $36^{\circ} 30'$, excepting what is included in the State of Missouri. The last of the series excluded the South from the whole of the Oregon Territory. All these, in the slang of the day, were what are called slave territories, and not free soil; that is, territories belonging to slaveholding powers and open to the emigration of masters with their slaves. By these several acts, the South was excluded from 1,238,025 square miles—an extent of country considerably exceeding the entire valley of the Mississippi. To the South was left the portion of the Territory of Louisiana lying south of $36^{\circ} 30'$, and the portion north of it included in the State of Missouri, with the portion lying south of $36^{\circ} 30'$, including the States of Louisiana and Arkansas, and the territory lying west of the latter, and south of $36^{\circ} 30'$, called the Indian country. These, with the Territory of Florida, now the State, make, in the whole, 238,503 square miles. To this must be added the territory acquired with Texas. If the whole should be added to the Southern section, it would make an increase of 325,520, which would make the whole left to the South, 609,023. But a large part of Texas is still in contest between the two sections, which leaves it uncertain what will be the real extent of the portion of territory that may be left to the South.

I have not included the territory recently acquired by the treaty with Mexico. The North is making the most strenuous efforts to appropriate the whole to herself, by excluding the South from every foot of it. If she should succeed, it will add to that from which the South has already been excluded, 526,078 square miles, and would increase the whole which the North has appropriated to herself, to 1,764,023, not including the portion that she may succeed in excluding us from in Texas. To sum up the whole, the United States, since they declared their independence, have acquired 2,373,046 square miles of territory, from which the North will have excluded the South, if she should succeed in monopolizing the newly acquired territories, about three-fourths of the whole, leaving to the South but about one-fourth.

Such is the first and great cause that has destroyed the equilibrium between the two sections in the Government.

The next is the system of revenue and disbursements which has been adopted by the Government. It is well known that the Government has derived its revenue mainly from duties on imports. I shall not undertake to show that such duties must necessarily fall mainly on the exporting States, and that the South, as the great exporting portion of the Union, has in reality paid vastly more than her due proportion of the revenue; because I deem it unnecessary, as the subject has on so many occasions been fully discussed. Nor shall I, for the same reason, undertake to show that a far greater portion of the revenue has been disbursed at the North, than its due share; and that the joint effect of these causes has been, to transfer a vast amount from South to North, which, under an equal system of revenue and disbursements, would not have been lost to her. If to this be added, that many of the duties were imposed, not for revenue, but for protection,—that is, intended to put money, not in the treasury, but directly into the pocket of the manufacturers,—some conception may be formed of the immense amount which, in the long course of sixty years, has been transferred from South to North. There are no data by which it can be estimated with any certainty; but it is safe to say, that it amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars. Under the most moderate estimate, it would be sufficient to add greatly to the wealth of the North, and thus greatly increase her population by attracting emigration from all quarters to that section.

This, combined with the great primary cause, amply explains why the North has acquired a preponderance in every department of the Government by its disproportionate increase of population and States. The former, as has been shown, has increased, in fifty years, 2,400,000 over that of the South. This increase of population, during so long a period, is satisfactorily accounted for, by the number of emigrants, and the increase of their descendants, which have been attracted to the Northern section from Europe and the South, in consequence of the advantages derived from the causes assigned. If they had not existed—if the South had retained all the capital which has been extracted from her by the fiscal action of the Government; and, if it had not been excluded by the ordinance of 1787 and the Missouri compromise, from the region lying between the Ohio and the Mississippi rivers, and between the Mississippi and the Rocky Mountains north of 36° 30'—it scarcely admits of a doubt, that it would have divided the emigration with the North, and by retaining her own people, would have at least equalled the North in population under the census of 1840, and probably under that about to be taken. She would also, if she had retained her equal rights in those territories, have maintained an equality in the number of States with the North, and have preserved the equilibrium between the two sections that existed at the commencement of the Government. The loss, then, of the equilibrium is to be attributed to the action of this Government.

But while these measures were destroying the equilibrium between the two sections, the action of the Government was leading to a radical change in its character, by concentrating all the power of the system in itself. The occasion will not permit me to trace the measures by which this great change has been consummated. If it did, it would not be difficult to show that the process commenced at an early period of the Government; and that it proceeded, almost without interruption, step by step, until it absorbed virtually its entire powers; but without going through the whole process to establish the fact, it may be done satisfactorily by a very short statement.

That the Government claims, and practically maintains, the right to decide in the last resort, as to the extent of its powers, will scarcely be denied by any one conversant with the political history of the country. That it also claims the right to resort to force to maintain whatever power it claims, against all opposition, is equally certain. Indeed it is apparent, from what we daily hear, that this has become the prevailing and fixed opinion of a great majority of the community. Now, I ask, what limitation can possibly be placed upon the powers of a government claiming and exercising such rights? And, if none can be, how can the separate governments of the States maintain and protect the powers reserved to them by the constitution—or the people of the several States maintain those which are reserved to them, and among others, the sovereign powers by which they ordained and established, not only their separate State Constitutions and Governments, but also the Constitution and Government of the United States? But, if they have no constitutional means of maintaining them against the right claimed by this Government, it necessarily follows that they hold them at its pleasure and discretion, and that all the powers of the system are in reality concentrated in it. It also follows that the character of the Government has been changed, in consequence, from a federal republic, as it originally came from the hands of its framers, into a great national consolidated democracy. It has indeed, at present, all the characteristics of the latter, and not one of the former, although it still retains its outward form.

The result of the whole of these causes combined is—that the North has acquired a decided ascendancy over every department of this Government, and through it a control over all the powers of the system. A single section governed by the will of the numerical majority, has now, in fact, the control of the Government and the entire powers of the system. What was once a constitutional federal republic, is now converted, in reality, into one as absolute as that of the Autocrat of Russia, and as despotic in its tendency as any absolute government that ever existed.

As, then, the North has the absolute control over the Government, it is manifest that on all questions between it and the South, where there is a diversity of interests, the interest of the latter will be sacrificed to the former, however oppressive the effects may be; as the South possesses no means by which it can resist, through the action of the Government. But if there was no question of vital importance to the South, in reference to which there was a diversity of views between the two sections, this state of things might be endured, without the hazard of destruction to the South. But such is not the fact. There is a question of vital importance to the Southern section, in reference to which the views and feelings of the two sections are as opposite and hostile as they can possibly be.

I refer to the relation between the two races in the Southern section, which constitutes a vital portion of her social organization. Every portion of the North entertains views and feelings more or less hostile to it. Those most opposed and hostile, regard it as a sin, and consider themselves under the most sacred obligation to use every effort to destroy it. Indeed, to the extent that they conceive that they have power, they regard themselves as implicated in the sin, and responsible for not suppressing it by the use of all and every means. Those less opposed and hostile, regard it as a crime—an offence against humanity, as they call it; and although not so fanatical, feel themselves bound to use all efforts to effect the same object; while those who are least opposed and hostile, regard it as a blot and a stain on the character of what they call the Nation, and feel themselves accordingly bound to give it no countenance or support. On the contrary, the Southern section regards the relation as one which cannot be destroyed without subjecting the two races to the greatest calamity, and the section to poverty, desolation, and wretchedness; and accordingly they feel bound, by every consideration of interest and safety, to defend it.

This hostile feeling on the part of the North towards the social organization of the South long lay dormant; but it only required some cause to act on those who felt most intensely that they were responsible for its continuance, to call it into action. The increasing power of this Government, and of the control of the Northern section over all its departments, furnished the cause. It was this which made an impression on the minds of many, that there was little or no restraint to prevent the Government from doing whatever it might choose to do. This was sufficient of itself to put the most fanatical portion of the North in action, for the purpose of destroying the existing relation between the two races in the South.

The first organized movement towards it commenced in 1835. Then, for the first time, societies were organized, presses established, lecturers sent forth to excite the people of the North, and incendiary publications scattered over the whole South through the mail. The South was thoroughly aroused. Meetings were held everywhere, and resolutions adopted, calling upon the North to apply a remedy to arrest the threatened evil, and pledging themselves to adopt measures for their own protection if it was not arrested. At the meeting of Congress, petitions poured in from the North, calling upon Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, and to prohibit what they called the internal slave trade between the States—announcing at the same time, that their ultimate object was to abolish slavery, not only in the District, but in the States and throughout the Union. At this period, the number engaged in the agitation was small, and possessed little or no personal influence.

Neither party in Congress had, at that time, any sympathy with them or their cause. The members of each party presented their petitions with great reluctance. Nevertheless, small and contemptible as the party then was, both of the great parties of the North dreaded them. They felt that though small, they were organized in reference to a subject which had a great and a commanding influence over the Northern mind. Each party, on that account, feared to oppose their petitions, lest the opposite party should take advantage of the one who might do so, by favoring them. The effect was that both united in insisting that the petitions should be received, and that Congress should take jurisdiction over the subject. To justify their course, they took the extraordinary ground that Congress was bound to receive petitions on every subject, however objectionable they might be, and whether they had or had not jurisdiction over the subject. These views prevailed in the House of Representatives, and partially in the Senate; and thus the party succeeded, in their first movements, in gaining what they proposed—a position in Congress from which agitation could be extended over the whole Union. This was the commencement of the agitation, which has ever since continued, and which, as is now acknowledged, has endangered the Union itself.

As for myself, I believed at that early period, if the party who got up the petitions should succeed in getting Congress to take jurisdiction, that agitation would follow; and that it would in the end, if not arrested, destroy the Union. I then so expressed myself in debate, and called upon both parties to take grounds against assuming jurisdiction; but in vain. Had my voice been heeded, and had Congress refused to take jurisdiction, by the united votes of all parties, the agitation which followed would have been prevented; and the fanatical zeal that gives impulse to the agitation, and which has brought us to our present perilous condition, would have become extinguished from the want of fuel to feed the flame. That was the time for the North to have shown her devotion to the Union; but, unfortunately, both of the great parties of that section were so intent on obtaining or retaining party ascendancy, that all other considerations were overlooked or forgotten.

What has since followed are but natural consequences. With the success of their first movement, this small fanatical party began to acquire strength; and with that, to become an object of courtship to both the great parties. The necessary consequence was a further increase of power, and a gradual tainting of the opinions of both of the other parties with their doctrines, until the infection has extended over both; and the great mass of the population of the North, who, whatever may be their opinion of the original abolition party, which still preserves its distinctive organization, hardly ever fail, when it comes to acting, to co-operate in carrying out their measures. With the increase of their influence, they extended the sphere of their action. In a short time after the commencement of their first movement, they had acquired sufficient influence to induce the legislatures of most of the Northern States to pass acts which in effect abrogated the clause of the constitution that provides for the delivery up of fugitive slaves. Not long after, petitions followed to abolish slavery in forts, magazines, and dockyards, and all other places where Congress had exclusive power of legislation. This was followed by petitions and resolutions of legislatures of the Northern States, and popular meetings, to exclude the Southern States from all territories acquired, or to be acquired; and to prevent the admission of any State hereafter into the Union, which, by its constitution, does not prohibit slavery. And Congress is invoked to do all this, expressly with the view to the final abolition of slavery in the States. That has been avowed to be the ultimate object from the beginning of the agitation until the present time; and yet the great body of both parties of the North, with the full knowledge of the fact, although disavowing the abolitionists, have co-operated with them in almost all their measures.

Such is a brief history of the agitation, as far as it has yet advanced. Now I ask, Senators, what is there to prevent its further progress, until it fulfils the ultimate end proposed, unless some decisive measure should be adopted to prevent it? Has any one of the causes, which had added to its increase from its original small and contemptible beginning until it has attained its present magnitude, diminished in force? Is the original cause of the movement—that slavery is a sin, and ought to be suppressed—weaker now than at the commencement? Or is the abolition party less numerous or influential, or have they less influence with, or control over, the two great parties of the North in elections? Or has the South greater means of influencing or controlling the movements of this Government now, than it had when the agitation commenced? To all these questions but one answer can be given: No—no—no. The very reverse is true. Instead of being weaker, all the elements in favor of agitation are stronger now than they were in 1835, when it first commenced; while all the elements of influence on the part of the South are weaker. Unless something decisive is done, I again ask, what is to stop this agitation, before the great and final object at which it aims—the abolition of slavery in the States—is consummated? Is it, then, not certain, that if something is not done to arrest it, the South will be forced to choose between abolition and secession? Indeed, as events are now moving, it will not require the South to secede, in order to dissolve the Union. Agitation will of itself effect it, of which its past history furnishes abundant proof—as I shall next proceed to show.

It is a great mistake to suppose that disunion can be effected by a single blow. The cords which bind these States together in one common Union, are far too numerous and powerful for that. Disunion must be the work of time. It is only through a long process, and successively, that the cords can be snapped, until the whole fabric falls asunder. Already the agitation of the slavery question has snapped some of the most important, and has greatly weakened all the others, as I shall proceed to show.

The cords that bind the States together are not only many, but various in character. Some are spiritual or ecclesiastical; some political; others social. Some appertain to the benefit conferred by the Union, and others to the feeling of duty and obligation.

The strongest of those of a spiritual and ecclesiastical nature, consisted in the unity of the great religious denominations, all of which originally embraced the whole Union. All these denominations, with the exception, perhaps, of the Catholics, were organized very much upon the principle of our political institutions. Beginning with smaller meetings, corresponding with the political divisions of the country, their organization terminated in one great central assemblage, corresponding very much with the character of Congress. At these meetings the principal clergymen and lay members of the respective denominations, from all parts of the Union, met to transact business relating to their common concerns. It was not confined to what appertained to the doctrines and discipline of the respective denominations, but extended to plans for disseminating the Bible—establishing missions, distributing tracts—and of establishing presses for the publication of tracts, newspapers, and periodicals, with a view of diffusing religious information—and for the support of their respective doctrines and creeds. All this combined contributed greatly to strengthen the bonds of the Union. The ties which held each denomination together formed a strong cord to hold the whole Union together; but, powerful as they were, they have not been able to resist the explosive effect of slavery agitation.

The first of these cords which snapped, under its explosive force, was that of the powerful Methodist Episcopal Church. The numerous and strong ties which held it together are all broken, and its unity gone. They now form separate churches; and, instead of that feeling of attachment and devotion to the interests of the whole church which was formerly felt, they are now arrayed into two hostile bodies, engaged in litigation about what was formerly their common property.

The next cord that snapped was that of the Baptists—one of the largest and most respectable of the denominations. That of the Presbyterian is not entirely snapped, but some of its strands have given way. That of the Episcopal Church is the only one of the four great Protestant denominations which remains unbroken and entire.

The strongest cord of a political character, consists of the many and powerful ties that have held together the two great parties which have, with some modifications, existed from the beginning of the Government. They both extended to every portion of the Union, and strongly contributed to hold all its parts together. But this powerful cord has fared no better than the spiritual. It resisted, for a long time, the explosive tendency of the agitation, but has finally snapped under its force—if not entirely, in a great measure. Nor is there one of the remaining cords which has not been greatly weakened. To this extent the Union has already been destroyed by agitation, in the only way it can be,

by sundering and weakening the cords which bind it together.

If the agitation goes on, the same force, acting with increased intensity, as has been shown, will finally snap every cord, when nothing will be left to hold the States together except force. But, surely that can with no propriety of language be called a Union, when the only means by which the weaker is held connected with the stronger portion is force. It may, indeed, keep them connected; but the connection will partake much more of the character of subjugation, on the part of the weaker to the stronger, than the union of free, independent, and sovereign States, in one confederation, as they stood in the early stages of the Government, and which only is worthy of the sacred name of Union.

Having now, Senators, explained what it is that endangers the Union, and traced it to its cause, and explained its nature and character, the question again recurs—How can the Union be saved? To this I answer, there is but one way by which it can be; and that is, by adopting such measures as will satisfy the States belonging to the Southern section, that they can remain in the Union consistently with their honor and their safety. There is, again, only one way by which this can be effected; and that is, by removing the causes by which this belief has been produced. Do this, and discontent will cease, harmony and kind feelings between the sections be restored, and every apprehension of danger to the Union removed. The question then is—How can this be done? But before I undertake to answer this question, I propose to show by what the Union cannot be saved.

It cannot, then, be saved by eulogies on the Union, however splendid or numerous. The cry of "Union, Union—the glorious Union!" can no more prevent disunion than the cry of "Health, health—glorious health!" on the part of the physician, can save a patient lying dangerously ill. So long as the Union, instead of being regarded as a protector, is regarded in the opposite character, by not much less than a majority of the States, it will be in vain to attempt to conciliate them by pronouncing eulogies on it.

Besides, this cry of Union comes commonly from those whom we cannot believe to be sincere. It usually comes from our assailants. But we cannot believe them to be sincere; for, if they loved the Union, they would necessarily be devoted to the constitution. It made the Union; and to destroy the constitution would be to destroy the Union. But the only reliable and certain evidence of devotion to the constitution is to abstain, on the one hand, from violating it; and to repel, on the other, all attempts to violate it. It is only by faithfully performing these high duties that the constitution can be preserved, and with it the Union.

But how stands the profession of devotion to the Union by our assailants, when brought to this test? Have they abstained from violating the constitution? Let the many acts passed by the Northern States to set aside and annul the clause of the constitution providing for the delivery up of fugitive slaves answer. I cite this, not that it is the only instance (for there are many others), but because the violation in this particular is too notorious and palpable to be denied. Again: have they stood forth faithfully to repel violations of the constitution? Let their course in reference to the agitation of the slavery question, which was commenced and has been carried on for fifteen years, avowedly for the purpose of abolishing slavery in the States—an object all acknowledged to be unconstitutional—answer. Let them show a single instance, during this long period, in which they have denounced the agitators or their attempts to effect what is admitted to be unconstitutional, or a single measure which they have brought forward for that purpose. How can we, with all these facts before us, believe that they are sincere in their profession of devotion to the Union, or avoid believing their profession is but intended to increase the vigor of their assaults and to weaken the force of our resistance?

Nor can we regard the profession of devotion to the Union, on the part of those who are not our assailants, as sincere, when they pronounce eulogies upon the Union, evidently with the intent of charging us with disunion, without uttering one word of denunciation against our assailants. If friends of the Union, their course should be to unite with us in repelling these assaults, and denouncing the authors as enemies of the Union. Why they avoid this, and pursue the course they do, it is for them to explain.

Nor can the Union be saved by invoking the name of the illustrious Southerner whose mortal remains repose on the western bank of the Potomac. He was one of us—a slaveholder and a planter. We have studied his history, and find nothing in it to justify submission to wrong. On the contrary, his great fame rests on the solid foundation that, while he was careful to avoid doing wrong to others, he was prompt and decided in repelling wrong. I trust that, in this respect, we profited by his example.

Nor can we find any thing in his history to deter us from seceding from the Union, should it fail to fulfil the objects for which it was instituted, by being permanently and hopelessly converted into the means of oppressing instead of protecting us. On the contrary, we find much in his example to encourage us, should we be forced to the extremity of deciding between submission and disunion.

There existed then, as well as now, a union: that between the parent country and her then colonies. It was a union that had much to endear it to the people of the colonies. Under its protecting and superintending care, the colonies were planted, and grew up, and prospered, through a long course of years, until they became populous and wealthy. Its benefits were not limited to them. Their extensive agricultural and other productions gave birth to a flourishing commerce, which richly rewarded the parent country for the trouble and expense of establishing and protecting them. Washington was born and grew up to manhood under that union. He acquired his early distinction in its service, and there is every reason to believe that he was devotedly attached to it. But his devotion was a rational one. He was attached to it not as an end, but as a means to an end. When it failed to fulfil its end, and instead of affording protection, was converted into the means of oppressing the colonies, he did not hesitate to draw his sword, and head the great movement by which that union was for ever severed, and the independence of these States established. This was the great and crowning glory of his life, which has spread his fame over the whole globe, and will transmit it to the latest posterity.

Nor can the plan proposed by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, nor that of the administration, save the Union. I shall pass by, without remark, the plan proposed by the Senator, and proceed directly to the consideration of that of the administration. I however assure the distinguished and able Senator, that, in taking this course, no disrespect whatever is intended to him or his plan. I have adopted it, because so many Senators of distinguished abilities, who were present when he delivered his speech, and explained his plan, and who were fully capable to do justice to the side they support, have replied to him.

The plan of the administration cannot save the Union, because it can have no effect whatever towards satisfying the States composing the Southern section of the Union, that they can, consistently with safety and honor, remain in the Union. It is, in fact, but a modification of the Wilmot Proviso. It proposes to effect the same object, —to exclude the South from all territory acquired by the Mexican treaty. It is well known that the South is united against the Wilmot Proviso, and has committed itself by solemn resolutions, to resist, should it be adopted. Its opposition is not to the name, but that which it proposes to effect. That, the Southern States hold to be unconstitutional, unjust, inconsistent with their equality as members of the common Union, and calculated to destroy irretrievably the equilibrium between the two sections. These objections equally apply to what, for brevity, I will call the Executive Proviso. There is no difference between it and the Wilmot, except in the mode of effecting the object; and in that respect, I must say, that the latter is much the least objectionable. It goes to its object openly, boldly, and distinctly. It claims for Congress unlimited power over the territories, and proposes to assert it over the territories acquired from Mexico, by a positive prohibition of slavery. Not so the Executive Proviso. It takes an indirect course, and in order to elude the Wilmot Proviso, and thereby avoid encountering the united and determine resistance of the South, it denies, by implication, the authority of Congress to legislate for the territories, and claims the right as belonging exclusively to the inhabitants of the territories. But to effect the object of excluding the South, it takes care, in the mean time, to let in emigrants freely from the Northern States and all other quarters, except from the South, which it takes special care to exclude by holding up to them the danger of having their slaves liberated under the Mexican laws. The necessary consequence is to exclude the South from the territory, just as effectually as would the Wilmot Proviso. The only difference in this respect is, that what one proposes to effect directly and openly, the other proposes to effect indirectly and covertly.

But the Executive Proviso is more objectionable than the Wilmot, in another and more important particular. The latter, to effect its object, inflicts a dangerous wound upon the constitution, by depriving the Southern States, as joint partners and owners of the territories, of their rights in them; but it inflicts no greater wound than is absolutely necessary to effect its object. The former, on the contrary, while it inflicts the same wound, inflicts others equally great, and, if possible, greater.

* * * * *

Having now shown what cannot save the Union, I return to the question with which I commenced, How can the Union be saved? There is but one way ¹⁰ by which it can with any certainty; and that is, by a full and final settlement, on the principle of justice, of all the questions at issue between the two sections. The South asks for justice, simple justice; and less she ought not to take. She has no compromise to offer but the constitution; and no concession or surrender to make. She has already surrendered so much that she ²⁰ has little left to surrender. Such a settlement would go to the root of the evil, and remove all cause of discontent, by satisfying the South that she could remain honorably and safely in the Union, and thereby restore the harmony and fraternal feelings between the sections, which existed anterior to the Missouri agitation. Nothing else can, with any certainty, finally and ³⁰ for ever settle the questions at issue, terminate agitation, and save the Union.

But can this be done? Yes, easily; not by the weaker party, for it can of itself do nothing—not even protect itself—but by the stronger. The North has only to will it to accomplish it, to do justice by conceding to the South an equal right in the acquired territory, and to do her duty by causing the stipulations relative to fugitive ⁴⁰ slaves to be faithfully fulfilled; to cease the agitation of the slave question, and to provide for the insertion of a provision in the constitution, by an amendment, which will restore to the South, in substance, the power she possessed of protecting herself, before the equilibrium between the sections was de- ⁵⁰stroyed by the action of this Government. There will be no difficulty in devising such a provision: one that will protect the South, and which, at the same time, will improve and strengthen the Government, instead of impairing and weakening it.

But will the North agree to this? It is for her to answer the question. But, I will say, she cannot refuse, if she has half the love of the Union which she professes to have, or without justly exposing herself to the charge that her love of power and aggrandizement is far greater than her love of the Union. At all events, the responsibility of saving the Union rests on the North, and not on the South. The South cannot save it by any act of hers, and the North may save it without any sacrifice whatever, unless to do justice, and to perform her duties under the constitution, should be regarded by her as ²⁰ a sacrifice.

It is time, Senators, that there should be an open and manly avowal on all sides, as to what is intended to be done. If the question is not now settled, it is uncertain whether it ever can hereafter be; and we, as the representatives of the States of this Union, regarded as governments, should come to a distinct understanding as to our re- ³⁰spective views, in order to ascertain whether the great questions at issue can be settled or not. If you, who represent the stronger portion, cannot agree to settle them on the broad principle of justice and duty, say so; and let the States we both represent agree to separate and part in peace. If you are unwilling we should part in peace, tell us so; and we shall know what to ⁴⁰ do, when you reduce the question to submission or resistance. If you remain silent, you will compel us to infer by your acts what you intend. In that case, California will become the test question. If you admit her, under all the difficulties that oppose her admission, you compel us to infer that you intend to exclude us from the whole of the acquired territories; with ⁵⁰ the intention of destroying, irretrievably, the equilibrium between the two sections. We would be blind not to perceive in that case, that your real objects are power and aggrandizement, and infatuated not to act accordingly.

I have now, Senators, done my duty in expressing my opinions fully, freely, and candidly, on this solemn occasion. In doing so, I have been governed by the motives which have governed me in all stages of the agitation of the slavery question since its commencement. I have exerted myself, during the whole period, to arrest it, with the intention of saving the Union, if it could be done; and if it could not, to save the section where it has pleased Providence to cast my lot, and which I sincerely believe has justice and the constitution on its side. Having faithfully done my duty to the best of my ability, both to the Union and my section, throughout this agitation, I shall have the consolation, let what will come, that I am free from all responsibility.

DANIEL WEBSTER (1782-1852)

SPEECH ON THE CONSTITUTION AND THE UNION, MARCH 7, 1850

MR. PRESIDENT,—I wish to speak to-day, not as a Massachusetts man, nor as a Northern man, but as an American, and a member of the Senate of the United States. It is fortunate that there is a Senate of the United States; a body not yet moved from its propriety, not lost to a just sense of its own dignity and its own high responsibilities; and a body to which the country looks, with confidence, for wise, moderate, patriotic, and healing counsels. It is not to be denied that we live in the midst of strong agitations, and are surrounded by very considerable dangers to our institutions and government. The imprisoned winds are let loose. The East, the North, and the stormy South combine to throw the whole sea into commotion, to toss its billows to the skies, and disclose its profoundest depths. I do not affect to regard myself, Mr. President, as holding, or as fit to hold, the helm in this combat with the political elements; but I have a duty to perform, and I mean to perform it with fidelity, not without a sense of existing dangers, but not without hope. I have a part to act, not for my own security or safety, for I am looking out for no fragment upon which to float away from the wreck, if wreck there must be; but for the good of the whole, and the preservation of all; and there is that which will keep me to my duty during this struggle, whether the sun and the stars shall appear, or shall not appear for many days. I speak to-day for the preservation of the Union. "Hear me for my cause." I speak to-day, out of a solicitous and anxious heart, for the restoration to the country of that quiet and that harmony which make the blessings of this Union so rich, and so dear to us all. These are the topics that I propose to myself to discuss; these are the motives, and the sole motives, that influence me in the wish to communicate my opinions to the Senate and the country; and if I can do any thing, however little, for the promotion of these ends, I shall have accomplished all that I expect.

Mr. President, it may not be amiss to recur very briefly to the events which, equally sudden and extraordinary, have brought the country into its present political condition. In May, 1846, the United States declared war against Mexico. Our armies, then on the frontiers, entered the provinces of that republic, met and defeated all her troops, penetrated her mountain passes, and occupied her capital. The marine force of the United States took possession of her forts and her towns, on the Atlantic and on the Pacific. In less than two years a treaty was negotiated, by which Mexico ceded to the United States a vast territory, extending seven or eight hundred miles along the shores of the Pacific, and reaching back over the mountains, and across the desert, until it joins the frontier of the State of Texas. It so happened, in the distracted and feeble state of the Mexican government, that before the declaration of war by the United States against Mexico had become known in California, the people of California, under the lead of American officers, overthrew the existing Mexican provincial government, and raised an independent flag. When the news arrived at San Francisco that war had been declared by the United States against Mexico, this independent flag was pulled down, and the stars and stripes of this Union hoisted in its stead. So, Sir, before the war was over, the forces of the United States, military and naval, had possession of San Francisco and Upper California, and a great rush of emigrants from various parts of the world took place into California in 1846 and 1847. But now behold another wonder.

In January of 1848, a party of Mormons made a discovery of an extraordinarily rich mine of gold, or rather of a great quantity of gold, hardly proper to be called a mine, for it spread near the surface, on the lower part of the south, or American, branch of the Sacramento. They attempted to conceal their discovery for some time; but soon another discovery of gold, perhaps of greater importance, was made, on another part of the American branch of the Sacramento, and near Sutter's Fort, as it is called. The fame of these discoveries spread far and wide. They inflamed more and more the spirit of emigration towards California, which had already been excited; and adventurers crowded into the country by hundreds, and flocked towards the Bay of San Francisco. This, as I have said, took place in the winter and spring of 1848. The digging commenced in the spring of that year, and from that time to this the work of searching for gold has been prosecuted with a success not heretofore known in the history of this globe. You recollect, Sir, how incredulous at first the American public was at the accounts which reached us of these discoveries; but we all know, now, that these accounts received, and continue to receive, daily confirmation; and down to the present moment I suppose the assurance is as strong, after the experience of these several months, of the existence of deposits of gold apparently inexhaustible in the regions near San Francisco, in California, as it was at any period of the earlier dates of the accounts.

It so happened, Sir, that although, after the return of peace, it became a very important subject for legislative consideration and legislative decision to provide a proper territorial government for California, yet differences of opinion between the two houses of Congress prevented the establishment of any such territorial government at the last session. Under this state of things, the inhabitants of California, already amounting to a considerable number, thought it to be their duty, in the summer of last year, to establish a local government. Under the proclamation of General Riley, the people chose delegates to a convention; and that convention met at Monterey. It formed a constitution for the State of California, which, being referred to the people, was adopted by them in their primary assemblages. Desirous of immediate connection with the United States, its Senators were appointed and representatives chosen, who have come hither, bringing with them the authentic constitution of the State of California; and they now present themselves, asking, in behalf of their constituents, that it may be admitted into this Union as one of the United States. This constitution, Sir, contains an express prohibition of slavery, or involuntary servitude, in the State of California. It is said, and I suppose truly, that, of the members who composed that convention, some sixteen were natives of, and had been residents in, the slave-holding States, about twenty-two were from the non-slave-holding States, and the remaining ten members were either native Californians or old settlers in that country. This prohibition of slavery, it is said, was inserted with entire unanimity.

It is this circumstance, Sir, the prohibition of slavery, which has contributed to raise, I do not say it has wholly raised, the dispute as to the propriety of the admission of California into the Union under this constitution. It is not to be denied, Mr. President, nobody thinks of denying, that whatever reasons were assigned at the commencement of the late war with Mexico, it was prosecuted for the purpose of the acquisition of territory, and under the alleged argument that the cession of territory was the only form in which proper compensation could be obtained by the United States from Mexico, for the various claims and demands which the people of this country had against that government. At any rate, it will be found that President Polk's message, at the commencement of the session of December, 1847, avowed that the war was to be prosecuted until some acquisition of territory should be made. As the acquisition was to be south of the line of the United States, in warm climates and countries, it was naturally, I suppose, expected by the South, that whatever acquisitions were made in that region would be added to the slaveholding portion of the United States. Very little of accurate information was possessed of the real physical character, either of California or New Mexico, and events have not turned out as was expected. Both California and New Mexico are likely to come in as free States; and therefore some degree of disappointment and surprise has resulted. In other words, it is obvious that the question which has so long harassed the country, and at times very seriously alarmed the minds of wise and good men, has come upon us for a fresh discussion: the question of slavery in these United States.

Now, Sir, I propose, perhaps at the expense of some detail and consequent detention of the Senate, to review historically this question, which, partly in consequence of its own importance, and partly, perhaps mostly, in consequence of the manner in which it has been discussed in different portions of the country, has been a source of so much alienation and unkind feeling between them.

We all know, Sir, that slavery has existed in the world from time immemorial. There was slavery, in the earliest periods of history, among the Oriental nations. There was slavery among the Jews; the theocratic government of that people issued no injunction against it. There was slavery among the Greeks; and the ingenious philosophy of the Greeks found, or sought to find, a justification for it exactly upon the grounds which have been assumed for such a justification in this country: that is, a natural and original difference among the races of mankind, and the inferiority of the black or colored race to the white. The Greeks justified their system of slavery upon that idea, precisely. They held the African and some of the Asiatic tribes to be inferior to the white race; but they did not show, I think, by any close process of logic, that if this were true, the more intelligent and the stronger had therefore a right to subjugate the weaker.

The more manly philosophy and jurisprudence of the Romans placed the justification of slavery on entirely different grounds. The Roman jurists, from the first and down to the fall of the empire, admitted that slavery was against the natural law, by which, as they maintained, all men, of whatever clime, color, or capacity, were equal; but they justified slavery, first upon the ground and authority of the law of nations, arguing, and arguing truly, that at that day the conventional law of nations admitted that captives in war, whose lives, according to the notions of the times, were at the absolute disposal of the captors, might, in exchange for exemption from death, be made slaves for life, and that such servitude might descend to their posterity. The jurists of Rome also maintained, that, by the civil law, there might be servitude or slavery, personal and hereditary; first, by the voluntary act of an individual, who might sell himself into slavery; secondly, by his being reduced into a state of slavery by his creditors, in satisfaction of his debts; and, thirdly, by being placed in a state of servitude or slavery for crime. At the introduction of Christianity, the Roman world was full of slaves; and I suppose there is to be found no injunction against that relation between man and man in the teachings of the Gospel of Jesus Christ or of any of his Apostles. The object of the instruction imparted to mankind by the founder of Christianity was to touch the heart, purify the soul, and improve the lives of individual men. That object went directly to the first fountain of all the political and all social relations of the human race, as well as of all true religious feeling, the individual heart and mind of man.

Now, Sir, upon the general nature and influence of slavery there exists a wide difference of opinion between the northern portion of this country and the southern. It is said on the one side, that, although not the subject of any injunction or direct prohibition in the New Testament, slavery is a wrong; that it is founded merely in the right of the strongest; and that it is an oppression, like unjust wars, like all those conflicts by which a powerful nation subjects a weaker to its will; and that, in its nature, whatever may be said of it in the modifications which have taken place, it is not according to the meek spirit of the Gospel. It is not "kindly affectioned"; it does not "seek another's, and not its own"; it does not "let the oppressed go free." These are sentiments that are cherished, and of late with greatly augmented force, among the people of the Northern States. They have taken hold of the religious sentiment of that part of the country, as they have, more or less, taken hold of the religious feelings of a considerable portion of mankind. The South, upon the other side, having been accustomed to this relation between the two races all their lives, from their birth; having been taught, in general, to treat the subjects of this bondage with care and kindness, and I believe, in general, feeling great kindness for them, have not taken the view of the subject which I have mentioned. There are thousands of religious men, with consciences as tender as any of their brethren at the North, who do not see the unlawfulness of slavery; and there are more thousands, perhaps, that, whatsoever they may think of it in its origin, and as a matter depending upon natural right, yet take things as they are; and, finding slavery to be an established relation of the society in which they live, can see no way in which, let their opinions on the abstract question be what they may, it is in the power of the present generation to relieve themselves from this relation. And candor obliges me to say that I believe they are just as conscientious, many of them, and the religious people, all of them, as they are at the North who hold different opinions.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina the other day alluded to the separation of that great religious community, the Methodist Episcopal Church. That separation was brought about by differences of opinion upon this particular subject of slavery. I felt great concern, as that dispute went on, about the result. I was in hopes that the difference of opinion might be adjusted, because I looked upon that religious denomination as one of the great props of religion and morals throughout the whole country, from Maine to Georgia, and westward to our utmost western boundary. The result was against my wishes and against my hopes. I have read all their proceedings and all their arguments; but I have never yet been able to come to the conclusion that there was any real ground for that separation; in other words, that any good could be produced by that separation. I must say I think there was some want of candor and charity. Sir, when a question of this kind seizes on the religious sentiments of mankind, and comes to be discussed in religious assemblies of the clergy and laity, there is always to be expected, or always to be feared, a great degree of excitement. It is in the nature of man, manifested by his whole history, that religious disputes are apt to become warm in proportion to the strength of the convictions which men entertain of the magnitude of the questions at issue. In all such disputes there will sometimes be found men with whom every thing is absolute; absolutely wrong, or absolutely right. They see the right clearly; they think others ought so to see it; and they are disposed to establish a broad line of distinction between what is right and what is wrong. They are not seldom willing to establish that line upon their own convictions of truth and justice, and are ready to mark and guard it by placing along it a series of dogmas, as lines of boundary on the earth's surface are marked by posts and stones. There are men who, with clear perceptions, as they think, of their own duty, do not see how too eager a pursuit of one duty may involve them in the violation of others, or how too warm an embracement of one truth may lead to a disregard of other truths equally important. As I heard it stated strongly, not many days ago, these persons are disposed to mount upon some particular duty, as upon a war-horse, and to drive furiously on and upon and over all other duties that may stand in the way. There are men who, in reference to disputes of that sort, are of opinion that human duties may be ascertained with the exactness of mathematics. They deal with morals as with mathematics; and they think what is right may be distinguished from what is wrong with the precision of an algebraic equation. They have, therefore, none too much charity towards others who differ from them. They are apt, too, to think that nothing is good but what is perfect, and that there are no compromises or modifications to be made in consideration of difference of opinion or in deference to other men's judgment. If their perspicacious vision enables them to detect a spot on the face of the sun, they think that a good reason why the sun should be struck down from heaven. They prefer the chance of running into utter darkness to living in heavenly light, if that heavenly light be not absolutely without any imperfection. There are impatient men; too impatient always to give heed to the admonition of St. Paul, that we are not to "do evil that good may come"; too impatient to wait for the slow progress of moral causes in the improvement of mankind. They do not remember that the doctrines and the miracles of Jesus Christ have, in eighteen hundred years, converted only a small portion of the human race; and among the nations that are converted to Christianity, they forget how many vices and crimes, public and private, still prevail, and that many of them, public crimes especially, which are so clearly offences against the Christian religion, pass without exciting particular indignation. Thus wars are waged, and unjust wars. I do not deny that there may be just wars. There certainly are; but it was the remark of an eminent person, not many years ago, on the other side of the Atlantic, that it is one of the greatest reproaches to human nature that wars are sometimes just. The defence of nations sometimes causes a just war against the injustice of other nations. In this state of sentiment upon the general nature of slavery lies the cause of a great part of those unhappy divisions, exasperations, and reproaches which find vent and support in different parts of the Union.

But we must view things as they are. Slavery does exist in the United States. It did exist in the States before the adoption of this Constitution, and at that time. Let us, therefore, consider for a moment what was the state of sentiment, North and South, in regard to slavery, at the time this Constitution was adopted. A remarkable change has taken place since; but what did the wise and great men of all parts of the country think of slavery then? In what estimation did they hold it at the time when this Constitution was adopted? It will be found, Sir, if we will carry ourselves by historical research back to that day, and ascertain men's opinions by authentic records 10 still existing among us, that there was then no diversity of opinion between the North and the South upon the subject of slavery. It will be found that both parts of the country held it equally an evil, a moral and political evil. It will not be found that, either at the North or at the South, there was much, though there was some, invective against slavery as inhuman and cruel. 20 The great ground of objection to it was political; that it weakened the social fabric; that, taking the place of free labor, society became less strong and labor less productive; and therefore we find from all the eminent men of the time the clearest expression of their opinion that slavery is an evil. They ascribed its existence here, not without truth, and not without some acer- 30 bity of temper and force of language, to the injurious policy of the mother country, who, to favor the navigator, had entailed these evils upon the Colonies. I need hardly refer, Sir, particularly to the publications of the day. They are matters of history on the record. The eminent men, the most eminent men, and nearly all the conspicuous politicians of the South, held 40 the same sentiments; that slavery was an evil, a blight, a scourge, and a curse. There were no terms of reprobation of slavery so vehement in the North at that day as in the South. The North was not so much excited against it as the South; and the reason is, I suppose, that there was much less of it at the North; and the people did not see, or think they saw, the evils so promi- 50 nently as they were seen, or thought to be seen, at the South.

Then, Sir, when this Constitution was framed, this was the light in which the Federal Convention viewed it. That body reflected the judgment and sentiments of the great men of the South. A member of the other house, whom I have not the honor to know, has, in a recent speech, collected extracts from these public documents. They prove the truth of what I am saying, and the question then was, how to deal with it, and how to deal with it as an evil. They came to this general result. They thought that slavery could not be continued in the country if the importation of slaves were made to cease, and therefore they provided that, after a certain period, the importation might be prevented by the act of the new government. The period of twenty years was proposed by some gentleman from the North, I think, and many members of the Convention from the South opposed it as being too long. Mr. Madison especially was somewhat warm against it. He said it would bring too much of this mischief into the country to allow the importation of slaves for such a period. Because we must take along with us, in the whole of this discussion, when we are considering the sentiments and opinions in which the constitutional provision originated, that the conviction of all men was, that, if the importation of slaves ceased, the white race would multiply faster than the black race, and that slavery would therefore gradually wear out and expire. It may not be improper here to allude to that, I had almost said, celebrated opinion of Mr. Madison. You observe, Sir, that the term slave, or slavery, is not used in the Constitution. The Constitution does not require that "fugitive slaves" shall be delivered up. It requires that persons held to service in one State, and escaping into another, shall be delivered up. Mr. Madison opposed the introduction of the term slave or slavery, into the Constitution; for he said that he did not wish to see it recognized by the Constitution of the United States of America that there could be property in men.

Now, Sir, all this took place in the Convention of 1787; but connected with this, concurrent and contemporaneous, is another important transaction, not sufficiently attended to. The Convention for framing this Constitution assembled in Philadelphia in May, and sat until September, 1787. During all that time the Congress of the United States was in session at New York. It was a matter of design, as we know, that the Convention should not assemble in the same city where Congress was holding its sessions. Almost all the public men of the country, therefore, of distinction and eminence, were in one or the other of these two assemblies; and I think it happened, in some instances, that the same gentlemen were members of both bodies. If I mistake not, such was the case with Mr. Rufus King, then a member of Congress from Massachusetts. Now, at the very time when the Convention in Philadelphia was framing this Constitution, the Congress in New York was framing the Ordinance of 1787, for the organization and government of the territory northwest of the Ohio. They passed that Ordinance on the 13th of July, 1787, at New York, the very month, perhaps the very day, on which these questions about the importation of slaves and the character of slavery were debated in the Convention at Philadelphia. So far as we can now learn, there was a perfect concurrence of opinion between these two bodies; and it resulted in this Ordinance of 1787, excluding slavery from all the territory over which the Congress of the United States had jurisdiction, and that was all the territory northwest of the Ohio. Three years before, Virginia and other States had made a cession of that great territory to the United States; and a most munificent act it was. I never reflect upon it without a disposition to do honor and justice, and justice would be the highest honor, to Virginia, for the cession of her northwestern territory. I will say, Sir, it is one of her fairest claims to the respect and gratitude of the country, and that, perhaps, it is only second to that other claim which belongs to her, that from her counsels, and from the intelligence and patriotism of her leading statesmen, proceeded the first idea put into practice of the formation of a general constitution of the United States. The Ordinance of 1787 applied to the whole territory over which the Congress of the United States had jurisdiction. It was adopted two years before the Constitution of the United States went into operation; because the Ordinance took effect immediately on its passage, while the Constitution of the United States, having been framed, was to be sent to the States to be adopted by their Conventions; and then a government was to be organized under it. This Ordinance, then, was in operation and force when the Constitution was adopted, and the government put in motion, in April, 1789.

Mr. President, three things are quite clear as historical truths. One is, that there was an expectation that, on the ceasing of the importation of slaves from Africa, slavery would begin to run out here. That was hoped and expected. Another is, that, as far as there was any power in Congress to prevent the spread of slavery in the United States, that power was executed in the most absolute manner, and to the fullest extent. An honorable member, whose health does not allow him to be here to-day—

A SENATOR. He is here.

I am very happy to hear that he is; may he long be here, and in the enjoyment of health to serve his country! The honorable member said, the other day, that he considered this Ordinance as the first in the series of measures calculated to enfeeble the South, and deprive them of their just participation in the benefits and privileges of this government. He says, very properly, that it was enacted under the old Confederation, and before this Constitution went into effect; but, my present purpose is only to say, Mr. President, that it was established with the entire and unanimous concurrence of the whole South. Why, there it stands! The vote of every State in the Union was unanimous in favor of the Ordinance, with the exception of a single individual vote, and that individual vote was given by a Northern man. This Ordinance prohibiting slavery for ever northwest of the Ohio has the hand and seal of every Southern member in Congress. It was therefore no aggression of the North on the South. The other and third clear historical truth is, that the Convention meant to leave slavery in the States as they found it, entirely under the authority and control of the States themselves.

This was the state of things, Sir, and this the state of opinion, under which those very important matters were arranged, and those three important things done; that is, the establishment of the Constitution of the United States with a recognition of slavery as it existed in the States; the establishment of the ordinance for the government of the Northwestern Territory, prohibiting, to the full extent of all territory owned by the United States, the introduction of slavery into that territory, while leaving to the States all power over slavery in their own limits; and creating a power, in the new government, to put an end to the importation of slaves, after a limited period. There was entire coincidence and concurrence of sentiment between the North and the South, upon all these questions, at the period of the adoption of the Constitution. But opinions, Sir, have changed, greatly changed; changed North and changed South. Slavery is not regarded in the South now as it was then. I see an honorable member of this body paying me the honor of listening to my remarks; he brings to my mind, Sir, freshly and vividly, what I have learned of his great ancestor, so much distinguished in his day and generation, so worthy to be succeeded by so worthy a grandson, and of the sentiments he expressed in the Convention in Philadelphia.

Here we may pause. There was, if not an entire unanimity, a general concurrence of sentiment running through the whole community, and especially entertained by the eminent men of all parts of the country. But soon a change began, at the North and the South, and a difference of opinion showed itself; the North growing much more warm and strong against slavery, and the South growing much more warm and strong in its support. Sir, there is no generation of mankind whose opinions are not subject to be influenced by what appear to them to be their present emergent and exigent interests. I impute to the South no particularly selfish view in the change which has come over her. I impute to her certainly no dishonest view. All that has happened has been natural. It has followed those causes which always influence the human mind and operate upon it. What, then, have been the causes which have created so new a feeling in favor of slavery in the South, which have changed the whole nomenclature of the South on that subject, so that, from being thought of and described in the terms I have mentioned and will not repeat, it has now become an institution, a cherished institution, in that quarter; no evil, no scourge, but a great religious, social, and moral blessing, as I think I have heard it latterly spoken of? I suppose this, Sir, is owing to the rapid growth and sudden extension of the cotton plantations of the South. So far as any motive consistent with honor, justice, and general judgment could act, it was the cotton interest that gave a new desire to promote slavery, to spread it, and to use its labor. I again say that this change was produced by causes which must always produce like effects. The whole interest of the South became connected, more or less, with the extension of slavery. If we look back to the history of the commerce of this country in the early years of this government, what were our exports? Cotton was hardly, or but to a very limited extent, known. In 1791 the first parcel of cotton of the growth of the United States was exported, and amounted only to 19,200 pounds. It has gone on increasing rapidly, until the whole crop may now, perhaps, in a season of great product and high prices, amount to a hundred millions of dollars. In the years I have mentioned, there was more of wax, more of indigo, 10 more of rice, more of almost every article of export from the South, than of cotton. When Mr. Jay negotiated the treaty of 1794 with England, it is evident from the twelfth article of the treaty, which was suspended by the Senate, that he did not know that cotton was exported at all from the United States.

Well, Sir, we know what followed. 20 The age of cotton became the golden age of our Southern brethren. It gratified their desire for improvement and accumulation, at the same time that it excited it. The desire grew by what it fed upon, and there soon came to be an eagerness for other territory, a new area or new areas for the cultivation of the cotton crop; and measures leading to this result were brought about 30 rapidly, one after another, under the lead of Southern men at the head of the government, they having a majority in both branches of Congress to accomplish their ends. The honorable member from South Carolina observed that there has been a majority all along in favor of the North. If that be true, Sir, the North has acted either very liberally and kindly, or very weakly; 40 for they never exercised that majority efficiently five times in the history of the government, when a division or trial of strength arose. Never. Whether they were out-generalled, or whether it was owing to other causes, I shall not stop to consider; but no man acquainted with the history of the Union can deny that the general lead in the politics of the country, for three fourths 50 of the period that has elapsed since the adoption of the Constitution, has been a Southern lead.

In 1802, in pursuit of the idea of opening a new cotton region, the United States obtained a cession from Georgia of the whole of her western territory, now embracing the rich and growing States of Alabama and Mississippi. In 1803 Louisiana was purchased from France, out of which the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, and Missouri have been framed, as slave-holding States. In 1819 the cession of Florida was made, bringing in another region adapted to cultivation by slaves. Sir, the honorable member from South Carolina thought he saw in certain operations of the government, such as the manner of collecting the revenue, and the tendency of measures calculated to promote emigration into the country, what accounts for the more rapid growth of the North than the South. He ascribes that more rapid growth, not to the operation of time, but to the system of government and administration established under this Constitution. That is matter of opinion. To a certain extent it may be true; but it does seem to me that, if any operation of the government can be shown in any degree to have promoted the population, and growth, and wealth of the North, it is much more sure that there are sundry important and distinct operations of the government, about which no man can doubt, tending to promote, and which absolutely have promoted, the increase of the slave interest and the slave territory of the South. It was not time that brought in Louisiana; it was the act of men. It was not time that brought in Florida; it was the act of men. And lastly, Sir, to complete those acts of legislation which have contributed so much to enlarge the area of the institution of slavery, Texas, great and vast and illimitable Texas, was added to the Union as a slave State in 1845; and that, Sir, pretty much closed the whole chapter, and settled the whole account.

That closed the whole chapter and settled the whole account, because the annexation of Texas, upon the conditions and under the guaranties upon which she was admitted, did not leave within the control of this government an acre of land, capable of being cultivated by slave labor, between this Capitol and the Rio Grande or the Nueces, or whatever is the proper boundary of Texas; not an acre. From that moment the whole country, from this place to the western boundary of Texas, was fixed, pledged, fastened, decided, to be slave territory for ever, by the solemn guaranties of law. And I now say, Sir, as the proposition upon which I stand this day, and upon the truth and firmness of which I intend to act until it is overthrown, that there is not at this moment within the United States, or any territory of the United States, a single foot of land, the character of which, in regard to its being free territory or slave territory, is not fixed by some law, and some irrevocable law, beyond the power of the action of the government. Is it not so with respect to Texas? It is most manifestly so. The honorable member from South Carolina, at the time of the admission of Texas, held an important post in the executive department of the government; he was Secretary of State. Another eminent person of great activity and adroitness in affairs, I mean the late Secretary of the Treasury, was a conspicuous member of this body, and took the lead in the business of annexation, in coöperation with the Secretary of State; and I must say that they did their business faithfully and thoroughly; there was no botch left in it. They rounded it off, and made as close joiner-work as ever was exhibited. Resolutions of annexation were brought into Congress, fitly joined together, compact, efficient, conclusive upon the great objective which they had in view, and those resolutions passed.

Allow me to read a part of these resolutions. It is the third clause of the second section of the resolution of the 1st of March, 1845, for the admission of Texas, which applies to this part of the case. That clause is as follows:—

New States, of convenient size, not exceeding four in number, in addition to said State of Texas, and having sufficient population, may hereafter, by the consent of said State, be formed out of the territory thereof, which shall be entitled to admission under the provisions of the Federal Constitution. And such States as may be formed out of that portion of said territory lying south of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude, commonly known as the Missouri Compromise line, shall be admitted into the Union with or without slavery, as the people of each State asking admission may desire; and in such State or States as shall be formed out of said territory north of said Missouri Compromise line, slavery or involuntary servitude (except for crime) shall be prohibited.

Now, what is here stipulated, enacted, and secured? It is, that all Texas south of 36° 30', which is nearly the whole of it, shall be admitted into the Union as a slave State. It was a slave State, and therefore came in as a slave State; and the guaranty is, that new States shall be made out of it, to the number of four, in addition to the State then in existence and admitted at that time by these resolutions, and that such States as are formed out of that portion of Texas lying south of 36° 30' may come in as slave States. I know no form of legislation which can strengthen this. I know no mode of recognition that can add a tittle of weight to it. I listened respectfully to the resolutions of my honorable friend from Tennessee. He proposed to recognize that stipulation with Texas. But any additional recognition would weaken the force of it; because it stands here on the ground of a contract, a thing done for a consideration. It is a law founded on a contract with Texas, and designed to carry that contract into effect. A recognition now, founded not on any consideration or any contract, would not be so strong as it now stands on the face of the resolution. I know no way, I candidly confess, in which this government, acting in good faith, as I trust it always will, can relieve itself from that stipulation and pledge, by any honest course of legislation whatever. And therefore, I say again, that, so far as Texas is concerned, in the whole of that State south of 36° 30', which, I suppose, embraces all the territory capable of slave cultivation, there is no land, not an acre, the character of which is not established by law; a law which cannot be repealed without the violation of a contract, and plain disregard of the public faith.

I hope, Sir, it is now apparent that my proposition, so far as it respects Texas, has been maintained, and that the provision in this article is clear and absolute; and it has been well suggested by my friend from Rhode Island, that that part of Texas which lies north of 36° 30' of north latitude, and which may be formed into free States, is dependent, in like manner, upon the consent of Texas, herself a slave State.

Now, Sir, how came this? How came it to pass that within these walls, where it is said by the honorable member from South Carolina that the free States have always had a majority, this resolution of annexation, such as I have described it, obtained a majority in both houses of Congress? Sir, it obtained that majority by the great number of Northern votes added to the entire Southern vote, or, at least nearly the whole of the Southern vote. The aggregate was made up of Northern and Southern votes. In the House of Representatives there were about eighty Southern votes and about fifty Northern votes for the admission of Texas. In the Senate the vote for the admission of Texas was twenty-seven, and twenty-five against it; and of those twenty-seven votes, constituting the majority, no less than thirteen came from the free States, and four of them were from New England. The whole of these thirteen Senators, constituting within a fraction, you see, one half of all the votes in this body for the admission of this immeasurable extent of slave territory, were sent here by free States.

Sir, there is not so remarkable a chapter in our history of political events, political parties, and political men as is afforded by this admission of a new slave-holding territory, so vast that a bird cannot fly over it in a week. New England, as I have said, with some of her own votes, supported this measure. Three fourths of the votes of liberty-loving Connecticut were given for it in the other house, and one half here. There was one vote for it from Maine, but, I am happy to say, not the vote of the honorable member who addressed the Senate the day before yesterday, and who was then a Representative from Maine in the House of Representatives; but there was one vote from Maine, ay, and there was one vote for it from Massachusetts, given by a gentleman then representing, and now living in the district in which the prevalence of Free Soil sentiment for a couple of years or so has defeated the choice of any member to represent it in Congress. Sir, that body of Northern and Eastern men who gave those votes at that time are now seen taking upon themselves, in the nomenclature of politics, the appellation of the Northern Democracy. They undertook to wield the destinies of this empire, if I may give that name to a republic, and their policy was, and they persisted in it, to bring into this country and under this government all the territory they could. They did it, in the case of Texas, under pledges, absolute pledges, to the slave interest, and they afterwards lent their aid in bringing in these new conquests, to take their chance for slavery or freedom. My honorable friend from Georgia, in March, 1847, moved the Senate to declare that the war ought not to be prosecuted for the conquest of territory, or for the dismemberment of Mexico. The whole of the Northern Democracy voted against it. He did not get a vote from them. It suited the patriotic and elevated sentiments of the Northern Democracy to bring in a world from among the mountains and valleys of California and New Mexico, or any other part of Mexico, and then quarrel about it; to bring it in, and then endeavor to put upon it the saving grace of the Wilmot Proviso. There were two eminent and highly respectable gentlemen from the North, and East, then leading gentlemen in the Senate, (I refer, and I do so with entire respect, for I entertain for both of those gentlemen, in general, high regard, to Mr. Dix of New York and Mr. Niles of Connecticut,) who both voted for the admission of Texas. They would not have that vote any other way than as it stood; and they would have it as it did stand. I speak of the vote upon the annexation of Texas. Those two gentlemen would have the resolution of annexation just as it is, without amendment; and they voted for it just as it is, and their eyes were all open to its true character. The honorable member from South Carolina who addressed us the other day was then Secretary of State. His correspondence with Mr. Murphy, the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States in Texas, had been published. That correspondence was all before those gentlemen, and the Secretary had the boldness and candor to avow in that correspondence, that the great object sought by the annexation of Texas was to strengthen the slave interest of the South. Why, Sir, he said so in so many words—

MR. CALHOUN. Will the honorable Senator permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Certainly.

MR. CALHOUN. I am very reluctant to interrupt the honorable gentleman; but, upon a point of so much importance, I deem it right to put myself rectus in curia.³ I did not put it upon the ground assumed by the Senator. I put it upon this ground: that Great Britain had announced to this country, in so many words, that her object was to abolish slavery in Texas, and, through Texas, to accomplish the abolition of slavery in the United States and the world. The ground I put it on was, that it would make an exposed frontier, and, if Great Britain succeeded in her object, it would be impossible that that frontier could be secured against the aggressions of the Abolitionists; and that this government was bound, under the guaranties of the Constitution, to protect us against such a state of things.

That comes, I suppose, Sir, to exactly the same thing. It was, that

³ right in the court

Texas must be obtained for the security of the slave interest of the South.

MR. CALHOUN. Another view is very distinctly given.

That was the object set forth in the correspondence of a worthy gentleman not now living, who preceded the honorable member from South Carolina in the Department of State. There repose in the files of the Department, as I have occasion to know, strong letters from Mr. Upshur to the United States minister in England, and I believe there are some to the same minister from the honorable Senator himself, asserting to this effect the sentiments of this government; namely, that Great Britain was expected not to interfere to take Texas out of the hands of its then existing government and make it a free country. But my argument, my suggestion, is this: that those gentlemen who composed the Northern Democracy, when Texas was brought into the Union, saw clearly that it was brought in as a slave country, and brought in for the purpose of being maintained as slave territory, to the Greek Kalends. I rather think the honorable gentleman who was then Secretary of State might, in some of his correspondence with Mr. Murphy, have suggested that it was not expedient to say too much about this object, lest it should create some alarm. At any rate, Mr. Murphy wrote to him that England was anxious to get rid of the constitution of Texas, because it was a constitution establishing slavery; and that what the United States had to do was to aid the people of Texas in upholding their constitution; but that nothing should be said which should offend the fanatical men of the North. But, Sir, the honorable member did avow this object himself, openly, boldly, and manfully; he did not disguise his conduct or his motives.

MR. CALHOUN. Never, never.

What he means he is very apt to say.

MR. CALHOUN. Always, always.

And I honor him for it.

This admission of Texas was in 1845. Then, in 1847, *flagrante bello*¹ between the United States and Mexico, the proposition I have mentioned was brought forward by my friend from Georgia, and the Northern Democracy voted steadily against it. Their remedy was to apply to the acquisitions, after they should come in, the Wilmot Proviso. What follows? These two gentlemen, worthy and honorable and influential men, (and if they had not been they could not have carried the measure,) these two gentlemen, members of this body, brought in Texas, and by their votes they also prevented the passage of the resolution of the honorable member from Georgia, and then they went home and took the lead in the Free Soil party. And there they stand, Sir! They leave us here, bound in honor and conscience by the resolutions of annexation; they leave us here, to take the odium of fulfilling the obligations in favor of slavery which they voted us into, or else the greater odium of violating those obligations, while they are at home making capital and rousing speeches for free soil and no slavery. And therefore I say, Sir, that there is not a chapter in our history, respecting public measures and public men, more full of what would create surprise, more full of what does create, in my mind, extreme mortification, than that of the conduct of the Northern Democracy on this subject.

Mr. President, sometimes, when a man is found in a new relation to things around him and to other men, he says the world has changed, and that he has not changed. I believe, Sir, that our self-respect leads us often to make this declaration in regard to ourselves when it is not exactly true. An individual is more apt to change, perhaps, than all the world around him. But, under the present circumstances, and under the responsibility which I know I incur by what I am now stating here, I feel at liberty to recur to the various expressions and statements, made at various times, of my own opinions and resolutions respecting the admission of Texas, and all that has followed. Sir, as early as 1836, or in the early part of 1837, there was conversation and correspondence between myself and some private friends on this project of annexing Texas to the United States; and an honorable gentleman with whom I have had a long acquaintance, a friend of mine, now perhaps in this chamber, I mean General Hamilton, of South Carolina, was privy to that correspondence. I had voted for the recognition of Texan independence, because I believed it to be an existing fact, surprising and astonishing as it was, and I wished well to the new republic; but I manifested from the first utter opposition to bringing her, with her slave territory, into the Union. I happened, in 1837, to make a public address to political friends in New York, and I then stated my sentiments upon the subject. It was the first time that I had occasion to advert to it; and I will ask a friend near me to have the kindness to read an extract from the speech made by me on that occasion. It was delivered in Niblo's Garden, in 1837.

Mr. Greene then read the following extract from the speech of Mr. Webster, to which he referred:—

"Gentlemen, we all see that, by whomsoever possessed, Texas is likely to be a slave-holding country; and I frankly avow my entire unwillingness to do any thing which shall extend the slavery of the African race on this continent, or add other slave-holding States to the Union. When I say that I regard slavery in itself as a great moral, social, and political evil, I only use language which has been adopted by distinguished men, themselves citizens of slave-holding States. I shall do nothing, therefore, to favor or encourage its further extension. We have slavery already amongst us. The Constitution found it in the Union; it recognized it, and gave it solemn guaranties. To the full extent of these guaranties we are all bound, in honor, in justice, and by the Constitution. All the stipulations contained in the Constitution in favor of the slave-holding States which are already in the Union ought to be fulfilled, and, so far as depends on me, shall be fulfilled, in the fulness of their spirit, and to the exactness of their letter. Slavery, as it exists in the States, is beyond the reach of Congress. It is a concern of the States themselves; they have never submitted it to Congress, and Congress has no rightful power over it. I shall concur, therefore, in no act, no measure, no menace, no indication of purpose, which shall interfere or threaten to interfere with the exclusive authority of the several States over the subject of slavery as it exists within their respective limits. All this appears to me to be matter of plain and imperative duty.

"But when we come to speak of admitting new States, the subject assumes an entirely different aspect. Our rights and our duties are then both different. . . .

"I see, therefore, no political necessity for the annexation of Texas to the Union; no advantages to be derived from it; and objections to it of a strong, and, in my judgment, decisive character."

I have nothing, Sir, to add to, or to take from, those sentiments. That speech, the Senate will perceive, was made in 1837. The purpose of immediately annexing Texas at that time was abandoned or postponed; and it was not revived with any vigor for some years. In the mean time it happened that I had become a member of the executive administration, and was for a short period in the Department of State. The annexation of Texas was a subject of conversation, not confidential, with the President and heads of departments, as well as with other public men. No serious attempt was then made, however, to bring it about. I left the Department of State in May, 1843, and shortly after, I learned, though by means which were no way connected with official information, that a design had been taken up of bringing Texas, with her slave territory and population, into this Union. I was in Washington at the time, and persons are now here who will remember that we had an arranged meeting for conversation upon it. I went home to Massachusetts and proclaimed the existence of that purpose, but I could get no audience and but little attention. Some did not believe it, and some were too much engaged in their own pursuits to give it any heed. They had gone to their farms or to their merchandise, and it was impossible to arouse any feeling in New England, or in Massachusetts, that should combine the two great political parties against this annexation; and, indeed, there was no hope of bringing the Northern Democracy into that view, for their leaning was all the other way. But, Sir, even with Whigs, and leading Whigs, I am ashamed to say, there was a great indifference towards the admission of Texas, with slave territory, into this Union. . . .

But now that, under certain conditions, Texas is in the Union, with all her territory, as a slave State, with a solemn pledge, also, that, if she shall be divided into many States, those States may come in as slave States south of 36° 30', how are we to deal with this subject? I know no way of honest legislation, when the proper time comes for the enactment, but to carry into effect all that we have stipulated to do. I do not entirely agree with my honorable friend from Tennessee, that, as soon as the time comes when she is entitled to another representative, we should create a new State. On former occasions, in creating new States out of territories, we have generally gone upon the idea that, when the population of the territory amounts to about sixty thousand, we would consent to its admission as a State. But it is quite a different thing when a State is divided, and two or more States made out of it. It does not follow in such a case that the same rule of apportionment should be applied. That, however, is a matter for the consideration of Congress, when the proper time arrives. I may not then be here; I may have no vote to give on the occasion; but I wish it to be distinctly understood, that, according to my view of the matter, this government is solemnly pledged, by law and contract, to create new States out of Texas, with her consent, when her population shall justify and call for such a proceeding, and, so far as such States are formed out of Texan territory lying south of 36° 30', to let them come in as slave States. That is the meaning of the contract which our friends, the Northern Democracy, have left us to fulfil; and I, for one, mean to fulfil it, because I will not violate the faith of the government. What I mean to say is, that the time for the admission of new States formed out of Texas, the number of such States, their boundaries, the requisite amount of population, and all other things connected with the admission, are in the free discretion of Congress, except this; to wit, that, when new States formed out of Texas are to be admitted, they have a right by legal stipulation and contract, to come in as slave States.

Now, as to California and New Mexico, I hold slavery to be excluded from those territories by a law even superior to that which admits and sanctions it in Texas. I mean the law of nature, of physical geography, the law of the formation of the earth. That law settles for ever, with a strength beyond all terms of human enactment, that slavery cannot exist in California or New Mexico. Understand me, Sir; I mean slavery as we regard it; the slavery of the colored race as it exists in the Southern States. I shall not discuss the point, but leave it to the learned gentlemen who have undertaken to discuss it; but I suppose there is no slavery of that description in California now. I understand that peonism, a sort of penal servitude, exists there, or rather a sort of voluntary sale of a man and his offspring for debt, an arrangement of a peculiar nature known to the law of Mexico. But what I mean to say is, that it is as impossible that African slavery, as we see it among us, should find its way, or be introduced, into California and New Mexico, as any other natural impossibility. California and New Mexico are Asiatic in their formation and scenery. They are composed of vast ridges of mountains of great height, with broken ridges and deep valleys. The sides of these mountains are entirely barren; their tops capped by perennial snow. There may be in California, now made free by its constitution, and no doubt there are, some tracts of valuable land. But it is not so in New Mexico. Pray, what is the evidence which every gentleman must have obtained on this subject, from information sought by himself or communicated by others? I have inquired and read all I could find, in order to acquire information on this important subject. What is there in New Mexico that could, by any possibility, induce any body to go there with slaves? There are some narrow strips of tillable land on the borders of the rivers; but the rivers themselves dry up before midsummer is gone. All that the people can do in that region is to raise some little articles, some little wheat for their tortillas, and that by irrigation. And who expects to see a hundred black men cultivating tobacco, corn, cotton, rice, or any thing else on lands in New Mexico, made fertile only by irrigation?

I look upon it, therefore, as a fixed fact, to use the current expression of the day, that both California and New Mexico are destined to be free, so far as they are settled at all, which I believe, in regard to New Mexico, will be but partially for a great length of time; free by the arrangement of things ordained by the Power above us. I have therefore to say, in this respect also, that this country is fixed for freedom, to as many persons as shall ever live in it, by a less repealable law than that which attaches to the right of holding slaves in Texas; and I will say further, that, if a resolution or a bill were now before us, to provide a territorial government for New Mexico, I would not vote to put any prohibition into it whatever. Such a prohibition would be idle, as it respects any effect it would have upon the territory; and I would not take pains uselessly to reëffirm an ordinance of nature, nor to reenact the will of God. I would put in no Wilmot Proviso for the mere purpose of a taunt or a reproach. I would put into it no evidence of the votes of superior power, exercised for no purpose but to wound the pride, whether a just and a rational pride, or an irrational pride, of the citizens of the Southern States. I have no such object, no such purpose. They would think it a taunt, an indignity; they would think it to be an act taking away from them what they regard as a proper equality of privilege. Whether they expect to realize any benefit from it or not, they would think it at least a plain theoretic wrong: that something more or less derogatory to their character and their rights had taken place. I propose to inflict no such wound upon any body, unless something essentially important to the country, and efficient to the preservation of liberty and freedom, is to be effected. I repeat, therefore, Sir, and, as I do not propose to address the Senate often on this subject, I repeat it because I wish it to be distinctly understood, that, for the reasons stated, if a proposition were now here to establish a government for New Mexico, and it was moved to insert a provision for a prohibition of slavery, I would not vote for it. . . .

Now, Mr. President, I have established, so far as I proposed to do so, the proposition with which I set out, and upon which I intend to stand or fall; and that is, that the whole territory within the former United States, or in the newly acquired Mexican provinces, has a fixed and settled character, now fixed and settled by law which cannot be repealed; in the case of Texas without a violation of public faith, and by no human power in regard to California or New Mexico; that, therefore, under one or other of these laws, every foot of land in the States or in the Territories has already received a fixed and decided character.

Mr. President, in the excited times in which we live, there is found to exist a state of crimination and recrimination between the North and South. There are lists of grievances produced by each; and those grievances, real or supposed, alienate the minds of one portion of the country from the other, exasperate the feelings, and subdue the sense of fraternal affection, patriotic love, and mutual regard. I shall bestow a little attention, Sir, upon these various grievances existing on the one side and on the other. I begin with complaints of the South. I will not answer, further than I have, the general statements of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, that the North has prospered at the expense of the South in consequence of the manner of administering this government, in the collecting of its revenues, and so forth. These are disputed topics, and I have no inclination to enter into them. But I will allude to other complaints of the South, and especially to one which has in my opinion just foundation; and that is, that there has been found at the North, among individuals and among legislators, a disinclination to perform fully their constitutional duties in regard to the return of persons bound to service who have escaped into the free States. In that respect, the South, in my judgment, is right, and the North is wrong. Every member of every Northern legislature is bound by oath, like every other officer in the country, to support the Constitution of the United States; and the article of the Constitution which says to these States that they shall deliver up fugitives from service is as binding in honor and conscience as any other article. No man fulfils his duty in any legislature who sets himself to find excuses, evasions, escapes from this constitutional obligation. I have always thought that the Constitution addressed itself to the legislatures of the States or to the States themselves. It says that those persons escaping to other States "shall be delivered up," and I confess I have always been of the opinion that it was an injunction upon the States themselves. When it is said that a person escaping into another State, and coming therefore within the jurisdiction of that State, shall be delivered up, it seems to me the import of the clause is, that the State itself, in obedience to the Constitution, shall cause him to be delivered up. That is my judgment. I have always entertained that opinion, and I entertain it now. But when the subject, some years ago, was before the Supreme Court of the United States, the majority of the judges held that the power to cause fugitives from service to be delivered up was a power to be exercised under the authority of this government. I do not know, on the whole, that it may not have been a fortunate decision. My habit is to respect the result of judicial deliberations and the solemnity of judicial decisions. As it now stands, the business of seeing that these fugitives are delivered up resides in the power of Congress and the national judicature, and my friend at the head of the Judiciary Committee has a bill on the subject now before the Senate, which, with some amendments to it, I propose to support, with all its provisions, to the fullest extent. And I desire to call the attention of all sober-minded men at the North, of all conscientious men, of all men who are not carried away by some fanatical idea or some false impression, to their constitutional obligations. I put it to all the sober and sound minds at the North as a question of morals and a question of conscience. What right have they, in their legislative capacity or any other capacity, to endeavor to get round this Constitution, or to embarrass the free exercise of the rights secured by the Constitution to the persons whose slaves escape from them? None at all; none at all. Neither in the forum of conscience, nor before the face of the Constitution, are they, in my opinion, justified in such an attempt. Of course it is a matter for their consideration. They probably, in the excitement of the times, have not stopped to consider of this. They have followed what seemed to be the current of thought and of motives, as the occasion arose, and they have neglected to investigate fully the real question, and to consider their constitutional obligations; which, I am sure, if they did consider, they would fulfil with alacrity. I repeat, therefore, Sir, that here is a well-founded ground of complaint against the North, which ought to be removed, which it is now in the power of the different departments of this government to remove; which calls for the enactment of proper laws authorizing the judicature of this government, in the several States, to do all that is necessary for the recapture of fugitive slaves and for their restoration to those who claim them. Wherever I go, and whenever I speak on the subject, and when I speak here I desire to speak to the whole North, I say that the South has been injured in this respect, and has a right to complain; and the North has been too careless of what I think the Constitution peremptorily and emphatically enjoins upon her as a duty. . . .

Then, Sir, there are the Abolition societies, of which I am unwilling to speak, but in regard to which I have very clear notions and opinions. I do not think them useful. I think their operations for the last twenty years have produced nothing good or valuable. At the same time, I believe thousands of their members to be honest and good men, perfectly well-meaning men. They have excited feelings; they think they must do something for the cause of liberty; and, in their sphere of action, they do not see what else they can do than to contribute to an Abolition press, or an Abolition society, or to pay an Abolition lecturer. I do not mean to impute gross motives even to the leaders of these societies, but I am not blind to the consequences of their proceedings. I cannot but see what mischiefs their interference with the South has produced. And is it not plain to every man? Let any gentleman who entertains doubts on this point recur to the debates in the Virginia House of Delegates in 1832, and he will see with what freedom a proposition made by Mr. Jefferson Randolph for the gradual abolition of slavery was discussed in that body. Every one spoke of slavery as he thought; very ignominious and disparaging names and epithets were applied to it. The debates in the House of Delegates on that occasion, I believe, were all published. They were read by every colored man who could read, and to those who could not read, those debates were read by others. At that time Virginia was not unwilling or afraid to discuss this question, and to let that part of her population know as much of the discussion as they could learn. That was in 1832. As has been said by the honorable member from South Carolina, these Abolition societies commenced their course of action in 1835. It is said, I do not know how true it may be, that they sent incendiary publications into the slave States; at any rate, they attempted to arouse, and did arouse, a very strong feeling; in other words, they created great agitation in the North against Southern slavery. Well, what was the result? 10 The bonds of the slaves were bound more firmly than before, their rivets were more strongly fastened. Public opinion, which in Virginia had begun to be exhibited against slavery, and was opening out for the discussion of the question, drew back and shut itself up in its castle. I wish to know whether any body in Virginia can now talk openly as Mr. Randolph, Governor Mc- 20 Dowell, and others talked in 1832, and sent their remarks to the press? We all know the fact, and we all know the cause; and every thing that these agitating people have done has been, not to enlarge, but to restrain, not to set free, but to bind faster, the slave population of the South.

Again, Sir, the violence of the Northern press is complained of. The press 30 violent! Why, Sir, the press is violent everywhere. There are outrageous reproaches in the North against the South, and there are reproaches as vehement in the South against the North. Sir, the extremists of both parts of this country are violent; they mistake loud and violent talk for eloquence and for reason. They think that he who talks loudest reasons best. And 40 this we must expect, when the press is free, as it is here, and I trust always will be; for, with all its licentiousness and all its evil, the entire and absolute freedom of the press is essential to the preservation of government on the basis of a free constitution. Wherever it exists there will be foolish and violent paragraphs in the newspapers, as there are, I am sorry to say, foolish and violent 50 speeches in both houses of Congress. In truth, Sir, I must say that, in my opinion, the vernacular tongue of the country has become greatly vitiated, depraved, and corrupted by the style of our Congressional debates. And if it were possible for those debates to vitiate the principles of the people as much as they have depraved their tastes, I should cry out, "God save the Republic!"

Well, in all this I see no solid grievance, no grievance presented by the South, within the redress of the government, but the single one to which I have referred; and that is, the want of a proper regard to the injunction of the Constitution for the delivery of fugitive slaves.

There are also complaints of the North against the South. I need not go over them particularly. The first and gravest is, that the North adopted the Constitution, recognizing the existence of slavery in the States, and recognizing the right, to a certain extent, of the representation of slaves in Congress, under a state of sentiment and expectation which does not now exist; and that, by events, by circumstances, by the eagerness of the South to acquire territory and extend her slave population, the North finds itself, in regard to the relative influence of the South and the North, of the free States and the slave States, where it never did expect to find itself when they agreed to the compact of the Constitution. They complain, therefore, that instead of slavery being regarded as an evil, as it was then, an evil which all hoped would be extinguished gradually, it is now regarded by the South as an institution to be 40 cherished, and preserved, and extended; an institution which the South has already extended to the utmost of her power by the acquisition of new territory.

Well, then, passing from that, every body in the North reads; and every body reads whatsoever the newspapers contain; and the newspapers, some of them, especially those presses to which I have alluded, are careful to spread about among the people every reproachful sentiment uttered by any Southern man bearing at all against the North; every thing that is calculated to ex-

asperate and to alienate; and there are many such things, as every body will admit, from the South, or some portion of it, which are disseminated among the reading people; and they do exasperate, and alienate, and produce a most mischievous effect upon the public mind at the North. Sir, I would not notice things of this sort appearing in obscure quarters; but one thing has occurred in this debate which struck me very forcibly. An honorable member from Louisiana addressed us the other day on this subject. I suppose there is not a more amiable and worthy gentleman in this chamber, nor a gentleman who would be more slow to give offence to any body, and he did not mean in his remarks to give offence. But what did he say? Why, Sir, he took pains to run a contrast between the slaves of the South and the laboring people of the North, giving the preference, in all points of condition, and comfort, and happiness, to the slaves of the South. The honorable member, doubtless, did not suppose that he gave any offence, or did any injustice. He was merely expressing his opinion. But does he know how remarks of that sort will be received by the laboring people of the North? Why, who are the laboring people of the North? They are the whole North. They are the people who till their own farms with their own hands; freeholders, educated men, independent men. Let me say, Sir, that five sixths of the whole property of the North is in the hands of the laborers of the North; they cultivate their farms, they educate their children, they provide the means of independence. If they are not freeholders, they earn wages; these wages accumulate, are turned into capital, into new freeholds, and small capitalists are created. Such is the case, and such the course of things, among the industrious and frugal. And what can these people think when so respectable and worthy a gentleman as the member from Louisiana undertakes to prove that the absolute ignorance and the abject slavery of the South are more in conformity with the high purposes and destiny of immortal, rational human beings, than the educated, the independent free labor of the North?

There is a more tangible and irritating cause of grievance at the North. Free blacks are constantly employed in the vessels of the North, generally as cooks or stewards. When the vessel arrives at a Southern port, these free colored men are taken on shore, by the police or municipal authority, imprisoned, and kept in prison till the vessel is again ready to sail. This is not only irritating, but exceedingly unjustifiable and oppressive. Mr. Hoar's mission, some time ago, to South Carolina, was a well-intended effort to remove this cause of complaint. The North thinks such imprisonments illegal and unconstitutional; and as the cases occur constantly and frequently, they regard it as a great grievance.

Now, Sir, so far as any of these grievances have their foundation in matters of law, they can be redressed, and ought to be redressed; and so far as they have their foundation in matters of opinion, in sentiment, in mutual crimination and recrimination, all that we can do is to endeavor to allay the agitation, and cultivate a better feeling and more fraternal sentiments between the South and the North.

Mr. President, I should much prefer to have heard from every member on this floor declarations of opinion that this Union could never be dissolved, than the declaration of opinion by any body, that, in any case, under the pressure of any circumstances, such a dissolution was possible. I hear with distress and anguish the word "secession," especially when it falls from the lips of those who are patriotic, and known to the country, and known all over the world, for their political services. Secession! Peaceable secession! Sir, your eyes and mine are never destined to see that miracle. The dismemberment of this vast country without convulsion! The breaking up of the fountains of the great deep without ruffling the surface! Who is so foolish, I beg every body's pardon, as to expect to see any such thing? Sir, he who sees these States; now revolving in harmony around a common centre, and expects to see them quit their places and fly off without convulsion, may look the next hour to see the heavenly bodies rush from their spheres, and jostle against each other in the realms of space, without causing the wreck of the universe. 10 There can be no such thing as a peaceable secession. Peaceable secession is an utter impossibility. Is the great Constitution under which we live, covering this whole country, is it to be thawed and melted away by secession, as the snows on the mountain melt under the influence of a vernal sun, disappear almost unobserved, and run off? No, Sir! No, Sir! I will not state 20 what might produce the disruption of the Union; but, Sir, I see as plainly as I see the sun in heaven what that disruption itself must produce; I see that it must produce war, and such a war as I will not describe, in its twofold character.

Peaceable secession! Peaceable secession! The concurrent agreement of all the members of this great republic to separate! A voluntary separation, with alimony on one side and on the other! Why, what would be the result? Where is the line to be drawn? What States are to secede? What is to remain American? What am I to be? An American no longer? Am I to become a sectional man, a local man, a separatist, with no country in common with the gentlemen who sit around me here, 40 or who fill the other house of Congress? Heaven forbid! Where is the flag of the republic to remain? Where is the eagle still to tower? Or is he to cower, and shrink, and fall to the ground? Why, Sir, our ancestors, our fathers and our grandfathers, those of them that are yet living amongst us with prolonged lives, would rebuke and reproach us; and our children and our grand- 50 children would cry out shame upon us, if we of this generation should dishonor these ensigns of the power of the government and the harmony of that

Union which is every day felt among us with so much joy and gratitude. What is to become of the army? What is to become of the navy? What is to become of the public lands? How is each of the thirty States to defend itself? I know, although the idea has not been stated distinctly, there is to be, or it is supposed possible that there will be, a Southern Confederacy. I do not mean, when I allude to this statement, that any one seriously contemplates such a state of things. I do not mean to say that it is true, but I have heard it suggested elsewhere, that the idea has been entertained, that, after the dissolution of this Union, a Southern Confederacy might be formed. I am sorry, Sir, that it has ever been thought of, 10 talked of, or dreamed of, in the wildest flights of human imagination. But the idea, so far as it exists, must be of a separation, assigning the slave States to one side and the free States to the other. Sir, I may express myself too strongly, perhaps, but there are impossibilities in the natural as well as in the physical world, and I hold the idea of a separation of these States, those that 30 are free to form one government, and those that are slave-holding to form another, as such an impossibility. We could not separate the States by any such line, if we were to draw it. We could not sit down here to-day and draw a line of separation that would satisfy any five men in the country. There are natural causes that would keep and tie us together, and there are 40 social and domestic relations which we could not break if we would, and which we should not if we could.

Sir, nobody can look over the face of this country at the present moment, nobody can see where its population is the most dense and growing, without being ready to admit, and compelled to admit, that ere long the strength of America will be in the Valley of the Mississippi. Well, now, Sir, I beg to 50 inquire what the wildest enthusiast has to say on the possibility of cutting that river in two, and leaving free States at its source and on its branches, and slave

States down near its mouth, each forming a separate government? Pray, Sir, let me say to the people of this country, that these things are worthy of their pondering and of their consideration. Here, Sir, are five millions of freemen in the free States north of the river Ohio. Can any body suppose that this population can be severed, by a line that divides them from the territory of a foreign and an alien government, down somewhere, the Lord knows where, upon the lower banks of the Mississippi? What would become of Missouri? Will she join the arrondissement of the slave States? Shall the man from the Yellowstone and the Platte be connected, in the new republic, with the man who lives on the southern extremity of the Cape of Florida? Sir, I am ashamed to pursue this line of remark. I dislike it, I have an utter disgust for it. I would rather hear of natural blasts and mildews, war, pestilence, and famine, than to hear gentlemen talk of secession. To break up this great government! to dismember this glorious country; to astonish Europe with an act of folly such as Europe for two centuries has never beheld in any government or any people!! No, Sir! no, Sir! There will be no secession! Gentlemen are not serious when they talk of secession.

Sir, I hear there is to be a convention held at Nashville. I am bound to believe that, if worthy gentlemen meet at Nashville in convention, their object will be to adopt conciliatory counsels; to advise the South to forbearance and moderation, and to advise the North to forbearance and moderation; and to inculcate principles of brotherly love and affection, and attachment to the Constitution of the country as it now is. I believe, if the convention meet at all, it will be for this purpose; for certainly, if they meet for any purpose hostile to the Union, they have been singularly inappropriate in their selection of a place. I remember, Sir, that, when the treaty of Amiens was concluded between France and England, a sturdy Englishman and a distinguished orator, who regarded the conditions of the peace as ignominious to England, said in the House of Commons, that, if King William could know the terms of that treaty, he would turn in his coffin! Let me commend this saying of Mr. Windham, in all its emphasis and in all its force, to any persons who shall meet at Nashville for the purpose of concerting measures for the overthrow of this Union over the bones of Andrew Jackson!

Sir, I wish now to make two remarks, and hasten to a conclusion. I wish to say, in regard to Texas, that if it should be hereafter, at any time, the pleasure of the government of Texas to cede to the United States a portion, larger or smaller, of her territory which lies adjacent to New Mexico, and north of 36° 30' of north latitude, to be formed into free States, for a fair equivalent in money or in the payment of her debt, I think it an object well worthy the consideration of Congress, and I shall be happy to concur in it myself, if I should have a connection with the government at that time.

I have one other remark to make. In my observations upon slavery as it has existed in this country, and as it now exists, I have expressed no opinion of the mode of its extinguishment or melioration. I will say, however, though I have nothing to propose, because I do not deem myself so competent as other gentlemen to take any lead on this subject, that if any gentleman from the South shall propose a scheme, to be carried on by this government upon a large scale, for the transportation of free colored people to any colony or any place in the world, I should be quite disposed to incur almost any degree of expense to accomplish that object. Nay, Sir, following an example set more than twenty years ago by a great man, then a Senator from New York, I would return to Virginia, and through her to the whole South, the money received from the lands and territories ceded by her to this government, for any such purpose as to remove, in whole or in part, or in any way to diminish or deal beneficially with, the free colored population of the Southern States. I have said that I honor Virginia for her cession of this territory. There have been received into the treasury of the United States eighty millions of dollars, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands 10 ceded by her. If the residue should be sold at the same rate, the whole aggregate will exceed two hundred millions of dollars. If Virginia and the South see fit to adopt any proposition to relieve themselves from the free people of color among them, or such as may be made free, they have my full consent that the government shall pay them any sum of money out of the pro- 20 ceeds of that cession which may be adequate to the purpose.

And now, Mr. President, I draw these observations to a close. I have spoken freely, and I meant to do so. I have sought to make no display. I have sought to enliven the occasion by no animated discussion, nor have I attempted any train of elaborate argu- 30 ment. I have wished only to speak my sentiments, fully and at length; being desirous, once and for all, to let the Senate know, and to let the country know, the opinions and sentiments which I entertain on all these subjects. These opinions are not likely to be suddenly changed. If there be any future service that I can render to the country, consistently with these sentiments and opinions, I shall cheerfully render it. 40 If there be not, I shall still be glad to have had an opportunity to disburden myself from the bottom of my heart, and to make known every political sentiment that therein exists.

And now, Mr. President, instead of speaking of the possibility or utility of secession, instead of dwelling in those caverns of darkness, instead of groping with those ideas so full of all that is 50 horrid and horrible, let us come out into the light of day; let us enjoy the fresh air of Liberty and Union; let us cherish those hopes which belong to us; let us devote ourselves to those great objects that are fit for our consideration and our action; let us raise our conceptions to the magnitude and the importance of the duties that devolve upon us; let our comprehension be as broad as the country for which we act, our aspirations as high as its certain destiny; let us not be pigmies in a case that calls for men. Never did there devolve on any generation of men higher trusts than now devolve upon us, for the preservation of this Constitution and the harmony and peace of all who are destined to live under it. Let us make our generation one of the strongest and brightest links in that golden chain which is destined, I fondly believe, to grapple the people of all the States to this Constitution for ages to come. We have a great, popular, constitutional government, guarded by law and by judicature, and defended by the affections of the whole people. No monarchical throne presses the States together, no iron chain of military power encircles them; they live and stand under a government popular in its form, representative in its character, founded upon principles of equality, and so constructed, we hope, as to last for ever. In all its history it has been beneficent; it has trodden down no man's liberty; it has crushed no State. Its daily respiration is liberty and patriotism; its yet youthful veins are full of enterprise, courage, and honorable love of glory and renown. Large before, the country has now, by recent events, become vastly larger. This republic now extends, with a vast breadth, across the whole continent. The two great seas of the world wash the one and the other shore. We realize, on a mighty scale, the beautiful description of the ornamental border of the buckler of Achilles:—

Now, the broad shield complete, the artist crowned
With his last hand, and poured the ocean
round;
In living silver seemed the waves to roll,
And beat the buckler's verge, and bound the whole.

HARRIET BEECHER STOWE (1811-1896)

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN

CHAPTER IX

IN WHICH IT APPEARS THAT A SENATOR IS BUT A MAN

... Mrs. Bird hastily deposited the 10 various articles she had collected in a small plain trunk, and locking it, desired her husband to see it in the carriage, and then proceeded to call the woman. Soon, arrayed in a cloak, bonnet, and shawl, that had belonged to her benefactress, she appeared at the door with her child in her arms. Mr. Bird hurried her into the carriage, and Mrs. Bird pressed on after her to the 20 carriage steps. Eliza leaned out of the carriage, and put out her hand,—a hand as soft and beautiful as was given in return. She fixed her large, dark eyes, full of earnest meaning, on Mrs. Bird's face, and seemed going to speak. Her lips moved,—she tried once or twice, but there was no sound,—and pointing upward, with a look never to be forgotten, she fell back in the seat, and 30 covered her face. The door was shut, and the carriage drove on.

What a situation, now, for a patriotic senator, that had been all the week before spurring up the legislature of his native state to pass more stringent resolutions against escaping fugitives, their harborers and abettors!

Our good senator in his native state had not been exceeded by any of his 40 brethren at Washington, in the sort of eloquence which has won for them immortal renown! How sublimely he had sat with his hands in his pockets, and scouted all sentimental weakness of those who would put the welfare of a few miserable fugitives before great state interests!

He was as bold as a lion about it, and "mightily convinced" not only 50 himself, but everybody that heard him;—but then his idea of a fugitive was only an idea of the letters that spell the word,—or, at the most, the image of a little newspaper picture of a man with a stick and bundle, with "Ran away from the subscriber" under it. The magic of the real presence of distress,—the imploring human eye, the frail, trembling human hand, the despairing appeal of helpless agony,—these he had never tried. He had never thought that a fugitive might be a hap- less mother, a defenceless child,—like that one which was now wearing his lost boy's little well-known cap; and so, as our poor senator was not stone or steel,—as he was a man, and a down-right noble-hearted one, too,—he was, as everybody must see, in a sad case for his patriotism. And you need not exult over him, good brother of the Southern States; for we have some ink- 20 lings that many of you, under similar circumstances, would not do much better. We have reason to know, in Kentucky, as in Mississippi, are noble and generous hearts, to whom never was tale of suffering told in vain. Ah, good brother! is it fair for you to expect of us services which your own brave, honorable heart would not allow you to render, were you in our place?

Be that as it may, if our good senator was a political sinner, he was in a fair way to expiate it by his night's penance. There had been a long continuous period of rainy weather, and the soft, rich earth of Ohio, as every one knows, is admirably suited to the manufacture of mud,—and the road was an Ohio railroad of the good old times.

"And pray, what sort of a road may that be?" says some eastern traveller, who has been accustomed to connect no ideas with a railroad but those of smoothness or speed.

Know, then, innocent eastern friend, that in benighted regions of the west, where the mud is of unfathomable and sublime depth, roads are made of round rough logs, arranged transversely side 50 by side, and coated over in their pristine freshness with earth, turf, and whatsoever may come to hand, and then the rejoicing native calleth it a road, and straightway essayeth to ride thereupon. In process of time, the rains wash off all the turf and grass aforesaid, move the logs hither and thither, in picturesque positions, up, down, and crosswise, with divers chasms and ruts of black mud intervening.

Over such a road as this our senator went stumbling along, making moral reflections as continuously as under the circumstances could be expected,—the carriage proceeding along much as follows,—bump! bump! bump! slush! down in the mud!—the senator, woman, and child reversing their positions so suddenly as to come, without any very accurate adjustment, against the windows of the down-hill side. Carriage sticks fast, while Cudjoe on the outside is heard making a great muster among the horses. After various ineffectual pullings and twitchings, just as the senator is losing all patience, the carriage suddenly rights itself with a bounce,—two front wheels go down into another abyss, and senator, woman, and child all tumble promiscuously on to the front seat,—senator's hat is jammed over his eyes and nose quite unceremoniously, and he considers himself fairly extinguished;—child cries, and Cudjoe on the outside delivers animated addresses to the horses, who are kicking, and floundering, and straining, under repeated cracks of the whip. Carriage springs up, with another bounce,—down go the hind wheels,—senator, woman, and child fly over on to the back seat, his elbows encountering her bonnet, and both her feet being jammed into his hat, which flies off in the concussion. After a few moments the "slough" is passed, and the horses stop, panting;—the senator finds his hat, the woman straightens her bonnet and hushes her child, and they brace themselves firmly for what is yet to come.

For a while only the continuous bump! bump! intermingled, just by way of variety, with divers side plunges and compound shakes; and they begin to flatter themselves that they are not so badly off, after all. At last, with a square plunge, which puts all on to their feet and then down into their seats with incredible quickness, the carriage stops,—and, after much outside commotion, Cudjoe appears at the door.

"Please, sir, it's powerful bad spot, this yer. I don't know how we's to get clar out. I'm a thinkin' we'll have to be a gettin' rails."

The senator despairingly steps out, picking gingerly for some firm foothold; down goes one foot an immeasurable depth,—he tries to pull it up, loses his balance, and tumbles over into the mud, and is fished out, in a very despairing condition, by Cudjoe.

But we forbear, out of sympathy to our readers' bones. Western travellers, who have beguiled the midnight hour in the interesting process of pulling down rail fences, to pry their carriages out of mud-holes, will have a respectful and mournful sympathy with our unfortunate hero. We beg them to drop a silent tear, and pass on.

It was full late in the night when the carriage emerged, dripping and bespattered, out of the creek, and stood at the door of a large farm-house.

It took no inconsiderable perseverance to arouse the inmates; but at last the respectable proprietor appeared, and undid the door. He was a great, tall, bristling Orson of a fellow, full six feet and some inches in his stockings, and arrayed in a red flannel hunting-shirt. A very heavy mat of sandy hair, in a decidedly tousled condition, and a beard of some days' growth, gave the worthy man an appearance, to say the least, not particularly prepossessing. He stood for a few minutes holding the candle aloft, and blinking on our travellers with a dismal and mystified expression that was truly ludicrous. It cost some effort of our senator to induce him to comprehend the case fully; and while he is doing his best at that, we shall give him a little introduction to our readers.

Honest old John Van Trompe was once quite a considerable land-holder and slave-owner in the State of Kentucky. Having "nothing of the bear about him but the skin," and being gifted by nature with a great, honest, just heart, quite equal to his gigantic frame, he had been for some years witnessing with repressed uneasiness the workings of a system equally bad for oppressor and oppressed. At last, one day, John's great heart had swelled altogether too big to wear its bonds 10 any longer; so he just took his pocket-book out of his desk, and went over into Ohio, and bought a quarter of a township of good, rich land, made out free papers for all his people,—men, women, and children,—packed them up in wagons, and sent them off to settle down; and then honest John turned his face up the creek, and sat quietly down on a snug, retired farm, to enjoy 20 his conscience and his reflections.

"Are you the man that will shelter a poor woman and child from slave-catchers?" said the senator, explicitly.

"I rather think I am," said honest John, with some considerable emphasis.

"I thought so," said the senator.

"If there's anybody comes," said the good man, stretching his tall, muscular 30 form upward, "why here I'm ready for him; and I've got seven sons, each six foot high, and they'll be ready for 'em. Give our respects to 'em," said John; "tell 'em it's no matter how soon they call,—make no kinder difference to us," said John, running his fingers through the shock of hair that thatched his head, and bursting out into a great laugh.

Weary, jaded, and spiritless, Eliza dragged herself up to the door, with her child lying in a heavy sleep on her arm. The rough man held the candle to her face, and uttering a kind of compassionate grunt, opened the door of a small bedroom adjoining to the large kitchen where they were standing, and motioned her to go in. He took down 50 a candle, and lighting it, set it upon the table, and then addressed himself to Eliza.

"Now, I say, gal, you needn't be a bit afeard, let who will come here. I'm up to all that sort o' thing," said he, pointing to two or three goodly rifles over the mantel-piece; "and most people that know me know that 'twouldn't be healthy to try to get anybody out o' my house when I'm agin it. So now you jist go to sleep now, as quiet as if yer mother was a rockin' ye," said he, as he shut the door.

"Why, this is an uncommon handsome un," he said to the senator. "Ah, well; handsome uns has the greatest cause to run, sometimes, if they has any kind o' feelin', such as decent women should. I know all about that."

The senator, in a few words, briefly explained Eliza's history.

"Oh! ou! aw! now, I want to know?" said the good man, pitifully; "sho! now sho! That's natur now, poor crittur! hunted down now like a deer,—hunted down, jest for havin' natural feelin's, and doin' what no kind o' mother could help a doin'! I tell ye what, these yer things make me come the niggest to swearin', now, o' most anything," said honest John, as he wiped his eyes with the back of a great, freckled, yellow hand. "I tell yer what, stranger, it was years and years before I'd jine the church, 'cause the ministers round in our parts used to preach that the Bible went in for these ere cuttings up,—and I couldn't be up to 'em with their Greek and Hebrew, and so I took up agin 'em, Bible and all. I never jined the church till I found a minister that was up to 'em all in Greek and all that, and he said right the contrary; and 40 then I took right hold, and jined the church,—I did now, fact," said John, who had been all this time uncorking some very frisky bottled cider, which at this juncture he presented.

"Ye'd better jest put up here, now, till daylight," said he, heartily, "and I'll call up the old woman, and have a bed got ready for you in no time."

"Thank you, my good friend," said the senator. "I must be along, to take the night stage for Columbus."

"Ah! well, then, if you must, I'll go a piece with you, and show you a cross road that will take you there better than the road you came on. That road's mighty bad."

John equipped himself, and, with a lantern in hand, was soon seen guiding the senator's carriage towards a road that ran down in a hollow, back of his dwelling. When they parted, the senator put into his hand a ten-dollar bill.

"It's for her," he said, briefly.

"Ay, ay," said John, with equal conciseness.

They shook hands, and parted.

CHAPTER XIX

ST. CLARE DISCUSSES "THE INSTITUTION"

Miss Ophelia sat down, and pulled out her knitting-work, and sat there grim with indignation. She knit and knit, but while she mused the fire burned; at last she broke out,—

"I tell you, Augustine, I can't get over things so, if you can. It's a perfect abomination for you to defend such a system,—that's my mind!"

"What now?" said St. Clare, looking up. "At it again, hey?"

"I say it's perfectly abominable for you to defend such a system!" said Miss Ophelia, with increasing warmth.

"I defend it, my dear lady? Who ever said I did defend it?" said St. Clare.

"Of course, you defend it,—you all do,—all you Southerners. What do you have slaves for, if you don't?"

"Are you such a sweet innocent as to suppose nobody in this world ever does what they don't think is right? Don't you, or didn't you ever, do anything that you did not think quite right?"

"If I do, I repent of it, I hope," said Miss Ophelia, rattling her needles with energy.

"So do I," said St. Clare, peeling his orange; "I'm repenting of it all the time."

"What do you keep on doing it for?"

"Didn't you ever keep on doing wrong, after you'd repented, my good cousin?"

"Well, only when I've been very much tempted," said Miss Ophelia.

"Well, I'm very much tempted," said St. Clare; "that's just my difficulty."

"But I always resolve I won't, and I try to break off."

"Well, I have been resolving I won't, off and on, these ten years," said St. Clare; "but I haven't, some how, got clear. Have you got clear of all your sins, cousin?"

"Cousin Augustine," said Miss Ophelia, seriously, and laying down her knitting-work, "I suppose I deserve that you should reprove my shortcomings. I know all you say is true enough; nobody else feels them more than I do; but it does seem to me, after all, there is some difference between me and you. It seems to me I would cut off my right hand sooner than keep on, from day to day, doing what I thought was wrong. But, then, my conduct is so inconsistent with my profession, I don't wonder you reprove me."

"O, now, cousin," said Augustine, sitting down on the floor, and laying his head back in her lap, "don't take on so awfully serious! You know what a good-for-nothing, saucy boy I always was. I love to poke you up,—that's all,—just to see you get earnest. I do think you are desperately, distressingly good; it tires me to death to think of it."

"But this is a serious subject, my boy, Auguste," said Miss Ophelia, laying her hand on his forehead.

"Dismally so," said he; "and I—well, I never want to talk seriously in hot weather. What with mosquitoes and all, a fellow can't get himself up to any very sublime moral flights; and I believe," said St. Clare, suddenly rousing himself up, "there's a theory, now! I understand now why northern nations are always more virtuous than southern ones,—I see into that whole subject."

"O, Auguste, you are a sad rattle-brain!"

"Am I? Well, so I am, I suppose; but for once I will be serious, now; but you must hand me that basket of oranges;—you see, you'll have to 'stay me with flagons and comfort me with apples,' if I'm going to make this effort. Now," said Augustine, drawing the basket up, "I'll begin: When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for a fellow to hold two or three dozen of his fellow-worms in captivity, a decent regard to the opinions of society requires—"

"I don't see that you are growing more serious," said Miss Ophelia.

"Wait,—I'm coming on,—you'll hear. The short of the matter is, cousin," said he, his handsome face suddenly settling into an earnest and serious expression, "on this abstract question of slavery there can, as I think, be but one opinion. Planters, who have money to make by it,—clergymen, 20 who have planters to please,—politicians, who want to rule by it,—may warp and bend language and ethics to a degree that shall astonish the world at their ingenuity; they can press nature and the Bible, and nobody knows what else, into the service; but, after all, neither they nor the world believe in it one particle the more. It comes from the devil, that's the short of it; 30 —and, to my mind, it's a pretty respectable specimen of what he can do in his own line."

Miss Ophelia stopped her knitting, and looked surprised; and St. Clare, apparently enjoying her astonishment, went on.

"You seem to wonder; but if you will get me fairly at it, I'll make a clean breast of it. This cursed business, accursed of God and man, what is it? Strip it of all its ornament, run it down to the root and nucleus of the whole, and what is it? Why, because my brother Quashy is ignorant and weak, and I am intelligent and strong,—because I know how, and can do it,—therefore, I may steal all he has, keep it, and give him only such and so much as suits my fancy. What- 50 ever is too hard, too dirty, too disagreeable, for me, I may set Quashy to doing. Because I don't like work, Quashy shall work. Because the sun burns me, Quashy shall stay in the sun. Quashy shall earn the money, and I will spend it. Quashy shall lie down in every puddle, that I may walk over dry-shod. Quashy shall do my will, and not his, all the days of his mortal life, and have such chance of getting to heaven, at last, as I find convenient. This I take to be about what 10 slavery is. I defy anybody on earth to read our slave-code, as it stands in our law-books, and make anything else of it. Talk of the abuses of slavery! Humbug! The thing itself is the essence of all abuse! And the only reason why the land don't sink under it, like Sodom and Gomorrah, is because it is used in a way infinitely better than it is. For pity's sake, for shame's 20 sake, because we are men born of women, and not savage beasts, many of us do not, and dare not,—we would scorn to use the full power which our savage laws put into our hands. And he who goes the furthest, and does the worst, only uses within limits the power that the law gives him."

St. Clare had started up, and, as his manner was when excited, was walking, with hurried steps, up and down the floor. His fine face, classic as that of a Greek statue, seemed actually to burn with the fervor of his feelings. His large blue eyes flashed, and he gestured with an unconscious eagerness. Miss Ophelia had never seen him in this mood before, and she sat perfectly silent.

"I declare to you," said he, suddenly 40 stopping before his cousin,—"it's no sort of use to talk or to feel on this subject,—but I declare to you, there have been times when I have thought, if the whole country would sink, and hide all this injustice and misery from the light, I would willingly sink with it. When I have been travelling up and down on our boats, or about on my collecting tours, and reflected that 50 every brutal, disgusting, mean, low-lived fellow I met, was allowed by our laws to become an absolute despot of as many men, women, and children, as he could cheat, steal, or gamble money enough to buy,—when I have seen such men in actual ownership of helpless children, of young girls and women,—I have been ready to curse my country, to curse the human race!”

“Augustine! Augustine!” said Miss Ophelia, “I’m sure you’ve said enough. I never, in my life, heard anything like this, even at the north.”

“At the north” said St. Clare, with a sudden change of expression, and resuming something of his habitual careless tone. “Pooh! your northern folks are cold-blooded; you are cool in everything! You can’t begin to curse up hill and down as we can, when we get fairly at it.”

“Well, but the question is,” said Miss Ophelia.

“O, yes, to be sure, the question is,—and a deuce of a question it is! How came you in this state of sin and misery? Well, I shall answer in the good old words you used to teach me, Sundays. I came so by ordinary generation. My servants were my father’s, and, what is more, my mother’s; and now they are mine, they and their increase, which bids fair to be a pretty considerable item. My father, you know, came first from New England; and he was just such another man as your father,—a regular old Roman,—upright, energetic, noble-minded, with an iron will. Your father settled down in New England, to rule over rocks and stones, and to force an existence out of Nature; and mine settled in Louisiana, to rule over men and women, and force existence out of them. My mother,” said St. Clare, getting up, and walking to a picture at the end of the room, and gazing upward with a face fervent with veneration, “she was divine! Don’t look at me so!—you know what I mean! She probably was of mortal birth; but, as far as ever I could observe, there was no trace of any human weakness or error about her; and everybody that lives to remember her, whether bond or free, servant, acquaintance, relation, all say the same. Why, cousin, that mother has been all that has stood between me and utter unbelief for years. She was a direct embodiment and personification of the New Testament,—a living fact, to be accounted for, and to be accounted for in no other way than by its truth. O mother! mother!” said St. Clare, clasping his hands, in a sort of transport; and then suddenly checking himself, he came back, and seating himself on an ottoman, he went on:—

“My brother and I were twins; and they say, you know, that twins ought to resemble each other; but we were in all points a contrast. He had black, fiery eyes, coal-black hair, a strong, fine Roman profile, and a rich brown complexion. I had blue eyes, golden hair, a Greek outline, and fair complexion. He was active and observing, I dreamy and inactive. He was generous to his friends and equals, but proud, dominant, overbearing, to inferiors, and utterly unmerciful to whatever set itself up against him. Truthful we both were, he from pride and courage, I from a sort of abstract ideality. We loved each other about as boys generally do,—off and on, and in general; he was my father’s pet, and I my mother’s.

“There was a morbid sensitiveness and acuteness of feeling in me on all possible subjects, of which he and my father had no kind of understanding, and with which they could have no possible sympathy. But mother did; and so, when I had quarrelled with Alfred, and father looked sternly on me, I used to go off to mother’s room, and sit by her. I remember just how she used to look, with her pale cheeks, her deep, soft, serious eyes, her white dress,—she always wore white; and I used to think of her whenever I read in Revelations about the saints that were arrayed in fine linen, clean and white. She had a great deal of genius of one sort and another, particularly in music; and she used to sit at her organ, playing fine old majestic music of the Catholic church, and singing with a voice more like an angel than a mortal woman; and I would lay my head down on her lap, and cry, and dream, and feel,—O immeasurably!—things that I had no language to say!

"In those days, this matter of slavery had never been canvassed as it has now; nobody dreamed of any harm in it.

"My father was a born aristocrat. I think, in some preëxistent state, he must have been in the higher circles of spirits, and brought all his old court pride along with him; for it was in-grain, bred in the bone, though he was originally of poor and not in any way of noble family. My brother was begotten in his image.

"Now, an aristocrat, you know, the world over, has no human sympathies, beyond a certain line in society. In England the line is in one place, in 20 Burmah in another, and in America in another; but the aristocrat of all these countries never goes over it. What would be hardship and distress and injustice in his own class, is a cool matter of course in another one. My father's dividing line was that of color. Among his equals never was a man more just and generous; but he considered the negro, through all possible 30 gradations of color, as an intermediate link between man and animals, and graded all his ideas of justice or generosity on this hypothesis. I suppose, to be sure, if anybody had asked him, plump and fair, whether they had human immortal souls, he might have hemmed and hawed, and said yes. But my father was not a man much troubled with spiritualism; religious senti- 40 ment he had none, beyond a veneration for God, as decidedly the head of the upper classes.

"Well, my father worked some five hundred negroes; he was an inflexible, driving, punctilious business man; everything was to move by system,—to be sustained with unfailing accuracy and precision. Now, if you take into account that all this was to be 50 worked out by a set of lazy, twaddling, shiftless laborers, who had grown up, all their lives, in the absence of every possible motive to learn how to do anything but 'shirk,' as you Vermonters say, you'll see that there might naturally be, on his plantation, a great many things that looked horrible and distressing to a sensitive child, like me.

"Besides all, he had an overseer,—a great, tall, slab-sided, two-fisted renegade son of Vermont (begging your pardon), who had gone through a regular apprenticeship in hardness and brutality, and taken his degree to be admitted to practice. My mother could never endure him, nor I, but he obtained an entire ascendancy over my father; and this man was the absolute despot of the estate.

"I was a little fellow then, but I had the same love that I have now for all kinds of human things,—a kind of passion for the study of humanity, come in what shape it would. I was found in the cabins and among the field-hands a great deal, and, of course, was a great favorite; and all sorts of complaints and grievances were breathed in my ear; and I told them to mother, and we, between us, formed a sort of committee for a redress of grievances. We hindered and repressed a great deal 30 of cruelty, and congratulated ourselves on doing a vast deal of good, till, as often happens, my zeal overacted. Stubbs complained to my father that he couldn't manage the hands, and must resign his position. Father was a fond, indulgent husband, but a man that never flinched from anything that he thought necessary; and so he put down his foot, like a rock, between us 40 and the field-hands. He told my mother, in language perfectly respectful and deferential, but quite explicit, that over the house-servants she should be entire mistress, but that with the field-hands he could allow no interference. He revered and respected her above all living beings; but he would have said it all the same to the Virgin Mary herself, if she had come in the way of his system.

"I used sometimes to hear my mother reasoning cases with him,—endeavoring to excite his sympathies. He would listen to the most pathetic appeals with the most discouraging politeness and equanimity. 'It all resolves itself into this,' he would say; 'must I part with Stubbs, or keep him? Stubbs is the soul of punctuality, honesty, and efficiency,—a thorough business hand, and as humane as the general run. We can't have perfection; and if I keep him, I must sustain his administration as a whole, even if there are, now and then, things that are exceptionable. All government includes some necessary hardness. General rules will bear hard on particular cases.' This last maxim my father seemed to consider a settler in most alleged cases of cruelty. After he had said that, he commonly drew up his feet on the sofa, like a man that has disposed of a business, and betook himself to a nap, or the newspaper, as the case might be.

"The fact is, my father showed the exact sort of talent for a statesman. He could have divided Poland as easily as an orange, or trod on Ireland as quietly and systematically as any man living. At last my mother gave up, in despair. It never will be known, till the last account, what noble and sensitive natures like hers have felt, cast, utterly helpless, into what seems to them an abyss of injustice and cruelty, and which seems so to nobody about them. It has been an age of long sorrow of such natures, in such a hell-begotten sort of world as ours. What remained for her, but to train her children in her own views and sentiments? Well, after all you say about training, children will grow up substantially what they are by nature, and only that. From the cradle, Alfred was an aristocrat; and as he grew up, instinctively all his sympathies and all his reasonings were in that line, and all mother's exhortations went to the winds. As to me, they sunk deep into me. She never contradicted, in form, anything that my father said, or seemed directly to differ from him; but she impressed, burnt into my very soul, with all the force of her deep, earnest nature, an idea of the dignity and worth of the meanest human soul. I have looked in her face with solemn awe, when she would point up to the stars in the evening, and say to me, 'See there, Auguste, the poorest, meanest soul on our place will be living, when all these stars are gone forever,—will live as long as God lives!'

"She had some fine old paintings; one, in particular, of Jesus healing a blind man. They were very fine, and used to impress me strongly. 'See there, Auguste,' she would say; 'the blind man was a beggar, poor and loathsome; therefore, he would not heal him afar off! He called him to him, and put his hands on him! Remember this, my boy.' If I had lived to grow up under her care, she might have stimulated me to I know not what of enthusiasm. I might have been a saint, reformer, martyr,—but, alas! alas! I went from her when I was only thirteen, and I never saw her again!"

St. Clare rested his head on his hands, and did not speak for some minutes. After a while, he looked up, and went on:—

"What poor, mean trash this whole business of human virtue is! A mere matter, for the most part, of latitude and longitude, and geographical position, acting with natural temperament. The greater part is nothing but an accident! Your father, for example, settles in Vermont, in a town where all are, in fact, free and equal; becomes a regular church-member and deacon, and in due time joins an Abolition society, and thinks us all little better than heathens. Yet he is, for all the world, in constitution and habit, a duplicate of my father. I can see it leaking out in fifty different ways,—just that same strong, overbearing, dominant spirit. You know very well how impossible it is to persuade some of the folks in your village that Squire Sinclair does not feel above them. The fact is, though he has fallen on democratic times, and embraced a democratic theory, he is to the heart an aristocrat, as much as my father, who ruled over five or six hundred slaves."

Miss Ophelia felt rather disposed to cavil at this picture, and was laying down her knitting to begin, but St. Clare stopped her.

"Now, I know every word you are going to say. I do not say they were alike, in fact. One fell into a condition where everything acted against the natural tendency, and the other where everything acted for it; and so one turned out a pretty wilful, stout, overbearing old democrat, and the other a wilful, stout old despot. If both had owned plantations in Louisiana, they would have been as like as two old bullets cast in the same mould."

"What an undutiful boy you are!" said Miss Ophelia.

"I don't mean them any disrespect," said St. Clare. "You know reverence is not my forte. But, to go back to my history:—

"When father died, he left the whole property to us twin boys, to be divided as we should agree. There does not breathe on God's earth a nobler-souled, more generous fellow, than Alfred, in all that concerns his equals; and we got on admirably with this property question, without a single unbrotherly word or feeling. We undertook to work the plantation together; and Alfred, whose outward life and capabilities had double the strength of mine, became an enthusiastic planter, and a wonderfully successful one.

"But two years' trial satisfied me that I could not be a partner in that matter. To have a great gang of seven hundred, whom I could not know personally, or feel any individual interest in, bought and driven, housed, fed, worked like so many horned cattle, trained up to military precision,—the question of how little of life's commonest enjoyments would keep them in working order being a constantly recurring problem,—the necessity of drivers and overseers,—the ever-necessary whip, first, last, and only argument,—the whole thing was insufferably disgusting and loathsome to me; and when I thought of my mother's estimate of one poor human soul, it became even frightful!

"It's all nonsense to talk to me about slaves enjoying all this! To this day, I have no patience with the unutterable trash that some of your patronizing Northerners have made up, as in their zeal to apologize for our sins. We all know better. Tell me that any man living wants to work all his days, from day-dawn till dark, under the constant eye of a master, without the power of putting forth one irresponsible volition, on the same dreary, monotonous, unchanging toil, and all for two pairs of pantaloons and a pair of shoes a year, with enough food and shelter to keep him in working order! Any man who thinks that human beings can, as a general thing, be made about as comfortable that way as any other, I wish he might try it. I'd buy the dog, and work him, with a clear conscience!"

"I always have supposed," said Miss Ophelia, "that you, all of you, approved of these things, and thought them right,—according to scripture."

"Humbug! We are not quite reduced to that yet. Alfred, who is as determined a despot as ever walked, does not pretend to this kind of defence;—no, he stands, high and haughty, on that good old respectable ground, the right of the strongest; and he says, and I think quite sensibly, that the American planter is 'only doing, in another form, what the English aristocracy and capitalists are doing to the lower classes'; that is, I take it, appropriating them, body and bone, soul and spirit, to their use and convenience. He defends both,—and I think, at least, consistently. He says that there can be no high civilization without enslavement of the masses, either nominal or real. There must, he says, be a lower class, given up to physical toil and confined to an animal nature; and a higher one thereby acquires leisure and wealth for a more expanded intelligence and improvement, and becomes the directing soul of the lower. So he reasons, because, as I said, he is born an aristocrat;—so I don't believe, because I was born a democrat."

"How in the world can the two things be compared?" said Miss Ophelia. "The English laborer is not sold, traded, parted from his family, whipped."

"He is as much at the will of his employer as if he were sold to him. 10 The slave-owner can whip his refractory slave to death,—the capitalist can starve him to death. As to family security, it is hard to say which is the worst,—to have one's children sold, or see them starve to death at home."

"But it's no kind of apology for slavery, to prove that it isn't worse than some other bad thing."

"I didn't give it for one,—nay, I'll 20 say, besides, that ours is the more bold and palpable infringement of human rights; actually buying a man up, like a horse,—looking at his teeth, cracking his joints, and trying his paces, and then paying down for him,—having speculators, breeders, traders, and brokers in human bodies and souls,—sets the thing before the eyes of the civilized world in a more tangible form, 30 though the thing done be, after all, in its nature, the same; that is, appropriating one set of human beings to the use and improvement of another, without any regard to their own."

"I never thought of the matter in this light," said Miss Ophelia.

"Well, I've travelled in England some, and I've looked over a good many documents as to the state of 40 their lower classes; and I really think there is no denying Alfred when he says that his slaves are better off than a large class of the population of England. You see, you must not infer, from what I have told you, that Alfred is what is called a hard master; for he isn't. He is despotic, and unmerciful to insubordination; he would shoot a fellow down with as little remorse 50 as he would shoot a buck, if he opposed him. But, in general, he takes a sort of pride in having his slaves comfortably fed and accommodated.

"When I was with him, I insisted that he should do something for their instruction; and, to please me, he did get a chaplain, and used to have them catechized Sunday, though, I believe, in his heart, that he thought it would do about as much good to set a chaplain over his dogs and horses. And the fact is, that a mind stupefied and animalized by every bad influence from the hour of birth, spending the whole of every week-day in unreflecting toil, cannot be done much with by a few hours on Sunday. The teachers of Sunday-schools among the manufacturing population of England, and among plantation-hands in our country, could perhaps testify to the same result, there and here. Yet some striking ex- 20 ceptions there are among us, from the fact that the negro is naturally more impressible to religious sentiment than the white."

"Well," said Miss Ophelia, "how came you to give up your plantation life?"

"Well, we jogged on together some time, till Alfred saw plainly that I was no planter. He thought it absurd, after he had reformed, and altered, and improved everywhere, to suit my notions, that I still remained unsatisfied. The fact was, it was, after all, the THING that I hated,—the using these men and women, the perpetuation of all this ignorance, brutality, and vice,—just to make money for me!

"Besides, I was always interfering in the details. Being myself one of the laziest of mortals, I had altogether too much fellow-feeling for the lazy; and when poor, shiftless dogs put stones at the bottom of their cotton-baskets to make them weigh heavier, or filled their sacks with dirt, with cotton at the top, it seemed so exactly like what I should do if I were they, I couldn't and wouldn't have them flogged for it.

Well, of course, there was an end of plantation discipline; and Alf and I came to about the same point that I and my respected father did, years before. So he told me that I was a womanish sentimentalist, and would never do for business life; and advised me to take the bank-stock and the New Orleans family mansion, and go to writing poetry, and let him manage the plantation. So we parted, and I came here."

"But why didn't you free your slaves?"

"Well, I wasn't up to that. To hold them as tools for money-making, I could not;—have them to help spend money, you know, didn't look quite so ugly to me. Some of them were old house-servants, to whom I was much attached; and the younger ones were children to the old. All were well satisfied to be as they were." He paused, and walked reflectively up and down the room.

"There was," said St. Clare, "a time in my life when I had plans and hopes of doing something in this world, more than to float and drift. I had vague, indistinct yearnings to be a sort of emancipator,—to free my native land from this spot and stain. All young men have had such fever-fits, I suppose, some time,—but then—"

"Why didn't you?" said Miss Ophelia;—"you ought not to put your hand to the plough, and look back."

"O, well, things didn't go with me as I expected, and I got the despair of living that Solomon did. I suppose it was a necessary incident to wisdom in us both; but, somehow or other, instead of being actor and regenerator in society, I became a piece of drift-wood, and have been floating and eddying about, ever since. Alfred scolds me, every time we meet; and he has the better of me, I grant,—for he really does something; his life is a logical result of his opinions, and mine is a contemptible non sequitur."

"My dear cousin, can you be satisfied with such a way of spending your probation?"

"Satisfied! Was I not just telling you I despised it? But, then, to come back to this point,—we were on this liberation business. I don't think my feelings about slavery are peculiar. I find many men who, in their hearts, think of it just as I do. The land groans under it; and, bad as it is for the slave, it is worse, if anything, for the master. It takes no spectacles to see that a great class of vicious, improvident, degraded people, among us, are an evil to us, as well as to themselves. The capitalist and aristocrat of England cannot feel that as we do, because they do not mingle with the class they degrade as we do. They are in our houses; they are the associates of our children, and they form their minds faster than we can; for they are a race that children always will cling to and assimilate with. If Eva, now, was not more angel than ordinary, she would be ruined. We might as well allow the small-pox to run among them, and think our children would not take it, as to let them be uninstructed and vicious, and think our children will not be affected by that. Yet our laws positively and utterly forbid any efficient general educational system, and they do it wisely, too; for, just begin and thoroughly educate one generation, and the whole thing would be blown sky high. If we did not give them liberty, they would take it."

"And what do you think will be the end of this?" said Miss Ophelia.

"I don't know. One thing is certain,—that there is a mustering among the masses, the world over; and there is a dies iræ coming on, sooner or later. The same thing is working in Europe, in England, and in this country. My mother used to tell me of a millennium that was coming, when Christ should reign, and all men should be free and happy. And she taught me, when I was a boy, to pray, 'Thy kingdom come.' Sometimes I think all this sighing, and groaning, and stirring among the dry bones foretells what she used to tell me was coming. But who may abide the day of his appearing?"

"Augustine, sometimes I think you are not far from the kingdom," said Miss Ophelia, laying down her knitting, and looking anxiously at her cousin.

"Thank you for your good opinion;

but it's up and down with me,—up to heaven's gate in theory, down in earth's dust in practice. But there's the tea-bell,—do let's go,—and don't say, now, I haven't had one downright serious talk, for once in my life."

At table, Marie alluded to the incident of Prue. "I suppose you'll think, cousin," she said, "that we are all barbarians."

"I think that's a barbarous thing," said Miss Ophelia, "but I don't think you are all barbarians."

"Well, now," said Marie, "I know it's impossible to get along with some of these creatures. They are so bad they ought not to live. I don't feel a particle of sympathy for such cases. If they'd only behave themselves, it would not happen."

"But, mamma," said Eva, "the poor creature was unhappy; that's what made her drink."

"O, fiddlestick! as if that were any excuse! I'm unhappy, very often. I presume," she said, pensively, "that I've had greater trials than ever she had. It's just because they are so bad. There's some of them that you cannot break in by any kind of severity. I remember father had a man that was so lazy he would run away just to get rid of work, and lie round in the swamps, stealing and doing all sorts of horrid things. That man was caught and whipped, time and again, and it never did him any good; and the last time he crawled off, though he couldn't but just go, and died in the swamp. There was no sort of reason for it, for father's hands were always treated kindly."

"I broke a fellow in, once," said St. Clare, "that all the overseers and masters had tried their hands on in vain."

"You!" said Marie; "well, I'd be glad to know when you ever did anything of the sort."

"Well, he was a powerful, gigantic fellow,—a native-born African; and he appeared to have the rude instinct of freedom in him to an uncommon degree. He was a regular African lion. They called him Scipio. Nobody could do anything with him; and he was sold round from overseer to overseer, till at last Alfred bought him, because he thought he could manage him. Well, one day he knocked down the overseer, and was fairly off into the swamps. I was on a visit to Alf's plantation, for it was after we had dissolved partnership. Alfred was greatly exasperated; but I told him that it was his own fault, and laid him any wager that I could break the man; and finally it was agreed that, if I caught him, I should have him to experiment on. So they mustered out a party of some six or seven, with guns and dogs, for the hunt. People, you know, can get up just as much enthusiasm in hunting a man as a deer, if it is only customary; in fact, I got a little excited myself, though I had only put in as a sort of mediator, in case he was caught.

"Well, the dogs bayed and howled, and we rode and scampered, and finally we started him. He ran and bounded like a buck, and kept us well in the rear for some time; but at last he got caught in an impenetrable thicket of cane; then he turned to bay, and I tell you he fought the dogs right gallantly. He dashed them to right and left, and actually killed three of them with only his naked fists, when a shot from a gun brought him down, and he fell, wounded and bleeding, almost at my feet. The poor fellow looked up at me with manhood and despair both in his eye. I kept back the dogs and the party, as they came pressing up, and claimed him as my prisoner. It was all I could do to keep them from shooting him, in the flush of success; but I persisted in my bargain, and Alfred sold him to me. Well, I took him in hand, and in one fortnight I had him tamed down as submissive and tractable as heart could desire."

"What in the world did you do to him?" said Marie.

"Well, it was quite a simple process. I took him to my own room, had a good bed made for him, dressed his wounds, and tended him myself, until he got fairly on his feet again. And, in process of time, I had free papers made out for him, and told him he might go where he liked."

"And did he go?" said Miss Ophelia.

"No. The foolish fellow tore the paper in two, and absolutely refused to leave me. I never had a braver, better fellow,—trusty and true as steel. He embraced Christianity afterwards, and became as gentle as a child. He used to oversee my place on the lake, and did it capitally, too. I lost him the first cholera season. In fact, he laid down his life for me. For I was sick, almost to death; and when, through the panic, everybody else fled, Scipio worked for me like a giant, and actually brought me back into life again. But, poor fellow! he was taken, right after, and there was no saving him. I never felt anybody's loss more."

Eva had come gradually nearer and nearer to her father, as he told the story,—her small lips apart, her eyes wide and earnest with absorbing interest.

As he finished, she suddenly threw her arms around his neck, burst into tears, and sobbed convulsively.

"Eva, dear child! what is the matter?" said St. Clare, as the child's small frame trembled and shook with the violence of her feelings. "This child," he added, "ought not to hear any of this kind of thing,—she's nervous."

"No, papa, I'm not nervous," said Eva, controlling herself, suddenly, with a strength of resolution singular in such a child. "I'm not nervous, but these things sink into my heart."

"What do you mean, Eva?"

"I can't tell you, papa. I think a great many thoughts. Perhaps some day I shall tell you."

"Well, think away, dear,—only don't cry and worry your papa," said St. Clare. "Look here,—see what a beautiful peach I have got for you!"

Eva took it, and smiled, though there was still a nervous twitching about the corners of her mouth.

"Come, look at the gold-fish," said St. Clare, taking her hand and stepping on to the veranda. A few moments, and merry laughs were heard through the silken curtains, as Eva and St. Clare were pelting each other with roses, and chasing each other among the alleys of the court.

SONGS AND BALLADS OF THE CIVIL WAR

THE PICKET-GUARD

"All quiet along the Potomac," they say,

"Except now and then a stray picket
Is shot, as he walks on his beat to and fro,

By a rifleman hid in the thicket.

'Tis nothing: a private or two, now and then,

Will not count in the news of the battle;

Not an officer lost—only one of the men

Moaning out, all alone, the death rattle."

All quiet along the Potomac to-night,
Where the soldiers lie peacefully dreaming;

Their tents in the rays of the clear autumn moon,

Or the light of the watch-fire, are gleaming.

A tremulous sigh of the gentle night-wind

Through the forest leaves softly is creeping;

While the stars up above, with their glittering eyes,

Keep guard, for the army is sleeping.

There's only the sound of the lone sentry's tread

As he tramps from the rock to the fountain,

And thinks of the two in the low trundle-bed

Far away in the cot on the mountain.

His musket falls slack; his face, dark and grim,

Grows gentle with memories tender,
As he mutters a prayer for the children
asleep—

For their mother—may Heaven defend her!

The moon seems to shine just as brightly as then ²⁵

That night, when the love yet unspoken

Leaped up to his lips—when low-murmured vows

Were pledged to be ever unbroken.

Then drawing his sleeve roughly over his eyes,

He dashes off tears that are welling, ³⁰

And gathers his gun closer up to its place

As if to keep down the heart-swelling.

He passes the fountain, the blasted
pine-tree;

The footstep is lagging and weary;

Yet onward he goes, through the broad belt of light, ³⁵

Towards the shade of the forest so dreary.

Hark! was it the night-wind that rustled the leaves?

Was it moonlight so wondrously flashing?

It looked like a rifle. . . . "Ha! Mary, goodby!"

The red life-blood is ebbing and plashing.

All quiet along the Potomac to-night—
No sound save the rush of the river, While soft falls the dew on the face of the dead—

The picket's off duty forever!

—ETHEL LYNN BEERS.

DIXIE

Southrons, hear your country call you!
Up, lest worse than death befall you!

To arms! To arms! To arms, in Dixie!

Lo! all the beacon-fires are lighted,—
Let all hearts be now united! ⁵

CHORUS

To arms! To arms! To arms, in Dixie!

Advance the flag of Dixie!

Hurrah! Hurrah!

For Dixie's land we take our stand,
And live and die for Dixie! ¹⁰

To arms! To arms!

And conquer peace for Dixie!

To arms! To arms!

And conquer peace for Dixie

Hear the Northern thunders mutter! ¹⁵

Northern flags in South winds flutter!

Send them back your fierce defiance!

Stamp upon the accursed alliance!

Fear no danger! Shun no labor!

Lift up rifle, pike, and sabre! ²⁰

Shoulder pressing close to shoulder,

Let the odds make each heart bolder!

How the South's great heart rejoices

At your cannon's ringing voices!

For faith betrayed, and pledges broken,

Wrongs inflicted, insults spoken. ²⁶

Strong as lions, swift as eagles,

Back to their kennels hunt these beagles!

Cut the unequal bonds asunder!

Let them hence each other plunder! ³⁰

Swear upon your country's altar

Never to submit or falter

Till the spoilers are defeated,

Till the Lord's work is completed!

If the loved ones weep in sadness, ³⁵
Victory soon shall bring them gladness,—

Exultant pride soon banish sorrow;

Smiles chase tears away to-morrow.

—ALBERT PIKE.

FAREWELL TO BROTHER JONATHAN

Farewell! we must part; we have turned from the land

Of our cold-hearted brother, with tyrannous hand,

Who assumed all our rights as a favor
to grant,
And whose smile ever covered the sting
of a taunt;

Who breathed on the fame he was bound to defend;
Still the craftiest foe, 'neath the guise
of a friend;
Who believed that our bosoms would bleed at a touch,
Yet could never believe he could goad
them too much;

Whose conscience affects to be seared
with our sin,
Yet is plastic to take all its benefits
in;
The mote in our eye so enormous has
grown,
That he never perceived there's a beam
in his own.

O Jonathan, Jonathan! vassal of pelf, Self-righteous, self-glorious, yes, every inch self,
Your loyalty now is all bluster and boast,
But was dumb when the foemen invaded our coast.

In vain did your country appeal to you
then;
You coldly refused her your money and
men;
Your trade interrupted, you slunk from her wars,
And preferred British gold to the Stripes and the Stars!

Then our generous blood was as water poured forth,
And the sons of the South were the shields of the North;
Nor our patriot ardor one moment gave o'er,
Till the foe you had fed we had driven
from the shore!

Long years we have suffered opprobrium and wrong;
But we clung to your side with affection
so strong.

That at last, in mere wanton aggression, you broke
All the ties of our hearts with one murderous stroke.

We are tired of contest for what is our
own;
We are sick of a strife that could never be done;
Thus our love has died out, and its altars are dark;
Not Prometheus's self could rekindle
the spark.

O Jonathan, Jonathan! deadly the sin
Of your tigerish thirst for the blood of your kin;
And shameful the spirit that gloats over wives
And maidens despoiled of their honor and lives!

Your palaces rise from the fruits of our toil;
Your millions are fed from the wealth of our soil;
The balm of our air brings the health
to your cheek;
And our hearts are aglow with the welcome we speak.

O brother! beware how you seek us
again,
Lest you brand on your forehead the signet of Cain;
That blood and that crime on your conscience must sit;
We may fall—we may perish—but never submit!

The pathway that leads to the Pharisee's door
We remember, indeed, but we tread it
no more;
Preferring to turn, with the Publican's
faith,
To the path through the valley and shadow of death!

—ANONYMOUS.

MARYLAND

The despot's heel is on thy shore,
Maryland!
His torch is at thy temple door,
Maryland!

Avenge the patriotic gore 5
That flecked the streets of Baltimore,
And be the battle-queen of yore,
Maryland! My Maryland!

Hark to thy wand'ring son's appeal,
Maryland! 10

My mother State! to thee I kneel;
Maryland!

For life and death, for woe and weal,
Thy peerless chivalry reveal,
And gird thy beauteous limbs with steel, 15
Maryland! My Maryland!

Thou wilt not cower in the dust,
Maryland!
Thy beaming sword shall never rust,
Maryland! 20

Remember Carroll's sacred trust;
Remember Howard's warlike thrust,—
And all thy slumberers with the just,
Maryland! My Maryland!

Come! 'tis the red dawn of the day, 25
Maryland!

Come! with thy panoplied array,
Maryland!

With Ringgold's spirit for the fray,
With Watson's blood, at Monterey, 30
With fearless Lowe, and dashing May,
Maryland! My Maryland!

Come! for thy shield is bright and strong,
Maryland!

Come! for thy dalliance does thee
wrong, 35
Maryland!

Come! to thine own heroic throng,
That stalks with Liberty along,
And gives a new Key to thy song
Maryland! My Maryland! 40

Dear Mother! burst the tyrant's chain,
Maryland!

Virginia should not call in vain;
Maryland!

She meets her sisters on the plain; 45
"Sic semper" ¹ 'tis the proud refrain!
That baffles minions back amain,
Maryland!

Arise, in majesty again,
Maryland! My Maryland! 50

¹ Sic semper tyrannis: the motto of Virginia

I see the blush upon thy cheek,
Maryland!
But thou wast ever bravely meek;
Maryland!

But lo! there surges forth a shriek 55
From hill to hill, from creek to creek,— Potomac calls to Chesapeake,
Maryland! My Maryland!

Thou wilt not yield the Vandal toll,
Maryland! 60

Thou wilt not crook to his control,
Maryland!

Better the fire upon thee roll,
Better the shot, the blade, the bowl,
Than crucifixion of the soul, 65
Maryland! My Maryland!

I hear the distant thunder hum,
Maryland!

The Old Line's bugle, fife, and drum,
Maryland! 70

She is not dead, nor deaf, nor dumb:
Huzza! she spurns the Northern scum!
She breathes—she burns! she'll come!
she'll come!

Maryland! My Maryland!

—JAMES R. RANDALL.

THE BATTLE CRY OF FREEDOM

Yes, we'll rally round the flag, boys,
we'll rally once again,
Shouting the battle cry of Freedom;
We'll rally from the hillside, we'll gather from the plain,
Shouting the battle cry of Freedom!

CHORUS

The Union forever, hurrah! boys, hurrah! 5

Down with the traitor, up with the star;

While we rally round the flag,
boys, rally once again,

Shouting the battle cry of Freedom!

We are springing to the call of our brothers gone before,
Shouting the battle cry of Freedom; 10

And we'll fill the vacant ranks with a million freemen more,
Shouting the battle cry of Freedom!

We will welcome to our numbers the loyal, true, and brave,
Shouting the battle cry of Freedom!
And although they may be poor, not a man shall be a slave,
Shouting the battle cry of Freedom!

So we're springing to the call from the East and from the West,
Shouting the battle cry of Freedom;
And we'll hurl the rebel crew from the land we love the best,
Shouting the battle cry of Freedom!

—GEORGE F. ROOT.

JOHN BROWN

Old John Brown lies a-mouldering in the grave,
Old John Brown lies slumbering in the grave;
But John Brown's soul is marching with the brave,
His soul is marching on.

CHORUS

Glory, Glory hallelujah,
Glory, Glory hallelujah,
Glory, Glory hallelujah—
His soul goes marching on.

He has gone to be a soldier in the army of the Lord,
He is sworn in as a private in the ranks
of the Lord;
He shall stand at Armageddon with his brave old sword,
When Heaven is marching on.

He shall file in front when the lines of battle form,
He shall face to front when the squares
of battle form,
With the column, and charge in the storm,
When men are marching on.

Ah, foul tyrants, do you hear him when he comes?
Ah, black traitors, do ye know him as he comes?

In thunder of the cannon and roll of the drums,
As we go marching on.

Men may die and moulder in the dust;
Men may die and rise again from dust, Shoulder to shoulder, in the ranks of the just,
When God is marching on.

—? H. H. BROWNELL.

STONEWALL JACKSON'S WAY

Come, stack arms, men! Pile on the rails,
Stir up the camp-fire bright;
No growling if the canteen fails,
We'll make a roaring night.
Here Shenandoah brawls along,
There burly Blue Ridge echoes strong,
To swell the Brigade's rousing song
Of "Stonewall Jackson's way."

We see him now—the queer slouched
hat
Cocked o'er his eye askew;
The shrewd, dry smile; the speech so pat,
So calm, so blunt, so true.
The "Blue-Light Elder" knows 'em
well;
Says he, "That's Banks—he's fond of
shell;
Lord save his soul! we'll give him—"
well!
That's "Stonewall Jackson's way."

Silence! ground arms! kneel all! caps
off!

Old Massa's goin' to pray.
Strangle the fool that dares to scoff!
Attention! it's his way.
Appealing from his native sod,
*In forma pauperis*¹ to God.
"Lay bare Thine arm; stretch forth Thy rod!
Amen!" That's "Stonewall's way."

He's in the saddle now. Fall in!
Steady! the whole brigade!
Hill's at the ford, cut off; we'll win
His way out, ball and blade!

What matter if our shoes are worn?
 What matter if our feet are torn? 30
 "Quick step! we're with him before morn!"

That's "Stonewall Jackson's way."

The sun's bright lances rout the mists
 Of morning, and, by George!
 Here's Longstreet, struggling in the lists, 35

Hemmed in an ugly gorge.

Pope and his Dutchmen, whipped before,

"Bay'nets and grape!" hear Stonewall roar;

"Charge, Stuart! Pay off Ashby's score!"

In "Stonewall Jackson's way." 40

Ah! maiden, wait and watch and yearn
 For news of Stonewall's band!

Ah! widow, read, with eyes that burn,
 That ring upon thy hand.

Ah! wife, sew on, pray on, hope on, 45
 Thy life shall not be all forlorn.

The foe had better ne'er been born
 That gets in "Stonewall's way."

—JOHN W. PALMER.

THREE HUNDRED THOUSAND MORE

We are coming, Father Abraham, three hundred thousand more,

From Mississippi's winding stream and from New England's shore;

We leave our ploughs and workshops,
 our wives and children dear,

With hearts too full for utterance, with but a silent tear;

We dare not look behind us, but steadfastly before: 5

We are coming, Father Abraham, three
 hundred thousand more!

If you look across the hill-tops that meet the northern sky,

Long moving lines of rising dust your vision may descry;

And now the wind, an instant, tears the cloudy veil aside,

And floats aloft our spangled flag in glory and in pride; 10

And bayonets in the sunlight gleam,
 and bands brave music pour:

We are coming, Father Abraham, three
 hundred thousand more!

If you look all up our valleys where the growing harvests shine,

You may see our sturdy farmer boys
 fast forming into line;

And children from their mother's knees are pulling at the weeds, 15

And learning how to reap and sow against their country's needs;

And a farewell group stands weeping
 at every cottage door:

We are coming, Father Abraham, three
 hundred thousand more!

You have called us, and we're coming,
 by Richmond's bloody tide

To lay us down, for Freedom's sake, our brothers' bones beside; 20

Or from foul treason's savage grasp to wrench the murderous blade,

And in the face of foreign foes its fragments to parade.

Six hundred thousand loyal men and true have gone before:

We are coming, Father Abraham, three
 hundred thousand more!

BATTLE-HYMN OF THE REPUBLIC

Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord;

He is trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored;

He hath loosed the fateful lightning
 of His terrible swift sword;

His truth is marching on.

I have seen Him in the watch-fires of a hundred circling camps; 5

They have builded Him an altar in the evening dews and damps;

I can read His righteous sentence by the dim and flaring lamps;

His day is marching on.

I have read a fiery gospel, writ in burn-ished rows of steel:

"As ye deal with my contemners, so with you my grace shall deal; 10

Let the Hero born of woman, crush the serpent with his heel, Since God is marching on."

He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat;

He is sifting out the hearts of men before His judgment-seat.

Oh! be swift, my soul, to answer Him!
be jubilant, my feet! 15

Our God is marching on.

In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea,

With a glory in His bosom that trans-figures you and me;

As He died, to make men holy, let us
die to make them free,

While God is marching on. 20

—JULIA WARD HOWE.

LITTLE GIFFEN

Out of the focal and foremost fire,
Out of the hospital walls as dire;
Smitten of grape-shot and gangrene,
(Eighteenth battle and he sixteen!)
Spectre such as you seldom see— 5
Little Giffen, of Tennessee!

"Take him and welcome!" the surgeons
said;

"Little the doctor can help the dead!"
So we took him; and brought him where

The balm was sweet in the summer air;
And we laid him down on a wholesome
bed— 11

Utter Lazarus, heel to head!

And we watched the war with bated
breath—

Skeleton Boy against skeleton Death.
Months of torture, how many such? 15

Weary weeks of the stick and the crutch;

And still a glint of the steel-blue eye
Told of a spirit that wouldn't die,

And didn't. Nay more, in Death's despite

The crippled skeleton learned to write.

"Dear Mother," at first, of course; and
then 21

"Dear Captain," inquiring about the
men.

Captain's answer: "Of eighty and five Giffen and I are left alive."

Word of gloom from the war one day:
Johnston pressed at the front, they
say. 26

Little Giffen was up and away;

A tear—his first—as he bade good-bye
Dimmed the glint of his steel-blue eye.

"I'll write, if spared." There was news of the fight, 30

But none of Giffen; he did not write.

I sometimes fancy, that, were I king
Of the princely Knights of the Golden
Ring,

With the song of the minstrel in mine
ear,

And the tender legend that trembles
here, 35

I'd give the best on his bended knee,
The whitest soul of my chivalry,
For "Little Giffen," of Tennessee.

—FRANCIS O. TICKNOR.

TENTING ON THE OLD CAMP GROUND

We're tenting to-night on the old camp
ground;

Give us a song to cheer

Our weary hearts, a song of home,
And friends we love so dear.

CHORUS

Many are the hearts that are weary to-night, 5

Wishing for the war to cease;

Many are the hearts, looking for the right,

To see the dawn of peace.

We've been tenting to-night on the old
camp ground,

Thinking of days gone by; 10

Of the loved ones at home, that gave us the hand,

And the tear that said "Good-by!"

We are tired of the war on the old
camp ground;

Many are dead and gone,
Of the brave and the true who've left their homes; 15
Others been wounded long.

We've been fighting to-day on the old
camp ground,

Many are lying near;
Some are dead, and some are dying,
Many are in tears. 20

—WALTER KITTREDGE.

MARCHING THROUGH GEORGIA.

Bring the good old bugle, boys, we'll sing another song—

Sing it with the spirit that will start the world along—

Sing it as we used to sing it, fifty thousand strong,

While we are marching through Georgia.

CHORUS

"Hurrah! Hurrah! we bring the jubilee! 5

Hurrah! Hurrah! the flag that makes you free!"

So we sang the chorus from Atlanta to the sea,

While we were marching through
Georgia.

How the darkies shouted when they heard the joyful sound!

How the turkeys gobbled which our commissary found! 10

How the sweet potatoes even started from the ground,

While we were marching through
Georgia.

Yes, and there were Union men who wept with joyful tears,

When they saw the honored flag they had not seen for years;

Hardly could they be restrained from breaking forth in cheers, 15

While we were marching through
Georgia.

"Sherman's dashing Yankee boys will never reach the coast!"

So the saucy rebels said—and 'twas a handsome boast,

Had they not forgot, alas! to reckon
with their host,

While we were marching through
Georgia. 20

So we made a thoroughfare for Freedom and her train,

Sixty miles in latitude—three hundred to the main;

Treason fled before us, for resistance
was in vain,

While we were marching through
Georgia.

—HENRY C. WORK.

TRAMP, TRAMP, TRAMP!

In the prison cell I sit,

Thinking, mother dear, of you,

And our bright and happy home so far
away;

And the tears they fill my eyes,

Spite of all that I can do, 5

Though I try to cheer my comrades and be gay.

CHORUS

Tramp, tramp, tramp, the boys are marching,

Cheer up, comrades, they will
come;

And beneath the starry flag

We will breathe the air again 10

Of the freeland in our own beloved home.

In the battle front we stood,

When their fiercest charge they
made,

And they swept us off a hundred men or more;

But before we reached their lines, 15

They were beaten back dismayed,

And we heard the cry of victory o'er and o'er.

So within the prison cell

We are waiting for the day

That shall come to open wide the iron
door; 20

And the hollow eye grows bright,
And the poor heart almost gay,
As we think of seeing home and friends
once more.

—GEORGE F. ROOT.

THE BLUE AND THE GRAY

By the flow of the inland river,
Whence the fleets of iron have fled,
Where the blades of the grave-grass
quiver,
Asleep are the ranks of the dead.
Under the sod and the dew, 5
Waiting the judgment day;
Under the one, the Blue,
Under the other, the Gray.

These in the robings of glory,
Those in the gloom of defeat; 10
All with the battle-blood gory,
In the dusk of eternity meet.
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day;
Under the laurel, the Blue, 15
Under the willow, the Gray.

From the silence of sorrowful hours
The desolate mourners go,
Lovingly laden with flowers
Alike for the friend and the foe. 20
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day;
Under the roses, the Blue,
Under the lilies, the Gray.

So with an equal splendor, 25
The morning sun-rays fall,
With a touch, impartially tender,
On the blossoms blooming for all.
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day; 30
Broidered with gold, the Blue,
Mellowed with gold, the Gray.

So, when the summer calleth,
On forest and field of grain,
With an equal murmur falleth 35
The cooling drip of the rain.
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day;
Wet with the rain, the Blue,
Wet with the rain, the Gray. 40

Sadly, but not with upbraiding,
The generous deed was done;
In the storm of the years that are fading

No braver battle was won.
Under the sod and the dew, 45
Waiting the judgment day;
Under the blossoms, the Blue,
Under the garlands, the Gray.

No more shall the war-cry sever,
Or the winding rivers be red; 50
They banish our anger forever
When they laurel the graves of our
dead!
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day;
Love and tears for the Blue, 55
Tears and love for the Gray.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN (1809-1865)

AUTOBIOGRAPHY

I was born February 12, 1809, in Hardin County, Kentucky. My parents were both born in Virginia, of undistinguished families—second families, perhaps I should say. My mother, who died in my tenth year, was of a family of the name of Hanks, some of whom now reside in Adams, and others in Macon County, Illinois. My paternal grandfather, Abraham Lincoln, emigrated from Rockingham County, Virginia, to Kentucky about 1781 or 1782, where a year or two later he was killed by the Indians, not in battle, but by stealth, when he was laboring to open a farm in the forest. His ancestors, who were Quakers, went to Virginia from Berks County, Pennsylvania. An effort to identify them with the New England family of the same name ended in nothing more definite than a similarity of Christian names in both families, such as Enoch, Levi, Mordecai, Solomon, Abraham, and the like.

My father, at the death of his father, was but six years of age, and he grew up literally without education. He removed from Kentucky to what is now Spencer County, Indiana, in my eighth year. We reached our new home about the time the state came into the Union. It was a wild region, with many bears and other wild animals still in the woods. There I grew up. There were some schools, so called, but no qualification was ever required of a teacher beyond "readin', writin', and cipherin'," to the rule of three. If a straggler supposed to understand Latin happened to sojourn in the neighborhood, he was looked upon as a wizard. There was absolutely nothing to excite ambition for education. Of course, when I came of age I did not know much. Still, somehow, I could read, write, and cipher to the rule of three, but that was all. I have not been to school since. The little advance I now have upon this store of education, I have picked up from time to time under the pressure of necessity.

I was raised to farm work, which I continued till I was twenty-two. At twenty-one I came to Illinois, Macon County. Then I got to New Salem, at that time in Sangamon, now in Menard County, where I remained a year as a sort of clerk in a store. Then came the Black Hawk War; and I was elected a captain of volunteers, a success which gave me more pleasure than any I have had since. I went the campaign, was elated, ran for the legislature the same year (1832), and was beaten—the only time I ever have been beaten by the people. The next and three succeeding biennial elections I was elected to the legislature. I was not a candidate afterward. During this legislative period I had studied law, and removed to Springfield to practice it. In 1846 I was once elected to the lower House of Congress. Was not a candidate for reelection. From 1849 to 1854, both inclusive, practiced law more assiduously than ever before. Always a Whig in politics; and generally on the Whig electoral tickets, making active canvasses. I was losing interest in politics when the repeal of the Missouri Compromise aroused me again. What I have done since that is pretty well known.

If any personal description of me is thought desirable, it may be said I am, in height, six feet four inches, nearly; lean in flesh, weighing on an average one hundred and eighty pounds; dark complexion, with coarse black hair and gray eyes. No other marks or brands recollected.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLITICAL VIEWS

NEW SALEM, June 13, 1836

TO THE EDITOR OF THE Journal: In your paper of last Saturday I see a communication, over the signature of "Many Voters," in which the candidates who are announced in the Journal are called upon to "show their hands." Agreed. Here's mine.

I go for all sharing the privileges of the government who assist in bearing its burdens. Consequently, I go for admitting all whites to the right of suffrage who pay taxes or bear arms (by no means excluding females).

If elected, I shall consider the whole people of Sangamon my constituents, as well those that oppose as those that support me.

While acting as their representative, I shall be governed by their will on all subjects upon which I have the means of knowing what their will is; and upon all others I shall do what my own judgment teaches me will best advance their interests. Whether elected or not, I go for distributing the proceeds of the sales of the public lands to the several states, to enable our state, in common with others, to dig canals and construct railroads without borrowing money and paying the interest on it.

If alive on the first Monday in November, I shall vote for Hugh L. White for President.

Very respectfully,

A. LINCOLN.

LETTER TO ROBERT ALLEN

NEW SALEM, June 21, 1836

DEAR COLONEL: I am told that during my absence last week you passed through this place, and stated publicly that you were in possession of a fact or facts which, if known to the public, would entirely destroy the prospects of N. W. Edwards and myself at the ensuing election; but that, through favor to us, you should forbear to divulge them. No one has needed favors more than I, and, generally, few have been less unwilling to accept them; but in this case favor to me would be injustice to the public, and therefore I must beg your pardon for declining it. That I once had the confidence of the people of Sangamon, is sufficiently evident; and if I have since done anything, either by design or misadventure, which if known would subject me to a forfeiture of that confidence, he that knows of that thing, and conceals it, is a traitor to his country's interest.

I find myself wholly unable to form any conjecture of what fact or facts, real or supposed, you spoke; but my opinion of your veracity will not permit me for a moment to doubt that you at least believed what you said. I am flattered with the personal regard you manifested for me; but I do hope that, on more mature reflection, you will view the public interest as a paramount consideration, and therefore determine to let the worst come. I here assure you that the candid statement of facts on your part, however low it may sink me, shall never break the tie of personal friendship between us. I wish an answer to this, and you are at liberty to publish both, if you choose.

Very respectfully,

A. LINCOLN.

PROTEST IN THE ILLINOIS LEGISLATURE ON THE SUBJECT OF SLAVERY

MARCH 3, 1837

Resolutions upon the subject of domestic slavery having passed both branches of the General Assembly at its present session, the undersigned hereby protest against the passage of the same.

They believe that the institution of slavery is founded on both injustice and bad policy, but that the promulgation of abolition doctrines tends rather to increase than abate its evils.

¹⁰ They believe that the Congress of the United States has no power under the Constitution to interfere with the institution of slavery in the different states.

They believe that the Congress of the United States has the power, under the Constitution, to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, but that the power ought not to be exercised, ²⁰ unless at the request of the people of the District.

The difference between these opinions and those contained in the said resolutions is their reason for entering this protest.

DAN STONE,
A. LINCOLN,

Representatives from the County of Sangamon.

NOTES FOR A LAW LECTURE

I am not an accomplished lawyer. I find quite as much material for a lecture in those points wherein I have failed as in those wherein I have been moderately successful. The leading rule for the lawyer, as for the man of every other calling, is diligence. Leave ⁴⁰ nothing for tomorrow which can be done today. Never let your correspondence fall behind. Whatever piece of business you have in hand, before stopping, do all the labor pertaining to it which can then be done. When you bring a common law-suit, if you have the facts for doing so, write the declaration at once. If a law point be involved, examine the books, and note ⁵⁰ the authority you rely on upon the declaration itself, where you are sure to find it when wanted. The same of defenses and pleas. In business not likely to be litigated—ordinary collection cases, foreclosures, partitions, and the like—make all examinations of titles, and note them and even draft orders and decrees in advance. This course has a triple advantage: it avoids omissions and neglect, saves your labor when once done, performs the labor out of court when you have leisure, rather than in court when you have not. Extemporaneous speaking should be practiced and cultivated. It is the lawyer's avenue to the public. However able and faithful he may be in other respects, people are slow to bring him business if he cannot make a speech. And yet there is not a more fatal error to young lawyers than relying too much on speech-making. If anyone, upon his rare powers of speaking, shall claim an exemption from the drudgery of the law, his case is a failure in advance.

Discourage litigation. Persuade your neighbors to compromise whenever you can. Point out to them how the nominal winner is often a real loser—in fees, expenses, and waste of time. As a peacemaker the lawyer has a superior opportunity of being a good man. There will still be business enough.

Never stir up litigation. A worse man can scarcely be found than one who does this. Who can be more nearly a fiend than he who habitually overhauls the register of deeds in search of defects in titles, whereon to stir up strife, and put money in his pocket? A moral tone ought to be infused into the profession which should drive such men out of it.

The matter of fees is important, far beyond the mere question of bread and butter involved. Properly attended to, fuller justice is done to both lawyer and client. An exorbitant fee should never be claimed. As a general rule never take your whole fee in advance, nor any more than a small retainer. When fully paid beforehand, you are more than a common mortal if you can feel the same interest in the case, as if something was still in prospect for you, as well as for your client. And when you lack interest in the case, the job will very likely lack skill and diligence in the performance. Settle the amount of fee and take a note in advance. Then you will feel that you are working for something, and you are sure to do your work faithfully and well. Never sell a fee note—at least not before the consideration service is performed. It leads to negligence and dishonesty—negligence by losing interest in the case, and dishonesty in refusing to refund when you have allowed the consideration to fail.

There is a vague popular belief that lawyers are necessarily dishonest. I say vague, because when we consider to what extent confidence and honors are reposed in and conferred upon lawyers by the people, it appears improbable that their impression of dishonesty is very distinct and vivid. Yet the impression is common, almost universal. Let no young man choosing the law for a calling for a moment yield to the popular belief—resolve to be honest at all events; and if in your own judgment you cannot be an honest lawyer, resolve to be honest without being a lawyer. Choose some other occupation, rather than one in the choosing of which you do, in advance, consent to be a knave.

LETTER TO JOHN D. JOHNSTON

DEAR JOHNSTON: Your request for eighty dollars I do not think best to comply with now. At the various times when I have helped you a little you have said to me, "We can get along very well now"; but in a very short time I find you in the same difficulty again. Now this can only happen by some defect in your conduct. What that defect is, I think I know. You are not lazy, and still you are an idler. I doubt whether, since I saw you, you have done a good whole day's work in any one day. You do not very much dislike to work, and still you do not work much, merely because it does not seem to you that you could get much for it. This habit of uselessly wasting time is the whole difficulty; it is vastly important to you, and still more so to your children, that you should break the habit. It is more important to them, because they have longer to live, and can keep out of an idle habit before they are in it, easier than they can get out after they are in.

You are now in need of some money; and what I propose is, that you shall go to work, "tooth and nail," for somebody who will give you money for it. Let father and your boys take charge of your things at home, prepare for a crop, and make the crop, and you go to work for the best money wages, or in discharge of any debt you owe, that you can get; and to secure you a fair reward for your labor, I now promise you, that for every dollar that you will, between this and the first of May, get for your own labor, either in money or as your own indebtedness, I will then give you one other dollar. By this, if you hire yourself at ten dollars a month, from me you will get ten more, making twenty dollars a month for your work. In this I do not mean you shall go off to St. Louis, or the lead mines, or the gold mines in California, but I mean for you to go at it for the best wages you can get close to home in Coles County. Now, if you will do this, you will soon be out of debt, and, what is better, you will have a habit that will keep you from getting in debt again. But if I should now clear you out of debt, next year you would be just as deep in as ever. You say you would almost give your place in heaven for seventy or eighty dollars. Then you value your place in heaven very cheap, for I am sure you can, with the offer I make, get the seventy or eighty dollars for four or five months' work. You say if I will furnish you the money you will deed me the land, and, if you don't pay the money back, you will deliver possession. Nonsense! If you can't now live with the land, how will you then live without it? You have always been kind to me, and I do not mean to be unkind to you. On the contrary, if you will but follow my advice, you will find it worth more than eighty times eighty dollars to you.

Affectionately your brother,
A. LINCOLN

LETTER TO H. D. SHARPE¹

SPRINGFIELD, December 8, 1858

H. D. SHARPE, ESQ.

DEAR SIR: Your very kind letter of November 9th was duly received. I do not know that you expected or desired an answer; but glancing over the contents of yours again, I am prompted to say that, while I desired the result of the late canvass to have been different, I still regard it as an exceedingly small matter. I think we have fairly entered upon a durable struggle as to whether this nation is to ultimately become all slave or all free, and though I fall early in the contest, it is nothing if I shall have contributed, in the least degree, to the final rightful result.

Respectfully yours,
A. LINCOLN

ADDRESS AT COOPER INSTITUTE, NEW YORK

FEBRUARY 27, 1860

MR. PRESIDENT AND FELLOW CITIZENS OF NEW YORK: The facts with which I shall deal this evening are mainly old and familiar; nor is there anything new in the general use I shall make of them. If there shall be any novelty, it will be in the mode of presenting the facts, and the inferences and observations following that presentation. In his speech last autumn at Columbus, Ohio, as reported in the New York Times, Senator Douglas said:

"Our fathers, when they framed the government under which we live, understood this question just as well, and even better, than we do now."

I fully indorse this, and I adopt it as a text for this discourse. I so adopt it because it furnishes a precise and an agreed starting-point for a discussion between Republicans and that wing of the Democracy headed by Senator Douglas. It simply leaves the inquiry: What was the understanding those fathers had of the question mentioned?

What is the frame of government under which we live? The answer must be, "The Constitution of the United States." That Constitution consists of the original, framed in 1787, and under which the present government first went into operation, and twelve subsequently framed amendments, the first ten of which were framed in 1789.

Who were our fathers that framed the Constitution? I suppose the "thirty-nine" who signed the original instrument may be fairly called our fathers who framed that part of the present government. It is almost exactly true to say they framed it, and it is altogether true to say they fairly represented the opinion and sentiment of the whole nation at that time. Their names, being familiar to nearly all, and accessible to quite all, need not now be repeated.

I take these "thirty-nine," for the present, as being "our fathers who framed the government under which we live." What is the question which, according to the text, those fathers understood "just as well, and even better, than we do now"?

It is this: Does the proper division of local from federal authority, or anything in the Constitution, forbid our federal government to control as to slavery in our federal territories?

Upon this Senator Douglas holds the affirmative, and Republicans the negative. This affirmation and denial form an issue; and this issue—this question—is precisely what the text declares our fathers understood "better than we." Let us now inquire whether the "thirty-nine," or any of them, ever acted upon this question; and if they did, how they acted upon it—how they expressed that better understanding. In 1784, three years before the Constitution, the United States then owning the Northwestern Territory, and no other, the Congress of the Confederation had before them the question of prohibiting slavery in that territory, and four of the "thirty-nine" who afterward framed the Constitution were in that Congress, and voted on that question. Of these, Roger Sherman, Thomas Mifflin, and Hugh Williamson voted for the prohibition; thus showing that, in their understanding, no line dividing local from federal authority, nor anything else, properly forbade the federal government to control as to slavery in federal territory. The other of the four, James McHenry, voted against the prohibition, showing that for some cause he thought it improper to vote for it.

In 1787, still before the Constitution, but while the convention was in session framing it, and while the Northwestern Territory still was the only territory owned by the United States, the same question of prohibiting slavery in the territory again came before the Congress of the Confederation; and two more of the "thirty-nine" who afterward signed the Constitution were in that Congress, and voted on the question. They were William Blount and William Few; and they both voted for the prohibition—thus showing that in their understanding no line dividing local from federal authority, nor anything else, properly forbade the federal government to control as to slavery in federal territory. This time the prohibition became a law, being part of what is now well known as the Ordinance of '87.

The question of federal control of slavery in the territories seems not to have been directly before the convention which framed the original Constitution; and hence it is not recorded that the "thirty-nine," or any of them, while engaged on that instrument, expressed any opinion on that precise question.

In 1789, by the first Congress which sat under the Constitution, an act was passed to enforce the Ordinance of '87, including the prohibition of slavery in the Northwestern Territory. The bill for this act was reported by one of the "thirty-nine"—Thomas Fitzsimmons, then a member of the House of Representatives from Pennsylvania. It went through all its stages without a word of opposition, and finally passed 10 both branches without ayes and nays, which is equivalent to a unanimous passage. In this Congress there were sixteen of the thirty-nine fathers who framed the original Constitution. They were John Langdon, Nicholas Gilman, William S. Johnson, Roger Sherman, Robert Morris, Thomas Fitzsimmons, William Few, Abraham Baldwin, Rufus King, William Paterson, 20 George Clymer, Richard Bassett, George Read, Pierce Butler, Daniel Carroll, and James Madison.

This shows that, in their understanding, no line dividing local from federal authority, nor anything in the Constitution, properly forbade Congress to prohibit slavery in the federal territory; else both their fidelity to correct principle, and their oath to support the Constitution, would have constrained them to oppose the prohibition.

Again, George Washington, another of the "thirty-nine," was then President of the United States, and as such approved and signed the bill, thus completing its validity as a law, and thus showing that, in his understanding, no line dividing local from federal authority, nor anything in the Constitution, 40 forbade the federal government to control as to slavery in federal territory.

No great while after the adoption of the original Constitution, North Carolina ceded to the federal government the country now constituting the state of Tennessee; and a few years later Georgia ceded that which now constitutes the states of Mississippi and Alabama. In both deeds of cession it was 50 made a condition by the ceding states that the federal government should not prohibit slavery in the ceded country. Besides this, slavery was then actually in the ceded country. Under these circumstances, Congress, on taking charge of these countries, did not absolutely prohibit slavery within them. But they did interfere with it—take control of it—even there, to a certain extent. In 1798 Congress organized the territory of Mississippi. In the act of organization they prohibited the bringing of slaves into the territory from any place without the United States, by fine, and giving freedom to slaves so brought. This act passed both branches of Congress without yeas and nays. In that Congress were three of the "thirty-nine" who framed the original Constitution. They were John Langdon, George Read, and Abraham Baldwin. They all probably voted for it. Certainly they would have placed their opposition to it upon record if, in their understanding, any line dividing local from federal authority, or anything in the Constitution, properly forbade the federal government to control as to slavery in federal territory.

In 1803 the federal government purchased the Louisiana country. Our former territorial acquisitions came from certain of our own states; but this Louisiana country was acquired from a foreign nation. In 1804 Congress gave a territorial organization to that part of it which now constitutes the state of Louisiana. New Orleans, lying within that part, was an old and comparatively large city. There were other considerable towns and settlements, and slavery was extensively and thoroughly intermingled with the people. Congress did not, in the Territorial Act, prohibit slavery; but they did interfere with it—take control of it—in a more marked and extensive way than they did in the case of Mississippi. The substance of the provision therein made in relation to slaves was:

1st. That no slave should be imported into the territory from foreign parts.

2d. That no slave should be carried into it who had been imported into the United States since the first day of May, 1798.

3d. That no slave should be carried into it, except by the owner, and for his own use as a settler; the penalty in all the cases being a fine upon the violator of the law, and freedom to the slave.

This act also was passed without ayes or nays. In the Congress which passed it there were two of the "thirty-nine." They were Abraham Baldwin and Jonathan Dayton. As stated in the case of Mississippi, it is probable they both voted for it. They would not have allowed it to pass without recording their opposition to it, if, in their understanding, it violated either the line properly dividing local from federal authority, or any provision of the constitution.

In 1819-20 came and passed the Missouri question. Many votes were taken, by yeas and nays, in both branches of Congress, upon the various phases of the general question. Two of the "thirty-nine"—Rufus King and Charles Pinckney—were members of that Congress. Mr. King steadily voted for slavery prohibition and against all compromises, while Mr. Pinckney as steadily voted against slavery prohibition and against all compromises. By this, Mr. King showed that, in his understanding, no line dividing local from federal authority, nor anything in the Constitution, was violated by Congress prohibiting slavery in federal territory; while Mr. Pinckney, by his votes, showed that, in his understanding, there was some sufficient reason for opposing such prohibition in that case.

The cases I have mentioned are the only acts of the "thirty-nine," or of any of them, upon the direct issue, which I have been able to discover.

To enumerate the persons who thus acted as being four in 1784, two in 1787, seventeen in 1789, three in 1798, two in 1804, and two in 1819-20, there would be thirty of them. But this would be counting John Langdon, Roger Sherman, William Few, Rufus

King, and George Read each twice, and Abraham Baldwin three times. The true number of those of the "thirty-nine" whom I have shown to have acted upon the question which, by the text, they understood better than we, is twenty-three, leaving sixteen not shown to have acted upon it in any way.

Here, then, we have twenty-three out of our thirty-nine fathers "who framed the government under which we live," who have, upon their official responsibility and their corporal oaths, acted upon the very question which the text affirms they "understood just as well, and even better than we do now"; and twenty-one of them—a clear majority of the whole "thirty-nine"—so acting upon it as to make them guilty of gross political impropriety and willful perjury if, in their understanding, any proper division between local and federal authority, or anything in the Constitution they had made themselves, and sworn to support, forbade the federal government to control as to slavery in the federal territories. Thus the twenty-one acted; and, as actions speak louder than words, so actions under such responsibility speak still louder.

Two of the twenty-three voted against congressional prohibition of slavery in the federal territories, in the instances in which they acted upon the question. But for what reasons they so voted is not known. They may have done so because they thought a proper division of local from federal authority, or some provision or principle of the Constitution, stood in the way; or they may, without any such question, have voted against the prohibition on what appeared to them to be sufficient grounds of expediency. No one who has sworn to support the Constitution can conscientiously vote for what he understands to be an unconstitutional measure, however expedient he may think it; but one may and ought to vote against a measure which he deems constitutional if, at the same time, he deems it inexpedient. It, therefore, would be unsafe to set down even the two who voted against the prohibition as having done so because, in their understanding, any proper division of local from federal authority, or anything in the Constitution, forbade the federal government to control as to slavery in federal territory.

The remaining sixteen of the "thirty-nine," so far as I have discovered, have left no record of their understanding upon the direct question of federal control of slavery in the federal territories. But there is much reason to believe that their understanding upon that question would not have appeared different from that of their twenty-three compeers, had it been manifested at all.

For the purpose of adhering rigidly to the text, I have purposely omitted whatever understanding may have been manifested by any person, however distinguished, other than the thirty-nine fathers who framed the original Constitution; and, for the same reason, I have also omitted whatever understanding may have been manifested by any of the "thirty-nine" even on any other phase of the general question of slavery. If we should look into their acts and declarations on those other phases, as the foreign slave-trade, and the morality and policy of slavery generally, it would appear to us that on the direct question of federal control of slavery in federal territories, the sixteen, if they had acted at all, would probably have acted just as the twenty-three did. Among that sixteen were several of the most noted anti-slavery men of those times—as Dr. Franklin, Alexander Hamilton, and Gouverneur Morris—while there was not one now known to have been otherwise, unless it may be John Rutledge, of South Carolina.

The sum of the whole is that of our thirty-nine fathers who framed the original Constitution, twenty-one—a clear majority of the whole—certainly understood that no proper division of local from federal authority, nor any part of the Constitution, forbade the federal government to control slavery in the federal territories; while all the rest had probably the same understanding. Such, unquestionably, was the understanding of our fathers who framed the original Constitution; and the text affirms that they understood the question "better than we."

But, so far, I have been considering the understanding of the question manifested by the framers of the original Constitution. In and by the original instrument, a mode was provided for amending it; and, as I have already stated, the present frame of "the government under which we live" consists of that original, and twelve amendatory articles framed and adopted since. Those who now insist that federal control of slavery in federal territories violates the Constitution, point us to the provisions which they suppose it thus violates; and, as I understand, they all fix upon provisions in these amendatory articles, and not in the original instrument. The Supreme Court, in the Dred Scott case, plant themselves upon the Fifth Amendment, which provides that no person shall be deprived of "life, liberty, or property without due process of law"; while Senator Douglas and his peculiar adherents plant themselves upon the Tenth Amendment, providing that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution" "are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people."

Now, it so happens that these amendments were framed by the first Congress which sat under the Constitution—the identical Congress which passed the act, already mentioned, enforcing the prohibition of slavery in the Northwestern Territory. Not only was it the same Congress, but they were the identical, same individual men who, at the same session, and at the same time within the session, had under consideration, and in progress toward maturity, these constitutional amendments, and this act prohibiting slavery in all the territory the nation then owned. The constitutional amendments were introduced before, and passed after, the act enforcing the Ordinance of '87; so that, during the whole pendency of the act to enforce the ordinance, the constitutional amendments were also pending.

The seventy-six members of that Congress, including sixteen of the framers of the original Constitution, as before stated, were preëminently our fathers who framed that part of "the government under which we live" which is now claimed as forbidding the federal government to control slavery in the federal territories.

Is it not a little presumptuous in anyone at this day to affirm that the two things which that Congress deliberately framed, and carried to maturity at the same time, are absolutely inconsistent with each other? And does not such affirmation become impudently absurd when coupled with the other affirmation, from the same mouth, that those who did the two things alleged to be inconsistent, understood whether they really were inconsistent better than we—better than he who affirms that they are inconsistent?

It is surely safe to assume that the thirty-nine framers of the original Constitution, and the seventy-six members of the Congress which framed the amendments thereto, taken together, do certainly include those who may be fairly called "our fathers who framed the government under which we live." And so assuming, I defy any man to show that any one of them ever, in his whole life, declared that, in his understanding, any proper division of local from federal authority, or any part of the Constitution, forbade the federal government to control as to slavery in the federal territories. I go a step further. I defy anyone to show that any living men in the whole world ever did, prior to the beginning of the present century (and I might almost say prior to the beginning of the last half of the present century), declare that, in his understanding, any proper division of local from federal authority, or any part of the Constitution, forbade the federal government to control as to slavery in the federal territories.

To those who now so declare I give not only "our fathers who framed the government under which we live," but with them all other living men within the century in which it was framed, among whom to search, and they shall not be able to find the evidence of a single man agreeing with them.

Now, and here, let me guard a little against being misunderstood. I do not mean to say we are bound to follow implicitly in whatever our fathers did. To do so would be to discard all the lights of current experience—to reject all progress, all improvement. What I do say is that if we would supplant the opinions and policy of our fathers in any case, we should do so upon evidence so conclusive, and argument so clear, that even their great authority, fairly considered and weighed, cannot stand; and most surely not in a case whereof we ourselves declare they understood the question better than we.

If any man at this day sincerely believes that a proper division of local from federal authority, or any part of the Constitution, forbids the federal government to control as to slavery in the federal territories, he is right to say so, and to enforce his position by all truthful evidence and fair argument which he can. But he has no right to mislead others who have less access to history, and less leisure to study it, into the false belief that "our fathers who framed the government under which we live" were of the same opinion—thus substituting falsehood and deception for truthful evidence and fair argument. If any man at this day sincerely believes "our fathers who framed the government under which we live" used and applied principles, in other cases, which ought to have led them to understand that a proper division of local from federal authority, or some part of the Constitution, forbids the federal government to control as to slavery in the federal territories, he is right to say so. But he should, at the same time, brave the responsibility of declaring that, in his opinion, he understands their principles better than they did themselves; and especially should he not shirk that responsibility by asserting that they "understood the question just as well, and even better, than we do now."

But enough! Let all who believe that "our fathers who framed the government under which we live understood this question just as well, and even better, than we do now," speak ¹⁰ as they spoke, and act as they acted upon it. This is all Republicans ask—all Republicans desire—in relation to slavery. As those fathers marked it, so let it be again marked, as an evil not to be extended, but to be tolerated and protected only because of and so far as its actual presence among us makes that toleration and protection a necessity. Let all the guaranties ²⁰ those fathers gave it be not grudgingly, but fully and fairly, maintained. For this Republicans contend, and with this, so far as I know or believe, they will be content.

And now, if they would listen—as I suppose they will not—I would address a few words to the Southern people.

I would say to them: You consider yourselves a reasonable and a just people; ³⁰ and I consider that in the general qualities of reason and justice you are not inferior to any other people. Still, when you speak of us Republicans, you do so only to denounce us as reptiles, or, at the best, as no better than outlaws. You will grant a hearing to pirates or murderers, but nothing like it to "Black Republicans." In all your contentions with one another, each of ⁴⁰ you deems an unconditional condemnation of "Black Republicanism" as the first thing to be attended to. Indeed, such condemnation of us seems to be an indispensable prerequisite—license, so to speak—among you to be admitted or permitted to speak at all. Now can you or not be prevailed upon to pause and to consider whether this is quite just to us, or even to your- ⁵⁰ selves? Bring forward your charges and specifications, and then be patient long enough to hear us deny or justify.

You say we are sectional. We deny

it. That makes an issue; and the burden of proof is upon you. You produce your proof; and what is it? Why, that our party had no existence in your section—gets no votes in your section. The fact is substantially true; but does it prove the issue? If it does, then in case we should, without change of principle, begin to get votes in your section, we should thereby cease to be sectional. You cannot escape this conclusion; and yet, are you willing to abide by it? If you are, you will probably soon find that we have ceased to be sectional, for we shall get votes in your section this very year. You will then begin to discover, as the truth plainly is, that your proof does not touch the issue. The fact that we get ^{no votes in your section is a fact of your making, and not of ours. And if there be fault in that fact, that fault is primarily yours, and remains so until you show that we repel you by some wrong principle or practice. If we do repel you by any wrong principle or practice, the fault is ours; but this brings you to where you ought to have started—to a discussion of the right or} wrong of our principle. If our principle, put in practice, would wrong your section for the benefit of ours, or for any other object, then our principle, and we with it, are sectional, and are justly opposed and denounced as such. Meet us, then, on the question of whether our principle, put in practice, would wrong your section; and so meet us as if it were possible that something may be said on our side. Do you accept the challenge? No! Then you really believe that the principle which "our fathers who framed the government under which we live" thought so clearly right as to adopt it, and indorse it again and again, upon their official oaths, is in fact so clearly wrong as to demand your condemnation without a moment's consideration.

Some of you delight to flaunt in our faces the warning against sectional parties given by Washington in his Farewell Address. Less than eight years before Washington gave that warning, he had, as President of the United States, approved and signed an act of Congress enforcing the prohibition of slavery in the Northwestern Territory, which act embodied the policy of the government upon that subject up to and at the very moment he penned that warning; and about one year after he penned it, he wrote Lafayette that he considered that prohibition a wise measure, expressing in the same connection his hope that we should at some time have a confederacy of free states.

Bearing this in mind, and seeing that sectionalism has since arisen upon this same subject, is that warning a weapon in your hands against us, or in our hands against you? Could Washington himself speak, would he cast the blame of that sectionalism upon us, who sustain his policy, or upon you, who repudiate it? We respect that warning of Washington, and we commend it to you, together with his example pointing to the right application of it.

But you say you are conservative—eminently conservative—while we are revolutionary, destructive, or something of the sort. What is conservatism? Is it not adherence to the old and tried, against the new and untried? We stick to, contend for, the identical old policy on the point in controversy which was adopted by “our fathers who framed the government under which we live”; while you with one accord reject, and scout, and spit upon that old policy, and insist upon substituting something new. True, you disagree among yourselves as to what that substitute shall be. You are divided on new propositions and plans, but you are unanimous in rejecting and denouncing the old policy of the fathers. Some of you are for reviving the foreign slave-trade; some for a congressional slave-code for the territories; some for Congress forbidding the territories to prohibit slavery within their limits; some for maintaining slavery in the territories through the judiciary; some for the “gur-reat pur-rinciple” that “if one man would enslave another, no third man should object,” fantastically called “popular sovereignty”; but never a man among you is in favor of federal prohibition of slavery in federal territories, according to the practice of “our fathers who framed the government under which we live.” Not one of all your various plans can show a precedent or an advocate in the century within which our government originated. Consider, then, whether your claim of conservatism for yourselves, and your charge of destructiveness against us, are based on the most clear and stable foundations.

Again, you say we have made the slavery question more prominent than it formerly was. We deny it. We admit that it is more prominent, but we deny that we made it so. It was not we, but you, who discarded the old policy of the fathers. We resisted, and still resist, your innovation; and thence comes the greater prominence of the question. Would you have that question reduced to its former proportions? Go back to that old policy. What has been will be again, under the same conditions. If you would have the peace of the old times, readopt the precepts and policy of the old times.

You charge that we stir up insurrections among your slaves. We deny it; and what is your proof? Harper's Ferry! John Brown!! John Brown was no Republican; and you have failed to implicate a single Republican in his Harper's Ferry enterprise. If any member of our party is guilty in that matter, you know it, or you do not know it. If you do know it, you are inexcusable for not designating the man and proving the fact. If you do not know it, you are inexcusable for asserting it, and especially for persisting in the assertion after you have tried and failed to make the proof. You need not be told that persisting in a charge which one does not know to be true, is simply malicious slander.

Some of you admit that no Republican designedly aided or encouraged the Harper's Ferry affair, but still insist that our doctrines and declarations necessarily lead to such results. We do not believe it. We know we hold no doctrine, and make no declaration, which were not held to and made by "our fathers who framed the government under which we live." You never dealt fairly by us in relation to this affair. When it occurred, some important state elections were near at hand, and you were in evident glee with the belief that, by charging the blame upon us, you could get an advantage of us in those elections. The elections came, and your expectations were not quite fulfilled. Every Republican man knew that, as to himself at least, your charge was a slander, and he was not much inclined by it to cast his vote in your favor. Republican doctrines and declarations are accompanied with a continual protest against any interference with your slaves, or with you about your slaves. Surely, this does not encourage them to revolt. True, we do, in common with "our fathers who framed the government under which we live," declare our belief that slavery is wrong; but the slaves do not hear us declare even this. For anything we say or do, the slaves would scarcely know there is a Republican party. I believe they would not, in fact, generally know it but for your misrepresentations of us in their hearing. In your political contests among yourselves, each faction charges the other with sympathy with Black Republicanism; and then, to give point to the charge, defines Black Republicanism to simply be insurrection, blood, and thunder among the slaves.

Slave insurrections are no more common now than they were before the Republican party was organized. What induced the Southampton insurrection, twenty-eight years ago, in which at least three times as many lives were lost as at Harper's Ferry? You can scarcely stretch your very elastic fancy to the conclusion that Southampton was "got up by Black Republicanism." In the present state of things in the United States, I do not think a general, or even a very extensive, slave insurrection is possible. The indispensable concert of action cannot be attained. The slaves have no means of rapid communication; nor can incendiary freemen, black or white, supply it. The explosive materials are everywhere in parcels; but there neither are, nor can be supplied, the indispensable connecting trains.

Much is said by Southern people about the affection of slaves for their masters and mistresses; and a part of it, at least, is true. A plot for an uprising could scarcely be devised and communicated to twenty individuals before some one of them, to save the life of a favorite master or mistress, would divulge it. This is the rule; and the slave revolution in Haiti was not an exception to it, but a case occurring under peculiar circumstances. The gunpowder plot of British history, though not connected with slaves, was more in point. In that case, only about twenty were admitted to the secret; and yet one of them, in his anxiety to save a friend, betrayed the plot to that friend, and, by consequence, averted the calamity. Occasional poisonings from the kitchen, and open or stealthy assassinations in the field, and local revolts extending to a score or so, will continue to occur as the natural results of slavery; but no general insurrection of slaves, as I think, can happen in this country for a long time. Whoever much fears, or much hopes, for such an event, will be alike disappointed.

In the language of Mr. Jefferson, uttered many years ago, "It is still in our power to direct the process of emancipation and deportation peaceably, and in such slow degrees, as that the evil will wear off insensibly; and their places be, pari passu,¹ filled up by free white laborers. If, on the contrary, it is left to force itself on, human nature must shudder at the prospect held up."

Mr. Jefferson did not mean to say, nor do I, that the power of emancipation is in the federal government. He spoke of Virginia; and, as to the power of emancipation, I speak of the slave-holding states only. The federal government, however, as we insist, has the power of restraining the extension of the institution—the power to insure that a slave insurrection shall never occur on any American soil which is now free from slavery.

John Brown's effort was peculiar. It was not a slave insurrection. It was an attempt by white men to get up a revolt among slaves, in which the slaves refused to participate. In fact, it was so absurd that the slaves, with all their ignorance, saw plainly enough it could not succeed. That affair, in its philosophy, corresponds with the many attempts, related in history, at the assassination of kings and emperors. An enthusiast broods over the oppression of a people till he fancies himself commissioned by Heaven to liberate them. He ventures the attempt, which ends in little else than his own execution. Orsini's attempt on Louis Napoleon, and John Brown's attempt at Harper's Ferry, were, in their philosophy, precisely the same. The eagerness to cast blame on old England in the one case, and on New England in the other, does not disprove the sameness of the two things.

And how much would it avail you, if you could, by the use of John Brown, Helper's book, and the like, break up the Republican organization? Human action can be modified to some extent, but human nature cannot be changed. There is a judgment and a feeling against slavery in this nation, which cast at least a million and a half of votes. You cannot destroy that judgment and feeling—that sentiment—by breaking up the political organization which rallies around it. You can scarcely scatter and disperse an army which has been formed into order in the face of your heaviest fire; but if you could, how much would you gain by forcing the sentiment which created it out of the peaceful channel of the ballot box into some other channel? What would that other channel probably be? Would the number of John Browns be lessened or enlarged by the operation?

But you will break up the Union rather than submit to a denial of your constitutional rights.

That has a somewhat reckless sound; but it would be palliated, if not fully justified, were we proposing, by the mere force of numbers, to deprive you of some right plainly written down in the Constitution. But we are proposing no such thing.

When you make these declarations you have a specific and well-understood allusion to an assumed constitutional right of yours to take slaves into the federal territories, and to hold them there as property. But no such right is specifically written in the Constitution. That instrument is literally silent about any such right. We, on the contrary, deny that such a right has any existence in the Constitution, even by implication.

Your purpose, then, plainly stated, is that you will destroy the government, unless you be allowed to construe and force the Constitution as you please, on all points in dispute between you and us. You will rule or ruin in all events.

This, plainly, stated, is your language. Perhaps you will say the Supreme Court has decided the disputed constitutional question in your favor. Not quite so. But waiving the lawyer's distinction between dictum and decision, the court has decided the question for you in a sort of way. The court has substantially said it is your constitutional right to take slaves into the federal territories, and to hold them there as property. When I say the decision was made in a sort of way, I mean it was made in a divided court, by a bare majority of the judges, and they not quite agreeing with one another in the reasons for making it; that it is so made as that its avowed supporters disagree with one another about its meaning, and that it was mainly based upon a mistaken statement of fact—the statement in the opinion that “the right of property in a slave is distinctly and expressly affirmed in the Constitution.”

An inspection of the Constitution will show that the right of property in a slave is not “distinctly and expressly affirmed” in it. Bear in mind, the judges do not pledge their judicial opinion that such right is impliedly affirmed in the Constitution; but they pledge their veracity that it is “distinctly and expressly” affirmed there —“distinctly,” that is, not mingled with anything else—“expressly,” that is, in words meaning just that, without the aid of any inference, and susceptible of no other meaning.

If they had only pledged their judicial opinion that such right is affirmed in the instrument by implication, it would be open to others to show that neither the word “slave” nor “slavery” is to be found in the Constitution, nor the word “property” even, in any connection with language alluding to the things slave, or slavery; and that wherever in that instrument the slave is alluded to, he is called a “person”; and wherever his master’s legal right in relation to him is alluded to, it is spoken of as “service or labor which may be due”—as a debt payable in service or labor. Also it would be open to show, by contemporaneous history, that this mode of alluding to slaves and slavery, instead of speaking of them, was employed on purpose to exclude from the Constitution the idea that there could be property in man.

To show all this is easy and certain.

When this obvious mistake of the judges shall be brought to their notice, is it not reasonable to expect that they will withdraw the mistaken statement, and reconsider the conclusion based upon it?

And then it is to be remembered that “our fathers who framed the government under which we live”—the men who made the Constitution—decided this same constitutional question in our favor long ago: decided it without division among themselves when making the decision; without division among themselves about the meaning of it after it was made, and, so far as any evidence is left, without basing it upon any mistaken statement of facts.

Under all these circumstances, do you really feel yourselves justified to break up this government unless such a court decision as yours is, shall be at once submitted to as a conclusive and final rule of political action? But you will not abide the election of a Republican President! In that supposed event, you say, you will destroy the Union; and then, you say, the great crime of having destroyed it will be upon us! That is cool. A highwayman holds a pistol to my ear, and mutters through his teeth, “Stand and deliver, or I shall kill you, and then you will be a murderer!”

To be sure, what the robber demanded of me—my money—was my own; and I had a clear right to keep it; but it was no more my own than my vote is my own; and the threat of death to me, to extort my money, and the threat of destruction to the Union, to extort my vote, can scarcely be distinguished in principle.

A few words now to Republicans. It is exceedingly desirable that all parts of this great confederacy shall be at peace, and in harmony one with another. Let us Republicans do our part to have it so. Even though much provoked, let us do nothing through passion and ill temper. Even though the Southern people will not so much as listen to us, let us calmly consider their demands, and yield to them if, in our deliberate view of our duty, we possibly can. Judging by all they say and do, and by the subject and nature of their controversy with us, let us determine, if we can, what will satisfy them.

Will they be satisfied if the territories be unconditionally surrendered to them? We know they will not. In all their present complaints against us, the territories are scarcely mentioned. Invasions and insurrections are the rage

now. Will it satisfy them if, in the future, we have nothing to do with invasions and insurrections? We know it will not. We so know, because we know we never had anything to do with invasions and insurrections; and yet this total abstaining does not exempt us from the charge and the denunciation.

The question recurs, What will satisfy them? Simply this: we must not only let them alone, but we must somehow convince them that we do let them alone. This, we know by experience, is no easy task. We have been so trying to convince them from the very beginning of our organization, but with no success. In all our platforms and speeches we have constantly protested our purpose to let them alone; but this has had no tendency to convince them. Alike unavailing to convince them is the fact that they have never detected a man of us in any attempt to disturb them.

These natural and apparently adequate means all failing, what will convince them? This, and this only: cease to call slavery wrong, and join them in calling it right. And this must be done thoroughly—done in acts as well as in words. Silence will not be tolerated—we must place ourselves avowedly with them. Senator Douglas' new sedition law must be enacted and enforced, suppressing all declarations that slavery is wrong, whether made in politics, in presses, in pulpits, or in private. We must arrest and return their fugitive slaves with greedy pleasure. We must pull down our free-state constitutions. The whole atmosphere must be disinfected from all taint of opposition to slavery, before they will cease to believe that all their troubles proceed from us.

I am quite aware they do not state their case precisely in this way. Most of them would probably say to us, "Let us alone; do nothing to us, and say what you please about slavery." But we do let them alone—have never disturbed them—so that, after all, it is what we say which dissatisfies them.

They will continue to accuse us of doing, until we cease saying.

I am also aware they have not as yet in terms demanded the overthrow of our free-state constitutions. Yet those constitutions declare the wrong of slavery with more solemn emphasis than do all other sayings against it; and when all these other sayings shall have been silenced, the overthrow of these constitutions will be demanded, and nothing be left to resist the demand. It is nothing to the contrary that they do not demand the whole of this just now. Demanding what they do, and for the reason they do, they can voluntarily stop nowhere short of this consummation. Holding, as they do, that slavery is morally right and socially elevating, they cannot cease to demand a full national recognition of it as a legal right and a social blessing.

Nor can we justifiably withhold this on any ground save our conviction that slavery is wrong. If slavery is right, all words, acts, laws, and constitutions against it are themselves wrong, and should be silenced and swept away. If it is right, we cannot justly object to its nationality—its universality; if it is wrong, they cannot justly insist upon its extension—its enlargement. All they ask we could readily grant, if we thought slavery right; all we ask they could as readily grant, if they thought it wrong. Their thinking it right and our thinking it wrong is the precise fact upon which depends the whole controversy. Thinking it right, as they do, they are not to blame for desiring its full recognition as being right; but thinking it wrong, as we do, can we yield to them? Can we cast our votes with their view, and against our own? In view of our moral, social, and political responsibilities, can we do this?

Wrong as we think slavery is, we can yet afford to let it alone where it is, because that much is due to the necessity arising from its actual presence in the nation; but can we, while our votes will prevent it, allow it to spread into the national territories, and to overrun us here in these free states?

If our sense of duty forbids this, then let us stand by our duty fearlessly and effectively. Let us be diverted by none of those sophistical contrivances wherewith we are so industriously plied and belabored—contrivances such as groping for some middle ground between the right and the wrong; vain as the search for a man who should be neither a living man nor a dead man; such as a policy of “don’t care” on a question about which all true men do care; such as Union appeals beseeching true Union men to yield to Disunionists, reversing the divine rule, and calling, not the sinners, but the righteous to repentance; such as invocations to Washington, imploring men to unsay what Washington said and undo what Washington did.

Neither let us be slandered from our duty by false accusations against us, nor frightened from it by menaces of destruction to the government, nor of dungeons to ourselves. Let us have faith that right makes might, and in that faith let us to the end dare to do our duty as we understand it.

FAREWELL ADDRESS AT SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS

FEBRUARY 11, 1861

MY FRIENDS: No one, not in my situation, can appreciate my feeling of sadness at this parting. To this place, and the kindness of these people, I owe everything. Here I have lived a quarter of a century, and have passed from a young to an old man. Here my children have been born, and one is buried. I now leave, not knowing when or whether ever I may return, with a task before me greater than that which rested upon Washington. Without the assistance of that Divine Being who ever attended him, I cannot succeed. With that assistance, I cannot fail. Trusting in Him who can go with me, and remain with you, and be everywhere for good, let us confidently hope that all will yet be well. To His care commending you, as I hope in your prayers you will commend me, I bid you an affectionate farewell.

ADDRESS IN INDEPENDENCE HALL, PHILADELPHIA

MR. CUYLER: I am filled with deep emotion at finding myself standing in this place, where were collected together the wisdom, the patriotism, the devotion to principle, from which sprang the institutions under which we live. You have kindly suggested to me that in my hands is the task of restoring peace to our distracted country. I can say in return, sir, that all the political sentiments I entertain have been drawn, so far as I have been able to draw them, from the sentiments which originated in and were given to the world from this hall. I have never had a feeling, politically, that did not spring from the sentiments embodied in the Declaration of Independence. I have often pondered over the dangers which were incurred by the men who assembled here and framed and adopted that Declaration. I have pondered over the toils that were endured by the officers and soldiers of the army who achieved that independence. I have often inquired of myself what great principle or idea it was that kept this Confederacy so long together. It was not the mere matter of separation of the colonies from the motherland, but that sentiment in the Declaration of Independence which gave liberty not alone to the people of this country, but hope to all the world, for all future time. It was that which gave promise that in due time the weights would be lifted from the shoulders of all men, and that all should have an equal chance. This is the sentiment embodied in the Declaration of Independence. Now, my friends, can this country be saved on that basis? If it can, I will consider myself one of the happiest men in the world if I can help to save it.

If it cannot be saved upon that principle, it will be truly awful. But if this country cannot be saved without giving up that principle, I was about to say I would rather be assassinated on this spot than surrender it. Now, in my view of the present aspect of affairs, there is no need of bloodshed and war. There is no necessity for it. I am not in favor of such a course; and I may say in advance that there will be no bloodshed unless it is forced upon the government. The government will not use force, unless force is used against it.

My friends, this is wholly an unprepared speech. I did not expect to be called on to say a word when I came here. I supposed I was merely to do something toward raising a flag. I may, therefore, have said something indiscreet. But I have said nothing but what I am willing to live by, and, if it be the pleasure of Almighty God, to die by.

FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS

MARCH 4, 1861

FELLOW CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES: In compliance with a custom as old as the government itself, I appear before you to address you briefly, and to take in your presence the oath prescribed by the Constitution of the United States to be taken by the President "before he enters on the execution of his office."

I do not consider it necessary at present for me to discuss those matters of administration about which there is no special anxiety or excitement.

Apprehension seems to exist among the people of the Southern states that by the accession of a Republican administration their property and their peace and personal security are to be endangered. There has never been any reasonable cause for such apprehension. Indeed, the most ample evidence to the contrary has all the while existed and been open to their inspection. It is found in nearly all the published speeches of him who now addresses

you. I do but quote from one of those speeches when I declare that "I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the states where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so." Those who nominated and elected me did so with full knowledge that I had made this and many similar declarations, and had never recanted them. And, more than this, they placed in the platform for my acceptance, and as a law to themselves and to me, the clear and emphatic resolution which I now read:

"Resolved, That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the states, and especially the right of each state to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend; and we denounce the lawless invasion by armed force of the soil of any state or territory, no matter under what pretext, as among the gravest of crimes."

I now reiterate these sentiments; and, in doing so, I only press upon the public attention the most conclusive evidence of which the case is susceptible: that the property, peace, and security of no section are to be in any wise endangered by the now incoming administration. I add, too, that all the protection which, consistently with the Constitution and the laws, can be given, will be cheerfully given to all the states when lawfully demanded, for whatever cause—as cheerfully to one section as to another.

There is much controversy about the delivering up of fugitives from service or labor. The clause I now read is as plainly written in the Constitution as any other of its provisions:

"No person held to service or labor in one state, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall in consequence of any law or regulation therein be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

It is scarcely questioned that this provision was intended by those who made it for the reclaiming of what we call fugitive slaves; and the intention of the lawgiver is the law. All members of Congress swear their support to the whole Constitution—to this provision as much as to any other. To¹⁰ the proposition, then, that slaves whose cases come within the terms of this clause "shall be delivered up," their oaths are unanimous. Now, if they would make the effort in good temper, could they not with nearly equal unanimity frame and pass a law by means of which to keep good that unanimous oath?

There is some difference of opinion²⁰ whether this clause should be enforced by national or by state authority; but surely that difference is not a very material one. If the slave is to be surrendered, it can be of but little consequence to him or to others by which authority it is done. And should anyone in any case be content that his oath shall go unkept on a merely unsubstantial controversy as to how it shall be³⁰ kept?

Again, in any law upon this subject, ought not all the safeguards of liberty known in civilized and humane jurisprudence to be introduced, so that a free man be not, in any case, surrendered as a slave? And might it not be well at the same time to provide by law for the enforcement of that clause in the Constitution which guar-⁴⁰antees that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states"?

I take the official oath today with no mental reservations, and with no purpose to construe the Constitution or laws by any hypercritical rules. And while I do not choose now to specify particular acts of Congress as proper⁵⁰ to be enforced, I do suggest that it will be much safer for all, both in official and private stations, to conform to and abide by all those acts which stand un-repealed, than to violate any of them, trusting to find immunity in having them held to be unconstitutional.

It is seventy-two years since the first inauguration of a president under our national Constitution. During that period fifteen different and greatly distinguished citizens have, in succession, administered the executive branch of the government. They have conducted it through many perils, and generally with great success. Yet, with all this scope of precedent, I now enter upon the same task for the brief constitutional term of four years under great and peculiar difficulty. A disruption of the federal Union, heretofore only menaced, is now formidably attempted.

I hold that, in contemplation of universal law and of the Constitution, the union of these states is perpetual. Perpetuity is implied, if not expressed, in the fundamental law of all national governments. It is safe to assert that no government proper ever had a provision in its organic law for its own termination. Continue to execute all the express provisions of our national Constitution, and the Union will endure forever—it being impossible to destroy it except by some action not provided for in the instrument itself.

Again, if the United States be not a government proper, but an association of states in the nature of contract merely, can it, as a contract, be peaceably unmade by less than all the parties who made it? One party to a contract may violate it—break it, so to speak; but does it not require all to lawfully rescind it?

Descending from these general principles, we find the proposition that in legal contemplation the Union is perpetual confirmed by the history of the Union itself. The Union is much older than the Constitution. It was formed, in fact, by the Articles of Association in 1774. It was matured and continued by the Declaration of Independence in 1776. It was further matured, and the faith of all the then thirteen states expressly plighted and engaged that it should be perpetual, by the Articles of Confederation in 1778. And, finally, in 1787 one of the declared objects for ordaining and establishing the Constitution was "to form a more perfect Union."

But if the destruction of the Union by one or by a part only of the states be lawfully possible, the Union is less perfect than before the Constitution, having lost the vital element of perpetuity. 10

It follows from these views that no state upon its own mere motion can lawfully get out of the Union; that resolves and ordinances to that effect are legally void; and that acts of violence, within any state or states, against the authority of the United-States, are insurrectionary or revolutionary, according to circumstances.

I therefore consider that, in view of 20 the Constitution and the laws, the Union is unbroken; and to the extent of my ability I shall take care, as the Constitution itself expressly enjoins upon me, that the laws of the Union be faithfully executed in all the states. Doing this I deem to be only a simple duty on my part; and I shall perform it so far as practicable, unless my rightful masters, the American people, shall 30 withhold the requisite means, or in some authoritative manner direct the contrary. I trust this will not be regarded as a menace, but only as the declared purpose of the Union that it will constitutionally defend and maintain itself.

In doing this there needs to be no bloodshed or violence; and there shall be none, unless it be forced upon the 40 national authority. The power confided to me will be used to hold, occupy, and possess the property and places belonging to the government, and to collect the duties and imposts; but beyond what may be necessary for these objects, there will be no invasion, no using of force against or among the people anywhere. Where hostility to the United States, in any interior locality, shall be so great and universal 50 as to prevent competent resident citizens from holding the federal offices, there will be no attempt to force obnoxious strangers among the people for that object. While the strict legal right may exist in the government to enforce the exercise of these offices, the attempt to do so would be so irritating, and so nearly impracticable withal, that I deem it better to forego for the time the uses of such offices.

The mails, unless repelled, will continue to be furnished in all parts of the Union. So far as possible, the people everywhere shall have that sense of perfect security which is most favorable to calm thought and reflection. The course here indicated will be followed unless current events and experience shall show a modification or change to be proper; and in every case and exigency my best discretion will be exercised according to circumstances 20 actually existing, and with a view and a hope of a peaceful solution of the national troubles, and the restoration of fraternal sympathies and affections.

That there are persons in one section or another who seek to destroy the Union at all events, and are glad of any pretext to do it, I will neither affirm nor deny; but if there be such, I need 30 address no word to them. To those, however, who really love the Union may I not speak?

Before entering upon so grave a matter as the destruction of our national fabric, with all its benefits, its memories, and its hopes, would it not be wise to ascertain precisely why we do it? Will you hazard so desperate a step while there is any possibility that any 40 portion of the ills you fly from have no real existence? Will you, while the certain ills you fly to are greater than all the real ones you fly from—will you risk the commission of so fearful a mistake?

All profess to be content in the Union if all constitutional rights can be maintained. Is it true, then, that any right, plainly written in the Constitution, has 50 been denied? I think not. Happily the human mind is so constituted that no party can reach to the audacity of doing this. Think, if you can, of a single instance in which a plainly written provision of the Constitution has ever been denied. If by the mere force of numbers a majority should deprive a minority of any clearly written constitutional right, it might, in a moral point of view, justify revolution—certainly would if such a right were a vital one. But such is not our case. All the vital rights of minorities and of individuals are so plainly assured to them by affirmations and negations, guaranties and prohibitions, in the Constitution, that controversies never arise concerning them. But no organic law can ever be framed with a provision specifically applicable to every question which may occur in practical administration. No foresight can anticipate, nor any document of reasonable length contain, express provisions for all possible questions. Shall fugitives from labor be surrendered by national or by state authority? The Constitution does not expressly say. May Congress prohibit slavery in the territories? The Constitution does not expressly say. Must Congress protect slavery in the territories? The Constitution does not expressly say.

From questions of this class spring all our constitutional controversies, and we divide upon them into majorities and minorities. If the minority will not acquiesce, the majority must, or the government must cease. There is no other alternative; for continuing the government is acquiescence on one side or the other.

If a minority in such case will secede rather than acquiesce, they make a precedent which in turn will divide and ruin them; for a minority of their own will secede from them whenever a majority refuses to be controlled by such minority. For instance, why may not any portion of a new confederacy a year or two hence arbitrarily secede again, precisely as portions of the present Union now claim to secede from it? All who cherish disunion sentiments are now being educated to the exact temper of doing this.

Is there such perfect identity of interests among the states to compose a new Union, as to produce harmony only, and prevent renewed secession?

Plainly, the central idea of secession is the essence of anarchy. A majority held in restraint by constitutional checks and limitations, and always changing easily with deliberate changes of popular opinions and sentiments, is the only true sovereign of a free people.

Whoever rejects it does, of necessity, fly to anarchy or to despotism. Unanimity is impossible; the rule of a minority, as a permanent arrangement, is wholly inadmissible; so that, rejecting the majority principle, anarchy or despotism in some form is all that is left.

I do not forget the position, assumed by some, that constitutional questions are to be decided by the Supreme Court; nor do I deny that such decisions must be binding, in any case, upon the parties to a suit, as to the object of that suit, while they are also entitled to very high respect and consideration in all parallel cases by all other departments of the government. And while it is obviously possible that such decision may be erroneous in any given case, still the evil effect following it, being limited to that particular case, with the chance that it may be overruled and never become a precedent for other cases, can better be borne than could the evils of a different practice. At the same time, the candid citizen must confess that if the policy of the government, upon vital questions affecting the whole people, is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the Supreme Court, the instant they are made, in ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions, the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned their government into the hands of that eminent tribunal. Nor is there in this view any assault upon the court or the judges. It is a duty from which they may not shrink to decide cases properly brought before them, and it is no fault of theirs if others seek to turn their decisions to political purposes.

One section of our country believes slavery is right, and ought to be extended, while the other believes it is wrong, and ought not to be extended. This is the only substantial dispute. The fugitive-slave clause of the Constitution, and the law for the suppression of the foreign slave-trade, are each as well enforced, perhaps, as any law can ever be in a community where the moral sense of the people imperfectly supports the law itself. The great body of the people abide by the dry legal obligation in both cases, and a few break over in each. This, I think, cannot be perfectly cured; and it would be worse in both cases after the separation of the sections than before. The foreign slave-trade, now imperfectly suppressed, would be ultimately revived, without restriction, in one section, while fugitive slaves, now only partially surrendered, would not be surrendered at all by the other.

Physically speaking, we cannot separate. We cannot remove our respective sections from each other, nor build an impassable wall between them. A husband and wife may be divorced, and go out of the presence and beyond the reach of each other; but the different parts of our country cannot do this. They cannot but remain face to face; and intercourse, either amicable or hostile, must continue between them. Is it possible, then, to make that intercourse more advantageous or more satisfactory after separation than before? Can aliens make treaties easier than friends can make laws? Can treaties be more faithfully enforced between aliens than laws can among friends? Suppose you go to war, you cannot fight always; and when, after much loss on both sides, and no gain on either, you cease fighting, the identical old questions as to terms of intercourse are again upon you.

This country, with its institutions, belongs to the people who inhabit it. Whenever they shall grow weary of the existing government, they can exercise their constitutional right of amending it, or their revolutionary right to dismember or overthrow it. I cannot be ignorant of the fact that many worthy and patriotic citizens are desirous of having the national Constitution amended. While I make no recommendation of amendments, I fully recognize the rightful authority of the people over the whole subject, to be exercised in either of the modes prescribed in the instrument itself; and I should, under existing circumstances, favor rather than oppose a fair opportunity being afforded the people to act upon it. I will venture to add that to me the convention mode seems preferable, in that it allows amendments to originate with the people themselves, instead of only permitting them to take or reject propositions originated by others not especially chosen for the purpose, and which might not be precisely such as they would wish to either accept or refuse. I understand a proposed amendment to the Constitution—which amendment, however, I have not seen—has passed Congress, to the effect that the federal government shall never interfere with the domestic institutions of the states, including that of persons held to service. To avoid misconception of what I have said, I depart from my purpose not to speak of particular amendments so far as to say that, holding such a provision to now be implied constitutional law, I have no objection to its being made express and irrevocable.

The chief magistrate derives all his authority from the people, and they have conferred none upon him to fix terms for the separation of the states. The people themselves can do this also if they choose; but the Executive, as such, has nothing to do with it. His duty is to administer the present government, as it came to his hands, and to transmit it, unimpaired by him, to his successor.

Why should there not be a patient confidence in the ultimate justice of the people? Is there any better or equal hope in the world? In our present differences is either party without faith of being in the right? If the Almighty Ruler of Nations, with His eternal truth and justice, be on your side of the North, or on yours of the South, that truth and that justice will surely prevail by the judgment of this great tribunal of the American people.

By the frame of the government under which we live, this same people have wisely given their public servants but little power for mischief; and have, with equal wisdom, provided for the return of that little to their own hands¹⁰ at very short intervals. While the people retain their virtue and vigilance, no administration, by any extreme of wickedness or folly, can very seriously injure the government in the short space of four years.

My countrymen, one and all, think calmly and well upon this whole subject. Nothing valuable can be lost by taking time. If there be an object to²⁰ hurry any of you in hot haste to a step which you would never take deliberately, that object will be frustrated by taking time; but no good object can be frustrated by it. Such of you as are now dissatisfied, still have the old Constitution unimpaired, and, on the sensitive point, the laws of your own framing under it; while the new administration will have no immediate power, if it²⁰ would, to change either. If it were admitted that you who are dissatisfied hold the right side in the dispute, there still is no single good reason for precipitate action. Intelligence, patriotism, Christianity, and a firm reliance on Him who has never yet forsaken this favored land, are still competent to adjust in the best way all our present difficulty.

In your hands, my dissatisfied fellow countrymen, and not in mine, is the momentous issue of civil war. The government will not assail you. You can have no conflict without being yourselves the aggressors. You have no oath registered in heaven to destroy the government, while I shall have the most solemn one to "preserve, protect, and defend it."

I am loath to close. We are not enemies, but friends. We must not be enemies. Though passion may have strained, it must not break our bonds of affection. The mystic chords of memory, stretching from every battlefield and patriot grave to every living heart and hearthstone all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of the Union when again touched, as surely they will be, by the better angels of our nature.

LETTER TO MAJOR RAMSEY¹

EXECUTIVE MANSION, October 17, 1861

MY DEAR SIR: The lady bearer of this says she has two sons who want to work. Set them at it if possible. Wanting to work is so rare a want that it should be encouraged.

Yours truly,

A. LINCOLN

LETTER TO GENERAL G. B. McCLELLAN

EXECUTIVE MANSION,

WASHINGTON, February 3, 1862

MAJOR-GENERAL McCLELLAN.

MY DEAR SIR: You and I have distinct and different plans for a movement of the Army of the Potomac—yours to be down the Chesapeake, up the Rappahannock to Urbana, and across land to the terminus of the railroad on the York River; mine to move directly to a point on the railroad southwest of Manassas.

If you will give me satisfactory answers to the following questions, I shall⁴⁰ gladly yield my plan to yours.

First. Does not your plan involve a greatly larger expenditure of time and money than mine?

Second. Wherein is a victory more certain by your plan than mine?

Third. Wherein is a victory more valuable by your plan than mine?

Fourth. In fact, would it not be less valuable in this, that it would break no great line of the enemy's communications, while mine would?

¹From the Constitutional Edition of Lincoln's Writings; by permission of the publishers, G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

Fifth. In case of disaster, would not a retreat be more difficult by your plan than mine?

Yours truly,
ABRAHAM LINCOLN

MEMORANDUM ACCOMPANYING LETTER OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN TO GENERAL
MCLELLAN, DATED FEBRUARY 3, 1862

First. Suppose the enemy should attack us in force before we reach the Occoquan, what?

Second. Suppose the enemy in force shall dispute the crossing of the Occoquan, what? In view of this, might it not be safest for us to cross the Occoquan at Colchester, rather than at the village of Occoquan? This would cost the enemy two miles more of travel to meet us, but would, on the contrary, leave us two miles farther from our ultimate destination.

Third. Suppose we reach Maple Valley without an attack, will we not be attacked there in force by the enemy marching by the several roads from Manassas; and if so, what?

the New York Tribune. If there be in it any statements or assumptions of fact which I may know to be erroneous, I do not, now and here, controvert them. If there be in it any inferences which I may believe to be falsely drawn, I do not, now and here, argue against them. If there be perceptible in it an impatient and dictatorial tone, I waive it in deference to an old friend, whose heart I have always supposed to be right.

As to the policy I "seem to be pursuing," as you say, I have not meant to leave any one in doubt.

I would save the Union. I would save it the shortest way under the Constitution. The sooner the national authority can be restored, the nearer the Union will be "the Union as it was." If there be those who would not save the Union unless they could at the same time save slavery, I do not agree with them. If there be those who would not save the Union unless they could at the same time destroy slavery, I do not agree with them. My paramount object in this struggle is to save the Union, and is not either to save or to destroy slavery. If I could save the Union without freeing any slave, I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing all the slaves, I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing some and leaving others alone, I would also do that. What I do about slavery and the colored race, I do because I believe it helps to save the Union; and what I forbear, I forbear because I do not believe it would help to save the Union. I shall do less whenever I shall believe what I am doing hurts the cause; and I shall do more whenever I shall believe doing more will help the cause. I shall try to correct errors when shown to be errors, and I shall adopt new views so fast as they shall appear to be true views. I have here stated my purpose according to my view of official duty, and I intend no modification of my oft-expressed personal wish that all men, everywhere, could be free.

Yours,

A. LINCOLN

TELEGRAM TO R. YATES AND WILLIAM BUTLER

WASHINGTON, April 10, 1862
HON. R. YATES AND WILLIAM BUTLER, SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS:

I fully appreciate General Pope's splendid achievements, with their invaluable results; but you must know that major-generalships in the regular army are not as plenty as blackberries.

A. LINCOLN

LETTER TO HORACE GREELEY

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, August 22, 1862
HON. HORACE GREELEY.

DEAR SIR:—I have just read yours of the 19th, addressed to myself through

TELEGRAM TO GENERAL G. B.
McCLELLAN

WAR DEPARTMENT,

WASHINGTON CITY, October 24, 1862

MAJOR-GENERAL McCLELLAN:

I have just read your dispatch about sore-tongued and fatigued horses. Will you pardon me for asking what the horses of your army have done since the battle of Antietam that fatigues anything?

A. LINCOLN

LETTER TO GENERAL JOSEPH HOOKER

EXECUTIVE MANSION,

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 26, 1863

MAJOR-GENERAL HOOKER.

GENERAL: I have placed you at the head of the Army of the Potomac. Of course I have done this upon what appear to me to be sufficient reasons, and yet I think it best for you to know that there are some things in regard to which I am not quite satisfied with you. I believe you to be a brave and skillful soldier, which of course I like. I also believe you do not mix politics with your profession, in which you are right. You have confidence in yourself, which is a valuable if not an indispensable quality. You are ambitious, which, within reasonable bounds, does good rather than harm; but I think that during General Burnside's command of the army you have taken counsel of your ambition and thwarted him as much as you could, in which you did a great wrong to the country and to a most meritorious and honorable brother officer. I have heard, in such a way as to believe it, of your recently saying that both the army and the government needed a dictator. Of course it was not for this, but in spite of it, that I have given you the command. Only those generals who gain successes can set up dictators. What I now ask of you is military success, and I will risk the dictatorship. The government will support you to the utmost of its ability, which is neither more nor less than it has done and will do for all commanders. I much fear that the spirit which you have aided to infuse into the army, of criticizing their commander and withholding confidence from him, will now turn upon you. I shall assist you as far as I can to put it down. Neither you nor Napoleon, if he were alive again, could get any good out of an army while such a spirit prevails in it; and now beware of rashness. Beware of rashness, but with energy and sleepless vigilance go forward and give us victories.

Yours very truly,

A. LINCOLN

TELEGRAM TO GENERAL
JOSEPH HOOKER

WASHINGTON, June 5, 1863. 4 P. M.

MAJOR GENERAL HOOKER: Yours of today was received an hour ago. So much of professional military skill is requisite to answer it that I have turned the task over to General Halleck. He promises to perform it with his utmost care. I have but one idea which I think worth suggesting to you, and that is, in case you find Lee coming to the north of the Rappahannock, I would by no means cross to the south of it. If he should leave a rear force at Fredericksburg, tempting you to fall upon it, it would fight in entrenchments and have you at disadvantage, and so, man for man, worst you at that point, while his main force would in some way be getting an advantage of you northward. In one word, I would not take any risk of being entangled upon the river, like an ox jumped half over a fence and liable to be torn by dogs front and rear without a fair chance to gore one way or kick the other. If Lee would come to my side of the river, I would keep on the same side, and fight him or act on the defense, according as might be my estimate of his strength relatively to my own. But these are mere suggestions which I desire to be controlled by the judgment of yourself and General Halleck.

A. LINCOLN

TELEGRAM TO GENERAL JOSEPH HOOKER

WASHINGTON, June 14, 1863

MAJOR GENERAL HOOKER: So far as we can make out here, the enemy have Milroy surrounded at Winchester, and Tyler at Martinsburg. If they could hold out a few days, could you help them? If the head of Lee's army is at Martinsburg and the tail of it on the plank road between Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville, the animal must be very slim somewhere. Could you not break him?

A. LINCOLN

LETTER TO GENERAL U. S. GRANT

EXECUTIVE MANSION,

WASHINGTON, July 13, 1863

MAJOR GENERAL GRANT.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I do not remember that you and I ever met personally. I write this now as a grateful acknowledgment for the almost inestimable service you have done the country. I wish to say a word further. When you first reached the vicinity of Vicksburg, I thought you should do what you finally did—march the troops across³⁰ the neck, run the batteries with the transports, and thus go below; and I never had any faith, except a general hope that you knew better than I, that the Yazoo Pass expedition and the like could succeed. When you got below and took Port Gibson, Grand Gulf, and vicinity, I thought you should go down the river and join General Banks, and when you turned northward, east of the Big Black, I feared it was a mistake. I now wish to make the personal acknowledgment that you were right and I was wrong.

Yours very truly,

A. LINCOLN

LETTER TO JAMES H. HACKETT

EXECUTIVE MANSION,

WASHINGTON, August 17, 1863

JAMES H. HACKETT, Esq.

MY DEAR SIR: Months ago I should have acknowledged the receipt of your book and accompanying kind note; and I now have to beg your pardon for not having done so.

For one of my age I have seen very little of the drama. The first presentation of Falstaff I ever saw was yours here, last winter or spring. Perhaps the best compliment I can pay is to say, as I truly can, I am very anxious to see it again. Some of Shakespeare's plays I have never read; while others I have gone over perhaps as frequently as any unprofessional reader. Among the latter are "Lear," "Richard III," "Henry VIII," "Hamlet," and especially "Macbeth." I think nothing equals "Macbeth." It is wonderful.

Unlike you gentlemen of the profession, I think the soliloquy in "Hamlet" commencing "Oh, my offense is rank" surpasses that commencing "To be or not to be." But pardon this small attempt at criticism. I should like to hear you pronounce the opening speech of Richard III. Will you not soon visit Washington again? If you do, please call and let me make your personal acquaintance.

Yours truly,

A. LINCOLN

ADDRESS AT THE DEDICATION OF THE GETTYSBURG NA- TIONAL CEMETERY

NOVEMBER 19, 1863

Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent, a new nation, conceived in Liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

Now we are engaged in a great civil war; testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting-place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

But, in a larger sense, we cannot dedicate—we cannot consecrate—we cannot hallow—this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it, far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember, what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

LETTER TO GENERAL U. S. GRANT

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, April 30, 1864

LIEUTENANT GENERAL GRANT: Not expecting to see you again before the spring campaign opens, I wish to express in this way my entire satisfaction with what you have done up to this time, so far as I understand it. The particulars of your plans I neither know nor seek to know. You are vigilant and self-reliant; and, pleased with this, I wish not to obtrude any constraints or restraints upon you. While I am very anxious that any great disaster or capture of our men in great numbers shall be avoided, I know these points are less likely to escape your attention than they would be mine. If there is anything wanting which is within my power to give, do not fail to let me know it. And now, with a brave army and a just cause, may God sustain you.

Yours very truly,
A. LINCOLN

MEMORANDUM

AUGUST 23, 1864

This morning, as for some days past, it seems exceedingly probable that this administration will not be reelected. Then it will be my duty to so co-operate with the President-elect as to save the Union between the election and the inauguration; as he will have secured his election on such ground that he cannot possibly save it afterward.

A. LINCOLN

LETTER TO MRS. BIXBY

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, November 21, 1864

MRS. BIXBY, BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

DEAR MADAM: I have been shown in the files of the War Department a statement of the Adjutant-General of Massachusetts that you are the mother of five sons who have died gloriously on the field of battle. I feel how weak and fruitless must be any words of mine which should attempt to beguile you from the grief of a loss so overwhelming. But I cannot refrain from tendering to you the consolation that may be found in the thanks of the republic they died to save. I pray that our Heavenly Father may assuage the anguish of your bereavement, and leave you only the cherished memory of the loved and lost, and the solemn pride that must be yours to have laid so costly a sacrifice upon the altar of freedom.

Yours very sincerely and respectfully,
ABRAHAM LINCOLN

SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS

MARCH 4, 1865

FELLOW COUNTRYMEN: At this second appearing to take the oath of the presidential office, there is less occasion for an extended address than there was at the first. Then a statement, somewhat in detail, of a course to be pursued, seemed fitting and proper. Now, at the expiration of four years, during which public declarations have been constantly called forth on every point and phase of the great contest which still absorbs the attention and engrosses the energies of the nation, little that is new could be presented. The progress of our arms, upon which all else chiefly depends, is as well known to the public as to myself; and it is, I trust, reasonably satisfactory and encouraging to all. With high hope for the future, no prediction in regard to it is ventured.

On the occasion corresponding to this four years ago, all thoughts were anxiously directed to an impending civil war. All dreaded it—all sought to avert it. While the inaugural address was being delivered from this place, devoted altogether to saving the Union without war, insurgent agents were in the city seeking to destroy it without war—seeking to dissolve the Union, and divide effects, by negotiation. Both parties deprecated war; but one of them would make war rather than let the nation survive; and the other would accept war rather than let it perish. And the war came.

One-eighth of the whole population were colored slaves, not distributed generally over the Union, but localized in the southern part of it. These slaves constituted a peculiar and powerful interest. All knew that this interest was, somehow, the cause of the war. To strengthen, perpetuate, and extend this interest was the object for which the insurgents would rend the Union, even by war; while the government claimed no right to do more than to restrict the territorial enlargement of it.

Neither party expected for the war the magnitude or the duration which it has already attained. Neither anticipated that the cause of the conflict might cease with, or even before, the conflict itself should cease. Each looked for an easier triumph, and a result less fundamental and astounding. Both read the same Bible, and pray to the same God; and each invokes His aid against the other. It may seem strange that any men should dare to ask a just God's assistance in wringing their bread from the sweat of other men's faces; but let us judge not, that we be not judged. The prayers of both could not be answered—that of neither has been answered fully.

The Almighty has his own purposes. "Woe unto the world because of offenses! for it must needs be that offenses come; but woe to that man by whom the offense cometh." If we shall suppose that American slavery is one of those offenses which, in the providence of God, must needs come, but which, having continued through His appointed time, He now wills to remove, and that He gives to both North and South this terrible war, as the woe due to those by whom the offense came, shall we discern therein any departure from those divine attributes which the believers in a living God always ascribe to Him? Fondly do we hope—ferently do we pray—that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet, if God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled by the bondman's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said, "The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."

With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up the nation's wounds; to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow, and his orphan—to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves, and with all nations.

LETTER TO THURLOW WEED

EXECUTIVE MANSION,

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 15, 1865.

DEAR MR. WEED:

Every one likes a compliment. Thank you for yours on my little notification speech and on the recent inaugural address. I expect the latter to wear as well as—perhaps better than—anything I have produced; but I believe it is not immediately popular. Men are not flattered by being shown that there has been a difference of purpose between the Almighty and them. To deny it, however, in this case, is to deny that there is a God governing the world. It is a truth which I thought¹⁰ needed to be told, and, as whatever of humiliation there is in it falls most directly on myself, I thought others might afford for me to tell it.

Truly yours,

A. LINCOLN

EDWARD EVERETT HALE
(1822-1909)

THE MAN WITHOUT A COUNTRY

I suppose that very few casual readers of the New York Herald of August 13th observed, in an obscure corner, among the "Deaths," the announcement,

"NOLAN. Died on board U. S. Corvette Levant, Lat. 2° 11' S., Long. 131°³⁰ W., on the 11th of May, PHILIP NOLAN:"

I happened to observe it, because I was stranded at the old Mission-House in Mackinac, waiting for a Lake Superior steamer which did not choose to come; and I was devouring to the very stubble all the current literature I could get hold of, even down to the deaths and marriages in the Herald.⁴⁰ My memory for names and people is good, and the reader will see, as he goes on, that I had reason enough to remember Philip Nolan. There are hundreds of readers who would have paused at that announcement, if the officer of the Levant who reported it had chosen to make it thus: "Died, May 11th, The Man without a Country." For it was as "The Man without a Country" that⁵⁰ poor Philip Nolan had generally been known by the officers who had him in charge during some fifty years, as, indeed, by all the men who sailed under them. I dare say there is many a man who has taken wine with him once a fortnight, in a three years' cruise, who never knew that his name was "Nolan," or whether the poor wretch had any name at all.

There can now be no possible harm in telling this poor creature's story. Reason enough there has been till now, ever since Madison's administration went out in 1817, for very strict secrecy, the secrecy of honor itself, among the gentlemen of the navy who have had Nolan in successive charge. And certainly it speaks well for the esprit de corps of the profession, and the personal honor of its members, that to the press this man's story has been wholly unknown,—and, I think, to the country at²⁰ large also. I have reason to think, from some investigations I made in the Naval Archives when I was attached to the Bureau of Construction, that every official report relating to him was burned when Ross burned the public buildings at Washington. One of the Tuckers, or possibly one of the Watsons, had Nolan in charge at the end of the war; and when, on returning from his cruise, he reported at Washington to one of the Crowninshields,—who was in the Navy Department when he came home,—he found that the Department ignored the whole business. Whether they really knew nothing about it, or whether it was a "Non mi ricordo,"¹ determined on as a piece of policy, I do not know. But this I do know, that since 1817, and possibly before, no naval officer has mentioned Nolan in his report of a cruise.

But, as I say, there is no need for secrecy any longer. And now the poor creature is dead, it seems to me worth while to tell a little of his story, by way of showing young Americans of today what it is to be A Man without a Country.

Philip Nolan was as fine a young officer as there was in the "Legion of the West," as the Western division of our army was then called. When Aaron Burr made his first dashing expedition down to New Orleans in 1805, at Fort Massac, or somewhere above on the river, he met, as the Devil would have it, this gay, dashing, bright young fellow; at some dinner-party, I think. Burr marked him, talked to him, walked with him, took him a day or two's voyage in his flat-boat, and, in short, fascinated him. For the next year, barrack-life was very tame to poor Nolan. He occasionally availed himself of the permission the great man had given him to write to him. Long, high-worded, stilted letters the poor boy wrote and rewrote and copied. But never a line did he have in reply from the gay deceiver. The other boys in the garrison sneered at him, because he sacrificed in this unrequited affection for a politician the time which they devoted to Monongahela, sledge, and high-low-jack. Bourbon, euchre, and poker were still unknown. But one day Nolan had his revenge. This time Burr came down the river, not as an attorney seeking a place for his office, but as a disguised conqueror. He had defeated I know not how many district-attorneys; he had dined at I know not how many public dinners; he had been heralded in I know not how many Weekly Arguses; and it was rumored that he had an army behind him and an empire before him. It was a great day—his arrival—to poor Nolan. Burr had not been at the fort an hour before he sent for him. That evening he asked Nolan to take him out in his skiff to show him a cane-brake or a cotton-wood tree, as he said,—really to seduce him; and by the time the sail was over, Nolan was enlisted body and soul. From that time, though he did not yet know it, he lived as a man without a country.

What Burr meant to do I know no more than you, dear reader. It is none of our business just now. Only, when the grand catastrophe came, and Jefferson and the House of Virginia of that day undertook to break on the wheel all the possible Clarendons of the then House of York, by the great treason trial at Richmond, some of the lesser fry in that distant Mississippi Valley, which was farther from us than Puget's Sound is today, introduced the like novelty on their provincial stage; and, to while away the monotony of the summer at Fort Adams, got up, for spectacles, a string of court-martials on the officers there. One and another of the colonels and majors were tried, and, to fill out the list, little Nolan, against whom, Heaven knows, there was evidence enough,—that he was sick of the service, had been willing to be false to it, and would have obeyed any order to march any-whither with any one who would follow him, had the order only been signed, "By command of His Exc. A. Burr." The courts dragged on. The big flies escaped,—rightly for all I know. Nolan was proved guilty enough, as I say; yet you and I would never have heard of him, reader, but that, when the president of the court asked him at the close whether he wished to say anything to show that he had always been faithful to the United States, he cried out, in a fit of frenzy:

"D—n the United States! I wish I may never hear of the United States again!"

I suppose he did not know how the words shocked old Colonel Morgan who was holding the court. Half the officers who sat in it had served through the Revolution; and their lives, not to say their necks, had been risked for the very idea which he so cavalierly cursed in his madness. He, on his part, had grown up in the West of those days, in the midst of "Spanish plot," "Orleans plot," and all the rest. He had been educated on a plantation, where the finest company was a Spanish officer or a French merchant from Orleans. His education, such as it was, had been perfected in commercial expeditions to Vera Cruz; and I think he told me his father once hired an Englishman to be a private tutor for a winter on the plantation. He had spent half his youth with an older brother, hunting horses in Texas; and, in a word, to him "United States" was scarcely a reality. Yet he had been fed by "United States" for all the years since he had been in the army. He had sworn on his faith as a Christian to be true to "United States." It was "United States" which gave him the uniform he wore, and the sword by his side. Nay, my poor Nolan, it was only because "United States" had picked you out first as one of her own confidential men of honor that "A. Burr" cared for you a straw ¹⁰ more than for the flat-boat men who sailed his ark for him. I do not excuse Nolan; I only explain to the reader why he damned his country, and wished he might never hear her name again.

He never did hear her name but once again. From that moment, September 23, 1807, till the day he died, May 11, 1863, he never heard her name again. For that half century and more he was ²⁰ a man without a country.

Old Morgan, as I said, was terribly shocked. If Nolan had compared George Washington to Benedict Arnold, or had cried, "God save King George," Morgan would not have felt worse. He called the court into his private room, and returned in fifteen minutes, with a face like a sheet, to say,—

"Prisoner, hear the sentence of the ³⁰ Court! The Court decides, subject to the approval of the President, that you never hear the name of the United States again."

Nolan laughed. But nobody else laughed. Old Morgan was too solemn, and the whole room was hushed dead as night for a minute. Even Nolan lost his swagger in a moment. Then Morgan added,—

"Mr. Marshal, take the prisoner to Orleans in an armed boat, and deliver him to the naval commander there."

The marshal gave his orders, and the prisoner was taken out of court.

"Mr. Marshal," continued old Morgan, "see that no one mentions the United States to the prisoner. Mr. Marshal, make my respects to Lieutenant Mitchell at Orleans, and request ⁵⁰ him to order that no one shall mention the United States to the prisoner while he is on board ship. You will receive your written orders from the officer on duty here this evening. The Court is adjourned without day."

I have always supposed that Colonel Morgan himself took the proceedings of the court to Washington City, and explained them to Mr. Jefferson. Certain it is that the President approved them,—certain, that is, if I may believe the men who say they have seen his signature. Before the Nautilus got round from New Orleans to the northern Atlantic coast with the prisoner on board, the sentence had been approved, and he was a man without a country.

The plan then adopted was substantially the same which was necessarily followed ever after. Perhaps it was suggested by the necessity of sending him by water from Fort Adams and Orleans. The Secretary of the Navy—it must have been the first Crowninshield, though he is a man I do not remember—was requested to put Nolan on board a government vessel bound on a long cruise, and to direct that he should be only so far confined there as to make it certain that he never saw or heard of the country. We had few long cruises then, and the navy was very much out of favor; and as almost all of this story is traditional, as I have explained, I do not know certainly what his first cruise was. But the commander to whom he was entrusted,—perhaps it was Tingey or Shaw, though I think it was one of the younger men,—we are all old enough now—regulated the etiquette and the precautions of the affair, and according to his scheme they ⁴⁰ were carried out, I suppose, till Nolan died.

When I was second officer of the Intrepid, some thirty years after, I saw the original paper of instructions. I have been sorry ever since that I did not copy the whole of it. It ran, however, much in this way:—

"Washington (with a date, which must have been late in 1807).

"Sir,—You will receive from Lt. Neale the person of Philip Nolan, late a lieutenant in the United States Army.

"This person on his trial by court—martial expressed, with an oath, the wish that he might 'never hear of the United States again.'

"The Court sentenced him to have his wish fulfilled.

"For the present, the execution of the order is entrusted by the President to this Department.

"You will take the prisoner on board your ship, and keep him there with such precautions as shall prevent his escape.

"You will provide him with such quarters, rations, and clothing as would be proper for an officer of his late rank, if he were a passenger on your vessel on the business of his Government.

"The gentlemen on board will make any arrangements agreeable to themselves regarding his society. He is to be exposed to no indignity of any kind, nor is he ever unnecessarily to be reminded that he is a prisoner.

"But under no circumstances is he ever to hear of his country or to see any information regarding it; and you will specially caution all the officers under your command to take care, that, in the various indulgences which may be granted, this rule, in which his punishment is involved, shall not be broken.

"It is the intention of the Government that he shall never again see the country which he has disowned. Before the end of your cruise you will receive orders which will give effect to this intention.

"Resp'y yours,

"W. Southard, for the

"Sec'y of the Navy."

If I had only preserved the whole of this paper, there would be no break in the beginning of my sketch of this story. For Captain Shaw, if it was he, handed it to his successor in the charge, and he to his; and I suppose the commander of the Levant has it today as his authority for keeping this man in this mild custody.

The rule adopted on board the ships on which I have met "the man without a country" was, I think, transmitted from the beginning. No mess liked to have him permanently, because his presence cut off all talk of home or of the prospect of return, of politics or letters, of peace or of war,—cut off more than half the talk men like to have at sea. But it was always thought too hard that he should never meet the rest of us, except to touch hats; and we finally sank into one system. He was not permitted to talk with the men, unless an officer was by. With officers he had unrestrained intercourse, as far as they and he chose. But he grew shy, though he had favorites: I was one. Then the captain always asked him to dinner on Monday. Every mess in succession took up the invitation in its turn. According to the size of the ship, you had him at your mess more or less often at dinner. His breakfast he ate in his own stateroom,—he always had a state-room,—which was where a sentinel or somebody on the watch could see the door. And whatever else he ate or drank, he ate or drank alone. Sometimes, when the marines or sailors had any special jollification, they were permitted to invite "Plain-Buttons," as they called him. Then Nolan was sent with some officer, and the men were forbidden to speak of home while he was there. I believe the theory was that the sight of his punishment did them good. They called him "Plain-Buttons," because, while he always chose to wear a regulation army uniform, he was not permitted to wear the army button, for the reason that it bore either the initials or the insignia of the country he had disowned.

I remember, soon after I joined the navy, I was on shore with some of the older officers from our ship and from the Brandywine, which we had met at Alexandria. We had leave to make a party and go up to Cairo and the Pyramids. As we jogged along (you went on donkeys then), some of the gentlemen (we boys called them "Dons," but the phrase was long since changed) fell to talking about Nolan, and some one told the system which was adopted from the first about his books and other reading. As he was almost never permitted to go on shore, even though the vessel lay in port for months, his time at the best hung heavy; and everybody was permitted to lend him books, if they were not published in America and made no allusion to it. These were common enough in the old days, when people in the other hemisphere talked of the United States as little as we do of Paraguay. He had almost all the foreign papers that came into the ship, sooner or later, only somebody must go over them first, and cut out any advertisement or stray paragraph that alluded to America. This was a little cruel sometimes, when the back of what was cut out might be as innocent as Hesiod. Right in the midst of one of Napoleon's battles, or one of Canning's speeches, poor Nolan would find a great hole, because on the back of the page of that paper there had been an advertisement of a packet for New York, or a scrap from the President's message. I say this was the first time I ever heard of this plan, which afterwards I had enough and more than enough to do with. I remember it because poor Phillips, who was of the party, as soon as the allusion to reading was made, told a story of something which happened at the Cape of Good Hope on Nolan's first voyage; and it is the only thing I ever knew of that voyage. They had touched at the Cape, and had done the civil thing with the English Admiral and the fleet; and then, leaving for a long cruise up the Indian Ocean, Phillips had borrowed a lot of English books from an officer, which, in those days, as indeed in these, was quite a windfall. Among them, as the Devil would order, was the Lay of the Last Minstrel, which they had all of them heard of, but which most of them had never seen. I think it could not have been published long. Well, nobody thought there could be any risk of anything national in that, though Phillips swore old Shaw had cut out The Tempest from Shakspeare before he let Nolan have it, because he said "the Bermudas ought to be ours, and, by Jove, should be one day." So Nolan was permitted to join the circle one afternoon when a lot of them sat on deck smoking and reading aloud. People do not do such things so often now; but when I was young we got rid of a great deal of time so. Well, so it happened that in his turn Nolan took the book and read to the others; and he read very well, as I know. Nobody in the circle knew a line of the poem, only it was all magic and Border chivalry, and was ten thousand years ago. Poor Nolan read steadily through the fifth canto, stopped a minute and drank something, and then began, without a thought of what was coming,—

Breathes there the man, with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,—

It seems impossible to us that anybody ever heard this for the first time; but all these fellows did then, and poor Nolan himself went on, still unconsciously or mechanically,—

This is my own, my native land!

Then they all saw something was to pay; but he expected to get through, I suppose, turned a little pale, but plunged on,—

Whose heart hath ne'er within him burned,
As home his footsteps he hath turned
From wandering on a foreign strand?—
If such there breathe, go, mark him well,—

By this time the men were all beside themselves, wishing there was any way to make him turn over two pages; but he had not quite presence of mind for that; he gagged a little, colored crimson, and staggered on,—

For him no minstrel raptures swell;
High though his titles, proud his name,
Boundless his wealth as wish can claim,
Despite these titles, power, and pelf,
The wretch, concentered all in self,— and here the poor fellow choked, could not go on, but started up, swung the book into the sea, vanished into his state-room, "and by Jove," said Phillips, "we did not see him for two months again. And I had to make up some beggarly story to that English surgeon why I did not return his Walter Scott to him."

That story shows about the time when Nolan's braggadocio must have broken down. At first, they said, he took a very high tone, considered his imprisonment a mere farce, affected to enjoy the voyage, and all that; but Phillips said that after he came out of his state-room he never was the same man again. He never read aloud again, unless it was the Bible or Shakspeare,¹⁰ or something else he was sure of. But it was not that merely. He never entered in with the other young men exactly as a companion again. He was always shy afterwards, when I knew him,—very seldom spoke, unless he was spoken to, except to a very few friends. He lighted up occasionally,—I remember late in his life hearing him fairly eloquent on something which had been²⁰ suggested to him by one of Fléclier's sermons,—but generally he had the nervous, tired look of a heart-wounded man.

When Captain Shaw was coming home,—if, as I say, it was Shaw,—rather to the surprise of everybody they made one of the Windward Islands, and lay off and on for nearly a week. The boys said the officers were sick of salt-junk, and meant to have turtle-soup³⁰ before they came home. But after several days the Warren came to the same rendezvous; they exchanged signals; she sent to Phillips and these homewardbound men letters and papers, and told them she was outward-bound, perhaps to the Mediterranean, and took poor Nolan and his traps on the boat back to try his second cruise.⁴⁰ He looked very blank when he was told to get ready to join her. He had known enough of the signs of the sky to know that till that moment he was going "home." But this was a distinct evidence of something he had not thought of, perhaps,—that there was no going home for him, even to a prison. And this was the first of some twenty such transfers, which brought him sooner or⁵⁰ later into half our best vessels, but which kept him all his life at least some hundred miles from the country he had hoped he might never hear of again.

It may have been on that second cruise,—it was once when he was up the Mediterranean,—that Mrs. Graff, the celebrated Southern beauty of those days, danced with him. They had been lying a long time in the Bay of Naples, and the officers were very intimate in the English fleet, and there had been great festivities, and our men thought they must give a great ball on board the ship. How they ever did it on board the Warren I am sure I do not know. Perhaps it was not the Warren, or perhaps ladies did not take up so much room as they do now. They wanted to use Nolan's state-room for something, and they hated to do it without asking him to the ball; so the captain said they might ask him, if they would be responsible that he did not talk with the wrong people, "who would give him intelligence." So the dance went on, the finest party that had ever been known, I dare say; for I never heard of a man-of-war ball that was not. For ladies they had the family of the American consul, one or two travelers who had adventured so far, and a nice bevy of English girls and matrons, perhaps Lady Hamilton herself.

Well, different officers relieved each other in standing and talking with Nolan in a friendly way, so as to be sure that nobody else spoke to him. The dancing went on with spirit, and after a while even the fellows who took this honorary guard of Nolan ceased to fear any contretemps.¹ Only when some English lady—Lady Hamilton, as I said, perhaps—called for a set of "American dances," an odd thing happened. Everybody then danced contradances. The black band, nothing loath, conferred as to what "American dances" were, and started off with "Virginia Reel," which they followed with "Money-Musk," which, in its turn in those days, should have been followed by "The Old Thirteen." But just as Dick, the leader, tapped for his fiddles to begin, and bent forward, about to say, in true negro state, "The Old

Thirteen," gentlemen and ladies!" as he had said "'Virginny Reel,' if you please!" and "'Money-Musk,' if you please!" the captain's boy tapped him on the shoulder, whispered to him, and he did not announce the name of the dance; he merely bowed, began on the air, and they all fell to,—the officers teaching the English girls the figure, but not telling them why it had no 10 name.

But that is not the story I started to tell. As the dancing went on, Nolan and our fellows all got at ease, as I said,—so much so, that it seemed quite natural for him to bow to that splendid Mrs. Graff, and say,—

"I hope you have not forgotten me, Miss Rutledge. Shall I have the honor of dancing?"

He did it so quickly, that Shubrick, who was with him, could not hinder him. She laughed and said,—

"I am not Miss Rutledge any longer, Mr. Nolan; but I will dance all the same," just nodded to Shubrick, as if to say he must leave Mr. Nolan to her, and led him off to the place where the dance was forming.

Nolan thought he had got his chance. 30 He had known her at Philadelphia, and at other places had met her, and this was a godsend. You could not talk in contra-dances, as you do in cotillions, or even in the pauses of waltzing; but there were chances for tongues and sounds, as well as for eyes and blushes. He began with her travels, and Europe, and Vesuvius, and the French; and then, when they had worked down, and had that long talking time at the bot- 40 tom of the set, he said boldly,—a little pale, she said, as she told me the story years after,—

"And what do you hear from home, Mrs. Graff?"

And that splendid creature looked through him. Jove! how she must have looked through him!

"Home!! Mr. Nolan!!! I thought 50 you were the man who never wanted to hear of home again!"—and she walked directly up the deck to her husband, and left poor Nolan alone, as he always was.—He did not dance again.

I cannot give any history of him in order; nobody can now: and, indeed, I am not trying to. These are the traditions, which I sort out, as I believe them, from the myths which have been told about this man for forty years. The lies that have been told about him are legion. The fellows used to say he was the "Iron Mask"; and poor George Pons went to his grave in the belief that this was the author of "Junius," who was being punished for his celebrated libel on Thomas Jefferson. Pons was not very strong in the historical line. A happier story than either of these I have told is of the war. That came along soon after. I have heard this 20 affair told in three or four ways,—and, indeed, it may have happened more than once. But which ship it was on I cannot tell. However, in one, at least, of the great frigate-duels with the English, in which the navy was really baptized, it happened that a round shot from the enemy entered one of our ports square, and took right down the officer of the gun himself, and almost every 30 man of the gun's crew. Now you may say what you choose about courage, but that is not a nice thing to see. But, as the men who were not killed picked themselves up, and as they and the surgeon's people were carrying off the bodies, there appeared Nolan, in his shirt-sleeves, with the rammer in his hand, and, just as if he had been the officer, told them off with authority,— 40 who should go to the cock-pit with the wounded men, who should stay with him,—perfectly cheery, and with that way which makes men feel sure all is right and is going to be right. And he finished loading the gun with his own hands, aimed it, and bade the men fire. And there he stayed, captain of that gun, keeping those fellows in spirits, till the enemy struck,—sitting on the carriage while the gun was cooling, though 50 he was exposed all the time,—showing them easier ways to handle heavy shot,—making the raw hands laugh at their own blunders,—and when the gun cooled again, getting it loaded and fired twice as often as any other gun on the ship. The captain walked forward by way of encouraging the men, and Nolan touched his hat and said,—

"I am showing them how we do this in the artillery, Sir."

And this is the part of the story where all the legends agree: that the Commodore said,—

"I see you do, and I thank you, Sir; and I shall never forget this day, Sir, and you never shall, Sir."

And after the whole thing was over, and he had the Englishman's sword, in the midst of the state and ceremony of the quarterdeck, he said,—

"Where is Mr. Nolan? Ask Mr. Nolan to come here."

And when Nolan came, the captain ²⁰ said,—

"Mr. Nolan, we are all very grateful to you today; you are one of us today; you will be named in the despatches."

And then the old man took off his own sword of ceremony, and gave it to Nolan, and made him put it on. The man told me this who saw it. Nolan cried like a baby, and well he might. He had not worn a sword since that in- ³⁰ fernal day at Fort Adams. But always afterwards, on occasions of ceremony, he wore that quaint old French sword of the Commodore's.

The captain did mention him in the despatches. It was always said he asked that he might be pardoned. He wrote a special letter to the Secretary of War. But nothing ever came of it. As I said, that was about the time when ⁴⁰ they began to ignore the whole transaction at Washington, and when Nolan's imprisonment began to carry itself on because there was nobody to stop it without any new orders from home.

I have heard it said that he was with Porter when he took possession of the Nukahiwa Islands. Not this Porter, you know, but old Porter, his father, Essex Porter,—that is, the old Essex ⁵⁰ Porter, not this Essex. As an artillery officer, who had seen service in the West, Nolan knew more about fortifications, embrasures, ravelins, stockades, and all that, than any of them did; and he worked with a right good-will in fixing that battery all right. I have always thought it was a pity Porter did not leave him in command there with Gamble. That would have settled all the question about his punishment. We should have kept the islands, and at this moment we should have one station in the Pacific Ocean. Our French ¹⁰ friends, too, when they wanted this little watering-place, would have found it was preoccupied. But Madison and the Virginians, of course, flung all that away.

All that was near fifty years ago. If Nolan was thirty then, he must have been near eighty when he died. He looked sixty when he was forty. But he never seemed to me to change a hair afterwards. As I imagine his life, from what I have seen and heard of it, he must have been in every sea, and yet almost never on land. He must have known, in a formal way, more officers in our service than any man living knows. He told me once, with a grave smile, that no man in the world lived so methodical a life as he. "You know the boys say I am the Iron Mask, and you know how busy he was." He said it did not do for any one to try to read all the time, more than to do anything else all the time; and that he read just five hours a day. "Then," he said, "I keep up my notebooks, writing in them at such and such hours from what I have been reading; and I include in these my scrap-books." These were very curious ⁴⁰ indeed. He had six or eight, of different subjects. There was one of History, one of Natural Science, one which he called "Odds and Ends." But they were not merely books of extracts from newspapers. They had bits of plants and ribbons, shells tied on, and carved scraps of bone and wood, which he had taught the men to cut for him, and they were beautifully illustrated. He drew ⁵⁰ admirably. He had some of the funniest drawings there, and some of the most pathetic, that I have ever seen in my life. I wonder who will have Nolan's scrap-books.

Well, he said his reading and his notes were his profession, and that they took five hours and two hours respectively of each day. "Then," said he, "every man should have a diversion as well as a profession. My Natural History is my diversion." That took two hours a day more. The men used to bring him birds and fish, but on a long cruise he had to satisfy himself with centipedes and cockroaches and such small game. He was the only naturalist I ever met who knew anything about the habits of the house-fly and the mosquito. All those people can tell you whether they are Lepidoptera or Steptopotera; but as for telling how you can get rid of them, or how they get away from you when you strike them,—why Linnaeus knew as little of that as John Foy the idiot did. These nine hours made Nolan's regular daily "occupation." The rest of the time he talked or walked. Till he grew very old, he went aloft a great deal. He always kept up his exercise; and I never heard that he was ill. If any other man was ill, he was the kindest nurse in the world; and he knew more than half the surgeons do. Then if anybody was sick or died, or if the captain wanted him to, on any other occasion, he was always ready to read prayers. I have remarked that he read beautifully.

My own acquaintance with Philip Nolan began six or eight years after the war, on my first voyage after I was appointed a midshipman. It was in the first days after our Slave-Trade treaty, while the Reigning House, which was still the House of Virginia, had still a sort of sentimentalism about the suppression of the horrors of the Middle Passage, and something was sometimes done that way. We were in the South Atlantic on that business. From the time I joined, I believe I thought Nolan was a sort of lay chaplain,—a chaplain with a blue coat. I never asked about him. Everything in the ship was strange to me. I knew it was green to ask questions, and I suppose I thought there was a "Plain-Buttons" on every ship. We had him to dine in our mess once a week, and the caution was given that on that day nothing was to be said about home. But if they had told us not to say anything about the planet Mars or the Book of Deuteronomy, I should not have asked why; there were a great many things which seemed to me to have as little reason. I first came to understand anything about "the man without a country" one day when we overhauled a dirty little schooner which had slaves on board. An officer was sent to take charge of her, and, after a few minutes, he sent back his boat to ask that some one might be sent him who could speak Portuguese. We were all looking over the rail when the message came, and we all wished we could interpret, when the captain asked who spoke Portuguese. But none of the officers did; and just as the captain was sending forward to ask if any of the people could, Nolan stepped out and said he should be glad to interpret, if the captain wished, as he understood the language. The captain thanked him, fitted out another boat with him, and in this boat it was my luck to go.

When we got there, it was such a scene as you seldom see, and never want to. Nastiness beyond account, and chaos run loose in the midst of the nastiness. There were not a great many of the negroes; but by way of making what there were understand that they were free, Vaughan had had their handcuffs and ankle-cuffs knocked off, and, for convenience' sake, was putting them upon the rascals of the schooner's crew. The negroes were, most of them, out of the hold, and swarming all round the dirty deck, with a central throng surrounding Vaughan and addressing him in every dialect, and patois of a dialect, from the Zulu "click" up to the Parisian of Beledeljereed.

As we came on deck, Vaughan looked down from a hogshead, on which he had mounted in desperation, and said: "For God's love, is there anybody who can make these wretches understand something? The men gave them rum, and that did not quiet them. I knocked that big fellow down twice, and that did not soothe him. And then I talked Choctaw to all of them together; and I'll be hanged if they understand that as well as they understood the English."

Nolan said he could speak Portuguese, and one or two fine-looking Kroomen were dragged out, who, as it had been found already, had worked for the Portuguese on the coast at Fernando Po.

"Tell them they are free," said Vaughan; "and tell them that these rascals are to be hanged as soon as we can get rope enough."

Nolan "put that into Spanish,"—that is, he explained it in such Portuguese as the Kroomen could understand, and they in turn to such of the negroes as could understand them. Then there was such a yell of delight, clinching of fists, leaping and dancing, kissing of Nolan's feet, and a general rush made to the hogshhead by way of spontaneous worship of Vaughan, as the deus ex machina of the occasion.

"Tell them," said Vaughan, well pleased, "that I will take them all to Cape Palmas."

This did not answer so well. Cape Palmas was practically as far from the homes of most of them as New Orleans or Rio Janeiro was; that is, they would be eternally separated from home there. And their interpreters, as we could understand, instantly said, "Ah, non Palmas," and began to propose infinite other expedients in most voluble language. Vaughan was rather disappointed at this result of his liberality, and asked Nolan eagerly what they said. The drops stood on poor Nolan's white forehead, as he hushed the men down, and said:—

"He says, 'Not Palmas.' He says, 'Take us home, take us to our own country, take us to our own house, take us to our own pickaninnies and our own women.' He says he has an old father and mother who will die if they do not see him. And this one says he left his people all sick, and paddled down to Fernando to beg the white doctor to come and help them, and that these déviis caught him in the bay just in sight of home, and that he has never seen anybody from home since them. And this one says," choked out Nolan, "that he has not heard a word from his home in six months, while he has been locked up in an infernal barracoon."

Vaughan always said he grew gray himself while Nolan struggled through this interpretation. I, who did not understand anything of the passion involved in it, saw that the very elements were melting with fervent heat, and that something was to pay somewhere. Even the negroes themselves stopped howling, as they saw Nolan's agony, and Vaughan's almost equal agony of sympathy. As quick as he could get words, he said:—

"Tell them yes, yes, yes; tell them they shall go to the Mountains of the Moon, if they will. If I sail the schooner through the Great White Desert, they shall go home!"

And after some fashion Nolan said so. And then they all fell to kissing him again, and wanted to rub his nose with theirs.

But he could not stand it long; and getting Vaughan to say he might go back, he beckoned me down into our boat. As we lay back in the stern-sheets and the men gave way, he said to me: "Youngster, let that show you what it is to be without a family, without a home, and without a country. And if you are ever tempted to say a word or to do a thing that shall put a bar between you and your family, your home, and your country, pray God in His mercy to take you that instant home to His own heaven. Stick by your family, boy; forget you have a self, while you do everything for them. Think of your home, boy; write, and send, and talk about it. Let it be nearer and nearer to your thought, the farther you have to travel from it; and rush back to it when you are free, as that poor black slave is doing now. And for your country, boy," and the words rattled in his throat, "and for that flag," and he pointed to the ship, "never dream a dream but of serving her as she bids you, though the service carry you through a thousand hells. No matter what happens to you, no matter who flatters you or who abuses you, never look at another flag, never let a night pass but you pray God to bless that flag. Remember, boy, that behind all these men you have to do with, behind officers, and government, and people even, there is the Country 10 Herself, your Country, and that you belong to Her as you belong to your own mother. Stand by Her, boy, as you would stand by your mother, if those devils there had got hold of her to-day!"

I was frightened to death by his calm, hard passion; but I blundered out that I would, by all that was holy, and that I had never thought of doing 20 anything else. He hardly seemed to hear me; but he did, almost in a whisper, say,—“Oh, if anybody had said so to me when I was of your age!”

I think it was this half-confidence of his, which I never abused, for I never told this story till now, which afterward made us great friends. He was very kind to me. Often he sat up, or even got up, at night, to walk the deck 30 with me, when it was my watch. He explained to me a great deal of my mathematics, and I owe to him my taste for mathematics. He lent me books, and helped me about my reading. He never alluded so directly to his story again; but from one and another officer I have learned, in thirty years, what I am telling. When we parted from him in St. Thomas harbor, 40 at the end of our cruise, I was more sorry than I can tell. I was very glad to meet him again in 1830; and later in life, when I thought I had some influence in Washington, I moved heaven and earth to have him discharged. But it was like getting a ghost out of prison. They pretended there was no such man, and never was such a man. They will say so at the Department now! Per- 50 haps they do not know. It will not be the first thing in the service of which the Department appears to know nothing!

There is a story that Nolan met Burr once on one of our vessels, when a party of Americans came on board in the Mediterranean. But this I believe to be a lie; or rather, it is a myth, ben trovato,¹ involving a tremendous blowing-up with which he sunk Burr,—asking him how he liked to be “without a country.” But it is clear, from Burr’s life, that nothing of the sort could have happened; and I mention this only as an illustration of the stories which get a-going where there is the least mystery at bottom. . . .

For him, poor fellow, he repented of his folly; and then, like a man, submitted to the fate he had asked for. He never intentionally added to the difficulty or delicacy of the charge of those who had him in hold. Accidents would happen; but they never happened from his fault. Lieutenant Truxton told me that, when Texas was annexed, there was a careful discussion among the officers, whether they should get hold of Nolan’s handsome set of maps and cut Texas out of it,—from the map of the world and the map of Mexico. The United States had been cut out when the atlas was bought for him. But it was voted, rightly enough, that to do this would be virtually to reveal to him what had happened, or, as Harry Cole said, to make him think Old Burr had succeeded. So it was from no fault of Nolan’s that a great botch happened at my own table, when, for a short time, I was in command of the George Washington, corvette, on the South American station. We were lying in the La Plata; and some of the officers, who had been on shore and had just joined again, were entertaining us with accounts of their misadventures in riding the half-wild horses of Buenos Ayres. Nolan was at table, and was in an unusually bright and talkative mood. Some story of a tumble reminded him of an adventure of his own when he was catching wild horses in Texas with his brother Stephen, at a time when he must have been quite a boy. He told the story with a good deal of spirit,—so much so, that the silence which often follows a good story hung over the table for an instant, to be broken by Nolan himself. For he asked perfectly unconsciously,—“Pray, what has become of Texas? After the Mexicans got their independence, I thought that province of Texas would come forward very fast. It is really one of the finest regions on earth; it is the Italy of this continent. But I have not seen or heard a word of Texas for near twenty years.”

There were two Texan officers at the table. The reason he had never heard of Texas was that Texas and her affairs had been painfully cut out of his newspapers since Austin began his settlements; so that, while he read of Honduras and Tamaulipas, and till quite lately, of California, this virgin province, in which his brother had traveled so far, and, I believe, had died, had ceased to be to him. Waters and Williams, the two Texas men, looked grimly at each other and tried not to laugh. Edward Morris had his attention attracted by the third link in the chain of the captain's chandelier. Watrous was seized with a convulsion of sneezing. Nolan himself saw that something was to pay, he did not know what. And I, as master of the feast, had to say,—

After that cruise I never saw Nolan again. I wrote to him at least twice a year, for in that voyage we became even confidentially intimate; but he never wrote to me. The other men tell me that in those fifteen years he aged very fast, as well he might indeed; but that he was still the same gentle, uncomplaining, silent sufferer that he ever was, bearing as best he could his self-appointed punishment,—rather less social, perhaps, with new men whom he did not know, but more anxious, apparently, than ever to serve and befriend and teach the boys, some of whom fairly seemed to worship him. And now it seems the dear old fellow is dead. He has found a home at last, and a country.

Since writing this, and while considering whether or no I would print it, as a warning to the young Nolans and Vallandighams and Tatnalls of today of what it is to throw away a country, I have received from Danforth, who is on board the Levant, a letter which gives an account of Nolan's last hours. It removes all my doubts about telling this story.

To understand the first word of the letter, the non-professional reader should remember that after 1817, the position of every officer who had Nolan in charge was one of the greatest delicacy. The government had failed to renew the order of 1807 regarding him. What was a man to do? Should he let him go? What, then, if he were called to account by the Department for violating the order of 1807? Should he keep him? What, then, if Nolan should be liberated some day, and should bring an action for false imprisonment or kidnapping against every man who had had him in charge? I urged and pressed this upon Southard, and I have reason to think that other officers did the same thing. But the Secretary always said, as they often do at Washington, that there were no special orders to give, and that we must act on our own judgment. That means, “if you succeed, you will be sustained; if you fail, you will be disavowed.” Well, as Danforth says, all that is over now; though I do not know but I expose myself to a criminal prosecution on the evidence of the very revelation I am making.

Here is the letter:—

Levant, 2° 2' S. @ 131° W.

“Dear Fred:—I try to find heart and life to tell you that it is all over with dear old Nolan. I have been with him on this voyage more than I ever was, and I can understand wholly now the way in which you used to speak of the dear old fellow. I could see that he was not strong, but I had no idea the end was so near. The doctor had been watching him very carefully, and yesterday morning came to me and told me that Nolan was not so well, and had not left his state-room,—a thing I never remember before. He had let the doctor come and see him as he lay there,—the first time the doctor had been in the state-room,—and he said he should like to see me. Oh, dear! do you remember the mysteries we boys used to invent about his room in the old Intrepid days? Well, I went in, and there, to be sure, the poor fellow lay in his berth, smiling pleasantly as he gave me his hand, but looking very frail. I could not help a glance round, which showed me what a little shrine he had made of the box he was lying in. The stars and stripes were triced up above and around a picture of Washington, and he had painted a majestic eagle, with lightnings blazing from his beak and his foot just clasping the whole globe, which his wings overshadowed. The dear old boy saw my glance, and said, with a sad smile, 'Here, you see, I have a country!' And then he pointed to the foot of his bed, where I had not seen before a great map of the United States, as he had drawn it from memory, and which he had there to look upon as he lay. Quaint, queer old names were on it, in large letters: 'Indiana Territory,' 'Mississippi Territory,' and 'Louisiana Territory,' as I suppose our fathers learned such things: but the old fellow had patched in Texas, too; he had carried his western boundary all the way to the Pacific, but on that shore he had defined nothing.

"'O Danforth,' he said, 'I know I am dying. I cannot get home. Surely you will tell me something now?—Stop! stop! Do not speak till I say what I am sure you know, that there is not in this ship, that there is not in America,—God bless her!—a more loyal man than I. There cannot be a man who loves the old flag as I do, or prays for it as I do, or hopes for it as I do. There are thirty-four stars in it now, Danforth. I thank God for that, though I do not know what their names are. There has never been one taken away: I thank God for that. I know by that that there has never been any successful Burr. O Danforth, Danforth,' he sighed out, 'how like a wretched night's dream a boy's idea of personal fame or of separate sovereignty seems, when one looks back on it after such a life as mine! But tell me,—tell me something,—tell me everything, Danforth, before I die!'

"Ingham, I swear to you that I felt like a monster that I had not told him everything before. Danger or no danger, delicacy or no delicacy, who was I, that I should have been acting the tyrant all this time over this dear, sainted old man, who had years ago expiated, in his whole manhood's life, the madness of a boy's treason? 'Mr. Nolan,' said I, 'I will tell you everything you ask about. Only, where shall I begin?'

"Oh, the blessed smile that crept over his white face! and he pressed my hand and said, 'God bless you! Tell me their names,' he said, and he pointed to the stars on the flag. 'The last I know is Ohio. My father lived in Kentucky. But I have guessed Michigan and Indiana and Mississippi,—that was where Fort Adams is,—they make twenty. But where are your other fourteen? You have not cut up any of the old ones, I hope?'

"Well, that was not a bad text, and I told him the names in as good order as I could, and he bade me take down his beautiful map and draw them in as I best could with my pencil. He was wild with delight about Texas, told me how his brother died there; he had marked a gold cross where he supposed his brother's grave was; and he had guessed at Texas. Then he was delighted as he saw California and Oregon;—that, he said, he had suspected partly, because he had never been permitted to land on that shore, though the ships were there so much. 'And the men,' said he, laughing, 'brought off a good deal besides furs.' Then he went back—heavens, how far!—to ask about the Chesapeake, and what was done to Barron for surrendering her to the Leopard, and whether Burr ever tried again,—and he ground his teeth with the only passion he showed. But in a moment that was over, and he said, 'God forgive me, for I am sure I forgive him.' Then he asked about the old war,—told me the true story of his serving the gun the day we took the Java,—asked about dear old David Porter, as he called him. Then he settled down more quietly, and very happily, to hear me tell in an hour the history of fifty years.

"How I wished it had been somebody who knew something! But I did as well as I could. I told him of the English war. I told him about Fulton and the steamboat beginning. I told him about old Scott, and Jackson; told him all I could think about the Mississippi, and New Orleans, and Texas, and his own old Kentucky. And do you think, he asked me who was in command of the 'Legion of the West.' I told him it was a very gallant officer named Grant, and that, by our last news, he was about to establish his headquarters at Vicksburg. Then, 'Where was Vicksburg?' I worked that out on the map; it was about a hundred miles, more or less, above his old Fort Adams; and I thought Fort Adams must be a ruin now. 'It must be at old Vick's plantation,' said he: 'well, that is a change!'

"I tell you, Ingham, it was a hard thing to condense the history of half a century into that talk with a sick man. And I do not now know what I told him,—of emigration, and the means of it,—of steamboats, and railroads, and telegraphs,—of inventions, and books, and literature—of the colleges, and West Point, and the Naval School,—but with the queerest interruptions that ever you heard. You see it was Robinson Crusoe asking all the accumulated questions of fifty-six years!

"I remember he asked, all of a sudden, who was President now; and when I told him, he asked if Old Abe was General Benjamin Lincoln's son. He said he met old General Lincoln, when he was quite a boy himself, at some Indian treaty. I said no, that Old Abe was a Kentuckian like himself, but I could not tell him of what family; he had worked up from the ranks. 'Good for him!' cried Nolan; 'I am glad of that. As I have brooded and wondered, I have thought our danger was in keeping up those regular successions in the first families.' Then I got talking about my visit to Washington. I told him of meeting the Oregon Congressman, Harding; I told him about the Smithsonian, and the Exploring Expedition; I told him about the Capitol, and the statues for the pediment, and Crawford's Liberty, and Greenough's Washington. Ingham, I told him everything I could think of that would show the grandeur of his country and its prosperity; but I could not make up my mouth to tell him a word about this infernal Rebellion!

"And he drank it in and enjoyed it as I cannot tell you. He grew more and more silent, yet I never thought he was tired or faint. I gave him a glass of water, but he just wet his lips, and told me not to go away. Then he asked me to bring the Presbyterian 'Book of Public Prayer' which lay there, and said, with a smile, that it would open at the right place,—and so it did. There was his double red mark down the page; and I knelt down and read, and he repeated with me, 'For ourselves and our country, O gracious God, we thank Thee, that, notwithstanding our manifold transgressions of Thy holy laws, Thou hast continued to us Thy marvelous kindness,'—and so to the end of that thanksgiving. Then he turned to the end of the same book, and I read the words more familiar to me: 'Most heartily we beseech Thee with Thy favor to behold and bless Thy servant, the President of the United States, and all others in authority,'—and the rest of the Episcopal collect. 'Danforth,' said he, 'I have repeated those prayers night and morning, it is now fifty-five years.' And then he said he would go to sleep. He bent me down over him and kissed me; and he said, 'Look in my Bible, Danforth, when I am gone.' And I went away.

"But I had no thought it was the end. I thought he was tired and would sleep.

I knew he was happy, and I wanted him to be alone.

"But in an hour, when the doctor went in gently, he found Nolan had breathed his life away with a smile. He had something pressed close to his lips. It was his father's badge of the Order of Cincinnati.

"We looked in his Bible, and there was a slip of paper at the place where ¹⁰ he had marked the text:—

"They desire a country, even a heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for He hath prepared for them a city.'

"On this slip of paper he had written:

"Bury me in the sea; it has been my home, and I love it. But will not some one set up a stone for my memory at ²⁰ Fort Adams or at Orleans, that my disgrace may not be more than I ought to bear? Say on it:—

'In Memory of

'PHILIP NOLAN,

'Lieutenant in the Army of the United States.

'He loved his country as no other man has loved her; but no man deserved less at her hands.'

DAVID ROSS LOCKE (1833-1888)
("PETROLEUM V. NASBY")

MR. NASBY FINDS A NEW BUSINESS

Post Offis, Confedrit X Roads, (wich is in the Stait uv Kentucky),
January 20, 1869.

I hev it at last! I see a lite! A grate lite! A brite lite! I shall not go to Noo York, nor shall I be forced to leave the Corners, at least permanently. I hev at last struck ile! I shel live like a gentleman; I shel pay for my likker, and be on an ekal footin with other ⁵⁰ men. Bascom, whose smile is happiness, but whose frown is death, will smile onto me wunst more.

To Miss Soosan Murphy I owe my present happiness. The minnit I notist she hed put in a claim agin the Government for property yoosed doorin the war by Fedral soljery, I to-wunst saw where my finanshel salvashen wuz. Immejtitly I histed my shingle ez a agent to prosekoot claims agin the Government for property destroyed or yoosed, doorin the late onpleasantnis, by Fedral troops. That shingle hedn't bin out an hour before Joe Bigler hed red it to half the citizens uv the Corners; and in two hours I hed biznis on my hands, and money in my pockets. Ez a matter uv course, I insisted upon a retainin fee uv ten dollars in each case.

Issaker Gavitt and his two younger brothers wuz the first clients I hed. Their case is one uv pekoolyer hardship, and I feel ashooed that Congris will to-wunst afford them the releef they ask. The property destroyed wuz a barn and its contents, wich wuz destroyed by Buell in the second yeer uv the war; that is, the contents wud hev bin destroyed only they wuzn't in the barn, ez they hed bin sold jist previously to the Confedracry. But ez the Elder, peace to his ashes, took ³⁰ Confedrit munny for sed contents, wich munny he, in a moment uv enthoosiasm, invested in Confedrit bonds, wich finally got to be worth nothin, we put in a claim for the valyoo uv the contents ez well ez uv the barn. Beein 70 years uv age when the war broke out, he did not volunteer in the Confedrit service, and consequently never fired a shot at the Old Flag. His two youngest sons ⁴⁰ did, it is troo; but the Elder can't be held responsible for them boys. The estate is entitled to damage jist the same ez tho the Elder wuz alive.

Elder Pennibacker hez also claims to a considerable amount, wich is for fences, crops, barns, and sich, destroyed by Fedral armies. The Elder is not quite certain but that the fences wuz destroyed by order uv a Confedrit General, wich wuz retreetin; and it is possible that the crops, barns, and sich, wuz yoosed up at the same time. It wuz doorin the war, at any rate; and ez the Fedral Government wuz, in his opinyun, to blame for the war, wich never wood hev bin carried on hed it yeilded ez it ought to hev done, why the Fedral Government ought to pay all these losses. Uv course I shan't put all the Elder's talk into the petishen.

Miss Jane McGrath's case, wich is the one I shel push the hardest, is one wich, ef Congris does not consider favorably, it will show that Congris hez ¹⁰ no bowels. Miss McGrath is a woman. Uv course doorn the war she wuz loyal, ez she understood loyalty. She beleeved in her State. She hed two brothers wich went into the Confedrit servis, and she gave em both horses. But wood any sister let her brother go afoot? Them horses must be set down to the credit uv her sisterly affeckshun. It will be showed, I make no doubt, that ²⁰ when her oldest brother's regiment (he wuz a Colonel) left for the seat uv war, that Miss McGrath presented to it a soot uv colors wich she made with her own hands, wich soot included a black flag with skull and cross-bones onto it. Sposin she did? It wuz loyalty to wat she considered her State. And the fact that doorn the war she rode twelve ³⁰ miles to inform a Confedrit officer that four Fedral soljers wich hed escaped from Andersonville wuz hid in her barn, shoood not operate agin her. Onto her piano ther wuz a choice collection uv Southern songs, and ther is a rumor that in Louisville wunst she did spit in the face uv a Fedral offiser; but wat uv that? Is a great Government goin to inquire closely into sich trifles? Miss McGrath give me the names uv three ⁴⁰ Fedral Generals who campt on her place doorn the last year uv the war, wich wood certify to her loyalty, wich, ef they didn't, wood show that there wuzn't any gratitood in humanity.

Deekin Pogram hez uv course a claim. The Deekin's horses wuz all taken by a Fedral offiser, wich wuz the more aggeravatin, ez the Deekin hed, in addishen to his own, jist bought 25, ⁵⁰ wich he wuz to hev delivered to General Morgan, uv the Confedracy, the next day, who wuz to hev paid for em in gold. They were gobbled. For these horses the Deekin claims payment. He wuz, doorn the war, strictly nootral. Kentucky did not secede, neither did the Deekin. His boys went into the Confedrit service, and on several occasions he might hev cleaned his trusty rifle and gone out at nite to git a crack at Fedral pickets. Habit is strong, and ez ther were no schoolmasters to shoot, the Deekin must shoot somethin. He considered the war a great misforchoon; and many a time hez the old patriark, with tears streemin down his cheeks, exclaimed, "Why won't Linkin withdraw his troops and let us alone?" He hez bin since the close uv the struggle a hankerin arter Peece. "Let us hev Peece!" is his cry. "Give me back my niggers; let me hev things ez they wunce wuz, and I shel be soothed into quietood." He voted for Micklellan in 1864, and for Seymour in 1868; but that uv course won't count agin him in the matter uv the claim. The minnit he decided to put in the claim he withdrew from the Ku-Klux, uv wich associashun he hez bin chief since the close of the war. He is an inoffensive old man, whose pathway to the tomb needs ^{soothin}. The horses he lost he counts worth $10,000, and he uv course wants remuneration to the amount uv $10,000 more for the anguish he suffered seen uv em go.

Almost every white citizen uv the Corners hez a claim, uv wich I shel hev the prosekootin; that is, them wich can raise the retainin fee. Some hundred or more who never hed anything before or ^{doorin} the war, and who are in the same condishen now, hev put in claims for sums rangin from $10,000 to $20,000, offrin me the half I git. I may take em. They kin swear to each other's loyalty, wich will redoose the cost uv evidence to a mere nominal sum.

I shel hie me to Washington and got Mrs. Cobb to take hold with me, givin her a share. Ef she succeeds with Congris ez well ez she did with the President, the result will be all that I kin desire.

PETROLEUM V. NASBY, P. M.
(wich is Postmaster).

MR. NASBY LOSES HIS POST OFFICE

On a Farm, Three miles from Confedrit X Roads (wich is in the Stait uv Kentucky)

June 29, 1869.

The die is cast! The guilloteen hez fallen! I am no longer Post-master at Confedrit X Roads, wich is in the Stait uv Kentucky. The place wich knowed me wunst will know me no more forever; the paper wich Deekin Pogram takes will be handed out by a nigger; a nigger will hev the openin uv letters addressed to parties residin hereabouts, containin remittances; a nigger will hev the rifin uv letters addrest to lottry managers, and extractin the sweets therefrom; a nigger will be— But I can't dwell upon the disgustin theme no longer.

I hed bin in Washington two weeks assistin the Caucashens uv that city to put their foot upon the heads uv the cussid niggers who ain't content to accept the situashen and remain, ez they alluz hev bin, inferior beins. To say I hed succeeded, is a week expreshen. I organized a raid onto em so effectooally ez to drive no less than thirty uv em out uv employment, twenty-seven uv wich wuz compelled to steel their bread; wich give us a splendid opportoonty to show up the nateral cussidness uv the Afrikin race, wich we improved.

On my arrival at the Corners, I knew to-wunst that suthin wuz wrong. The bottles behind the bar wuz draped in black; the barrels wuz festooned gloomily (wich is our yoosual method of expressin grief at public calamities), and the premises generally wore a funeral aspeck.

"Wat is it?" gasped I.

Bascom returned not a word, but waved his hand towards the Post Offis.

Rushin thither, I bustid open the door, and reeled almost agin the wall. AT THE GENERAL DELIVERY WUZ THE GRINNIN FACE UV A NIGGER! And settin in my chair wuz Joe Bigler, with Pollock beside him, smokin pipes, and laffin over suthin in a noosepaper.

Bigler caught site uv me, and dartin out, pulled me inside them hitherto sacred precinkins.

"Permit me," sed he, jeerinly, "to interdoose you to yoor successor, Mr. Ceezer Lubby."

"MY SUCCESSOR! Wat does this mean?"

"Show him, Ceezer!"

And the nigger, every tooth in his head shinin, handed me a commishn dooly made out and signed. I saw it all at a glance. I hed left my biznis in the hands uv a depetty. It arrived the day after I left, and Isaker Gavitt, who distribbited the mail, gave it to the cuss. Pollock made out the bonds and went onto em himself, and in ten days the commishn come all regler; whereupon Bigler backt the nigger and took forcible possession uv the office. While I wuz absent they hed hed a percession in honor uv the joyful event; sed perceshn consistin uv Pollock, Bigler, and the new Postmaster, who marched through the streets with the stars and stripes, banners and sich. Bigler remarkt that the percession wuzn't large, but it wuz talented, eminently respectable, and extremely versateel. He (Bigler) carried the flag and played the fife; Pollock carried a banner with an inscripshen onto it, "Sound the loud timbrel o'er Egypt's dark sea," and played the bass drum; while the nigger bore aloft a banner inscribed, "Where Afric's sunny fountins roll down the golden sands," with his commission pinned onto it, playin in addishen a pair uv anshent cymbals. Bigler remarkt further that the perceshun created a positive sensashun at the Corners, wich I shood think it wood. "It wuzn't," sed the tormentin cuss, "very much like the grand percession wich took place when yoo received yoor commishn. Then the whites at the Corners wuz elated, for they spectid to git wat yoo owed em in doo time, and the niggers wuz correspondinly deprest. They slunk into by-ways and side-ways; they didn't hold up their heads, and they dusted out ez fast ez they cood git. At this percession there wuz a change. The niggers lined the streets ez we passed, grinnin exultinly, and the whites wuz deprest correspondinly. It's singler that at the Corners the two races can't feel good both at the same time."

My arrivall hevin become known by the time I got back to Bascom's all my friends hed gathered there. There wuzn't a dry eye among em; and ez I thot uv the joys once tastid, but now 10 forever fled, mine moistened likewise. There wuz a visible change in their manner toward me. They regarded me with solisitood, but I cood discern that the solisitood wuz not so much for me ez for themselves.

"Wat shel I do?" I askt. "Suthin must be devised, for I can't starve."

"Pay me wat yoo owe me!" ejake-latid Bascom.

"Pay me wat yoo owe me!" ejake-latid Deekin Pogram; and the same remark wuz made by all uv em with wonderful yoonanimity. Watever differences uv opinyun ther mite be on other topics, on this they wuz all agreed.

"Gentlemen!" I commenced, backing out into a corner, "is this generous? Is this the treatment I hev a right to expect? Is this—"

I shoood hev gone on at length, but just at that minnit Pollock, Joe Bigler, and the new Postmaster entered.

"I hev biznis!" sed the Postmaster; "not agreeable biznis, but it's my offshel dooty to perform it."

At the word "offshel," comin from his lips, I groaned, wich wuz ekkoed by those present.

"I hev in my hand," continyood he, 40 "de bond giben by my predecessor, onto wich is de names uv George W. Bascom, Elkanah Pogram, Hugh McPelter, and Seth Pennibacker, ez sureties. In dis order hand I hold a skedool ob de property belongin to de 'partment wich wuz turned ober to him by his predecessor, consistin of table, chairs, boxes, locks, bags, et settry, wid sundry dollars worf of stamps, paper, twine, &c. None ob 50 dis post offis property turned over to my predecessor by his predecessor, is to be found in de offis, and de objick ob dis visit is to notify yoo dat onless im-mejit payment be made uv de amount thereof, I am directed by de 'partment to bring soot to-wunst against the sed sureties."

Never before did I so appreciate A. Johnson, and his Postmaster-General Randall. Under their administrashen wat Postmaster wuz ever pulled up for steelin anythin? Ekko ansers. This wuz the feather that broke the camel's back. . . .

Uv course I can't go back to the Corners under eggssistin circumstances. It wood be uncomfortable for me to live there ez matters hev terminated. I shel make my way to Washington, and shel see if I can't git myself electid Manager of a Labor Assosation, and so make a livin till there comes a change in the 20 Administrashen. I wood fasten myself on A. Johnson, but unforchintly there ain't enuff in him to tie to. I would ez soon think uv tyin myself to a car wheel in a storm at sea.

THE NEW SOUTH

"There was a South of slavery and secession—that South is dead. There is a South of union and freedom—that South, thank God, is living, breathing, growing every hour." These words, delivered from the immortal lips of Benjamin H. Hill, at Tammany Hall, in 1866, true then and truer now, I shall make my text to-night.

Mr. President and Gentlemen: Let me express to you my appreciation of the kindness by which I am permitted to address you. I make this abrupt acknowledgment advisedly, for I feel that if, when I raise my provincial voice in this ancient and august presence, it could find courage for no more than the opening sentence, it would be well if in that sentence I had met in a rough sense my obligation as a guest, and had perished, so to speak, with courtesy on my lips and grace in my heart.

Permitted, through your kindness, to catch my second wind, let me say that I appreciate the significance of being the first Southerner to speak at this board; which bears the substance, if it surpasses the semblance, of original New England hospitality—and honors the sentiment that in turn honors you, but in which my personality is lost, and the compliment to my people made plain.

I bespeak the utmost stretch of your courtesy to-night. I am not troubled about those from whom I come. You remember the man whose wife sent him to a neighbor with a pitcher of milk, and who, tripping on the top step, fell with such casual interruptions as the landings afforded into the basement; and, while picking himself up, had the pleasure of hearing his wife call out: "John, did you break the pitcher?"

"No, I didn't," said John, "but I'll be dinged if I don't."

So, while those who call me from behind may inspire me with energy, if not with courage, I ask an indulgent hearing from you. I beg that you will bring your full faith in American fairness and frankness to judgment upon what I shall say. There was an old preacher once who told some boys of the Bible lesson he was going to read in the morning. The boys, finding the place, glued together the connecting pages. The next morning he read on the bottom of one page, "When Noah was one hundred and twenty years old he took unto himself a wife, who was"—then turning the page—"140 cubits long—40 cubits wide, built of gopher wood—and covered with pitch inside and out." He was naturally puzzled at this. He read it again, verified it, and then said: "My friends, this is the first time I ever met this in the Bible, but I accept this as an evidence of the assertion that we are fearfully and wonderfully made." If I could get you to hold such faith to-night I could proceed cheerfully to the task I otherwise approach with a sense of consecration.

Pardon me one word, Mr. President, spoken for the sole purpose of getting into the volumes that go out annually freighted with the rich eloquence of your speakers—the fact that the Cavalier as well as the Puritan, was on the continent in his early days, and that he was "up and able to be about." I have read your books carefully and I find no mention of the fact, which seems to me an important one for preserving a sort of historical equilibrium, if for nothing else.

Let me remind you that the Virginia Cavalier first challenged France on the continent; that a Cavalier, John Smith, gave New England its very name, and was so pleased with the job that he has been handing his own name around ever since; and that while Myles Standish was cutting off men's ears for courting a girl without her parents' consent, and forbidding men to kiss their wives on Sunday, the Cavalier was courting everything in sight; and that the Almighty had vouchsafed great increase to the Cavalier colonies, the huts in the wilderness being as full as the nests in the woods.

But having incorporated the Cavalier as a fact in your charming little books, I shall let him work out his own salvation, as he has always done, with engaging gallantry, and we will hold no controversy as to his merits. Why should we? Neither Puritan nor Cavalier long survived as such. The virtues and good traditions of both happily still live for the inspiration of their sons and the saving of the old fashion. But both Puritan and Cavalier were lost in the storm of the first Revolution; and the American citizen, supplanting both and stronger than either, took possession of the republic bought by their common blood and fashioned to wisdom, and charged himself with teaching men government and establishing the voice of the people as the voice of God.

My friends, Dr. Talmage has told you that the typical American has yet to come. Let me tell you that he has already come. Great types, like valuable plants, are slow to flower and fruit. But from the union of these colonists, Puritans and Cavaliers, from the straightening of their purposes and the crossing of their blood, slow perfecting through a century, came he who stands as the first typical American, the first who comprehended within himself all the strength and gentleness, all the majesty and grace of this republic—Abraham Lincoln. He was the sum of Puritan and Cavalier, for in his ardent nature were fused the virtues of both; 10 and in the depths of his great soul the faults of both were lost. He was greater than Puritan, greater than Cavalier, in that he was American, and that in his honest form were first gathered the vast and thrilling forces of his ideal government—charging it with such tremendous meaning and elevating it above human suffering that martyrdom, though infamously aimed, came as a 20 fitting crown to a life consecrated from the cradle to human liberty. Let us, each cherishing the traditions and honoring his fathers, build with reverent hands to the type of this simple but sublime life, in which all types are honored, and in our common glory as Americans there will be plenty and to spare for your forefathers and for mine.

Dr. Talmage has drawn for you, with 30 a master's hand, the picture of your returning armies. He has told you how, in the pomp and circumstance of war, they came back to you, marching with proud and victorious tread, reading their glory in a nation's eyes! Will you bear with me while I tell you of another army that sought its home at the close of the late war—an army that marched home in defeat and not in vic- 40 tory—in pathos and not in splendor; but in glory that equaled yours, and to hearts as loving as ever welcomed heroes home!

Let me picture to you the footsore Confederate soldier, as, buttoning up in his faded gray jacket the parole which was to bear testimony to his children of his fidelity and faith, he turned his face southward from Ap- 50 pomattox in April, 1865. Think of him as, ragged, half-starved, heavy-hearted, enfeebled by want and wounds, having fought to exhaustion, he surrenders his gun, wrings the hands of his comrades in silence, and lifting his tear-stained and pallid face for the last time to the graves that dot the old Virginia hills, pulls his gray cap over his brow and begins the slow and painful journey.

What does he find—let me ask you who went to your homes eager to find, in the welcome you had justly earned, full payment for four years' sacrifice— 10 what does he find when, having followed the battle-stained cross against overwhelming odds, dreading death not half so much as surrender, he reaches the home he left so prosperous and beautiful? He finds his house in ruins, his farm devastated, his slaves free, his stock killed, his barns empty, his trade destroyed, his money worthless; his 20 social system, feudal in its magnificence, swept away; his people without law or legal status; his comrades slain, and the burdens of others heavy on his shoulders. Crushed by defeat, his very traditions are gone. Without money, credit, employment, material, or training; and besides all this, confronted with the gravest problems that ever met human intelligence—the establishment of a status for the vast body of his lib- 30 erated slaves.

What does he do—this hero in gray with a heart of gold? Does he sit down in sullenness and despair? Not for a day. Surely God, who had stripped him of his prosperity, inspired him in his adversity. As ruin was never before so 40 overwhelming, never was restoration swifter.

The soldier stepped from the trenches into the furrow; horses that had charged Federal guns marched before the plow, and fields that ran red with human blood in April were green with the harvest in June; women reared in luxury cut up their dresses and made breeches for their husbands, and, with a patience and heroism that fit women 50 always as a garment, gave their hands to work. There was little bitterness in all this. Cheerfulness and frankness prevailed. "Bill Arp" struck the keynote when he said: "Well, I killed as many of them as they did of me; and now I'm going to work." So did the soldier returning home after defeat and roasting some corn on the roadside, who made the remark to his comrades: "You may leave the South if you want to; but I'm going to Sandersville, kiss my wife, and raise a crop; and if the Yankees fool with me any more, I'll whip 'em again."

I want to say to General Sherman,¹⁰ who is considered an able man in our parts, though some people think he is a kind of careless man about fire, that from the ashes he left us in 1864 we have raised a brave and beautiful city; that somehow or other we have caught the sunshine in the bricks and mortar of our homes, and have builded therein not one ignoble prejudice or memory.

But what is the sum of our work?²⁰ We have found out that in the summing up the free negro counts for more than he did as a slave. We have planted the schoolhouse on the hilltop, and made it free to white and black. We have sowed towns and cities in the place of theories, and put business above politics. We have challenged your spinners in Massachusetts and your ironmakers in Pennsylvania. We have learned that³⁰ the $400,000,000 annually received from our cotton crop will make us rich when the supplies that make it are home-raised. We have reduced the commercial rate of interest from 24 to 6 per cent., and are floating 4 per cent. bonds. We have learned that one Northern immigrant is worth fifty foreigners, and have smoothed the path to the Southward, wiped out the place where Mason⁴⁰ and Dixon's line used to be, and hung out the lathstring to you and yours.

We have reached the point that marks perfect harmony in every household, when the husband confesses that the pies which his wife cooks are as good as those his mother used to bake; and we admit that the sun shines as brightly and the moon as softly as it did "before the war." We have estab-⁵⁰lished thrift in city and country. We have fallen in love with work. We have restored comfort to homes from which culture and elegance never departed.

We have let economy take root and spread among us as rank as the crab-grass which sprung from Sherman's cavalry camps, until we are ready to lay odds on the Georgia Yankee, as he manufactures relics of the battlefield in a one-story shanty and squeezes pure olive-oil out of his cottonseed, against any down-easter that ever swapped wooden nutmegs for flannel sausage in the valleys of Vermont. Above all, we know that we have achieved in these "piping times of peace" a fuller independence for the South than that which our fathers sought to win in the forum by their eloquence or compel in the field by their swords.

It is a rare privilege, sir, to have had a part, however humble, in this work. Never was nobler duty confided to human hands than the uplifting and upbuilding of the prostrate and bleeding South—misguided, perhaps, but beautiful in her suffering, and honest, brave, and generous always. In the record of her social, industrial, and political institutions we await with confidence the verdict of the world.

But what of the negro? Have we⁵⁰ solved the problem he presents, or progressed in honor and equity toward solution? Let the record speak to the point. No section shows a more prosperous laboring population than the negroes of the South, none in fuller sympathy with the employing and land-owning class. He shares our school fund, has the fullest protection of our laws and the friendship of our⁴⁰ people. Self-interest, as well as honor, demand that he should have this. Our future, our very existence depend upon our working out this problem in full and exact justice. We understand that when Lincoln signed the emancipation proclamation, your victory was assured; for he then committed you to the cause of human liberty, against which the arms of man cannot prevail—while those of our statesmen who trusted to⁵⁰ make slavery the cornerstone of the Confederacy doomed us to defeat as far as they could, committing us to a cause that reason could not defend or the sword maintain in sight of advancing civilization.

Had Mr. Toombs said, which he did not say, that "he would call the roll of his slaves at the foot of Bunker Hill," he would have been foolish; for he might have known that whenever slavery became entangled in war it must perish, and that the chattel in human flesh ended forever in New England when your fathers—not to be blamed for parting with what didn't pay—sold their slaves to our fathers—not to be praised for knowing a paying thing when they saw it. The relations of the Southern people with the negro are close and cordial. We remember with what fidelity for four years he guarded our defenseless women and children, whose husbands and fathers were fighting against his freedom. To his eternal credit be it said that whenever he struck a blow for his own liberty he fought in open battle; and when at last he raised his black and humble hands that the shackles might be struck off, those hands were innocent of wrong against his helpless charges, and worthy to be taken in loving grasp by every man who honors loyalty and devotion. Ruffians have maltreated him, rascals have misled him, philanthropists established a bank for him; but the South, with the North, protests against injustice to this simple and sincere people.

To liberty and enfranchisement is as far as law can carry the negro. The rest must be left to conscience and common sense. It must be left to those among whom his lot is cast, with whom he is indissolubly connected, and whose prosperity depends upon their possessing his intelligent sympathy and confidence. Faith has been kept with him, in spite of calumnious assertions to the contrary by those who assume to speak for us, or by frank opponents. Faith will be kept with him in the future, if the South holds her reason and integrity.

But have we kept faith with you? In the fullest sense, yes. When Lee surrendered—I don't say when Johnston surrendered, because I understand he still alludes to the time when he met General Sherman last, as the time when he determined to abandon any further prosecution of the struggle—when Lee surrendered, I say, and Johnston quit, the South became, and has since been, loyal to this Union. We fought hard enough to know that we were whipped, and in perfect frankness accept as final the arbitrament of the sword to which we had appealed. The South found her jewel in the toad's head of defeat. The shackles that had held her in narrow limitations fell forever when the shackles of the negro slave were broken. Under the old régime the negroes were slaves to the South; the South was a slave to the system. The old plantation, with its simple police regulations and feudal habit, was the only type possible under slavery. Thus was gathered in the hands of a splendid and chivalric oligarchy the substance that should have been diffused among the people; as the rich blood, under certain artificial conditions is gathered at the heart, filling that with affluent rapture, but leaving the body chill and colorless.

The old South rested everything on slavery and agriculture, unconscious that these could neither give nor maintain healthy growth. The new South presents a perfect democracy, the oligarchs leading in the popular movement—a social system, compact and closely knitted, less splendid on the surface, but stronger at the core—a hundred farms for every plantation, fifty homes for every palace—and a diversified industry that meets the complex needs of this complex age.

The new South is enamored of her new work. Her soul is stirred with the breath of a new life. The light of a grander day is falling fair on her face. She is thrilling with the consciousness of growing power and prosperity. As she stands upright, full-statured and equal among the people of the earth, breathing the keen air and looking out upon the expanded horizon, she understands that her emancipation came because through the inscrutable wisdom of God her honest purpose was crossed, and her brave armies were beaten.

This is said in no spirit of time-serving or apology. The South has nothing for which to apologize. She believes that the late struggle between the States was war and not rebellion; revolution and not conspiracy, and that her convictions were as honest as yours. I¹⁰ should be unjust to the dauntless spirit of the South and to my own convictions if I did not make this plain in this presence. The South has nothing to take back.

In my native town of Athens is a monument that crowns its central hill—a plain, white shaft. Deep cut into its shining side is a name dear to me above the names of men—that of a²⁰ brave and simple man who died in brave and simple faith. Not for all the glories of New England, from Plymouth Rock all the way, would I exchange the heritage he left me in his soldier's death. To the foot of that I shall send my children's children to reverence him who ennobled their name with his heroic blood. But, sir, speaking from the shadow of that memory³⁰ which I honor as I do nothing else on earth, I say that the cause in which he suffered and for which he gave his life was adjudged by higher and fuller wisdom than his or mine; and I am glad that the omniscient God held the balance of battle in His Almighty hand, and that human slavery was swept forever from American soil—that the American Union was saved from the⁴⁰ wreck of war.

This message, Mr. President, comes to you from consecrated ground. Every foot of soil about the city in which I live is sacred as a battle-ground of the republic. Every hill that invests it is hallowed to you by the blood of your brothers who died for your victory, and doubly hallowed to us by the blood of those who died hopeless, but undaunted,⁵⁰ in defeat—sacred soil to all of us—rich with memories that make us purer and stronger and better—silent but staunch witnesses in its red desolation of the matchless valor of American hearts and the deathless glory of American arms—speaking an eloquent witness in its white peace and prosperity to the indissoluble union of American States, and the imperishable brotherhood of the American people.

Now, what answer has New England to this message? Will she permit the prejudice of war to remain in the hearts of the conquerors, when it has died in the hearts of the conquered? Will she transmit this prejudice to the next generation, that in their hearts which never felt the generous ardor of conflict it may perpetuate itself? Will she withhold, save in strained courtesy, the hand which straight from his soldier's heart Grant offered to Lee at Appomattox? Will she make the vision of a restored and happy people, which gathered above the couch of your dying captain, filling his heart with grace, touching his lips with praise, and glorifying his path to the grave—will she make this vision on which the last sigh of his expiring soul breathed a benediction, a cheat and delusion?

If she does, the South, never abject in asking for comradeship, must accept with dignity its refusal; but if she does not refuse to accept in frankness and sincerity this message of good will and friendship, then will the prophecy of Webster, delivered in this very society forty years ago amid tremendous applause, become true, be verified in its fullest sense, when he said: "Standing hand to hand and clasping hands, we should remain united as we have been for sixty years, citizens of the same country, members of the same government, united, all united now and united forever." There have been difficulties, contentions, and controversies, but I tell you that in my judgment,

Those opposed eyes,
Which like the meteors of a troubled heaven,
All of one nature, of one substance bred,
Did lately meet in th' intestine shock,
Shall now, in mutual well-beseeming ranks,
March all one way.

RECENT AND CONTEMPORARY PROSE

BRET HARTE (1839-1902)

THE OUTCASTS OF POKER FLAT

As Mr. John Oakhurst, gambler, stepped into the main street of Poker Flat on the morning of the 23d of November, 1850, he was conscious of a change in its moral atmosphere since the preceding night. Two or three men, 10 conversing earnestly together, ceased as he approached, and exchanged significant glances. There was a Sabbath lull in the air, which, in a settlement unused to Sabbath influences, looked ominous.

Mr. Oakhurst's calm, handsome face betrayed small concern in these indications. Whether he was conscious of any predisposing cause was another 20 question. "I reckon they're after somebody," he reflected; "likely it's me." He returned to his pocket the handkerchief with which he had been whipping away the red dust of Poker Flat from his neat boots, and quietly discharged his mind of any further conjecture.

In point of fact, Poker Flat was 30 "after somebody." It had lately suffered the loss of several thousand dollars, two valuable horses, and a prominent citizen. It was experiencing a spasm of virtuous reaction, quite as lawless and ungovernable as any of the acts that had provoked it. A secret committee had determined to rid the town of all improper persons. This was done permanently in regard of two men who were then hanging from the 40 boughs of a sycamore in the gulch, and temporarily in the banishment of certain other objectionable characters. I regret to say that some of these were ladies. It is but due to the sex, however, to state that their impropriety was professional, and it was only in such easily established standards of evil that Poker Flat ventured to sit in judgment.

Mr. Oakhurst was right in supposing that he was included in this category. A few of the committee had urged hanging him as a possible example and a sure method of reimbursing themselves from his pockets of the sums he had won from them. "It's agin justice," said Jim Wheeler, "to let this yer young man from Roaring Camp—an entire stranger—carry away our money." But a crude sentiment of equity residing in the breasts of those who had been fortunate enough to win from Mr. Oakhurst overruled this narrower local prejudice.

Mr. Oakhurst received his sentence 20 with philosophic calmness, none the less coolly that he was aware of the hesitation of his judges. He was too much of a gambler not to accept fate. With him life was at best an uncertain game, and he recognized the usual percentage in favor of the dealer.

A body of armed men accompanied 30 the deported wickedness of Poker Flat to the outskirts of the settlement. Besides Mr. Oakhurst, who was known to be a coolly desperate man, and for whose intimidation the armed escort was intended, the expatriated party consisted of a young woman familiarly known as "The Duchess;" another who had won the title of "Mother Ship-ton;" and "Uncle Billy," a suspected 40 sluice-robber and confirmed drunkard. The cavalcade provoked no comments from the spectators, nor was any word uttered by the escort. Only when the gulch which marked the uttermost limit of Poker Flat was reached, the leader spoke briefly and to the point.

The exiles were forbidden to return at the peril of their lives.

As the escort disappeared, their pent-up feelings found vent in a few hysterical tears from the Duchess, some bad language from Mother Shipton, and a Parthian volley of expletives from Uncle Billy. The philosophic Oakhurst alone remained silent. He listened calmly to Mother Shipton's desire to cut somebody's heart out, to the repeated statements of the Duchess that she would die in the road, and to the alarming oaths that seemed to be bumped out of Uncle Billy as he rode forward. With the easy good humor characteristic of his class, he insisted upon exchanging his own riding-horse, "Five-Spot," for the sorry mule which the Duchess rode. But even this act did not draw the party into any closer sympathy. The young woman readjusted her somewhat dragged plumes with a feeble, faded coquetry; Mother Shipton eyed the possessor of "Five-Spot" with malevolence, and Uncle Billy included the whole party in one sweeping anathema.

The road to Sandy Bar—a camp that, not having as yet experienced the regenerating influences of Poker Flat, consequently seemed to offer some invitation to the emigrants—lay over a steep mountain range. It was distant a day's severe travel. In that advanced season the party soon passed out of the moist, temperate regions of the foothills into the dry, cold, bracing air of the Sierras. The trail was narrow and difficult. At noon the Duchess, rolling out of her saddle upon the ground, declared her intention of going no farther, and the party halted.

The spot was singularly wild and impressive. A wooded amphitheatre, surrounded on three sides by precipitous cliffs of naked granite, sloped gently towards the crest of another precipice that overlooked the valley. It was, undoubtedly, the most suitable spot for a camp, had camping been advisable. But Mr. Oakhurst knew that scarcely half the journey to Sandy Bar was accomplished, and the party were not equipped or provisioned for delay. This fact he pointed out to his companions curtly, with a philosophic commentary on the folly of "throwing up their hand before the game was played out." But they were furnished with liquor, which in this emergency stood them in place of food, fuel, rest, and prescience. In spite of his remonstrances, it was not long before they were more or less under its influence. Uncle Billy passed rapidly from a bellicose state into one of stupor, the Duchess became maudlin, and Mother Shipton snored. Mr. Oakhurst alone remained erect, leaning against a rock, calmly surveying them.

Mr. Oakhurst did not drink. It interfered with a profession which required coolness, impassiveness, and presence of mind, and, in his own language, he "couldn't afford it." As he gazed at his recumbent fellow exiles, the loneliness begotten of his pariah trade, his habits of life, his very vices, for the first time seriously oppressed him. He bestirred himself in dusting his black clothes, washing his hands and face, and other acts characteristic of his studiously neat habits, and for a moment forgot his annoyance. The thought of deserting his weaker and more pitiable companions never perhaps occurred to him. Yet he could not help feeling the want of that excitement which, singularly enough, was most conducive to that calm equanimity for which he was notorious. He looked at the gloomy walls that rose a thousand feet sheer above the circling pines around him, at the sky ominously clouded, at the valley below, already deepening into shadows; and, doing so, suddenly he heard his own name called.

A horseman slowly ascended the trail. In the fresh, open face of the newcomer Mr. Oakhurst recognized Tom Simson, otherwise known as "The Innocent," of Sandy Bar. He had met him some months before over a "little game," and had, with perfect equanimity, won the entire fortune—amounting to some forty dollars—of that guileless youth. After the game was finished, Mr. Oakhurst drew the youthful speculator behind the door and thus addressed him: "Tommy, you're a good little man, but you can't gamble worth a cent. Don't try it over again." He then handed him his money back, pushed him gently from the room, and so made a devoted slave¹⁰ of Tom Simson.

There was a remembrance of this in his boyish and enthusiastic greeting of Mr. Oakhurst. He had started, he said, to go to Poker Flat to seek his fortune. "Alone?" No, not exactly alone; in fact (a giggle), he had run away with Piney Woods. Didn't Mr. Oakhurst remember Piney? She that used to wait on the table at the Temperance²⁰ House? They had been engaged a long time, but old Jake Woods had objected, and so they had run away, and were going to Poker Flat to be married, and here they were. And they were tired out, and how lucky it was they had found a place to camp, and company. All this the Innocent delivered rapidly, while Piney, a stout, comely damsel of fifteen, emerged from be-³⁰hind the pine-tree, where she had been blushing unseen, and rode to the side of her lover.

Mr. Oakhurst seldom troubled himself with sentiment, still less with propriety; but he had a vague idea that the situation was not fortunate. He retained, however, his presence of mind sufficiently to kick Uncle Billy, who was about to say something, and Uncle Billy was sober enough to recognize in⁴⁰ Mr. Oakhurst's kick a superior power that would not bear trifling. He then endeavored to dissuade Tom Simson from delaying further, but in vain. He even pointed out the fact that there was no provision, nor means of making a camp. But, unluckily, the Innocent met this objection by assuring the party that he was provided with an extra⁵⁰ mule loaded with provisions, and by the discovery of a rude attempt at a log house near the trail. "Piney can stay with Mrs. Oakhurst," said the Innocent, pointing to the Duchess, "and I can shift for myself."

Nothing but Mr. Oakhurst's admonishing foot saved Uncle Billy from bursting into a roar of laughter. As it was, he felt compelled to retire up the cañon until he could recover his gravity. There he confided the joke to the tall pine-trees, with many slaps of his leg, contortions of his face, and the usual profanity. But when he returned to the party, he found them seated by a fire—for the air had grown strangely chill and the sky overcast—in apparently amicable conversation. Piney was actually talking in an impulsive girlish fashion to the Duchess, who was listening with an interest and animation she had not shown for many days. The Innocent was holding forth, apparently with equal effect, to Mr. Oakhurst and Mother Shipton, who was actually relaxing into amiability. "Is this yer a d—d picnic?" said Uncle Billy, with inward scorn, as he surveyed the sylvan group, the glancing firelight, and the tethered animals in the foreground. Suddenly an idea mingled with the alcoholic fumes that³⁰ disturbed his brain. It was apparently of a jocular nature, for he felt impelled to slap his leg again and cram his fist into his mouth.

As the shadows crept slowly up the mountain, a slight breeze rocked the tops of the pine-trees and moaned through their long and gloomy aisles. The ruined cabin, patched and covered with pine boughs, was set apart for the ladies. As the lovers parted, they un-⁴⁰affectedly exchanged a kiss, so honest and sincere that it might have been heard above the swaying pines. The frail Duchess and the malevolent Mother Shipton were probably too stunned to remark upon this last evidence of simplicity, and so turned without a word to the hut. The fire was replenished, the men lay down before the door, and in a few minutes were⁵⁰ asleep.

Mr. Oakhurst was a light sleeper. Toward morning he awoke benumbed and cold. As he stirred the dying fire, the wind, which was now blowing strongly, brought to his cheek that which caused the blood to leave it,—snow!

He started to his feet with the intention of awakening the sleepers, for there was no time to lose. But turning to where Uncle Billy had been lying, he found him gone. A suspicion leaped to his brain, and a curse to his lips. He ran to the spot where the mules had been tethered—they were no longer there. The tracks were already rapidly disappearing in the snow.

The momentary excitement brought Mr. Oakhurst back to the fire with his usual calm. He did not waken the sleepers. The Innocent slumbered peacefully, with a smile on his good-humored, freckled face; the virgin ²⁰ Piney slept beside her frailer sisters as sweetly as though attended by celestial guardians; and Mr. Oakhurst, drawing his blanket over his shoulders, stroked his mustaches and waited for the dawn. It came slowly in a whirling mist of snowflakes that dazzled and confused the eye. What could be seen of the landscape appeared magically changed. He looked over the valley, ³⁰ and summed up the present and future in two words, "Snowed in!"

A careful inventory of the provisions, which, fortunately for the party, had been stored within the hut, and so escaped the felonious fingers of Uncle Billy, disclosed the fact that with care and prudence they might last ten days longer. "That is," said Mr. Oakhurst sotto voce to the Innocent, ⁴⁰ "if you're willing to board us. If you ain't—and perhaps you'd better not—you can wait till Uncle Billy gets back with provisions." For some occult reason, Mr. Oakhurst could not bring himself to disclose Uncle Billy's rascality, and so offered the hypothesis that he had wandered from the camp and had accidentally stampeded the animals. He dropped a warning to the Duchess ⁵⁰ and Mother Shipton, who of course knew the facts of their associate's defection. "They'll find out the truth about us all when they find out anything," he added significantly, "and there's no good frightening them now."

Tom Simson not only put all his worldly store at the disposal of Mr. Oakhurst, but seemed to enjoy the prospect of their enforced seclusion. "We'll have a good camp for a week, and then the snow'll melt, and we'll all go back together." The cheerful gaiety of the young man and Mr. Oakhurst's calm infected the others. The Innocent, with the aid of pine boughs, extemporized a thatch for the roofless cabin, and the Duchess directed Piney in the rearrangement of the interior with a taste and tact that opened the blue eyes of that provincial maiden to their fullest extent. "I reckon now you're used to fine things at Poker Flat," said Piney. The Duchess turned away sharply to conceal something that reddened her cheeks through their professional tint, and Mother Shipton requested Piney not to "chatter." But when Mr. Oakhurst returned from a weary search for the trail, he heard the sound of happy laughter echoed from the rocks. He stopped in some alarm, and his thoughts first naturally reverted to the whiskey, which he had prudently cached. "And yet it don't somehow sound like whiskey," said the gambler. It was not until he caught sight of the blazing fire through the still blinding storm, and the group around it, that he settled to the conviction that it was "square fun."

Whether Mr. Oakhurst had cached his cards with the whiskey as something debarred the free access of the community, I cannot say. It was certain that, in Mother Shipton's words, he "didn't say 'cards' once" during that evening. Haply the time was beguiled by an accordion, produced somewhat ostentatiously by Tom Simson from his pack. Notwithstanding some difficulties attending the manipulation of this instrument, Piney Woods managed to pluck several reluctant melodies from its keys, to an accompaniment by the Innocent on a pair of bone castanets. But the crowning festivity of the evening was reached in a rude camp-meeting hymn, which the lovers, joining hands, sang with great earnestness and vociferation. I fear that a certain defiant tone and Covenanters' swing to its chorus, rather than any devotional quality, caused it speedily to infect the others, who at last joined in the refrain:

"I'm proud to live in the service of the Lord,
And I'm bound to die in His army."

The pines rocked, the storm eddied and whirled above the miserable group, and the flames of their altar leaped heavenward, as if in token of the vow.

At midnight the storm abated, the rolling clouds parted, and the stars glittered keenly above the sleeping camp. Mr. Oakhurst, whose professional habits had enabled him to live on the smallest possible amount of sleep, in dividing the watch with Tom Simson somehow managed to take upon himself the greater part of that duty. He excused himself to the Innocent by saying that he had "often been a week without sleep." "Doing what?" asked Tom. "Poker!" replied Oakhurst sententiously. "When a man gets a streak of luck,—nigger-luck,—he don't get tired. The luck gives in first. Luck," continued the gambler reflectively, "is a mighty queer thing. All you know about it for certain is that it's bound to change. And it's finding out when it's going to change that makes you. We've had a streak of bad luck since we left Poker Flat,—you come along, and slap you get into it, too. If you can hold your cards right along you're all right. For,"⁴⁰ added the gambler with cheerful irrelevance—

"I'm proud to live in the service of the Lord,
And I'm bound to die in His army."

The third day came, and the sun, looking through the white-curtained valley, saw the outcasts divide their slowly decreasing store of provisions for the morning meal. It was one of the peculiarities of that mountain climate that its rays diffused a kindly warmth over the wintry landscape, as if in regretful commiseration of the past. But it revealed drift on drift of snow piled high around the hut,—a hopeless, uncharted, trackless sea of white lying below the rocky shores to which the castaways still clung. Through the marvelously clear air the smoke of the pastoral village of Poker Flat rose miles away. Mother Shipton saw it, and from a remote pinnacle¹⁰ of her rocky fastness hurled in that direction a final malediction. It was her last vituperative attempt, and perhaps for that reason was invested with a certain degree of sublimity. It did her good, she privately informed the Duchess. "Just you go out there and cuss, and see." She then set herself to the task of amusing "the child," as she and the Duchess were pleased²⁰ to call Piney. Piney was no chicken, but it was a soothing and original theory of the pair thus to account for the fact that she didn't swear and wasn't improper.

When night crept up again through the gorges, the reedy notes of the accordion rose and fell in fitful spasms and long-drawn gasps by the flickering campfire. But music failed to fill³⁰ entirely the aching void left by insufficient food, and a new diversion was proposed by Piney, — story-telling. Neither Mr. Oakhurst nor his female companions caring to relate their personal experiences, this plan would have failed too, but for the Innocent. Some months before he had chanced upon a stray copy of Mr. Pope's ingenious translation of the Iliad. He now proposed to narrate the principal incidents of that poem—having thoroughly mastered the argument and fairly forgotten the words—in the current vernacular of Sandy Bar. And so for the rest of that night the Homeric demi-gods again walked the earth. Trojan bully and wily Greek wrestled in the winds, and the great pines in the cañon seemed to bow to the wrath of the son of Peleus. Mr. Oakhurst listened with quiet satisfaction. Most especially was he interested in the fate of "Ash-heels" as the Innocent persisted in denominating the "swift-footed Achilles."

So, with small food and much of Homer and the accordion, a week passed over the heads of the outcasts. The sun again forsook them, and again from leaden skies the snowflakes were sifted over the land. Day by day closer around them drew the snowy circle, until at last they looked from their prison over drifted walls of dazzling white, that towered twenty feet above their heads. It became more and more difficult to replenish their fires, even from the fallen trees beside them, now half hidden in the drifts. And yet no one complained. The lovers turned from the dreary prospect and looked into each other's eyes, and were happy. Mr. Oakhurst settled himself coolly to the losing game before him. The Duchess, more cheerful than she had been, assumed the care of Piney. Only Mother Shipton—once the strongest of the party—seemed to sicken and fade. At midnight on the tenth day she called Oakhurst to her side. "I'm going," she said, in a voice of querulous weakness, "but don't say anything about it. Don't waken the kids. Take the bundle from under my head, and open it." Mr. Oakhurst did so. It contained Mother Shipton's rations for the last week, untouched. "Give 'em to the child," she said, pointing to the sleeping Piney. "You've starved yourself," said the gambler. "That's what they call it," said the woman querulously, as she lay down again, and, turning her face to the wall, passed quietly away.

The accordion and the bones were put aside that day, and Homer was forgotten. When the body of Mother Shipton had been committed to the snow, Mr. Oakhurst took the Innocent aside, and showed him a pair of snowshoes, which he had fashioned from the old pack-saddle. "There's one chance in a hundred to save her yet," he said, pointing to Piney; "but it's there," he added, pointing toward Poker Flat. "If you can reach there in two days she's safe." "And you?" asked Tom Simson. "I'll stay here," was the curt reply.

The lovers parted with a long embrace. "You are not going, too?" said the Duchess, as she saw Mr. Oakhurst apparently waiting to accompany him. "As far as the cañon," he replied. He turned suddenly and kissed the Duchess, leaving her pallid face aflame, and her trembling limbs rigid with amazement.

Night came, but not Mr. Oakhurst.

It brought the storm again and the whirling snow. Then the Duchess, feeding the fire, found that some one had quietly piled beside the hut enough fuel to last a few days longer. The tears rose to her eyes, but she hid them from Piney.

The women slept but little. In the morning, looking into each other's faces, they read their fate. Neither spoke, but Piney, accepting the position of the stronger, drew near and placed her arm around the Duchess's waist. They kept this attitude for the rest of the day. That night the storm reached its greatest fury, and, rending asunder the protecting vines, invaded the very hut.

Toward morning they found themselves unable to feed the fire, which gradually died away. As the embers slowly blackened, the Duchess crept closer to Piney, and broke the silence of many hours: "Piney, can you pray?" "No, dear," said Piney simply. The Duchess, without knowing exactly why, felt relieved, and, putting her head upon Piney's shoulder, spoke no more. And so reclining, the younger and purer pillowing the head of her soiled sister upon her virgin breast, they fell asleep.

The wind lulled as if it feared to waken them. Feathery drifts of snow, shaken from the long pine boughs, flew like white-winged birds, and settled about them as they slept. The moon through the rifted clouds looked down upon what had been the camp. But all human stain, all trace of earthly travail, was hidden beneath the spotless mantle mercifully flung from above.

They slept all that day and the next, nor did they waken when voices and footsteps broke the silence of the camp.

And when pitying fingers brushed the snow from their wan faces, you could scarcely have told from the equal peace that dwelt upon them which was she that had sinned. Even the law of Poker Flat recognized this, and turned away, leaving them still locked in each other's arms.

But at the head of the gulch, on one of the largest pine-trees, they found the deuce of clubs pinned to the bark with a bowie-knife. It bore the following, written in pencil in a firm hand:

LIES THE BODY

JOHN OAKHURST,

WHO STRUCK A STREAK OF BAD LUCK

And pulseless and cold, with a Deringer by his side and a bullet in his heart, though still calm as in life, beneath the snow lay he who at once was the strongest and yet the weakest of the outcasts of Poker Flat.

TENNESSEE'S PARTNER

I do not think that we ever knew his real name. Our ignorance of it certainly never gave us any social inconvenience, for at Sandy Bar in 1854 most men were christened anew. Sometimes these appellatives were derived from some distinctiveness of dress, as in the case of "Dungaree Jack"; or from some peculiarity of habit, as shown in "Saleratus Bill," so called from an undue proportion of that chemical in his daily bread; or from some unlucky slip, as exhibited in "The Iron Pirate," a mild, inoffensive man, who earned that baleful title by his unfortunate mispronunciation of the term "iron pyrites." Perhaps this may have been the beginning of a rude heraldry;

but I am constrained to think that it was because a man's real name in that day rested solely upon his own unsupported statement. "Call yourself Clifford; do you?" said Boston, addressing a timid newcomer with infinite scorn; "hell is full of such Cliffords!" He then introduced the unfortunate man, whose name happened to be really Clifford, as "Jay-bird Charley,"—an unhallowed inspiration of the moment, that clung to him ever after.

But to return to Tennessee's Partner, whom we never knew by any other than this relative title; that he had ever existed as a separate and distinct individuality we only learned later. It seems that in 1853 he left Poker Flat to go to San Francisco, ostensibly to procure a wife. He never got any farther than Stockton. At that place he was attracted by a young person who waited upon the table at the hotel where he took his meals. One morning he said something to her which caused her to smile not unkindly, to somewhat coquettishly break a plate of toast over his upturned, serious, simple face, and to retreat to the kitchen. He followed her, and emerged a few moments later, covered with more toast and victory. That day week they were married by a Justice of the Peace, and returned to Poker Flat. I am aware that more might be made of this episode, but I prefer to tell it as it was current at Sandy Bar,—in the gulches and barrooms,—where all sentiment was modified by a strong sense of humor.

Of their married felicity but little is known, perhaps for the reason that Tennessee, then living with his partner, one day took occasion to say something to the bride on his own account, at which, it is said, she smiled not unkindly, and chastely retreated,—this time as far as Marysville, where Tennessee followed her, and where they went to housekeeping without the aid of a Justice of the Peace. Tennessee's Partner took the loss of his wife simply and seriously, as was his fashion. But to everybody's surprise, when Tennessee one day returned from Marysville, without his partner's wife,—she having smiled and retreated with somebody else,—Tennessee's Partner was the first man to shake his hand and greet him with affection. The boys who had gathered in the cañon to see the shooting were naturally indignant. Their indignation might have found vent in sarcasm but for a certain look in Tennessee's Partner's eye that indicated a lack of humorous appreciation. In fact, he was a grave man, with a steady application to practical detail which was unpleasant in a difficulty.

Meanwhile a popular feeling against Tennessee had grown up on the Bar. He was known to be a gambler; he was suspected to be a thief. In these suspicious Tennessee's Partner was equally compromised; his continued intimacy with Tennessee after the affair above quoted could only be accounted for on the hypothesis of a copartnership of crime. At last Tennessee's guilt became flagrant. One day he overtook a stranger on his way to Red Dog. The stranger afterward related that Tennessee beguiled the time with interesting anecdote and reminiscence, but illogically concluded the interview in the following words: And now, young man, I'll trouble you for your knife, your pistols, and your money. You see your weppings might get you into trouble at Red Dog, and your money's a temptation to the evilly disposed. I think you said your address was San Francisco. I shall endeavor to call." It may be stated here that Tennessee had a fine flow of humor, which no business preoccupation could wholly subdue.

This exploit was his last. Red Dog and Sandy Bar made common cause against the highwayman. Tennessee was hunted in very much the same fashion as his prototype, the grizzly. As the toils closed around him, he made a desperate dash through the Bar, emptying his revolver at the crowd before the Arcade Saloon, and so on up Grizzly Cañon; but at its farther extremity he was stopped by a small man on a gray horse. The men looked at each other a moment in silence. Both were fearless, both self-possessed and independent; and both types of a civilization that in the seventeenth century would have been called heroic, but, in the nineteenth, simply "reckless." "What have you got there?—I call," said Tennessee, quietly. "Two bowers and an ace," said the stranger, as quietly, showing two revolvers and a bowie-knife. "That takes me," returned Tennessee; and with this gambler's epigram, he threw away his useless pistol, and rode back with his captor.

It was a warm night. The cool breeze which usually sprang up with the going down of the sun behind the chaparral-crested mountain was that evening withheld from Sandy Bar. The little cañon was stifling with heated, resinous odors, and the decaying driftwood on the Bar sent forth faint, sickening exhalations. The feverishness of day, and its fierce passions, still filled the camp. Lights moved restlessly along the bank of the river, striking no answering reflection from its tawny current. Against the blackness of the pines the windows of the old loft above the express-office stood out staringly bright; and through their curtainless panes the loungers below could see the forms of those who were even then deciding the fate of Tennessee. And above all this, etched on the dark firmament, rose the Sierra, remote and passionless, crowned with remoter, passionless stars.

The trial of Tennessee was conducted as fairly as was consistent with a judge and jury who felt themselves to some extent obliged to justify, in their verdict, the previous irregularities of arrest and indictment. The law of Sandy Bar was implacable, but not vengeful. The excitement and personal feeling of the chase were over; with Tennessee safe in their hands they were ready to listen patiently to any defense, which they were already satisfied was insufficient. There being no doubt in their own minds, they were willing to give the prisoner the benefit of any that might exist. Secure in the hypothesis that he ought to be hanged, on general principles, they indulged him with more latitude of defense than his reckless hardihood seemed to ask. The Judge appeared to be more anxious than the prisoner, who, otherwise unconcerned, evidently took a grim pleasure in the responsibility he had created. "I don't take any hand in this yer game," had been his invariable, but good-humored reply to all questions. The Judge—who was also his captor—for a moment vaguely regretted that he had not shot him "on sight," that morning, but presently dismissed this human weakness as unworthy of the judicial mind. Nevertheless, when there was a tap at the door, and it was said that Tennessee's Partner was there on behalf of the prisoner, he was admitted at once without question. Perhaps the younger members of the jury, to whom the proceedings were becoming irksomely thoughtful, hailed him as a relief.

For he was not, certainly, an imposing figure. Short and stout, with a square face, sunburned into a preternatural redness, clad in a loose duck "jumper," and trousers streaked and splashed with red soil, his aspect under any circumstances would have been quaint, and was now even ridiculous. As he stooped to deposit at his feet a heavy carpetbag he was carrying, it became obvious, from partially developed legends and inscriptions, that the material with which his trousers had been patched had been originally intended for a less ambitious covering. Yet he advanced with great gravity, and after having shaken the hand of each person in the room with labored cordiality, he wiped his serious, perplexed face on a red bandanna handkerchief, a shade lighter than his complexion, laid his powerful hand upon the table to steady himself, and thus addressed the Judge:—

"I was passin' by," he began, by way of apology, "and I thought I'd just step in and see how things was gittin' on with Tennessee thar,—my pardner. It's a hot night. I disremember any sich weather before on the Bar."

He paused a moment, but nobody volunteering any other meteorological recollections, he again had recourse to his pocket handkerchief, and for some moments mopped his face diligently.

"Have you anything to say in behalf of the prisoner?" said the Judge, finally.

"Thet's it," said Tennessee's Partner, in a tone of relief. "I come yar as Tennessee's pardner,—knowing him nigh on four year, off and on, wet and dry, in luck and out o' luck. His ways ain't allers my ways, but thar ain't any p'int in thet young man, thar ain't any liveliness as he's been up to, as I don't know. And you sez to me, sez you—confidential-like, and between man and man,—sez you, 'Do you know anything in his behalf?' and I sez to you, sez I,—confidential-like, as between man and man,—'What should a man know of his pardner?'"

"Is this all you have to say?" asked the Judge, impatiently, feeling, perhaps, that a dangerous sympathy of humor was beginning to humanize the Court.

"Thet's so," continued Tennessee's Partner. "It ain't for me to say anything agin' him. And now, what's the case? Here's Tennessee wants money, wants it bad, and doesn't like to ask it of his old pardner. Well, what does Tennessee do? He lays for a stranger, and he fetches that stranger. And you lays for him, and you fetches him; and the honors is easy. And I put it to you, bein' a far-minded man, and to you, gentlemen, all, as far-minded men, ef this isn't so."

"Prisoner," said the Judge, interrupting, "have you any questions to ask this man?"

"No! no!" continued Tennessee's Partner, hastily. "I play this yer hand alone. To come down to the bed rock, it's just this: Tennessee, thar, has played it pretty rough and expensive-like on a stranger, and on this yer camp. And now, what's the fair thing? Some would say more; some would say less. Here's seventeen hundred dollars in coarse gold and a watch, it's about all my pile,—and call it square!" And before a hand could be raised to prevent him, he had emptied the contents of the carpetbag upon the table.

For a moment his life was in jeopardy. One or two men sprang to their feet, several hands groped for hidden weapons, and a suggestion to "throw him from the window" was only overridden by a gesture from the Judge. Tennessee laughed. And apparently oblivious of the excitement, Tennessee's Partner improved the opportunity to mop his face again with his handkerchief.

When order was restored, and the man was made to understand, by the use of forcible figures and rhetoric, that Tennessee's offense could not be condoned by money, his face took a more serious and sanguinary hue, and those who were nearest to him noticed that his rough hand trembled slightly on the table. He hesitated a moment as he slowly returned the gold to the carpetbag, as if he had not yet entirely caught the elevated sense of justice which swayed the tribunal, and was perplexed with the belief that he had not offered enough. Then he turned to the Judge, and saying, "This yer is a lone hand, played alone, and without my pardner," he bowed to the jury and was about to withdraw, when the Judge called him back. "If you have anything to say to Tennessee, you had better say it now." For the first time that evening the eyes of the prisoner and his strange advocate met. Tennessee smiled, showed his white teeth, and, saying, "Euchred, old man!" held out his hand. Tennessee's Partner took it in his own, and saying, "I just dropped in as I was passin' to see how things was gettin' on," let the hand passively fall, and adding that "it was a warm night," again mopped his face with his handkerchief, and without another word withdrew.

The two men never again met each other alive. For the unparalleled insult of a bribe offered to Judge Lynch—who, whether bigoted, weak, or narrow, was at least incorruptible—firmly fixed in the mind of that mythical personage any wavering determination of Tennessee's fate; and at the break of day he was marched, closely guarded, to meet it at the top of Marley's Hill.

How he met it, how cool he was, how he refused to say anything, how perfect were the arrangements of the committee, were all duly reported, with the addition of a warning moral and example to all future evil doers, in the Red Dog Clarion, by its editor, who was present, and to whose vigorous English I cheerfully refer the reader. But the beauty of that midsummer morning, the blessed amity of earth and air and sky, the awakened life of the free woods and hills, the joyous renewal and promise of Nature, and above all, the infinite serenity that thrilled each, was not reported, as not being a part of the social lesson. And yet, when the weak and foolish deed was done, and a life, with its possibilities and responsibilities, had passed out of the misshapen thing that dangled between earth and sky, the birds sang, the flowers bloomed, the sun shone, as cheerily as before; and possibly the Red Dog Clarion was right.

Tennessee's Partner was not in the group that surrounded the ominous tree. But as they turned to disperse, attention was drawn to the singular appearance of a motionless donkey cart halted at the side of the road. As they approached, they at once recognized the venerable "Jenny" and the two-wheeled cart as the property of Tennessee's Partner,—used by him in carrying dirt from his claim; and a few paces distant the owner of the equipage himself, sitting under a buck-eye tree, wiping the perspiration from his glowing face. In answer to an inquiry, he said he had come for the body of the "diseased," "if it was all the same to the committee." He didn't wish to "hurry anything"; he could "wait." He was not working that day; and when the gentlemen were done with the "diseased," he would take him. "Ef thar is any present," he added, in his simple, serious way, "as would care to jine in the fun'l, they kin come." Perhaps it was from a sense of humor, which I have already intimated was a feature of Sandy Bar,—perhaps it was from something even better than that; but two-thirds of the loungers accepted the invitation at once.

It was noon when the body of Tennessee was delivered into the hands of his partner. As the cart drew up to the fatal tree, we noticed that it contained a rough, oblong box,—apparently made from a section of sluicing,—and half filled with bark and the tassels of pine. The cart was further decorated with slips of willow, and made fragrant with buckeye blossoms. When the body was deposited in the box, Tennessee's Partner drew over it a piece of tarred canvas, and gravely mounting the narrow seat in front, with his feet upon the shafts, urged the little donkey forward. The equipage moved slowly on, at that decorous pace which was habitual with "Jenny" even under less solemn circumstances. The men—half curiously, half jestingly, but all good-humoredly—strolled along beside the cart, some in advance, some a little in the rear of the homely catafalque. But, whether from the narrowing of the road or some present sense of decorum, as the cart passed on, the company fell to the rear in couples, keeping step, and otherwise assuming the external show of a formal procession. Jack Folinsbee, who had at the outset played a funeral march in dumb show upon an imaginary trombone, desisted, from a lack of sympathy and appreciation,—not having, perhaps, your true humorist's capacity to be content with the enjoyment of his own fun.

The way led through Grizzly Cañon,—by this time clothed in funereal drapery and shadows. The redwoods, burying their moccasined feet in the red soil, stood in Indian file along the track, trailing an uncouth benediction from their bending boughs upon the passing bier. A hare, surprised into helpless inactivity, sat upright and pulsating in the ferns by the roadside, as the cortège went by. Squirrels hastened to gain a secure outlook from higher boughs; and the blue jays, spreading their wings, fluttered before them like outriders, until the outskirts of Sandy Bar were reached, and the solitary cabin of Tennessee's Partner.

Viewed under more favorable circumstances, it would not have been a cheerful place. The unpicturesque site, the rude and unlovely outlines, the unsavory details, which distinguish the nest-building of the California miner, were all here, with the dreariness of decay superadded. A few paces from the cabin there was a rough inclosure, which, in the brief days of Tennessee's Partner's matrimonial felicity, had been used as a garden, but was now overgrown with fern. As we approached it we were surprised to find what we had taken for a recent attempt at cultivation was the broken soil about an open grave.

The cart was halted before the inclosure; and rejecting the offers of assistance with the same air of simple self-reliance he had displayed throughout, Tennessee's Partner lifted the rough coffin on his back, and deposited it, unaided, within the shallow grave. He then nailed down the board which served as a lid; and mounting the little mound of earth beside it, took off his hat, and slowly mopped his face with his handkerchief. This the crowd felt was a preliminary to speech; and they disposed themselves variously on stumps and boulders, and sat expectant.

"When a man," began Tennessee's Partner, slowly, "has been running free all day, what's the natural thing for him to do? Why, to come home. And if he ain't in a condition to go home, what can his best friend do? Why, bring him home! And here's Tennessee has been running free, and we brings him home from his wandering." He paused, and picked up a fragment of quartz, rubbed it thoughtfully on his sleeve, and went on: "It ain't the first time that I've packed him on my back, as you see'd me now. It ain't the first time that I brought him to this yer cabin when he couldn't help himself; it ain't the first time that I and 'Jinny' have waited for him on yon hill, and picked him up and so fetched him home, when he couldn't speak, and didn't know me. And now that it's the last time, why,"—he paused, and rubbed the quartz gently on his sleeve,—“you see it's sort of rough on his pardner. And now, gentlemen,” he added, abruptly, picking up his long-handled shovel, “the fun's over; and my thanks, and Tennessee's 20 thanks, to you for your trouble.”

Resisting any proffers of assistance, he began to fill in the grave, turning his back upon the crowd, that after a few moments' hesitation gradually withdrew. As they crossed the little ridge that hid Sandy Bar from view, some, looking back, thought they could see Tennessee's Partner, his work done, sitting upon the grave, his shovel between his knees, and his face buried in his red bandanna handkerchief. But it was argued by others that you couldn't tell his face from his handkerchief at that distance; and this point remained undecided.

In the reaction that followed the feverish excitement of that day, Tennessee's Partner was not forgotten. A 40 secret investigation had cleared him of any complicity in Tennessee's guilt, and left only a suspicion of his general sanity. Sandy Bar made a point of calling on him and proffering various uncouth but well-meant kindnesses. But from that day his rude health and great strength seemed visibly to decline; and when the rainy season fairly set in, and the tiny grass-blades were 50 beginning to peep from the rocky mound above Tennessee's grave, he took to his bed.

One night, when the pines beside the cabin were swaying in the storm, and trailing their slender fingers over the roof, and the roar and rush of the swollen river were heard below, Tennessee's Partner lifted his head from the pillow, saying, “It is time to go for Tennessee; I must put ‘Jinny’ in the cart”; and would have risen from his bed but for the restraint of his 10 attendant. Struggling, he still pursued his singular fancy: “There, now, steady, ‘Jinny’,—steady, old girl. How dark it is! Look out for the ruts,—and look out for him, too, old gal. Sometimes, you know, when he's blind drunk, he drops down right in the trail. Keep on straight up to the pine on the top of the hill. Thar—I told you so!—thar he is,—and coming this way, 20 too,—all by himself, sober, and his face a-shining. Tennessee! Pardner!”

And so they met.

MY DEAR SIR: I am happy to assure you that your anxiety is without reason. Flemming will be confined to the sofa for three or four weeks, and will have to be careful at first how he uses his leg. A fracture of this kind is always a tedious affair. Fortunately the bone was very skillfully set by the surgeon who chanced to be in the drug-store where Flemming was brought after his fall, and I apprehend no permanent inconvenience from the accident. Flemming is doing perfectly well physically; but I must confess that the irritable and morbid state of mind into which he has fallen causes me a great deal of uneasiness. He is the last man in the world who ought to break his leg. You know how impetuous our friend is ordinarily, what a soul of restlessness and energy, never content unless he is rushing at some object, like a sportive bull at a red shawl; but amiable withal. He is no longer amiable. His temper has become something frightful. Miss Fanny Flemming came up from Newport, where the family are staying for the summer, to nurse him; but he packed her off the next morning in tears. He has a complete set of Balzac's works, twenty-seven volumes, piled up near his sofa, one of which he threatens to throw at Watkins whenever that exemplary serving-man appears with his meals. Yesterday I very innocently brought Flemming a small basket of lemons. You know it was a strip of lemon-peel on the curbstone that caused our friend's mischance. Well, he no sooner set his eyes upon those lemons than he fell into such a rage as I cannot adequately describe. This is only one of his moods, and the least distressing. At other times he sits with bowed head regarding his splintered limb, silent, sullen, despairing. When this fit is on him—and it sometimes lasts all day—nothing can distract his melancholy. He refuses to eat, does not read the newspapers; books, except as projectiles for Watkins, have no charms for him. His state is truly pitiable.

Now, if he were a poor man, with a family depending on his daily labor, this irritability and despondency would be natural enough. But in a young fellow of twenty-four, with plenty of money and seemingly not a care in the world, the thing is monstrous. If he continues to give way to his vagaries in this manner, he will end by bringing on an inflammation of the fibula. It was the fibula he broke. I am at my wits' end to know what to prescribe for him. I have anæsthetics and lotions, to make people sleep and to soothe pain; but I've no medicine that will make a man have a little common sense. That is beyond my skill, but maybe it is not beyond yours. You are Flemming's intimate friend, his fidus Achates. Write to him, write to him frequently, distract his mind, cheer him up, and prevent him from becoming a confirmed case of melancholia. Perhaps he has some important plans disarranged by his present confinement. If he has you will know, and will know how to advise him judiciously. I trust your father finds the change beneficial? I am, my dear sir, with great respect, etc.

II

EDWARD DELANEY TO JOHN FLEMMING,
WEST 38TH STREET, NEW YORK
August 9, 1872

MY DEAR JACK: I had a line from Dillon this morning, and was rejoiced to learn that your hurt is not so bad as reported. Like a certain personage, you are not so black and blue as you are painted. Dillon will put you on your pins again in two or three weeks, if you will only have patience and follow his counsels. Did you get my note of last Wednesday? I was greatly troubled when I heard of the accident.

I can imagine how tranquil and saintly you are with your leg in a trough! It is deuced awkward, to be sure, just as we had promised ourselves a glorious month together at the seaside; but we must make the best of it. It is unfortunate, too, that my father's health renders it impossible for me to leave him. I think he has much improved; the sea air is his native element; but he still needs my arm to lean upon in his walks, and requires some one more careful than a servant to look after him. I cannot come to you, dear Jack, but I have hours of unemployed time on hand, and I will write you a whole post-office full of letters, if that will divert you. Heaven knows, I haven't anything to write about. It isn't as if we were living at one of the beach houses; then I could do you some character studies, and fill your imagination with groups of sea-goddesses, with their (or somebody else's) raven and blond manes hanging down their shoulders. You should have Aphrodite in morning wrapper, in evening costume, and in her prettiest bathing suit. But we are far from all that here. We have rooms in a farmhouse, on a cross-road, two miles from the hotels, and lead the quietest of lives.

I wish I were a novelist. This old house, with its sanded floors and high wainscots, and its narrow windows ¹⁰ looking out upon a cluster of pines that turn themselves into æolian harps every time the wind blows, would be the place in which to write a summer romance. It should be a story with the odors of the forest and the beat of the sea in it. It should be a novel like one of that Russian fellow's—what's his name?—Tourguenieff, Turguenef, Turgenif, Toorguniff, Turgen- ²⁰ jew—nobody knows how to spell him. Yet I wonder if even a Liza or an Alexandra Paulovna could stir the heart of a man who has constant twinges in his leg. I wonder if one of our own Yankee girls of the best type, haughty and spirituelle, would be of any comfort to you in your present deplorable condition. If I thought so, I would hasten down to the Surf House ³⁰ and catch one for you; or, better still, I would find you one over the way.

Picture to yourself a large white house just across the road, nearly opposite our cottage. It is not a house, but a mansion, built, perhaps in the colonial period, with rambling extensions, and gambrel roof, and a wide piazza on three sides—a self-possessed, high-bred piece of architecture, with ⁴⁰ its nose in the air. It stands back from the road, and has an obsequious retinue of fringed elms and oaks and weeping willows. Sometimes in the morning, and oftener in the afternoon, when the sun has withdrawn from that part of the mansion, a young woman appears on the piazza with some mysterious Penelope web of embroidery in her hand, or a book. There is a ham- ⁵⁰ mock over there—of pineapple fibre, it looks from here. A hammock is very becoming when one is eighteen, and has golden hair, and dark eyes, and an emerald-colored illusion dress looped up after the fashion of a Dresden china shepherdess, and is *chaussée*¹ like a belle of the time of Louis Quatorze. All this splendor goes into that hammock, and sways there like a pond-lily in the golden afternoon. The window of my bedroom looks down on that piazza—and so do I.

But enough of this nonsense, which ill becomes a sedate young attorney taking his vacation with an invalid father. Drop me a line, dear Jack, and tell me how you really are. State your case. Write me a long quiet letter. If you are violent or abusive, I'll take the law to you.

III

JOHN FLEMMING TO EDWARD DELANEY
August 11, 1872

Your letter, dear Ned, was a god-send. Fancy what a fix I am in—I, who never had a day's sickness since I was born. My left leg weighs three tons. It is embalmed in spices and smothered in layers of fine linen, like a mummy. I can't move. I haven't moved for five thousand years. I'm of the time of Pharaoh.

I lie from morning till night on a lounge, staring into the hot street. Everybody is out of town enjoying himself. The brown-stone-front houses across the street resemble a row of particularly ugly coffins set up on end. A green mould is settling on the names of the deceased, carved on the silver door-plates. Sardonic spiders have sewed up the key-holes. All is silence and dust and desolation.—I interrupt this a moment, to take a shy at Watkins with the second volume of César Birotteau. Missed him! I think I could bring him down with a copy of Sainte-Beuve or the Dictionnaire Universel, if I had it. These small Balzac books somehow do not quite fit my hand; but I shall fetch him yet. I've an idea that Watkins is tapping the old gentleman's Chateau Yquem. Duplicate key of the wine-cellar. Hibernian swarries¹ in the front basement. Young Cheops up-stairs, snug in his cerements. Watkins glides into my chamber, with that colorless, hypocritical face of his drawn out long like an accordion; but I know he grins all the way down-stairs, and is glad I have broken my leg. Was not my evil star in the very zenith when I ran up to town to attend that dinner at Delmonico's? I didn't come up altogether for that. It was partly to buy Frank Livingstone's roan mare Margot. And now I shall not be able to sit in the saddle these two months. I'll send the mare down to you at The Pines—is that the name of the place?

Old Dillon fancies that I have something on my mind. He drives me wild with lemons. Lemons for a mind diseased! Nonsense. I am only as restless as the devil under this confinement—a thing I'm not used to. Take a man who has never had so much as a headache or a toothache in his life, strap one of his legs in a section of water-spout, keep him in a room in the city for weeks, with the hot weather turned on, and then expect him to smile and purr and be happy! It is preposterous. I can't be cheerful or calm.

Your letter is the first consoling thing I have had since my disaster, ten days ago. It really cheered me up for half an hour. Send me a screed, Ned, as often as you can, if you love me. Anything will do. Write me more about that little girl in the hammock. That was very pretty, all that about the Dresden china shepherdess and the pond-lily; the imagery a little mixed, perhaps, but very pretty. I didn't suppose you had so much sentimental furniture in your upper story. It shows how one may be familiar for years with the reception-room of his neighbor, and never suspect what is directly under his mansard. I supposed your loft stuffed with dry legal parchments, mortgages, and affidavits; you take down a package of manuscript, and lo! there are lyrics and sonnets and canzonettas. You really have a graphic descriptive touch, Edward Delaney, and I suspect you of anonymous love-tales in the magazines.

I shall be a bear until I hear from you again. Tell me all about your pretty inconnue across the road. What is her name? Who is she? Who's her father? Where's her mother? Who's her lover? You cannot imagine how this will occupy me. The more trifling, the better. My imprisonment has weakened me intellectually to such a degree that I find your epistolary gifts quite considerable. I am passing into my second childhood. In a week or two I shall take to India-rubber rings and prongs of coral. A silver cup, with an appropriate inscription, would be a delicate attention on your part. In the meantime, write!

EDWARD DELANEY TO JOHN FLEMMING

August 12, 1872

The sick pasha shall be amused. Bismillah! he wills it so. If the storyteller becomes prolix and tedious—the bow-string and the sack, and two Nubians to drop him into the Piscataqua! But truly, Jack, I have a hard task. There is literally nothing here—except the little girl over the way. She is swinging in the hammock at this moment. It is to me compensation for many of the ills of life to see her now and then put out a small kid boot, which fits like a glove, and set herself going. Who is she, and what is her name? Her name is Daw. Only daughter of Mr. Richard W. Daw, ex-colonel and banker. Mother dead. One brother at Harvard, elder brother killed at the battle of Fair Oaks, ten years ago. Old, rich family, the Daws. This is the homestead, where father and daughter pass eight months of the twelve; the rest of the year in Baltimore and Washington. The New England winter too many for the old gentleman. The daughter is called Marjorie—Marjorie Daw. Sounds odd at first, doesn't it? But after you say it over to yourself half a dozen times, you like it. There's a pleasing quaintness to it, something prim and pansy-like. Must be a nice sort of girl to be called Marjorie Daw.

I had mine host of The Pines in the witness-box last night, and drew the foregoing testimony from him. He has charge of Mr. Daw's vegetable-garden, and has known the family these thirty years. Of course I shall make the acquaintance of my neighbors before many days. It will be next to impossible for me not to meet Mr. Daw or Miss Daw in some of my walks. The young lady has a favorite path to the sea-beach. I shall intercept her some morning, and touch my hat to her. Then the princess will bend her fair head to me with courteous surprise not unmixed with haughtiness. Will snub me, in fact. All this for thy sake, O Pasha of the Snapt Axle-tree!—How oddly things fall out! Ten minutes ago I was called down to the parlor—you know the kind of parlors in farm-houses on the coast, a sort of amphibious parlor, with sea-shells on the mantel-piece and spruce branches in the chimney-place—where I found my father and Mr. Daw doing the antique polite to each other. He had come to pay his respects to his new neighbors. Mr. Daw is a tall, slim gentleman of about fifty-five, with a florid face and snow-white mustache and side-whiskers. Looks like Mr. Dombey, or as Mr. Dombey would have looked if he had served a few years in the British Army. Mr. Daw was a colonel in the late war, commanding the regiment in which his son was a lieutenant. Plucky old boy, backbone of New Hampshire granite. Before taking his leave, the Colonel delivered himself of an invitation as if he were issuing a general order. Miss Daw has a few friends coming, at 4 P.M., to play croquet on the lawn (parade-ground) and have tea (cold rations) on the piazza. Will we honor them with our company? (or be sent to the guard-house.) My father declines on the plea of ill-health. My father's son bows with as much suavity as he knows, and accepts.

In my next I shall have something to tell you. I shall have seen the little beauty face to face. I have a presentiment, Jack, that this Daw is a rara avis!¹ Keep up your spirits, my boy, until I write you another letter—and send me along word how's your leg.

v

EDWARD DELANEY TO JOHN FLEMMING
August 13, 1872

The party, my dear Jack, was as dreary as possible. A lieutenant of the navy, the rector of the Episcopal church at Stillwater, and a society swell from Nahant. The lieutenant looked as if he had swallowed a couple of his buttons, and found the bullion rather indigestible; the rector was a pensive youth, of the daffydowndilly sort; and the swell from Nahant was a very weak tidal wave indeed. The women were much better, as they always are; the two Miss Kingsburys of Philadelphia, staying at the Sea-Shell House, two bright and engaging girls. But Marjorie Daw!

The company broke up soon after tea, and I remained to smoke a cigar with the colonel on the piazza. It was like seeing a picture, to see Miss Marjorie hovering around the old soldier, and doing a hundred gracious little things for him. She brought the cigars and lighted the tapers with her own delicate fingers, in the most enchanting fashion. As we sat there, she came and went in the summer twilight, and seemed, with her white dress and pale gold hair, like some lovely phantom that had sprung into existence out of the smoke-wreaths. If she had melted into air, like the statue of Galatea in the play, I should have been more sorry than surprised.

It was easy to perceive that the old colonel worshipped her, and she him. I think the relation between an elderly father and a daughter just blooming into womanhood the most beautiful possible. There is in it a subtle sentiment that cannot exist in the case of mother and daughter, or that of son and mother. But this is getting into deep water.

I sat with the Daws until half past ten, and saw the moon rise over the sea. The ocean, that had stretched motionless and black against the horizon, was changed by magic into a broken field of glittering ice, interspersed with marvellous silvery fjords. In the far distance the Isles of Shoals loomed up like a group of huge bergs drifting down on us. The Polar Regions in a June thaw! It was exceedingly fine. What did we talk about? We talked about the weather—and you! The weather has been disagreeable for several days past—and so have you. I glided from one topic to the other very naturally. I told my friends of your accident; how it had frustrated all our summer plans, and what our plans were. I played quite a spirited solo on the fibula. Then I described you; or, rather, I didn't. I spoke of your amiability, of your patience under this severe affliction; of your touching gratitude when Dillon brings you little presents of fruit; of your tenderness to your sister Fanny, whom you would not allow to stay in town to nurse you, and how heroically you sent her back to Newport, preferring to remain alone with Mary, the cook, and your man, Watkins, to whom, by the way, you were devotedly attached. If you had been there Jack, you wouldn't have known yourself. I should have excelled as a criminal lawyer, if I had not turned my attention to a different branch of jurisprudence.

Miss Marjorie asked all manner of leading questions concerning you. It did not occur to me then, but it struck me forcibly afterwards, that she evinced a singular interest in the conversation. When I got back to my room, I recalled how eagerly she leaned forward, with her full, snowy throat in strong moonlight, listening to what I said. Positively, I think I made her like you!

Miss Daw is a girl whom you would like immensely, I can tell you that. A beauty without affectation, a high and tender nature—if one can read the soul in the face. And the old colonel is a noble character, too.

I am glad that the Daws are such pleasant persons. The Pines is an isolated spot, and my resources are few. I fear I should have found life here somewhat monotonous before long, with no other society than that of my excellent sire. It is true, I might have made a target of the defenceless invalid; but I haven't a taste for artillery, moi.

VI

JOHN FLEMMING TO EDWARD DELANEY
August 17, 1872

For a man who hasn't a taste for artillery, it occurs to me, my friend, you are keeping up a pretty lively fire on my inner works. But go on. Cynicism is a small brass field-piece that eventually bursts and kills the artilleryman.

You may abuse me as much as you like, and I'll not complain; for I don't know what I should do without your letters. They are curing me. I haven't hurled anything at Watkins since last Sunday, partly because I have grown more amiable under your teaching, and partly because Watkins captured my ammunition one night, and carried it off to the library. He is rapidly losing the habit he had acquired of dodging whenever I rub my ear, or make any slight motion with my right arm. He is still suggestive of the wine-cellar, however. You may break, you may shatter Watkins, if you will, but the scent of the Roederer will hang round him still.

Ned, that Miss Daw must be a charming person. I should certainly like her. I like her already. When you spoke in your first letter of seeing a young girl swinging in a hammock under your chamber window, I was somehow strangely drawn to her. I cannot account for it in the least.

What you have subsequently written of Miss Daw has strengthened the impression. You seem to be describing a woman I have known in some previous state of existence, or dreamed of in this. Upon my word, if you were to send me her photograph, I believe I should recognize her at a glance. Her manner, that listening attitude, her traits of character, as you indicate them, the light hair and the dark eyes—they are all familiar things to me. Asked a lot of questions, did she? Curious about me? That is strange.

You would laugh in your sleeve, you wretched old cynic, if you knew how I lie awake nights, with my gas turned down to a star, thinking of the Pines and the house across the road.* How cool it must be down there! I long for the salt smell in the air. I picture the colonel smoking his cheroot on the piazza. I send you and Miss Daw off on afternoon rambles along the beach. Sometimes I let you stroll with her under the elms in the moonlight, for you are great friends by this time, I take it, and see each other every day. I know your ways and your manners! Then I fall into a truculent mood, and would like to destroy somebody. Have you noticed anything in the shape of a lover hanging around the colonial Lares and Penates? Does that lieutenant of the horse-marines or that young Still-water parson visit the house much? Not that I am pining for news of them, but any gossip of the kind would be in order. I wonder, Ned, you don't fall in love with Miss Daw. I am ripe to do it myself. Speaking of photographs, couldn't you manage to slip one of her *cartes-de-visite*¹ from her album—she must have an album, you know—and send it to me? I will return it before it could be missed. That's a good fellow! Did the mare arrive safe and sound? It will be a capital animal this autumn for Central Park.

Oh—my leg? I forgot about my leg. It's better.

* calling cards

VII

EDWARD DELANEY TO JOHN FLEMMING
August 20, 1872

You are correct in your surmises. I am on the most friendly terms with our neighbors. The colonel and my father smoke their afternoon cigar together in our sitting-room or on the piazza opposite, and I pass an hour or two of the day or the evening with the daughter. I am more and more struck by the beauty, modesty, and intelligence of Miss Daw.

You ask me why I do not fall in love with her. I will be frank, Jack: I have thought of that. She is young, rich, accomplished, uniting in herself more attractions, mental and personal, than I can recall in any girl of my acquaintance; but she lacks the something that would be necessary to inspire in me that kind of interest. Possessing this unnamed quantity, a woman neither beautiful nor wealthy nor very young could bring me to her feet. But not Miss Daw. If we were shipwrecked together on an uninhabited island—let me suggest a tropical island, for it costs no more to be picturesque—I would build her a bamboo hut, I would fetch her bread-fruit and coconuts, I would fry yams for her, I would lure the ingenuous turtle and make her nourishing soups, but I wouldn't make love to her—not under eighteen months. I would like to have her for a sister, that I might shield her and counsel her, and spend half my income on old thread-lace and camel's-hair shawls. (We are off the island now.) If such were not my feeling, there would still be an obstacle to my loving Miss Daw. A greater misfortune could scarcely befall me than to love her. Flemming, I am about to make a revelation that will astonish you. I may be all wrong in my premises and consequently in my conclusions; but you shall judge.

That night when I returned to my room after the croquet party at the Daws', and was thinking over the trivial events of the evening, I was suddenly impressed by the air of eager attention with which Miss Daw had followed my account of your accident. I think I mentioned this to you. Well, the next morning, as I went to mail my letter, I overtook Miss Daw on the road to Rye, where the post-office is, and accompanied her thither and back, an hour's walk. The conversation again turned to you, and again I remarked that inexplicable look of interest which had lighted up her face the previous evening. Since then, I have seen Miss Daw perhaps ten times, perhaps oftener, and on each occasion I found that when I was not speaking of you, or your sister, or some person or place associated with you, I was not holding her attention. She would be absent-minded, her eyes would wander away from me to the sea, or to some distant object in the landscape; her fingers would play with the leaves of a book in a way that convinced me she was not listening. At these moments if I abruptly changed the theme—and dropped some remark about my friend Flemming, then the sombre blue eyes would come back to me instantly.

Now, is not this the oddest thing in the world? No, not the oddest. The effect which you tell me was produced on you by my casual mention of an unknown girl swinging in a hammock is certainly as strange. You can conjecture how that passage in your letter of Friday startled me. Is it possible, then, that two persons who have never met, and who are hundreds of miles apart, can exert a magnetic influence on each other? I have read of such psychological phenomena, but never credited them. I leave the solution of the problem to you. As for myself, all other things being favorable, it would be impossible for me to fall in love with a woman who listens to me only when I am talking of my friend!

I am not aware that any one is paying marked attention to my fair neighbor. The lieutenant of the navy—he is stationed at Rivermouth—sometimes drops in of an evening, and sometimes the rector from Stillwater; the lieutenant the oftener. He was there last night. I should not be surprised if he had an eye to the heiress; but he is not formidable. Mistress Daw carries a neat little spear of irony, and the honest lieutenant seems to have a particular facility for impaling himself on the point of it. He is not dangerous, I should say; though I have known a woman to satirize a man for years, and marry him after all. Decidedly, the lowly rector is not dangerous; yet, again, who has not seen Cloth of Frieze victorious in the lists where Cloth of Gold went down?

As to the photograph. There is an exquisite ivorytype of Marjorie, in passe-partout, on the drawing-room mantel-piece. It would be missed at once if taken. I would do anything reasonable for you, Jack; but I've no burning desire to be hauled up before the local justice of the peace, on a charge of petty larceny.

P.S.—Enclosed is a spray of mignonette, which I advise you to treat tenderly. Yes, we talked of you again last night, as usual. It is becoming a little dreary for me.

VIII

EDWARD DELANEY TO JOHN FLEMMING

August 22, 1872

Your letter in reply to my last has occupied my thoughts all the morning. I do not know what to think. Do you mean to say that you are seriously half in love with a woman whom you have never seen—with a shadow, a chimera? for what else can Miss Daw be to you? I do not understand it at all. I understand neither you nor her. You are a couple of ethereal beings moving in finer air than I can breathe with my commonplace lungs. Such delicacy of sentiment is something that I admire without comprehending. I am bewildered. I am of the earthy, and I find myself in the incongruous position of having to do with mere souls, with natures so finely tempered that I run some risk of shattering them in my awkwardness. I am as Caliban among the spirits!

Reflecting on your letter, I am not sure that it is wise in me to continue this correspondence. But no, Jack; I do wrong to doubt the good sense that forms the basis of your character. You are deeply interested in Miss Daw; you feel that she is a person whom you may perhaps greatly admire when you know her: at the same time you bear in mind that the chances are ten to five that, when you do come to know her, she will fall short of your ideal, and you will not care for her in the least. Look at it in this sensible light, and I will hold back nothing from you.

Yesterday afternoon my father and myself rode over to Rivermouth with the Daws. A heavy rain in the morning had cooled the atmosphere and laid the dust. To Rivermouth is a drive of eight miles, along a winding road lined all the way with wild barberry-bushes. I never saw anything more brilliant than these bushes, the green of the foliage and the faint blush of the berries intensified by the rain. The colonel drove, with my father in front, Miss Daw and I on the back seat. I resolved that for the first five miles your name should not pass my lips. I was amused by the artful attempts she made, at the start, to break through my reticence. Then a silence fell upon her; and then she became suddenly gay. That keenness which I enjoyed so much when it was exercised on the lieutenant was not so satisfactory directed against myself. Miss Daw has great sweetness of disposition, but she can be disagreeable. She is like the young lady in the rhyme, with the curl on her forehead—

When she is good,
She is very, very good,
And when she is bad, she is horrid!

I kept to my resolution, however; but on the return home I relented, and talked of your mare! Miss Daw is going to try a side-saddle on Margot some morning. The animal is a trifle too light for my weight. By the bye,

I nearly forgot to say that Miss Daw sat for a picture yesterday to a Rivermouth artist. If the negative turns out well, I am to have a copy. So our ends will be accomplished without crime. I wish, though, I could send you the ivorytype in the drawing-room; it is cleverly colored, and would give you an idea of her hair and eyes, which of course the other will not.

No, Jack, the spray of mignonette did not come from me. A man of twenty-eight doesn't enclose flowers in his letters—to another man. But don't attach too much significance to the circumstance. She gives sprays of mignonette to the rector, sprays to the lieutenant. She has even given a rose from her bosom to your slave. It is her jocund nature to scatter flowers, like Spring.

If my letters sometimes read disjointedly, you must understand that I never finish at a sitting, but write at intervals, when the mood is on me.

The mood is not on me now.

IX

EDWARD DELANEY TO JOHN FLEMMING

August 23, 1872

I have just returned from the strangest interview with Marjorie. She has all but confessed to me her interest in you. But with what modesty and dignity! Her words elude my pen as I attempt to put them on paper; and, indeed, it was not so much what she said as her manner; and that I cannot reproduce. Perhaps it was of a piece with the strangeness of this whole business, that she should tacitly acknowledge to a third party the love she feels for a man she has never beheld! But I have lost, through your aid, the faculty of being surprised. I accept things as persons do in dreams. Now that I am again in my room, it all appears like an illusion—the black masses of Rembrandtish shadow under the trees, the fireflies whirling in Pyrrhic dances among the shrubbery, the sea over there, Marjorie sitting in the hammock!

It is past midnight, and I am too sleepy to write more.

Thursday Morning.

My father has suddenly taken it into his head to spend a few days at the Shoals. In the meanwhile you will not hear from me. I see Marjorie walking in the garden with the colonel. I wish I could speak to her alone, but shall probably not have an opportunity before we leave.

X

EDWARD DELANEY TO JOHN FLEMMING
August 28, 1872

You were passing into your second childhood, were you? Your intellect was so reduced that my epistolary gifts seemed quite considerable to you, did they? I rise superior to the sarcasm in your favor of the 11th instant, when I notice that five days' silence on my part is sufficient to throw you into the depths of despondency.

We returned only this morning from Appledore,¹ that enchanted island—at four dollars per day. I find on my desk three letters from you! Evidently there is no lingering doubt in your mind as to the pleasure I derive from your correspondence. These letters are undated, but in what I take to be the latest are two passages that require my consideration. You will pardon my candor, dear Flemming, but the conviction forces itself upon me that as your leg grows stronger your head becomes weaker. You ask my advice on a certain point. I will give it. In my opinion you could do nothing more unwise than to address a note to Miss Daw, thanking her for the flower. It would, I am sure, offend her delicacy beyond pardon. She knows you only through me; you are to her an abstraction, a figure in a dream—a dream from which the faintest shock would awaken her. Of course, if you enclose a note to me and insist on its delivery, I shall deliver it; but I advise you not to do so.

¹ among the Isles of Shoals

You say you are able, with the aid of a cane, to walk about your chamber, and that you purpose to come to The Pines the instant Dillon thinks you strong enough to stand the journey. Again I advise you not to. Do you not see that, every hour you remain away, Marjorie's glamour deepens, and your influence over her increases? You will ruin everything by precipitancy. Wait until you are entirely recovered; in any case, do not come without giving me warning. I fear the effect of your abrupt advent here—under the circumstances.

Miss Daw was evidently glad to see us back again, and gave me both hands in the frankest way. She stopped at the door a moment this afternoon in the carriage; she had been over to Rivermouth for her pictures. Unluckily the photographer had spilt some acid on the plate, and she was obliged to give him another sitting. I have an intuition that something is troubling Marjorie. She had an abstracted air not usual with her. However, it may be only my fancy—I end this, leaving several things unsaid, to accompany my father on one of those long walks which are now his chief medicine—and mine.

XI

EDWARD DELANEY TO JOHN FLEMMING
August 29, 1872

I write in great haste to tell you what has taken place here since my letter of last night. I am in the utmost perplexity. Only one thing is plain,—you must not dream of coming to The Pines. Marjorie has told her father everything! I saw her for a few moments, an hour ago, in the garden; and, as near as I could gather from her confused statement, the facts are these: Lieutenant Bradley—that's the naval officer stationed at Rivermouth—has been paying court to Miss Daw for some time past, but not so much to her liking as to that of the colonel, who it seems is an old friend of the young gentleman's father. Yesterday (I knew she was in some trouble when she drove up to our gate) the colonel spoke to Marjorie of Bradley—urged his suit, I infer. Marjorie expressed her dislike for the lieutenant with characteristic frankness, and finally confessed to her father—well, I really do not know what she confessed. It must have been the vaguest of confessions, and must have sufficiently puzzled the colonel. At any rate, it exasperated him. I suppose I am implicated in the matter and that the colonel feels bitterly towards me. I do not see why: I have carried no messages between you and Miss Daw; I have behaved with the greatest discretion. I can find no flaw anywhere in my proceeding. I do not see that anybody has done anything—except the colonel himself.

It is probable, nevertheless, that the friendly relations between the two houses will be broken off. "A plague o' both your houses," say you. I will keep you informed, as well as I can, of what occurs over the way. We shall remain here until the second week in September. Stay where you are, or, at all events, do not dream of joining me—Colonel Daw is sitting on the piazza looking rather wicked. I have not seen Marjorie since I parted with her in the garden.

EDWARD DELANEY TO THOMAS DILLON,
M.D., MADISON SQUARE, NEW YORK
August 30, 1872

MY DEAR DOCTOR: If you have any influence over Flemming, I beg of you to exert it to prevent his coming to this place at present. There are circumstances, which I will explain to you before long, that make it of the first importance that he should not come into this neighborhood. His appearance here, I speak advisedly, would be disastrous to him. In urging him to remain in New York, or to go to some inland resort, you will be doing him and me a real service. Of course you will not mention my name in this connection. You know me well enough, my dear doctor, to be assured that, in begging your secret coöperation, I have reasons that will meet your entire approval when they are made plain to you. We shall return to town on the 15th of next month, and my first duty will be to present myself at your hospitable door and satisfy your curiosity, if I have excited it. My father, I am glad to state, has so greatly improved that he can no longer be regarded as an invalid. With great esteem, I am, etc., etc.

EDWARD DELANEY TO JOHN FLEMMING
August 31, 1872

Your letter, announcing your mad determination to come here, has just reached me. I beseech you to reflect a moment. The step would be fatal to your interests and hers. You would furnish just cause for irritation to R. W. D.; and, though he loves Marjorie devotedly, he is capable of going to any lengths if opposed. You would not like, I am convinced, to be the means of causing him to treat her with severity. That would be the result of your presence at The Pines at this juncture. I am annoyed to be obliged to point out these things to you. We are on very delicate ground, Jack; the situation is critical, and the slightest mistake in a move would cost us the game. If you consider it worth the winning, be patient. Trust a little to my sagacity. Wait and see what happens. Moreover, I understand from Dillon that you are in no condition to take so long a journey. He thinks the air of the coast would be the worst thing possible for you; that you ought to go inland, if anywhere. Be advised by me. Be advised by Dillon.

1—To Edward Delaney

Letter received. Dillon be hanged. I think I ought to be on the ground.
J. F.

2—To John Flemming

Stay where you are. You would only complicate matters. Do not move until you hear from me.

E. D.

3—To Edward Delaney

My being at The Pines could be kept secret. I must see her.

J. F.

4—To John Flemming

Do not think of it. It would be useless. R. W. D. has locked M. in her room. You would not be able to effect an interview.

E. D.

5—To Edward Delaney

Locked her in her room. Good God! That settles the question. I shall leave by the twelve-fifteen express.

THE ARRIVAL

On the second day of September, 1872, as the down express, due at 3.40, left the station at Hampton, a young man, leaning on the shoulder of a servant, whom he addressed as Watkins, stepped from the platform into a hack, and requested to be driven to "The Pines." On arriving at the gate of a modest farmhouse, a few miles from the station, the young man descended with difficulty from the carriage, and, casting a hasty glance across the road, seemed much impressed by some peculiarity in the landscape. Again leaning on the shoulder of the person Watkins, he walked to the door of the farmhouse and inquired for Mr. Edward Delaney. He was informed by the aged man who answered his knock, that Mr. Edward Delaney had gone to Boston the day before, but that Mr. Jonas Delaney was within. This information did not appear satisfactory to the stranger, who inquired if Mr. Edward Delaney had left any message for Mr. John Flemming. There was a letter for Mr. John Flemming, if he were that person. After a brief absence the aged man reappeared with a Letter.

EDWARD DELANEY TO JOHN FLEMMING

September 1, 1872

I am horror-stricken at what I have done! When I began this correspondence I had no other purpose than to relieve the tedium of your sick-chamber. Dillon told me to cheer you up. I tried to. I thought that you entered into the spirit of the thing. I had no idea, until within a few days, that you were taking matters au grand sérieux.

What can I say? I am in sackcloth and ashes. I am a pariah, a dog of an outcast. I tried to make a little romance to interest you, something soothing and idyllic, and, by Jove! I have done it only too well! My father does not know a word of this, so don't jar the old gentleman any more than you can help. I fly from the wrath to come—when you arrive! For oh, dear Jack, there isn't any colonial mansion on the other side of the road, there isn't any piazza, there isn't any hammock—there isn't any Marjorie Daw!

FRANCIS MARION CRAWFORD
(1854-1909)From THE NOVEL: WHAT IT IS¹

There is much talk in our day of the realistic school of fiction, and the romantic school, though not often mentioned, is understood to be opposed to it. Of course, it is easy to enter into a long discussion about the exact meanings of the two words; but, on the whole, it seems to be true that if the people who talk about schools of fiction mean anything or wish to mean anything, which sometimes seems doubtful, they mean this: the realist proposes to show men what they are; the romanticist tries to show men what they should be. It is very unlikely that mankind will ever agree as to the relative merits of these two, and the discussion which was practically begun in Plato's time is not likely to end so long as people care what they read or what they think. The most any one can do is to give a personal opinion, and that means, of course, that he who expresses it commits himself and publicly takes either the one side or the other. For my part, I believe that more good can be done by showing men what they may be, ought to be, or can be, than by describing their greatest weaknesses with the highest art. We all know how bad we are; but it needs much encouragement to persuade some of us to believe that we can really be any better. To create genuine interest, and afford rest and legitimate amusement, without losing sight of that fact, and to do so in a more or less traditional way, seems to be the profession of the novelist who belongs to the romantic persuasion.

That novel-writing is a business I am credibly informed by my publishers. And since that is the case, it must be taken for granted that it is a business which to some extent must be practised like any other and which will succeed or fail in the hands of any particular man according as he is more or less fitted to carry it on. The qualifications for any business are three: native talent, education, and industry. Where there is success of the right kind, the talent and power of application must be taken for granted. The education is and always must be a question of circumstance. With regard to novel-writing, when I speak of education I am not referring to it in the ordinary sense. Some people take a great deal of interest in concrete things, while others care more for humanity. The education of a novelist is the experience of men and women which he has got at first hand in the course of his own life, for he is of that class to whom humanity offers a higher interest than inanimate nature. He can use nature and art only as a scene and background upon which and before which his personages move and have their being. It is his business to present his readers with something which I have called the pocket-theater, something which every man may carry in his pocket, believing that he has only to open it in order to look in upon the theater of the living world. To produce it, to prepare it, to put it into a portable and serviceable shape, the writer must know what that living world is, what the men in it do and what the women think, why women shed tears and children laugh and young men make love and old men repeat themselves. While he is writing his book, his human beings must be with him, before him, moving before the eye of his mind and talking into the ear of his heart. He must have lived himself; he must have loved, fought, suffered, and struggled in the human battle. I would almost say that to describe another's death he must himself have died.

All this accounts perhaps for the fact that readers are many and writers few. The reader knows one side of life, his own, better than the writer possibly can, and he reads with the greatest interest those books which treat of lives like his own. But the writer must have seen and known many phases of existence, and this is what the education of the novelist means: to know and understand, so far as he is able, men and women who have been placed in unusual circumstances. And this need not and should not lead him into creating altogether imaginary characters, nor men and women whose circumstances are not only unusual, but altogether impossible. We see grotesque pieces given at the theater—too grotesque—and too often given—which make us laugh, but never make us think. They would not make good novels. The novel must amuse, indeed, but should amuse reasonably, from an intellectual point of view, rather than as a piece of good fun. Its object is to make one see men and women who might really live, talk, and act as they do in the book, and some of whom one would perhaps like to imitate. Its intention is to amuse and please, and certainly not to teach or preach; but in order to amuse well it must be a finely-balanced creation, neither hysterical with tears nor convulsed with perpetual laughter. The one is as tiring as the other and, in the long run, as unnatural.

It is easy, comparatively speaking, to appeal to the emotions, but it is hard to appeal to the heart. This may sound somewhat contradictory at first, but there is truth in it, nevertheless. The outward emotions are in real life much more the expressions of the temperament than of what we call the heart. We all know that there are men and women who laugh and cry more easily than others, and we are rather inclined to believe that these are not they who feel most deeply. A very difficult question here presents itself. Bacon says somewhere that we are apt to extol the powers of the human intellect without invoking its aid as often as we might. This extolling of humanity has been a fashion of late years, and it has not yet disappeared, though its popularity is waning fast. In England Sir Andrew Clarke, M.D., has recently talked learnedly of "the religion of the body," and Lord Coleridge with eloquence of "the religion of the mind." These things are good enough, no doubt, but what of the religion of the heart, which is after all the only religion there is—if the heart is the earthly representative of the soul? There are some people—fewer than is generally supposed—who really do not believe in the existence of the soul. Let me tell them that they are very near to denying the existence of the heart. Perhaps some of them do, and they may live to repent of their unbelief in this world, if not in the next.

What is the heart, or rather, what do we in common conversation and writing understand by that word? It looks a great deal like attempting to define belief, but belief has received an excellent definition, for belief is knowledge and nothing else, so far as the individual who holds it is concerned. What we call the heart in each man and woman seems to mean the whole body of innate and inherited instincts, impulses, and beliefs, taken together, and in that relation to one another in which they stand after they have been acted upon throughout the individual's life by the inward vicissitudes and the outward circumstances to which he has been exposed. When all this is quiescent I think we call it Self. When roused to emotional activity we call it the Heart. But whatever we call it, it is to this Self or Heart that everything which is ethic and therefore permanent must appeal.

The foundation of good fiction and good poetry seems to be ethic rather than æsthetic. Everything in either which appeals to the taste, that is, to the æsthetic side, may ultimately perish as a mere matter of fashion; but that which speaks to man as man, independently of his fashions, his habits, and his tastes, must live and find a hearing with humanity so long as humanity is human. The right understanding of men and women leads to the right relations of men and women, and in this way, if in any, a novel may do good; when written to attain this end, it may live; when addressed to the constant element in human nature, it has as good a right and as good a chance of pleasing the men and women of the world in our day, as it had to appeal to the intellect of Pericles or to thrill the delicate sensibilities of Aspasia. Their novels were plays in outward effect, as ours should be in inward substance, and we must needs confess that the form in which their intellectual artistic luxuries were presented to them was superior to that of the modern effort included in four hundred pages at one dollar and twenty-five cents. Possibly, even probably, it is unfair to us to compare ourselves with Sophocles, Euripides, and Aristophanes; yet the comparison suggests itself if the definition be true and if our novels really aspire to be plays.

We have indeed something in our favor which the genuine playwright has not. We appeal entirely to the imagination, and, unless we use algebraic formulae or scientific discussion, we give no standard measure in our books by which to judge the whole. We can call up surroundings which never were and never can be possible in the world, and if we are able to do it well enough we can put impossible characters upon our stage and make them do impossible things, and the whole, acting upon a predisposed imagination, may create for the moment something almost like belief in the mind of the reader. We can conceive a tale fantastic beyond the bounds of probability, and if there be a touch of nature in it, we may for a while transport our readers into Fairyland. We can clothe all of this in poetic language if our command of the English tongue be equal to the occasion, and we can lend pathos to a monster and heroism to a burlesque man. But the writer of plays for the real theater cannot do this; if he does, he makes that which in theatrical language is called "burlesque" or a "spectacle"; or, if he be a follower of the "decadent school," he may produce what he has decided to call by a new name—a production not always conducive to a high belief in human nature.

The writer of plays, if he write them for actual performance, has living interpreters, and they and he are judged by the standards of real life. He is to a great extent dependent upon his actors for the effect he hopes to produce, and they are dependent not only upon him, upon their individual education, depth of feeling, and power of expression, but also upon the material conditions and surroundings in which they have to do their work. The most dramatic scene of real life, if it actually took place on the stage of a theater, would seem a very dull and tame affair to any one who chanced to find himself in the body of the house. The fundamental lack of interest, until it has been artificially aroused, is a gulf not to be bridged by such simple means as being really "natural." The art of the actor lies in knowing the precise degree of exaggeration necessary to produce the impression that he is not exaggerating at all—but exaggeration there must be. Without it, neither the words nor the actions can speak or appeal to the intelligence of the spectator.

But we novelists are in an easier position in our relation to our audience. We are granted many privileges and have many advantages which the playwright has not; for we can appeal to the heart almost directly without the conscious intervention of practised eyes and ears, used to realities and eager to judge by real standards. We speak of Edwin's great height, broad shoulders, noble features and silken moustache, and are not obliged to look out for an actor who shall fulfil these conditions of manly beauty before we can be heard without being ridiculous. Angelina's heavy hair is a fact on paper; on the stage it is a wig, and must be a good one. Her liquid blue eyes are blue because we say they are; but it would annoy a playwright to find that his leading actress had light gray eyes, when Edwin must compare them to the depths of the blackest night.

All this is rather frivolous, perhaps; but a little frivolity is to the point here, since there can be no amusement without a dash of it, and we profess to provide diversion to meet the public demand. With most men who have moulded, hacked, and chiselled the world into history, to think has been to act. With us novelists, so far as the world need know us, to think is to dream, and perhaps to dream only little dreams of merely passing significance. Few novelists are poets; only one or two have been statesmen; none have been conquerors. I suppose we are very insignificant figures compared with the great ones of this earth; but to our comfort we may dream, and if we need consolation we may console ourselves, as Montaigne puts it, with the art which small souls have to interest great ones, "L'art qu'ont

Frivolity is not weakness, though in excess it may be a weakness. "Carpe diem"¹ is a good motto for the morning, but in the evening "Dulce desipere in loco"² is not to be despised as a piece of advice. The frivolities of great men and famous women have filled volumes of memoirs, and are not without interest to the little, as our little interests do not always seem dull to the great. The greater men are, the more heart they have, good or bad, and the easier it is to affect them through it, through the multiform feelings which their varied lives have created within them, or through the few strong sentiments by which most of them are ruled, guided, or impelled according as they are conscientious, calculating, or impulsive, and to some extent according to their nationality, a matter which has almost as much to do with the author's dream as with the reader's subjective interpretation of it, and which largely determines the balance between sentiment and sentimentality.

Sentiment heightens the value of works of fiction as sentimentality lowers it. Sentimentality is to sentiment as sensuality to passion. The distinction is not a fine one and has grown common enough in our day to be universally understood. We owe it, I think, to the international balance of sentiment and sentimentality that the novelists of the present day are the French, Anglo-Saxons, and Russians. With all due respect to the great German intelligence, it does not seem capable of producing what we call a novel though it turns out most excellent plays. The German mind, measured by our standard, is sentimental, not romantic. Perhaps there is as much romance to be found in the history and traditions of Germany up to a date which I should place at about forty years ago as there is anywhere in the civilized world. Yet for some reason or other, the modern German, as I have said, seems to be more sentimental than romantic in his habits of thought and feeling.

It is not possible in a paper of this length to inquire into the foundations of sentimentality and romance. Practically, however, what we call a romantic life is one full of romantic incidents which come unsought, as the natural consequence and result of a man's or a woman's character. It is therefore necessarily an exceptional life, and as such should have exceptional interest for the majority. When our lives are not filled with emotions, they are too often crammed with insignificant details too insignificant to bear recording in a novel, but yet making up for each of us all the significance life has. The great emotions are not every-day phenomena, and it is the desire to experience them vicariously which creates the demand for fiction and thereby and at the same time a demand for emotion. This is felt more particularly nowadays than formerly.

There was a great deal of artificiality in the last century, and I believe very little real emotion or true sentiment. The evidences of the truth of this statement appear sufficiently, I think, in the current literature, the music, and the social manners of that time. Of the three the music alone has survived. Musicians constitute, in a certain sense, a caste, not unlike the Christian priesthood or the Buddhist brotherhood. Their art is more distinctly handed down from teacher to scholar, from master to pupil, than any other, and this may perhaps account for their unwillingness to break though their traditions and accepted rules. Few persons, however, can listen to an average symphony for orchestra, or sonata for piano, especially to the allegro movements, without being struck by the utter conventionality and artificiality of many parts of the production. This, it seems to me, is not due to the instinct of the musician, nor to the taste of the musical public, but is a distinct survival of a former existence, as much as the caudal appendage or the buttons on the backs of our coats. This is probably rank heresy from the musical point of view, and, like all I say here, is a mere personal opinion; but to judge by analogy from the remains of other arts cultivated a hundred years ago, there seems to be some foundation for it. Can any one see such plays acted, for instance, as 10 Sheridan's, without being forcibly struck by the total absence of spontaneity and the absolute submission to social routine of the average society man and woman of those days? Sheridan's comedies are undoubtedly as true to their times on the one hand as they are to human nature on the other, but the humanity of them is thrown into vivid and strong relief by the arti- 20 ficiality of the elements in the midst of which the chief actors have their being. As for the literature, it is hardly necessary for me to defend the statement that it was conventional. There was an intellectual dress, as it were, put on by the man of genius of those times. It hung loosely upon Goldsmith's irregular frame. It sat close, well-fitting and fashionable upon Addison, but Samuel 30 Johnson's mighty limbs almost burst its seams and betrayed at every movement the giant who wore it. On a sudden the fashion changed, and it has not done changing yet.

² dalliance is pleasant in the proper place

The French Revolution seems to have introduced an emotional phase into social history, and to it we must attribute directly or indirectly many of our present tastes and fashions. With 40 it began the novel in France. With it the novel in the English language made a fresh start and assumed a new form. To take a very simple view of the question, I should like to hazard, as a guess, the theory that when the world had lived at a very high pressure during the French Revolution, the wars of Napoleon, and what has been called the "awakening of the peoples," it had 50 acquired permanently "the emotional habit," just as a man who takes opium or morphia cannot do without the one or the other. There was a general desire felt to go on experiencing without dangerous consequences those varying conditions of hope, fear, disappointment, and triumph in which the whole world's nervous system had thrilled daily during so many years and at such fearful cost. The children of the women who had gone to the scaffold with Marie Antoinette, the sons of the men who had charged with Murat, who had stood by La Tour d'Auvergne, or who had fired their parting shot with Ney, were not satisfied to dwell in returning peace and reviving prosperity with nothing but insipid tales of shepherds and shepherdesses to amuse them. They wanted sterner, rougher stuff. They created a demand, and it was forthwith supplied, and their 20 children and children's children have followed their progenitors' footsteps in war and have adopted their tastes in peace.

Modern civilization, too, has done what it could to stir the hearts of men. Evil communications corrupt good manners, and it is not a play upon words to say that the increased facility of actual communications has widened 30 and deepened those channels of communication which are evil, and increased at the same time the demand for all sorts of emotion, bad or good. Not that emotion of itself is bad. It is often the contrary. Even the momentary reflection of true love is a good thing in itself. It is good that men and women should realize that a great affection is, or can be, a reality 40 to many as well as a convenient amusement or a heart-rending drama to a few.

Modern civilization has created modern vices, modern crimes, modern virtues, austerities, and generosityes. The crimes of to-day were not dreamed of a hundred years ago, any more than the sublimity of the good deeds done in our time to remedy our time's mis- 50 takes. And between the angel and the beast of this ending century lie great multitudes of ever-shifting, ever-changing lives, neither very bad nor very good, but in all cases very different from what lives used to be in the good old days when time meant time and not money. There, too, in that vast land of mediocrities, emotions play a part of which our grandfathers never heard, and being real, of the living, and of superior interest to those who feel them, reflect themselves in the novel of to-day, diverting the course of true love into very tortuous channels and varying the tale that is ever young with features that are often new. Within a few short months I myself have lived in a land where modern means of communication are not, and I have come to live here, where applied science is doing her best to eliminate distance as a factor from the equation of exchanges, financial and intellectual. The difference between the manifestations of human feeling in Southern Italy and North America is greater and wider than can be explained in intelligible terms. Yet it is but skin-deep. Sentiment, sentimentality, taste, fashion, daily speech, acquired science, and transmitted tradition cleanse, soil, model, or deface the changing shell of mutable mortality, and nothing which appeals to that shell alone can have permanent life; but the prime impulses of the heart are, broadly speaking, the same in all ages and almost in all races. The brave man's beats as strongly in battle to-day, the coward's stands as suddenly still in the face of danger, boys and girls still play with love, men and women still suffer for love, and the old still warn youth and manhood against love's snares—all that and much more comes from depths not reached by civilizations nor changed by fashions. Those deep waters the real novel must fathom, sounding the tide-stream of passion and bringing up such treasures as lie far below and out of sight—out of reach of the individual in most cases—until the art of the storyteller makes him feel that they are or might be his. Cæsar commanded his legionaries to strike at the face. Humanity, the novelist's master, bids him strike only at the heart.

HENRY JAMES (1843-1916)

THE REAL THING¹

I

When the porter's wife (she used to answer the house-bell), announced "A gentleman—with a lady, sir," I had, as I often had in those days, for the wish was father to the thought, an immediate vision of sitters. Sitters my visitors in this case proved to be; but not in the sense I should have preferred. However, there was nothing at first to indicate that they might not have come for a portrait. The gentleman, a man of fifty, very high and very straight, with a moustache slightly grizzled and a dark grey walking-coat admirably fitted, both of which I noted professionally—I don't mean as a barber or yet as a tailor—would have struck me as a celebrity if celebrities often were striking. It was a truth of which I had for some time been conscious that a figure with a good deal of frontage was, as one might say, almost never a public institution. A glance at the lady helped to remind me of this paradoxical law: she also looked too distinguished to be a "personality." Moreover one would scarcely come across two variations together.

Neither of the pair spoke immediately—they only prolonged the preliminary gaze which suggested that each wished to give the other a chance. They were visibly shy; they stood there letting me take them in—which, as I afterwards perceived, was the most practical thing they could have done. In this way their embarrassment served their cause. I had seen people painfully reluctant to mention that they desired anything so gross as to be represented on canvas; but the scruples of my new friends appeared almost insurmountable. Yet the gentleman might have said "I should like a portrait of my wife," and the lady might have said "I should like a portrait of my husband." Perhaps they were not husband and wife—this naturally would make the matter more delicate. Perhaps they wished to be done together—in which case they ought to have brought a third person to break the news.

"We come from Mr. Rivet," the lady said at last, with a dim smile which had the effect of a moist sponge passed over a "sunk" piece of painting, as well as of a vague allusion to vanished beauty.¹⁰ She was as tall and straight, in her degree, as her companion, and with ten years less to carry. She looked as sad as a woman could look whose face was not charged with expression; that is, her tinted oval mask showed friction as an exposed surface shows it. The hand of time had played over her freely, but only to simplify. She was slim and stiff, and so well-dressed, in dark blue²⁰ cloth, with lappets and pockets and buttons, that it was clear she employed the same tailor as her husband. The couple had an indefinable air of prosperous thrift—they evidently got a good deal of luxury for their money. If I was to be one of their luxuries it would behove me to consider my terms.

"Ah, Claude Rivet recommended me?" I inquired; and I added that it³⁰ was very kind of him, though I could reflect that, as he only painted landscape, this was not a sacrifice.

The lady looked very hard at the gentleman, and the gentleman looked round the room. Then staring at the floor a moment and stroking his moustache, he rested his pleasant eyes on me with the remark: "He said you were the right one."

"I try to be, when people want to sit."

"Yes, we should like to," said the lady anxiously.

"Do you mean together?"

My visitors exchanged a glance. "If you could do anything with me, I suppose it would be double," the gentleman stammered.

"Oh yes, there's naturally a higher⁵⁰ charge for two figures than for one."

"We should like to make it pay," the husband confessed.

"That's very good of you," I returned, appreciating so unwonted a sympathy—for I supposed he meant pay the artist.

A sense of strangeness seemed to dawn on the lady. "We mean for the illustrations—Mr. Rivet said you might put one in."

"Put one in—an illustration?" I was equally confused.

"Sketch her off, you know," said the gentleman, coloring.

It was only then that I understood the service Claude Rivet had rendered me; he had told them that I worked in black and white, for magazines, for story-books, for sketches of contemporary life, and consequently had frequent employment for models. These things were true, but it was not less²⁰ true (I may confess it now—whether because the aspiration was to lead to everything or to nothing I leave the reader to guess), that I couldn't get the honors, to say nothing of the emoluments, of a great painter of portraits out of my head. My "illustrations" were my pot-boilers; I looked to a different branch of art (far and away the most interesting it had always seemed³⁰ to me), to perpetuate my fame. There was no shame in looking to it also to make my fortune; but that fortune was by so much further from being made from the moment my visitors wished to be "done" for nothing. I was disappointed; for in the pictorial sense I had immediately seen them. I had seized their type—I had already settled what I would do with it. Something that⁴⁰ wouldn't absolutely have pleased them, I afterwards reflected.

"Ah, you're—you're—a—?" I began, as soon as I had mastered my surprise. I couldn't bring out the dingy word "models"; it seemed to fit the case so little.

"We haven't had much practice," said the lady.

"We've got to do something, and we've thought that an artist in your line might perhaps make something of us," her husband threw off. He further mentioned that they didn't know many artists and that they had gone first, on the off-chance (he painted views of course, but sometimes put in figures—perhaps I remembered), to Mr. Rivet, whom they had met a few years before at a place in Norfolk where he was sketching.

"We used to sketch a little ourselves," the lady hinted.

"It's very awkward, but we absolutely must do something," her husband ¹⁰ went on.

"Of course, we're not so very young," she admitted, with a wan smile.

With the remark that I might as well know something more about them, the husband had handed me a card extracted from a neat new pocket-book (their appurtenances were all of the freshest) and inscribed with the words "Major Monarch." Impressive as ²⁰ these words were they didn't carry my knowledge much further; but my visitor presently added: "I've left the army, and we've had the misfortune to lose our money. In fact our means are dreadfully small."

"It's an awful bore," said Mrs. Monarch.

They evidently wished to be discreet—to take care not to swagger because ³⁰ they were gentlefolks. I perceived they would have been willing to recognise this as something of a drawback, at the same time that I guessed at an underlying sense—their consolation in adversity—that they had their points. They certainly had; but these advantages struck me as preponderantly social; such for instance as would help to make a drawing-room look well. How- ⁴⁰ ever, a drawing-room was always, or ought to be, a picture.

In consequence of his wife's allusion to their age Major Monarch observed: "Naturally, it's more for the figure that we thought of going in. We can still hold ourselves up." On the instant I saw that the figure was indeed their strong point. His "naturally" didn't sound vain, but it lighted up the ques- ⁵⁰ tion. "She has got the best," he continued, nodding at his wife, with a pleasant after-dinner absence of circumlocution. I could only reply, as if we were in fact sitting over our wine, that this didn't prevent his own from being very good; which led him in turn to rejoin: "We thought that if you ever have to do people like us, we might be something like it. She, particularly—for a lady in a book, you know."

I was so amused by them that, to get more of it, I did my best to take their point of view; and though it was an embarrassment to find myself appraising physically, as if they were animals on hire or useful blacks, a pair whom I should have expected to meet only in one of the relations in which criticism is tacit, I looked at Mrs. Monarch judiciously enough to be able to exclaim, after a moment, with conviction. "Oh yes, a lady in a book!" She was singularly like a bad illustration.

"We'll stand up, if you like," said the Major; and he raised himself before me with a really grand air.

I could take his measure at a glance—he was six feet two and a perfect gentleman. It would have paid any club in process of formation and in want of a stamp to engage him at a salary to stand in the principal window. What struck me immediately was that in coming to me they had rather missed their vocation; they could surely have been turned to better account for advertising purposes. I couldn't of course see the thing in detail, but I could see them make someone's fortune—I don't mean their own. There was something in them for a waistcoat maker, an hotel-keeper or a soap-vendor. I could ⁴⁰ imagine "We always use it" pinned on their bosoms with the greatest effect; I had a vision of the promptitude with which they would launch a table d'hôte.

Mrs. Monarch sat still, not from pride but from shyness, and presently her husband said to her: "Get up, my dear, and show how smart you are." She obeyed, but she had no need to get ⁵⁰ up to show it. She walked to the end of the studio, and then she came back blushing, with her fluttered eyes on her husband. I was reminded of an incident I had accidentally had a glimpse of in Paris—being with a friend there, a dramatist about to produce a play—when an actress came to him to ask to be intrusted with a part. She went through her paces before him, walked up and down as Mrs. Monarch was doing. Mrs. Monarch did it quite as well, but I abstained from applauding. It was very odd to see such people apply for such poor pay. She looked as if she had ten thousand a year. Her husband had used the word that described her: she was, in the London current jargon, essentially and typically “smart.” Her figure was, in the same order of ideas, conspicuously and irreproachably “good.” For a woman of her age her waist was surprisingly small; her elbow moreover had the orthodox crook. She held her head at the conventional angle; but why did she come to me? She ought to have tried on jackets at a big shop. I feared my visitors were not only destitute, but “artistic”—which would be a great complication. When she sat down again I thanked her, observing that what a draughtsman most valued in his model was the faculty of keeping quiet.

“Oh, she can keep quiet,” said Major 30 Monarch. Then he added, jocosely: “I’ve always kept her quiet.”

“I’m not a nasty fidget, am I?” Mrs. Monarch appealed to her husband.

He addressed his answers to me. “Perhaps it isn’t out of place to mention—because we ought to be quite business-like, oughtn’t we?—that when I married her she was known as the Beautiful Statue.”

“Oh dear!” said Mrs. Monarch, ruefully.

“Of course I should want a certain amount of expression,” I rejoined.

“Of course!” they both exclaimed.

“And then I suppose you know that you’ll get awfully tired.”

“Oh, we never get tired!” they eagerly cried.

“Have you had any kind of prac- 50 tice?”

They hesitated—they looked at each other. “We’ve been photographed, immensely,” said Mrs. Monarch.

“She means the fellows have asked us,” added the Major.

“I see—because you’re so good-looking.”

“I don’t know what they thought, but they were always after us.”

“We always got our photographs for nothing,” smiled Mrs. Monarch.

“We might have brought some, my 10 dear,” her husband remarked.

“I’m not sure we have any left. We’ve given quantities away,” she explained to me.

“With our autographs and that sort of thing,” said the Major.

“Are they to be got in the shops?” I inquired, as a harmless pleasantry.

“Oh, yes; hers—they used to be.”

“Not now,” said Mrs. Monarch, with 20 her eyes on the floor.

II

I could fancy the “sort of thing” they put on the presentation-copies of their photographs, and I was sure they wrote a beautiful hand. It was odd how quickly I was sure of everything that concerned them. If they were now so poor as to have to earn shillings and pence, they never had had much of a margin. Their good looks had been their capital, and they had good-humouredly made the most of the career that this resource marked out for them. It was in their faces, the blankness, the deep intellectual repose of the twenty years of country-house visiting which had given them pleasant 40 intonations. I could see the sunny drawing-rooms, sprinkled with periodicals she didn’t read, in which Mrs. Monarch had continuously sat; I could see the wet shrubberies in which she had walked, equipped to admiration for either exercise. I could see the rich covers the Major had helped to shoot and the wonderful garments in which, late at night, he repaired to the smoking-room to talk about them. I could imagine their leggings and waterproofs, their knowing tweeds and rugs, their rolls of sticks and cases of tackle and neat umbrellas; and I could evoke the exact appearance of their servants and the compact variety of their luggage on the platforms of country stations.

They gave small tips, but they were liked; they didn't do anything themselves, but they were welcome. They looked so well everywhere; they gratified the general relish for stature, complexion, and "form." They knew it without fatuity or vulgarity, and they respected themselves in consequence. They were not superficial; they were thorough and kept themselves up—it had been their line. People with such a taste for activity had to have some line. I could feel how, even in a dull house, they could have been counted upon for cheerfulness. At present something had happened—it didn't matter what, their little income had grown less, it had grown least—and they had to do something for pocket-money. Their friends liked them, but didn't like to support them. There was something about them that represented credit—their clothes, their manners, their type; but if credit is a large empty pocket in which an occasional chink reverberates, the chink at least must be audible. What they wanted of me was to help to make it so. Fortunately they had no children—I soon divined that. They would also perhaps wish our relations to be kept secret: this was why it was "for the figure"—the reproduction of the face would betray them.

I liked them—they were so simple; and I had no objection to them if they would suit. But, somehow, with all their perfections I didn't easily believe in them. After all they were amateurs, and the ruling passion of my life was the detestation of the amateur. Combined with this was another perversity—an innate preference for the represented subject over the real one: the defect of the real one was so apt to be a lack of representation. I liked things that appeared; then one was sure. Whether they were or not was a subordinate and almost always a profitless question. There were other considerations, the first of which was that I already had two or three people in use, notably a young person with big feet, in alpaca, from Kilburn, who for a couple of years had come to me regularly for my illustrations and with whom I was still—perhaps ignobly—satisfied. I frankly explained to my visitors how the case stood; but they had taken more precautions than I supposed. They had reasoned out their opportunity, for Claude Rivet had told them of the projected édition de luxe of one of the writers of our day—the rarest of the novelists—who, long neglected by the multitudinous vulgar and dearly prized by the attentive (need I mention Philip Vincent?) had had the happy fortune of seeing, late in life, the dawn and then the full light of a higher criticism—an estimate in which, on the part of the public, there was something really of expiation. The edition in question, planned by a publisher of taste, was practically an act of high reparation; the wood-cuts with which it was to be enriched were the homage of English art to one of the most independent representatives of English letters. Major and Mrs. Monarch confessed to me that they had hoped I might be able to work them into my share of the enterprise. They knew I was to do the first of the books, Rutland Ramsay, but I had to make clear to them that my participation in the rest of the affair—this first book was to be a test—was to depend on the satisfaction I should give. If this should be limited, my employers would drop me without a scruple. It was therefore a crisis for me, and naturally I was making special preparations, looking about for new people, if they should be necessary, and securing the best types. I admitted however that I should like to settle down to two or three good models who would do for everything.

"Should we have often to—a—put on special clothes?" Mrs. Monarch timidly demanded.

"Dear, yes—that's half the business."

"And should we be expected to supply our own costumes?"

"Oh, no; I've got a lot of things. A painter's models put on—or put off—anything he likes."

"And do you mean—a—the same?"

"The same?"

Mrs. Monarch looked at her husband again.

"Oh, she was just wondering," he exclaimed, "if the costumes are in general use." I had to confess that they were, and I mentioned further that some of them (I had a lot of genuine, greasy last-century things), had served their time, a hundred years ago, on living, world-stained men and women. "We'll put on anything that fits," said the Major.

"Oh, I arrange that—they fit in the pictures."

"I'm afraid I should do better for the modern books. I would come as you like," said Mrs. Monarch.

"She has got a lot of clothes at home: they might do for contemporary life," her husband continued.

"Oh, I can fancy scenes in which you'd be quite natural." And indeed I could see the slipshod rearrangements of stale properties—the stories I tried to produce pictures for without the exasperation of reading them—whose sandy tracts the good lady might help to people. But I had to return to the fact that for this sort of work—the daily mechanical grind—I was already equipped; the people I was working with were fully adequate.

"We only thought we might be more like some characters," said Mrs. Monarch mildly, getting up.

Her husband also rose; he stood looking at me with a dim wistfulness that was touching in so fine a man. "Wouldn't it be rather a pull sometimes to have—a—to have?" He hung fire; he wanted me to help him by phrasing what he meant. But I couldn't—I didn't know. So he brought it out, awkwardly: "The real thing; a gentleman, you know, or a lady." I was quite ready to give a general assent—I admitted that there was a great deal in that. This encouraged Major Monarch to say, following up his appeal with an unacted gulp: "It's awfully hard—we've tried everything." The gulp was communicative; it proved too much for his wife. Before I knew it Mrs. Monarch had dropped again upon a divan and burst into tears. Her husband sat down beside her, holding one of her hands; whereupon she quickly dried her eyes with the other, while I felt embarrassed as she looked up at me. "There isn't a confounded job I haven't applied for—waited for—prayed for. You can fancy we'd be pretty bad first. Secretaryships and that sort of thing? You might as well ask for a peerage. I'd be anything—I'm strong; a messenger or a coalheaver. I'd put on a gold-laced cap and open carriage-doors in front of the haberdasher's; I'd hang about a station, to carry portmanteaus; I'd be a postman. But they won't look at you; there are thousands, as good as yourself, already on the ground. Gentlemen, poor beggars, who have drunk their wine, who have kept their hunters!"

I was as reassuring as I knew how to be, and my visitors were presently on their feet again while, for the experiment, we agreed on an hour. We were discussing it when the door opened and Miss Churm came in with a wet umbrella. Miss Churm had to take the omnibus to Maida Vale and then walk half-a-mile. She looked a trifle blowsy and slightly splashed. I scarcely ever saw her come in without thinking afresh how odd it was that, being so little in herself, she should yet be so much in others. She was a meagre little Miss Churm, but she was an ample heroine of romance. She was only a freckled cockney, but she could represent everything, from a fine lady to a shepherdess; she had the faculty, as she might have had a fine voice or long hair. She couldn't spell, and she loved beer, but she had two or three "points," and practice, and a knack, and mother-wit, and a kind of whimsical sensibility, and a love of the theatre, and seven sisters, and not an ounce of respect, especially for the h. The first thing my visitors saw was that her umbrella was wet, and in their spotless perfection they visibly winced at it. The rain had come on since their arrival.

"I'm all in a soak; there was a mess of people in the 'bus. I wish you lived near a stytion," said Miss Churm. I requested her to get ready as quickly as possible, and she passed into the room in which she always changed her dress. But before going out she asked me what 10 it was to get into this time.

"It's the Russian princess, don't you know?" I answered; "the one with the 'golden eyes,' in black velvet, for the long thing in the Cheapside."

"Golden eyes? I say!" cried Miss Churm, while my companions watched her with intensity as she withdrew. She always arranged herself, when she was late, before I could turn around; and I 20 kept my visitors a little, on purpose, so that they might get an idea, from seeing her, what would be expected of themselves. I mentioned that she was quite my notion of an excellent model—she was really very clever.

"Do you think she looks like a Russian princess?" Major Monarch asked, with lurking alarm.

"When I make her, yes."

"Oh, if you have to make her—I!" he reasoned, acutely.

"That's the most you can ask. There are so many that are not makeable."

"Well now, here's a lady!"—and with a persuasive smile he passed his arm into his wife's—"who's already made!"

"Oh, I'm not a Russian princess," Mrs. Monarch protested, a little coldly. I could see that she had known some 40 and didn't like them. There, immediately, was a complication of a kind that I never had to fear with Miss Churm.

This young lady came back in black velvet—the gown was rather rusty and very low on her lean shoulders—and with a Japanese fan in her red hands. I reminded her that in the scene I was doing she had to look over someone's head. "I forget whose it is; but it 50 doesn't matter. Just look over a head."

"I'd rather look over a stove," said Miss Churm; and she took her station near the fire. She fell into position, settled herself into a tall attitude, gave a certain backward inclination to her head and a certain forward droop to her fan, and looked, at least to my prejudiced sense, distinguished and charming, foreign and dangerous. We left her looking so, while I went downstairs with Major and Mrs. Monarch.

"I think I could come about as near 10 it as that," said Mrs. Monarch.

"Oh, you think she's shabby, but you must allow for the alchemy of art."

However, they went off with an evident increase of comfort, founded on their demonstrable advantage in being the real thing. I could fancy them shuddering over Miss Churm. She was very droll about them when I went back, for I told her what they wanted.

"Well, if she can sit I'll tyke to book-keeping," said my model.

"She's very lady-like," I replied, as an innocent form of aggravation.

"So much the worse for you. That means she can't turn round."

"She'll do for the fashionable novels."

"Oh yes, she'll do for them!" my model humorously declared. "Ain't they bad enough without her?" I had 30 often sociably denounced them to Miss Churm.

III

It was for the elucidation of a mystery in one of these works that I first tried Mrs. Monarch. Her husband came with her, to be useful if necessary—it was sufficiently clear that as a general thing he would prefer to come 40 with her. At first I wondered if this were for "propriety's" sake—if he were going to be jealous and meddling. The idea was too tiresome, and if it had been confirmed it would speedily have brought our acquaintance to a close. But I soon saw there was nothing in it and that if he accompanied Mrs. Monarch it was (in addition to the chance of being wanted), simply be- 50 cause he had nothing else to do. When she was away from him his occupation was gone—she never had been away from him. I judged, rightly, that in their awkward situation their close union was their main comfort and that this union had no weak spot. It was a real marriage, an encouragement to the hesitating, a nut for pessimists to crack. Their address was humble (I remember afterwards thinking it had been the only thing about them that was really professional), and I could fancy the lamentable lodgings in which the Major would have been left alone. He could 10 bear them with his wife—he couldn't bear them without her.

He had too much tact to try and make himself agreeable when he couldn't be useful; so he simply sat and waited, when I was too absorbed in my work to talk. But I liked to make him talk—it made my work, when it didn't interrupt it, less sordid, less special. To listen to him was to combine the 20 excitement of going out with the economy of staying at home. There was only one hindrance: that I seemed not to know any of the people he and his wife had known. I think he wondered extremely, during the term of our intercourse, whom the deuce I did know. He hadn't a stray sixpence of an idea to fumble for; so we didn't spin it very fine—we confined ourselves to questions 30 of leather and even of liquor (saddlers and breeches-makers and how to get good claret cheap), and matters like "good trains" and the habits of small game. His lore on these last subjects was astonishing; he managed to interweave the station-master with the ornithologist. When he couldn't talk about greater things he could talk cheerfully about smaller, and since I couldn't ac- 40 company him into reminiscences of the fashionable world he could lower the conversation without a visible effort to my level.

So earnest a desire to please was touching in a man who could so easily have knocked one down. He looked after the fire and had an opinion on the draught of the stove, without my asking him, and I could see that he thought 50 many of my arrangements not half clever enough. I remember telling him that if I were only rich I would offer him a salary to come and teach me how to live. Sometimes he gave a random sigh, of which the essence was: "Give me even such a bare old barrack as this, and I'd do something with it!" When I wanted to use him he came alone; which was an illustration of the superior courage of women. His wife could bear her solitary second floor, and she was in general more discreet; showing by various small reserves that she was alive to the propriety of keeping our relations markedly professional—not letting them slide into sociability. She wished it to remain clear that she and the Major were employed, not cultivated, and if she approved of me as a superior, who could be kept in his place, she never thought me quite good enough for an equal.

She sat with great intensity, giving the whole of her mind to it, and was capable of remaining for an hour almost as motionless as if she were before a photographer's lens. I could see she had been photographed often, but somehow the very habit that made her good for that purpose unfitted her for mine. At first I was extremely pleased with her lady-like air, and it was a satisfaction, on coming to follow her lines, to see how good they were and how far they could lead the pencil. But after a few times I began to find her too insurmountably stiff; do what I would with it, my drawing looked like a photograph or a copy of a photograph. Her figure had no variety of expression—she herself had no sense of variety. You may say that this was my business, 40 was only a question of placing her. I placed her in every conceivable position, but she managed to obliterate their differences. She was always a lady certainly, and into the bargain was always the same lady. She was the real thing, but always the same thing. There were moments when I was oppressed by the serenity of her confidence that she was the real thing. All her dealings with me and all her husband's were an implication that this was lucky for me. Meanwhile I found myself trying to invent types that approached her own, instead of making her own transform itself—in the clever way that was not impossible, for instance, to poor Miss Churm. Arrange as I would and take the precautions I would, she always, in my pictures, came out too tall—landing me in the dilemma of having represented a fascinating woman as seven feet high, which, out of respect perhaps to my own very much scantier inches, was far from my idea of such a personage.

The case was worse with the Major—nothing I could do would keep him down, so that he became useful only for the representation of brawny giants. I adored variety and range, I cherished human accidents, the illustrative note; I wanted to characterise closely, and the thing in the world I most hated was the danger of being ridden by a type. I had quarrelled with some of my friends about it—I had parted company with them for maintaining that one had to be, and that if the type was beautiful (witness Raphael and Leonardo), the servitude was only a gain. I was neither Leonardo nor Raphael; I might only be a presumptuous young modern searcher, but I held that everything was to be sacrificed sooner than character. When they averred that the haunting type in question could easily be character, I retorted, perhaps superficially: "Whose?" It couldn't be everybody's—it might end in being nobody's.

After I had drawn Mrs. Monarch a dozen times I perceived more clearly than before that the value of such a model as Miss Churm resided precisely in the fact that she had no positive stamp, combined of course with the other fact that what she did have was a curious and inexplicable talent for imitation. Her usual appearance was like a curtain which she could draw up at request for a capital performance. This performance was simply suggestive; but it was a word to the wise—it was vivid and pretty. Sometimes, even, I thought it, though she was plain herself, too insipidly pretty; I made it a reproach to her that the figures drawn from her were monotonously (bêtement, as we used to say) graceful. Nothing made her more angry: it was so much her pride to feel that she could sit for characters that had nothing in common with each other. She would accuse me at such moments of taking away her "reputation."

It suffered a certain shrinkage, this queer quantity, from the repeated visits of my new friends. Miss Churm was greatly in demand, never in want of employment, so I had no scruple in putting her off occasionally, to try them more at my ease. It was certainly amusing at first to do the real thing—it was amusing to do Major Monarch's trousers. They were the real thing, even if he did come out colossal. It was amusing to do his wife's black hair (it was so mathematically neat,) and the particular "smart" tension of her tight stays. She lent herself especially to positions in which the face was somewhat averted or blurred; she abounded in lady-like back views and profils perdus. When she stood erect she took naturally one of the attitudes in which court-painters represent queens and princesses; so that I found myself wondering whether, to draw out this accomplishment, I couldn't get the editor of the Cheapside to publish a really royal romance, "A Tale of Buckingham Palace." Sometimes, however, the real thing and the make-believe came into contact; by which I mean that Miss Churm, keeping an appointment or coming to make one on days when I had much work in hand, encountered her invidious rivals. The encounter was not on their part, for they noticed her no more than if she had been the housemaid; not from intentional loftiness, but simply because, as yet, professionally, they didn't know how to fraternise, as I could guess that they would have liked—or at least that the Major would. They couldn't talk about the omnibus—they always walked; and they didn't know what else to try—she wasn't interested in good trains or cheap claret. Besides, they must have felt—in the air—that she was amused at them, secretly derisive of their ever knowing how. She was not a person to conceal her scepticism if she had had a chance to show it. On the other hand Mrs. Monarch didn't think her tidy; for why else did she take pains to say to me (it was going out of the way, for Mrs. Monarch), that she didn't like dirty women?

One day when my young lady happened to be present with my other sisters (she even dropped in, when it was convenient, for a chat), I asked her to be so good as to lend a hand in getting tea—a service with which she was familiar and which was one of a class that, living as I did in a small way, with slender domestic resources, I often appealed to my models to render. They liked to lay hands on my property, to break the sitting, and sometimes the china—I made them feel Bohemian. The next time I saw Miss Churm after this incident she surprised me greatly by making a scene about it—she accused me of having wished to humiliate her. She had not resented the outrage at the time, but had seemed obliging and amused, enjoying the comedy of asking Mrs. Monarch, who sat vague and silent, whether she would have cream and sugar, and putting an exaggerated simper into the question. She had tried intonations—as if she too wished to pass for the real thing; till I was afraid my other visitors would take offence.

Oh, they were determined not to do this: and their touching patience was the measure of their great need. They would sit by the hour, uncomplaining, till I was ready to use them; they would come back on the chance of being wanted and would walk away cheerfully if they were not. I used to go to the door with them to see in what magnificent order they retreated. I tried to find other employment for them—I introduced them to several artists. But they didn't "take," for reasons I could appreciate, and I became conscious, rather anxiously, that after such disappointments they fell back upon me with a heavier weight.

They did me the honor to think that it was I who was most their form. They were not picturesque enough for the painters, and in those days there were not so many serious workers in black and white. Besides, they had an eye to the great job I had mentioned to them—they had secretly set their hearts on supplying the right essence for my pictorial vindication of our fine novelist. They knew that for this undertaking I should want no costume-effects, none of the frippery of past ages—that it was a case in which everything would be contemporary and satirical and, presumably, genteel. If I could work with them into it their future would be assured, for the labor would of course be long and the occupation steady.

One day Mrs. Monarch came without her husband—she explained his absence by his having had to go to the City. While she sat there in her usual anxious stiffness there came, at the door, a knock which I immediately recognised as the subdued appeal of a model out of work. It was followed by the entrance of a young man whom I easily perceived to be a foreigner, and who proved in fact an Italian acquainted with no English word but my name, which he uttered in a way that made it seem to include all others. I had not then visited his country, nor was I proficient in his tongue; but as he was not so meanly constituted—what Italian is?—as to depend only on that member for expression, he conveyed to me, in familiar but graceful mimicry, that he was in search of exactly the employment in which the lady before me was engaged. I was not struck with him at first, and while I continued to draw I emitted rough sounds of discouragement and dismissal. He stood his ground, however, not importunately, but with a dumb, dog-like fidelity in his eyes which amounted to innocent impudence—the manner of a devoted servant (he might have been in the house for years), unjustly suspected. Suddenly I saw that this very attitude and expression made a picture, whereupon I told him to sit down and wait till I should be free. There was another picture in the way he obeyed me; and I observed as I worked that there were others still in the way he looked wonderingly, with his head thrown back, about the high studio. He might have been crossing himself in St. Peter's. Before I finished I said to myself: "The fellow's a bankrupt orange-monger, but he's a treasure."

When Mrs. Monarch withdrew he passed across the room like a flash to open the door for her, standing there with the rapt, pure gaze of the young Dante spellbound by the young Beatrice. As I never insisted, in such situations, on the blankness of the British domestic, I reflected that he had the making of a servant (and I needed one, but couldn't pay him to be only that), as well as of a model; in short I made up my mind to adopt my bright adventurer if he would agree to officiate in the double capacity. He jumped at my offer, and in the event my rashness (for I had known nothing about him), was not brought home to me. He proved a sympathetic though a desultory ministrant, and had in a wonderful degree the sentiment de la pose. It was uncultivated, instinctive; a part of the happy instinct which had guided him to my door and helped him to spell out my name on the card nailed to it. He had had no other introduction to me than a guess, from the shape of my high north window, seen outside, that my place was a studio and that as a studio it would contain an artist. He had wandered to England in search of fortune, like other itinerants, and had embarked, with a partner and a small green handcart, on the sale of penny ices. The ices had melted away and the partner had dissolved in their train. My young man wore tight yellow trousers with reddish stripes and his name was Oronte. He was sallow but fair, and when I put him into some old clothes of my own he looked like an Englishman. He was as good as Miss Churm, who could look, when required, like an Italian.

I thought Mrs. Monarch's face slightly convulsed when, on her coming back with her husband, she found Oronte installed. It was strange to have to recognise in a scrap of a lazzarone a competitor to her magnificent Major. It was she who scented danger first, for the Major was anecdotically unconscious. But Oronte gave us tea, with a hundred eager confusions (he had never seen such a queer process), and I think she thought better of me for having at last an "establishment." They saw a couple of drawings that I had made of the establishment, and Mrs. Monarch hinted that it never would have struck her that he had sat for them. "Now the drawings you make from us, they look exactly like us," she reminded me, smiling in triumph; and I recognised that this was indeed just their defect. When I drew the Monarchs I couldn't, somehow, get away from them—get into the character I wanted to represent; and I had not the least desire my model should be discoverable in my picture. Miss Churm never was, and Mrs. Monarch thought I hid her, very properly, because she was vulgar; whereas if she was lost it was only as the dead who go to heaven are lost—in the gain of an angel the more.

By this time I had got a certain start with Rutland Ramsay, the first novel in the great projected series; that is I had produced a dozen drawings, several with the help of the Major and his wife, and I had sent them in for approval. My understanding with the publishers, as I have already hinted, had been that I was to be left to do my work, in this particular case, as I liked, with the whole book committed to me; but my connection with the rest of the series was only contingent. There were moments when, frankly, it was a comfort to have the real thing under one's hand; for there were characters in "Rutland Ramsay" that were very much like it. There were people presumably as straight as the Major and women of as good a fashion as Mrs. Monarch. There was a great deal of country-house life—treated, it is true, in a fine, fanciful, ironical, generalised way—and there was a considerable implication of knickerbockers and kilts. There were certain things I had to settle at the outset; such things for instance as the exact appearance of the hero, the particular bloom of the heroine. The author of course gave me a lead, but there was a margin for interpretation. I took the Monarchs into my confidence, I told them frankly what I was about, I mentioned my embarrassments and alternatives. "Oh, take him!" Mrs. Monarch murmured sweetly, looking at her husband; and "What could you want better than my wife?" the Major inquired, with the comfortable candor that now prevailed between us.

I was not obliged to answer these remarks—I was only obliged to place my sitters. I was not easy in mind, and I postponed, a little timidly perhaps, the solution of the question. The book was a large canvas, the other figures were numerous, and I worked off at first some of the episodes in which the hero and the heroine were not concerned. When once I had set them up I should have to stick to them—I couldn't make my young man seven feet high in one place and five feet nine in another. I inclined on the whole to the latter measurement, though the Major more than once reminded me that he looked about as young as anyone. It was indeed quite possible to arrange him, for the figure, so that it would have been difficult to detect his age. After the spontaneous Oronte had been with me a month, and after I had given him to understand several different times that his native exuberance would presently constitute an insurmountable barrier to our further intercourse, I waked to a sense of his heroic capacity. He was only five feet seven, but the remaining inches were latent. I tried him almost secretly at first, for I was really rather afraid of the judgment my other models would pass on such a choice. If they regarded Miss Churm as little better than a snare, what would they think of the representation by a person so little the real thing as an Italian street-vendor of a protagonist formed by a public school?

If I went a little in fear of them it was not because they bullied me, because they had got an oppressive foothold, but because in their really pathetic decorum and mysteriously permanent newness they counted on me so intensely. I was therefore very glad when Jack Hawley came home: he was always of such good counsel. He painted badly himself, but there was no one like him for putting his finger on the place. He had been absent from England for a year; he had been somewhere—I don't remember where—to get a fresh eye. I was in a good deal of dread of any such organ, but we were old friends; he had been away for months, and a sense of emptiness was creeping into my life. I hadn't dodged a missile for a year.

He came back with a fresh eye, but with the same old black velvet blouse, and the first evening he spent in my studio we smoked cigarettes till the small hours. He had done no work himself, he had only got the eye; so the field was clear for the production of my little things. He wanted to see what I had done for the Cheapside, but he was disappointed in the exhibition. That at least seemed the meaning of two or three comprehensive groans which, as he lounged on my big divan, on a folded leg, looking at my latest drawings, issued from his lips with the smoke of the cigarette.

"What's the matter with you?" I asked.

"What's the matter with you!"

"Nothing save that I'm mystified."

"You are indeed. You're quite off the hinge. What's the meaning of this new fad?" And he tossed me, with visible irreverence, a drawing in which I happened to have depicted both my majestic models. I asked if he didn't think it good, and he replied that it struck him as execrable; given the sort of thing I had always represented myself to him as wishing to arrive at; but I let that pass, I was so anxious to see exactly what he meant. The two figures in the picture looked colossal, but I supposed this was not what he meant, inasmuch as, for aught he knew to the contrary, I might have been trying for that. I maintained that I was working exactly in the same way as when he last had done me the honor to commend me. 10 "Well, there's a big hole somewhere," he answered; "wait a bit and I'll discover it." I depended upon him to do so: where else was the fresh eye? But he produced at last nothing more luminous than "I don't know—I don't like your types." This was lame, for a critic who had never consented to discuss with me anything but the question of execution, the direction of strokes 20 and the mystery of values.

"In the drawings you've been looking at I think my types are very handsome."

"Oh, they won't do!"

"I've had a couple of new models."

"I see you have. They won't do."

"Are you very sure of that?"

"Absolutely—they're stupid."

"You mean I am—for I ought to get 30 round that."

"You can't—with such people. Who are they?"—

I told him, as far as was necessary, and he declared, heartlessly: "Ce sont des gens qu'il faut mettre à la porte."

"You've never see them; they're awfully good," I compassionately objected.

"Not seen them? Why, all this recent work of yours drops to pieces with them. It's all I want to see of them." 40

"No one else has said anything against it—the Cheapside people are pleased."

"Everyone else is an ass, and the Cheapside people the biggest asses of all. Come, don't pretend, at this time of day, to have pretty illusions about the public, especially about publishers and editors. It's not for such animals 50 you work—it's for those who know, coloro che sanno; so keep straight for me if you can't keep straight for yourself. There's a certain sort of thing you tried for from the first—and a very good thing it is. But this twaddle isn't in it." When I talked with Hawley later about Rutland Ramsay and its possible successors he declared that I must get back into my boat again or I would go to the bottom. His voice in short was the voice of warning.

I noted the warning, but I didn't turn my friends out of doors. They bored me a good deal; but the very fact that they bored me admonished me not to sacrifice them—if there was anything to be done with them—simply to irritation. As I look back at this phase they seem to me to have pervaded my life not a little. I have a vision of them as most of the time in my studio, seated, against the wall, on an old velvet bench to be out of the way, and looking like a pair of patient courtiers in a royal ante-chamber. I am convinced that during the coldest weeks of the winter they held their ground because it saved them fire. Their newness was losing its gloss, and it was impossible not to feel that they were objects of charity. Whenever Miss Churm arrived they went away, and after I was fairly launched in Rutland Ramsay Miss Churm arrived pretty often. They managed to express to me tacitly that they supposed I wanted her for the low life of the book, and I let them suppose it, since they had attempted to study the work—it was lying about the studio—without discovering that it dealt only with the highest circles. They had dipped into the most brilliant of our novelists without deciphering many passages. I still took an hour from them, now and again, in spite of Jack Hawley's warning: it would be time enough to dismiss them, if dismissal should be necessary, when the rigor of the season was over. Hawley had made their acquaintance—he had met them at my fireside—and thought them a ridiculous pair. Learning that he was a painter they tried to approach him, to show him too that they were the real thing; but he looked at them, across the big room, as if they were miles away; they were a compendium of everything that he most objected to in the social system of his country. Such people as that, all convention and patent-leather, with ejaculations that stopped conversation, had no business in a studio. A studio was a place to learn to see, and how could you see through a pair of feather beds?

The main inconvenience I suffered at their hands was that, at first, I was shy of letting them discover how my artful little servant had begun to sit to me for Rutland Ramsay. They knew that I had been odd enough (they were prepared by this time to allow oddity to artists,) to pick a foreign vagabond out of the streets, when I might have had a person with whiskers and credentials; but it was some time before they learned how high I rated his accomplishments. They found him in an attitude more than once, but they never doubted I was doing him as an organ-grinder. There were several things they never guessed, and one of them was that for a striking scene in the novel, in which a footman briefly figured, it occurred to me to make use of Major Monarch as the menial. I kept putting this off, I didn't like to ask him to don the livery—besides the difficulty of finding a livery to fit him. At last, one day late in the winter, when I was at work on the despised Oronte (he caught one's idea in an instant), and was in the glow of feeling that I was going very straight, they came in, the Major and his wife, with their society laugh about nothing (there was less and less to laugh at), like country-callers— they always reminded me of that—who have walked across the park after church and are presently persuaded to stay to luncheon. Luncheon was over, but they could stay to tea—I knew they wanted it. The fit was on me, however, and I couldn't let my ardor cool and my work wait, with the fading daylight, while my model prepared it. So I asked Mrs. Monarch if she would mind laying it out—a request which, for an instant, brought all the blood to her face. Her eyes were on her husband's for a second, and some mute telegraphy passed between them. Their folly was over the next instant; his cheerful shrewdness put an end to it. So far from pitying their wounded pride, I must add, I was moved to give it as complete a lesson as I could. They bustled about together and got out the cups and saucers and made the kettle boil. I know they felt as if they were waiting on my servant, and when the tea was prepared I said: "He'll have a cup, please—he's tired." Mrs. Monarch brought him one where he stood, and he took it from her as if he had been a gentleman at a party, squeezing a crush-hat with an elbow.

Then it came over me that she had made a great effort for me—made it with a kind of nobleness—and that I owed her a compensation. Each time I saw her after this I wondered what the compensation could be. I couldn't go on doing the wrong thing to oblige them. Oh, it was the wrong thing, the stamp of the work for which they sat—Hawley was not the only person to say it now. I sent in a large number of the drawings I had made for Rutland Ramsay, and I received a warning that was more to the point than Hawley's. The artistic adviser of the house for which I was working was of opinion that many of my illustrations were not what had been looked for. Most of these illustrations were the subjects in which the Monarchs had figured. Without going into the question of what had been looked for, I saw at this rate I shouldn't get the other books to do. I hurled myself in despair upon Miss Churm, I put her through all her paces. I not only adopted Oronte publicly as my hero, but one morning when the Major looked in to see if I didn't require him to finish a figure for the Cheapside, for which he had begun to sit the week before, I told him that I had changed my mind—I would do the drawing from my man. At this my visitor turned pale and stood looking at me. "Is he your idea of an English gentleman?" he asked.

I was disappointed. I was nervous, I wanted to get on with my work; so I replied with irritation: "Oh, my dear Major—I can't be ruined for you!"

He stood another moment; then, without a word, he quitted the studio. I drew a long breath when he was gone, for I said to myself that I shouldn't see him again. I had not told him definitely that I was in danger of having my work rejected, but I was vexed at his not having felt the catastrophe in the air, read with me the moral of our fruitless collaboration, the lesson that, in the deceptive atmosphere of art, even the highest respectability may fail of being plastic.

I didn't owe my friends money, but I did see them again. They re-appeared together, three days later, and under the circumstances there was something tragic in the fact. It was a proof to me that they could find nothing else in life to do. They had threshed the matter out in a dismal conference—they had digested the bad news that they were not in for the series. If they were not useful to me even for the Cheapside, their function seemed difficult to determine, and I could only judge at first that they had come, forgivingly, decorously, to take a last leave. This made me rejoice in secret that I had little leisure for a scene; for I had placed both my other models in position together and I was pegging away at a drawing from which I hoped to derive glory. It had been suggested by the passage in which Rutland Ramsay, drawing up a chair to Artemisia's piano-stool, says extraordinary things to her while she ostensibly fingers out a difficult piece of music. I had done Miss Churm at the piano before—it was an attitude in which she knew how to take on an absolutely poetic grace. I wished the two figures to "compose" together, intensely, and my little Italian had entered perfectly into my conception. The pair were vividly before me, the piano had been pulled out; it was a charming picture of blended youth and murmured love, which I had only to catch and keep. My visitors stood and looked at it, and I was friendly to them over my shoulder.

They made no response, but I was used to silent company and went on with my work, only a little disconcerted (even though exhilarated by the sense that this was at least the ideal thing), at not having got rid of them after all. Presently I heard Mrs. Monarch's sweet voice beside, or rather above me: "I wish her hair was a little better done." I looked up and she was staring with a strange fixedness at Miss Churm whose back was turned to her. "Do you mind my just touching it?" she went on—a question which made me spring up for an instant, as with the instinctive fear that she might do the young lady a harm. But she quieted me with a glance I shall never forget—I confess I should like to have been able to paint that—and went for a moment to my model. She spoke to her softly, laying a hand upon her shoulder and bending over her; and as the girl, understanding, gratefully assented, she disposed her rough curls, with a few quick passes, in such a way as to make Miss Churm's head twice as charming. It was one of the most heroic personal services I have ever seen rendered. Then Mrs. Monarch turned away with a low sigh and, looking about her as if for something to do, stooped to the floor with a noble humility and picked up a dirty rag that had dropped out of my paint-box.

The Major meanwhile had also been looking for something to do and, wandering to the other end of the studio, saw before him my breakfast things, neglected, unremoved. "I say, can't I be useful here?" he called out to me with an irrepressible quaver. I assented with a laugh that I fear was awkward and for the next ten minutes, while I worked, I heard the light clatter of china and the tinkle of spoons and glass. Mrs. Monarch assisted her husband—they washed up my crockery, they put it away. They wandered off into my little scullery, and I afterwards found that they had cleaned my knives and that my slender stock of plate had an unprecedented surface. When it came over me, the latent eloquence of what they were doing, I confess that my drawing was blurred for a moment —the picture swam. They had accepted their failure, but they couldn't accept their fate. They had bowed their heads in bewilderment to the perverse and cruel law in virtue of which the real thing could be so much less precious than the unreal; but they didn't want to starve. If my servants were my models, my models might be my servants. They would reverse the parts—the others would sit for the ladies and gentlemen, and they would do the work. They would still be in the studio—it was an intense dumb appeal to me not to turn them out. "Take us on," they wanted to say—"we'll do anything."

When all this hung before me the afflatus vanished—my pencil dropped from my hand. My sitting was spoiled and I got rid of my sitters, who were also evidently rather mystified and awestruck. Then, alone with the Major and his wife, I had a most uncomfortable moment. He put their prayer into a single sentence: "I say, you know—just let us do for you, can't you?" I couldn't—it was dreadful to see them emptying my slops; but I pretended I could, to oblige them, for about a week. Then I gave them a sum of money to go away; and I never saw them again. I obtained the remaining books, but my friend Hawley repeats that Major and Mrs. Monarch did me a permanent harm, got me into a second-rate trick. If it be true I am content to have paid the price—for the memory.

JOHN BURROUGHS (1837-1921)

BIRDS'-NESTS

How alert and vigilant the birds are, even when absorbed in building their nests! In an open space in the woods I see a pair of cedar-birds collecting moss from the top of a dead tree. Following the direction in which they fly, I soon discover the nest placed in the fork of a small soft-maple, which stands amid a thick growth of wild-cherry trees and young beeches. Carefully concealing myself beneath it, without any fear that the workmen will hit me with a chip or let fall a tool, I await the return of the busy pair. Presently I hear the well-known note, and the female sweeps down and settles unsuspectingly into the half-finished structure. Hardly have her wings rested before her eye has penetrated my screen, and with a hurried movement of alarm she darts away. In a moment the male, with a tuft of wool in his beak, (for there is a sheep-pasture near,) joins her, and the two reconnoitre the premises from the surrounding bushes. With their beaks still loaded, they move around with a frightened look, and refuse to approach the nest till I have moved off and lain down behind a log. Then one of them ventures to alight upon the nest, but, still suspecting all is not right, quickly darts away again. Then they both together come, and after much peeping and spying about, and apparently much anxious consultation, cautiously proceed to work. In less than half an hour it would seem that wool enough has been brought to supply the whole family, real and prospective, with socks, if needles and fingers could be found fine enough to knit it up. In less than a week the female has begun to deposit her eggs,—four of them, in as many days,—white tinged with purple, with black spots on the larger end. After two weeks of incubation, the young are out.

Excepting the American goldfinch, this bird builds later in the spring than any other—its nest, in our northern climate, seldom being undertaken till July. As with the goldfinch, the reason is, probably, that suitable food for the young cannot be had at an earlier period.

Like most of our common species, as the robin, sparrow, bluebird, pewee, wren, etc., this bird sometimes seeks wild, remote localities in which to rear its young; at others, takes up its abode near that of man. I knew a pair of cedar-birds, one season, to build in an apple-tree the branches of which rubbed against the house. For a day or two before the first straw was laid, I noticed the pair carefully exploring every branch of the tree, the female taking the lead, the male following her with an anxious look and note. It was evident that the wife was to have her choice this time; and, like one who thoroughly knew her mind, she was proceeding to take it. Finally the site was chosen upon a high branch, extending over one low wing of the house. Mutual congratulations and caresses followed, when both birds flew away in quest of building material. That most freely used is a sort of cotton-bearing plant, which grows in old, worn-out fields. The nest is large for the size of the bird, and very soft. It is in every respect a first-class domicile.

On another occasion, while walking or rather loafing in the woods (for I have discovered that one cannot run and read the book of nature) my attention was arrested by a dull hammering, evidently but a few rods off. I said to myself, "Some one is building a house." From what I had previously seen, I suspected the builder to be a read-headed woodpecker in the top of a dead oak stub near by. Moving cautiously in that direction, I perceived a round hole, about the size of that made by an inch-and-a-half auger, near the top of the decayed trunk, and the white chips of the workman strewing the ground beneath. When but a few spaces from the tree, my foot pressed upon a dry twig, which gave forth a very slight snap. Instantly the hammering ceased, and a scarlet head appeared at the door. Though I remained perfectly motionless, forbearing even to wink till my eyes smarted, the bird refused to go on with his work, but flew quietly off to a neighboring tree. What surprised me was, that amid his busy occupation down in the heart of the old tree, he should have been so alert and watchful as to catch the slightest sound from without.

The woodpeckers all build in about the same manner, excavating the trunk or branch of a decayed tree and depositing the eggs on the fine fragments of wood at the bottom of the cavity. Though the nest is not especially an artistic work,—requiring strength rather than skill,—yet the eggs and the young of few other birds are so completely housed from the elements, or protected from their natural enemies—the jays, crows, hawks, and owls. A tree with a natural cavity is never selected, but one which has been dead just long enough to have become soft and brittle throughout. The bird goes in horizontally for a few inches, making a hole perfectly round and smooth and adapted to his size, then turns downward, gradually enlarging the hole, as he proceeds, to the depth of ten, fifteen, twenty inches, according to the softness of the tree and the requirements of the female in laying her eggs. A few days since, I climbed up to the nest of the downy wood-pecker, in the decayed top of a sugar-maple. For better protection against driving rains, the hole, which was rather more than an inch in diameter, was made immediately beneath a branch which stretched out almost horizontally from the main stem. It appeared merely a deeper shadow upon the dark and mottled surface of the bark with which the branches were covered, and could not be detected by the eye until one was within a few feet of it. The young chirped vociferously as I approached the nest, thinking it was the old one with food; but the clamor suddenly ceased as I put my hand on that part of the trunk in which they were concealed, the unusual jarring and rustling alarming them into silence. The cavity, which was about fifteen inches deep, was gourd-shaped, and was wrought out with great skill and regularity. The walls were quite smooth and clean and new.

I shall never forget the circumstance of observing a pair of yellow-bellied woodpeckers,—the most rare and secluded, and, next to the red-headed, the most beautiful species found in our woods,—breeding in an old, truncated beech in the Beaverville Mountains, an offshoot of the Catskills. We had been travelling, three brothers of us, all day in search of a trout lake, which lay far in among the mountains, had twice lost our course in the trackless forest, and, weary and hungry, had sat down to rest upon a decayed log. The chattering of the young, and the passing to and fro of the parent birds, soon arrested my attention. The entrance to the nest was on the east side of the tree, about twenty-five feet from the ground. At intervals of scarcely a minute, the old birds, one after another, would alight upon the edge of the hole with a grub or a worm in their beaks; then each in turn would make a bow or two, cast an eye quickly around, and by a single movement place itself in the neck of the passage. Here it would pause a moment, as if to determine in which expectant mouth to place the morsel, and then disappear within. In about half a minute, during which time the chattering of the young gradually subsided, the bird would again emerge, but this time bearing in its beak the ordure of one of the helpless family. Flying away very slowly with head lowered and extended, as if anxious to hold the offensive object as far from its plumage as possible, the bird dropped the unsavory morsel in the course of a few yards, and, alighting on a tree, wiped its bill on the bark and moss. This seems to be the order all day,—carrying in and carrying out. I watched the birds for an hour, while my companions were taking their turn in exploring the lay of the land around us, and noted no variation of the programme. It would be curious to know if the young are fed and waited upon in regular order, and how, amid the darkness and the crowded state of the apartment, the matter is so neatly managed. But the ornithologists are all silent upon the subject.

This practice of the birds is not so uncommon as it might at first seem. It is indeed almost an invariable rule among all the land birds. With woodpeckers and kindred species, and with birds that burrow in the ground, as bank swallows, kingfishers, etc., it is a necessity. The accumulation of the excrement in the nest would most likely prove fatal to the young.

But even among birds which neither bore nor mine, but which build a shallow nest on the branch of a tree or upon the ground, as the robin, the finches, the buntings, etc., the ordure of the young is removed to a distance by the parent bird. When the robin is seen going away from its brood with a slow heavy flight, entirely different from its manner a moment before on approaching the nest with a cherry or worm, it is certain to be engaged in this office. One may observe the social sparrow, when feeding its young, pause a moment after the worm has been given, and hop around on the brink of the nest, observing the movements within.

The instinct of cleanliness no doubt prompts the action in all cases, though the disposition to secrecy or concealment may not be unmixed with it.

The swallows form an exception to the rule, the excrement being voided by the young over the brink of the nest. They form an exception, also, to the rule of the secrecy, aiming not so much to conceal the nest as to render it inaccessible.

Other exceptions are the pigeons, hawks, and water-fowls.

But to return. Having a good chance to note the color and markings of the woodpeckers as they passed in and out at the opening of the nest, I saw that Audubon had made a mistake in figuring or describing the female of this species with the red spot upon the head. I have seen a number of pairs of them, and in no instance have I seen the mother bird marked with red.

The male was in full plumage, and I reluctantly shot him for a specimen. Passing by the place again next day, I paused a moment to note how matters stood. I confess it was not without some compunctions that I heard the cries of the young birds, and saw the widowed mother, her cares now doubled, hastening to and fro in the solitary woods. She would occasionally pause expectantly on the trunk of a tree, and utter a loud call.

It usually happens, when the male of any species is killed during the breeding season, that the female soon procures another mate. There are, most likely, always a few unmated birds, of both sexes, within a given range, and through these the broken links may be restored. Audubon or Wilson, I forget which, tells of a pair of fish-hawks, or ospreys, that built their nest in an ancient oak. The male was so zealous in the defence of the young that it actually attacked with beak and claw a person who attempted to climb into its nest, putting his face and eyes in great jeopardy. Arming himself with a heavy club, the climber felled the gallant bird to the ground and killed him. In the course of a few days the female had procured another mate. But naturally enough the step-father showed none of the spirit and pluck in defence of the brood that had been displayed by the original parent. When danger was nigh, he was seen afar off, sailing around in placid unconcern.

It is generally known that when either the wild turkey or domestic turkey begins to lay, and afterwards to sit and rear the brood, she secludes herself from the male, who then, very suddenly herds with others of his sex, and betakes himself to haunts of his own till male and female, old and young, meet again on common ground, late in the fall. But rob the sitting bird of her eggs, or destroy her tender young, and she immediately sets out in quest of a male, who is no laggard when he hears her call. The same is true of ducks and other aquatic fowls. The propagating instinct is strong, and surmounts all ordinary difficulties. No doubt the widowhood I had caused in the case of the woodpeckers was of short duration, and chance brought, or the widow drummed up, some forlorn male, who was not dismayed by the prospect of having a large family of half-grown birds on his hands at the outset.

I have seen a fine cock robin paying assiduous addresses to a female bird, as late as the middle of July; and I have no doubt that his intentions were honorable. I watched the pair for half an hour. The hen, I took it, was in the market for the second time that season, but the cock, from his bright, unfaded plumage, looked like a new arrival. The hen resented every advance of the male. In vain he strutted around her and displayed his fine feathers; every now and then she would make at him in the most spiteful manner. He followed her to the ground, poured into her ear a fine half-suppressed warble, offered her a worm, flew back to the tree again with a great spread of plumage, hopped around her on the branches, chirruped, chattered, flew gallantly at an intruder, and was back in an instant at her side. No use,—she cut him short at every turn.

The dénouement I cannot relate, as the artful bird, followed by her ardent suitor, soon flew away beyond my sight. It may not be rash to conclude, however, that she held out no longer than was prudent.

On the whole, there seems to be a system of Women's Rights prevailing among the birds, which, contemplated from the standpoint of the male, is quite admirable. In almost all cases of joint interest, the female bird is the most active. She determines the site of the nest, and is usually the most absorbed in its construction. Generally, she is more vigilant in caring for the young, and manifests the most concern when danger threatens. Hour after hour I have seen the mother of a brood of blue grossbeaks pass from the nearest meadow to the tree that held her nest, with a cricket or grasshopper in her bill, while her better-dressed half was singing serenely on a distant tree, or pursuing his pleasures amid the branches.

Yet the male is most conspicuous both by his color and manners and by his song, and is to that extent a shield to the female. It is thought that the female is humbler clad for her better concealment during incubation. But this is not satisfactory, as in most cases she is relieved from time to time by the male. In the case of the domestic dove, for instance, promptly at mid-day the cock is found upon the nest. I should sooner say that the dull or neutral tints of the female were a provision of nature for her greater safety at all times, as her life is far more precious to the species than that of the male. The indispensable office of the male reduces itself to little more than a moment of time, while that of his mate extends over days and weeks, if not months.

In migrating northward, the males precede the females by eight or ten days; returning in the fall, the females and young precede the males by about the same time.

After the woodpeckers have abandoned their nests, or rather chambers, which they do after the first season, their cousins, the nuthatches, chickadees, and brown creepers, fall heir to them. These birds, especially the creepers and nuthatches, have many of the habits of the picidæ,¹ but lack their powers of bill, and so are unable to excavate a nest for themselves. Their habitation, therefore, is always second-hand. But each species carries in some soft material of various kinds, or, in other words, furnishes the tenement to its liking. The chickadee arranges in the bottom of the cavity a little mat of a light felt-like substance, which looks as if it came from the hatter's, but which is probably the work of numerous worms or caterpillars. On this soft lining the female deposits six white eggs.

I recently discovered one of these nests in a most interesting situation. The tree containing it, a variety of the wild-cherry, stood upon the brink of the bald summit of a high mountain. Gray, time-worn rocks lay piled loosely about, or overtopped the just visible by-ways of the red fox. The trees had a half-scared look, and that indescribable wildness which lurks about the tops of all remote mountains possessed the place. Standing there, I looked down upon the back of the red-tailed hawk as he flew out over the earth beneath me. Following him, my eye also took in farms and settlements and villages and other mountain ranges that grew blue in the distance.

The parent birds attracted my attention by appearing with food in their beaks, and by seeming much put out. Yet so wary were they of revealing the locality of their brood, or even of the precise tree that held them, that I lurked around over an hour without gaining a point on them. Finally a bright and curious boy who accompanied me secreted himself under a low, projecting rock close to the tree in which we supposed the nest to be, while I moved off around the mountain-side. It was not long before the youth had their secret. The tree, which was low and wide, branching, and overrun with lichens, appeared at a cursory glance to contain not one dry or decayed limb. Yet there was one a few feet long, in which, when my eyes were piloted thither, I detected a small round orifice.

As my weight began to shake the branches, the consternation of both old and young was great. The stump of a limb that held the nest was about three inches thick, and at the bottom of the tunnel was excavated quite to the bark. With my thumb I broke in the thin wall, and the young, which were full-fledged, looked out upon the world for the first time. Presently one of them, with a significant chirp, as much as to say, "It is time we were out of this," began to climb up toward the proper entrance. Placing himself in the hole, he looked around without manifesting any surprise at the grand scene that lay spread out before him. He was taking his bearings, and determining how far he could trust the power of his untried wings to take him out of harm's way. After a moment's pause, with a loud chirp, he launched out and made tolerable headway. The others rapidly followed. Each one, as it started upward, from a sudden impulse, contemptuously saluted the abandoned nest with its excrement.

Though generally regular in their habits and instincts, yet the birds sometimes seem as whimsical and capricious as superior beings. One is not safe, for instance, in making any absolute assertion as to their place or mode of building. Ground builders often get up into a bush, and tree builders sometimes get upon the ground or into a tussock of grass. The song sparrow, which is a ground builder, has been known to build in the knot-hole of a fence rail, and a chimney sparrow once got tired of soot and smoke, and fastened its nest on a rafter in a barn. A friend tells me of a pair of barn swallows which, taking a fanciful turn, saddled their nest in the loop of a rope that was pendent from a peg in the peak, and liked it so well that they repeated the experiment next year. I have known the social sparrow, or "hair bird," to build under a shed, in a tuft of hay that hung down, through the loose flooring, from the mow above.

It usually contents itself with half a dozen stalks of dry grass and a few long hairs from a cow's tail, loosely arranged on the branch of an apple-tree. The rough-winged swallow builds in the wall and in old stone heaps, and I have seen the robin build in similar localities. Others have found its nest in old, abandoned wells. The house wren will build in anything that has an accessible cavity, from an old boot to a bombshell. A pair of them once persisted in building their nest in the top of a certain pump-tree, getting in through the opening above the handle. The pump being in daily use, the nest was destroyed more than a score of times. This jealous little wretch has the wise forethought, when the box in which he builds contains two compartments, to fill up one of them, so as to avoid the risk of troublesome neighbors.

The less skilful builders sometimes depart from their usual habit, and take up with the abandoned nest of some other species. The blue jay now and then lays in an old crow's-nest or cuckoo's-nest. The crow-blackbird, seized with a fit of indolence, drops its eggs in the cavity of a decayed branch. I heard of a cuckoo that dispossessed a robin of its nest; of another, that set a blue jay adrift. Large, loose structures, like the nests of the osprey and certain of the herons, have been found with half a dozen nests of the blackbird set in the outer edges, like so many parasites, or, as Audubon says, like the retainers about the rude court of a feudal baron.

The same birds breeding in a southern climate construct far less elaborate nests than when breeding in a northern climate. Certain species of waterfowl that abandon their eggs to the sand and the sun in the warmer zones, build a nest and sit in the usual way in Labrador. In Georgia, the Baltimore oriole places its nest upon the north side of the tree; in the Middle and Eastern States, it fixes it upon the south or east side, and makes it much thicker and warmer. I have seen one from the South that had some kind of coarse reed or sedge woven into it, giving it an openwork appearance, like a basket.

Very few species use the same material uniformly. I have seen the nest of the robin quite destitute of mud. In one instance, it was composed mainly of long black horse-hairs, arranged in a circular manner, with a lining of fine yellow grass; the whole presenting quite a novel appearance. In another case, the nest was chiefly constructed of a species of rock moss.

The nest for the second brood during the same season is often a mere makeshift. The haste of the female to deposit her eggs as the season advances seems very great, and the structure is apt to be prematurely finished. I was recently reminded of this fact by happening, about the last of July, to meet with several nests of the wood or bush sparrow in a remote blackberry field. The nests with eggs were far less elaborate and compact than the earlier nests, from which the young had flown.

Day after day, as I go to a certain piece of woods, I observe a male indigo-bird sitting on precisely the same part of a high branch, and singing in his most vivacious style. As I approach, he ceases to sing, and, flirting his tail right and left with marked emphasis, chirps sharply. In a low bush near by, I come upon the object of his solicitude—a thick, compact nest composed largely of dry leaves and fine grass, in which a plain brown bird is sitting upon four pale blue eggs.

The wonder is, that a bird will leave the apparent security of the tree-tops, to place its nest in the way of the many dangers that walk and crawl upon the ground. There, far up out of reach, sings the bird; here, not three feet from the ground, are its eggs or helpless young. The truth is, birds are the greatest enemies of birds, and it is with reference to this fact that many of the smaller species build.

Perhaps the greatest proportion of birds breed along highways. I have known the ruffed grouse to come out of a dense wood, and make its nest at the root of a tree within ten paces of the road, where, no doubt, hawks and crows, as well as skunks and foxes, would be less liable to find it out. Traversing remote mountain-roads through dense woods, I have repeatedly seen the veery, or Wilson's thrush, sitting upon her nest, so near me that I could almost take her from it by stretching out my hand. Birds of prey show none of this confidence in man, and, when locating their nests, avoid rather than seek his haunts.

In a certain locality in the interior of New York, I know, every season, where I am sure to find a nest or two of the slate-colored snowbird. It is under the brink of a low, mossy bank, so near the highway that it could be reached from a passing vehicle with a whip. Every horse or wagon or foot passenger disturbs the sitting bird. But she awaits the near approach of the sound of feet or wheels, and then darts quickly across the road, barely clearing the ground, and disappears amid the bushes on the opposite side.

In the trees that line one of the main streets and fashionable drives leading out of Washington City, and less than half a mile from the boundary, I have counted the nests of five different species at one time, and that without any very close scrutiny of the foliage, while in many acres of woodland, half a mile off, I searched in vain for a single nest. Among the five, the nest that interested me most was that of the blue grossbeak. Here, this bird, which, according to Audubon's observations in Louisiana, is shy and reclusive, affecting remote marshes and the borders of large ponds of stagnant water, had placed its nest in the lowest twig of the lowest branch of a large sycamore, immediately over a great thoroughfare, and so near the ground that a person standing in a cart or sitting on a horse could have reached it with his hand. The nest was composed mainly of fragments of newspaper and stalks of grass, and though so low, was remarkably well concealed by one of the peculiar clusters of twigs and leaves which characterize this tree. The nest contained young when I discovered it, and though the parent birds were much annoyed by my loitering about beneath the tree, they paid little attention to the stream of vehicles that was constantly passing. It was a wonder to me when the birds could have built it, for they are much shyer when building than at other times. No doubt they worked mostly in the morning, having the early hours all to themselves.

Another pair of blue grossbeaks built in a grave-yard within the city limits. The nest was placed in a low bush, and the male continued to sing at intervals till the young were ready to fly. The song of this bird is a rapid, intricate warble, like that of the indigo-bird, though stronger and louder. Indeed, these two birds so much resemble each other in color, form, manner, voice, and general habits that, were it not for the difference in size,—the grossbeak being nearly as large again as the indigo-bird,—it would be a hard matter to tell them apart. The females of both species are clad in the same reddish-brown suits. So are the young the first season.

Of course in the deep, primitive woods also are nests; but how rarely we find them! The simple art of the bird consists in choosing common, neutral-tinted material, as moss, dry leaves, twigs, and various odds and ends, and placing the structure on a convenient branch where it blends in color with its surroundings; but how consummate is this art, and how skillfully is the nest concealed! We occasionally light upon it, but who, unaided by the movements of the bird, could find it out? During the present season I went to the woods nearly every day for a fortnight, without making any discoveries of this kind; till one day, paying them a farewell visit, I chanced to come upon several nests. A black and white creeping warbler suddenly became much alarmed as I approached a crumbling old stump in a dense part of the forest. He alighted upon it, chirped sharply, ran up and down its sides, and finally left it with much reluctance. The nest, which contained three young birds nearly fledged, was placed upon the ground at the foot of the stump, and in such a position that the color of the young harmonized perfectly with the bits of bark, sticks, etc., lying about. My eye rested upon them for the second time before I made them out. They hugged the nest very closely, but, as I put down my hand, they all scampered off with loud cries for help, which caused the parent birds to place themselves almost within my reach. The nest was merely a little dry grass arranged in a thick bed of dry leaves.

This was amid a thick undergrowth. Moving on into a passage of large stately hemlocks, with only here and there a small beech or maple rising up into the perennial twilight, I paused to make out a note which was entirely new to me. It is still in my ear. Though unmistakably a bird note, it yet suggested the bleating of a tiny lambkin. Presently the birds appeared,—a pair of the solitary vireo. They came flitting from point to point, alighting only for a moment at a time, the male silent, but the female uttering this strange, tender note. It was a rendering into some new sylvan dialect of the human sentiment of maidenly love. It was really pathetic in its sweetness and childlike confidence and joy. I soon discovered that the pair were building a nest upon a low branch a few yards away from me. The male flew cautiously to the spot, and adjusted something, and the twain moved on, the female calling to her mate at intervals, love-e, love-e, with a cadence and tenderness in the tone that rang in the ear long afterward. The nest was suspended to the fork of a small branch, as is usual with the vireos, plentifully lined with lichens, and bound and rebound with masses of coarse spiderwebs. There was no attempt at concealment except in the neutral tints, which made it look like a natural growth of the dim, gray woods.

Continuing my random walk, I next paused in a low part of the woods, where the larger trees began to give place to a thick second growth that covered an old bark-peeling. I was standing by a large maple, when a small bird darted quickly away from it, as if it might have come out of a hole near its base. As the bird paused a few yards from me, and began to chirp uneasily, my curiosity was at once excited. When I saw it was the female mourning ground warbler, and remembering that the nest of this bird had not yet been seen by any naturalist—that not even Dr. Brewer had ever seen the eggs,—I felt that here was something worth looking for. So I carefully began the search, exploring inch by inch the ground, the base and roots of the tree, and the various shrubbery growths about it, till, finding nothing, and fearing I might really put my foot in it, I bethought me to withdraw to a distance and after some delay return again, and, thus forewarned, note the exact point from which the bird flew. This I did, and, returning, had little difficulty in discovering the nest. It was placed but a few feet from the maple-tree, in a bunch of ferns, and about six inches from the ground. It was quite a massive nest, composed entirely of the stalks and 10 leaves of dry grass, with an inner lining of fine, dark brown roots. The eggs, three in number, were of light flesh-color, uniformly specked with fine brown specks. The cavity of the nest was so deep that the back of the sitting bird sank below the edge.

In the top of a tall tree, a short distance farther on, I saw the nest of the red-tailed hawk,—a large mass of twigs 20 and dry sticks. The young had flown, but still lingered in the vicinity, and, as I approached, the mother bird flew about over me, squealing in a very angry, savage manner. Tufts of the hair and other indigestible material of the common meadow mouse lay around on the ground beneath the nest.

As I was about leaving the woods my hat almost touched the nest of the 30 red-eyed vireo, which hung basket-like on the end of a low, drooping branch of the beech. I should never have seen it had the bird kept her place. It contained three eggs of the bird's own, and one of the cow bunting. The strange egg was only just perceptibly larger than the others, yet three days after, when I looked into the nest again and found all but one egg hatched, the 40 young interloper was at least four times as large as either of the others, and with such a superabundance of bowels as to almost smother his bedfellows beneath them. That the intruder should fare the same as the rightful occupants, and thrive with them, was more than ordinary potluck; but that it alone should thrive, devouring, as it were, all the rest, is one of 50 those freaks of Nature in which she would seem to discourage the homely virtues of prudence and honesty. Weeds and parasites have the odds greatly against them, yet they wage a very successful war nevertheless.

The woods hold not such another gem as the nest of the humming-bird. The finding of one is an event to date from. It is the next best thing to finding an eagle's nest. I have met with but two, both by chance. One was placed on the horizontal branch of a chestnut-tree, with a solitary green 10 leaf, forming a complete canopy, about an inch and a half above it. The repeated spiteful dartings of the bird past my ears, as I stood under the tree, caused me to suspect that I was intruding upon some one's privacy; and following it with my eye, I soon saw the nest, which was in process of construction. Adopting my usual tac- 20 tics of secreting myself near by, I had the satisfaction of seeing the tiny artist at work. It was the female unassisted by her mate. At intervals of two or three minutes, she would appear with a small tuft of some cottony substance in her beak, dart a few times through and around the tree, and alighting quickly in the nest, arrange the material she had brought, using her breast 30 as the model.

The other nest I discovered in a dense forest on the side of a mountain. The sitting bird was disturbed as I passed beneath her. The whirring of her wings arrested my attention, when, after a short pause, I had the good luck to see, through an opening in the leaves, the bird return to her nest, which appeared like a mere wart or 40 excrescence on a small branch. The humming-bird, unlike all others, does not alight upon the nest, but flies into it. She enters it as quick as a flash, but as light as a feather. Two eggs are the complement. They are perfectly white, and so frail that only a woman's fingers may touch them. Incubation lasts about ten days. In a week the young have flown.

The only nest like the humming-bird's, and comparable to it in neatness and symmetry, is that of the blue-gray gnat-catcher. This is often saddled upon the limb in the same manner, though it is generally more or less pendent; it is deep and soft, composed mostly of some vegetable down covered all over with delicate tree-lichens, and, except that it is much larger, appears almost identical with the nest of the humming-bird.

But the nest of nests, the ideal nest, after we have left the deep woods, is unquestionably that of the Baltimore oriole. It is the only perfectly pensile nest we have. The nest of the orchard oriole is indeed mainly so, but this bird generally builds lower and shallower, more after the manner of the vireos.

The Baltimore oriole loves to attach its nest to the swaying branches of the tallest elms, making no attempt at concealment, but satisfied if the position be high and the branch pendent. This nest would seem to cost more time and skill than any other bird structure. A peculiar flax-like substance seems to be always sought after and always found. The nest when completed assumes the form of a large, suspended, gourd-shaped drop. The walls are thin but firm, and proof against the most driving rain. The mouth is hemmed or over-handed with horse-hair, and the sides are usually sewed through and through with the same.

Not particular as to the matter of secrecy, the bird is not particular as to material, so that it be of the nature of strings or threads. A lady friend once told me that, while working by an open window, one of these birds approached during her momentary absence, and, seizing a skein of some kind of thread or yarn, made off with it to its half-finished nest. But the perverse yarn caught fast in the branches, and, in the bird's efforts to extricate it, got hopelessly tangled. She tugged away at it all day, but was finally obliged to content herself with a few detached portions. The fluttering strings were an eyesore to her ever after, and, passing and repassing, she would pause to give them a spiteful jerk, as much as to say, "There is that confounded yarn that gave me so much trouble."

From Pennsylvania, Vincent Barnard (to whom I am indebted for other curious facts) sent me this interesting story of an oriole. He says a friend of his, curious in such things, on observing the bird beginning to build, hung out near the prospective nest skeins of many-colored zephyr yarn, which the eager artist readily appropriated. He managed it so that the bird used nearly equal quantities of various high, bright colors. The nest was made unusually deep and capacious, and it may be questioned if such a thing of beauty was ever before woven by the cunning of a bird. . . .

LIFE ON THE MISSISSIPPI¹

CHAPTER VII

A DARING DEED

When I returned to the pilot-house St. Louis was gone, and I was lost. Here was a piece of river which was all down in my book, but I could make neither head nor tail of it; you understand, it was turned around. I had seen it when coming up-stream, but I had never faced about to see how it looked when it was behind me. My heart broke again, for it was plain that I had got to learn this troublesome river both ways.

The pilot-house was full of pilots, going down to "look at the river." What is called the "upper river" (the two hundred miles between St. Louis and Cairo, where the Ohio comes in) was low; and the Mississippi changes its channel so constantly that the pilots used to always find it necessary to run down to Cairo to take a fresh look, when their boats were to lie in port a week; that is, when the water was at a low stage. A deal of this "looking at the river" was done by poor fellows who seldom had a berth, and whose only hope of getting one lay in their being always freshly posted and therefore ready to drop into the shoes of some reputable pilot, for a single trip, on account of such pilot's sudden illness, or some other necessity. And a good many of them constantly ran up and down inspecting the river, not because they ever really hoped to get a berth, but because (they being guests of the boat) it was cheaper to "look at the river" than stay ashore and pay board. In time these fellows grew dainty in their tastes, and only infested boats that had an established reputation for setting good tables. All visiting pilots were useful, for they were always ready and willing, winter or summer, night or day, to go out in the yawl and help buoy the channel or assist the boat's pilot in any way they could. They were likewise welcome because all pilots are tireless talkers, when gathered together, and as they talk only about the river they are always understood and are always interesting. Your true pilot cares nothing about anything on earth but the river, and his pride in his occupation surpasses the pride of kings.

We had a fine company of these river inspectors along this trip. There were eight or ten, and there was abundance of room for them in our great pilot-house. Two or three of them wore polished silk hats, elaborate shirt-fronts, diamond breastpins, kid gloves, and patent-leather boots. They were choice in their English, and bore themselves with a dignity proper to men of solid means and prodigious reputation as pilots. The others were more or less loosely clad, and wore upon their heads tall felt cones that were suggestive of the days of the Commonwealth.

I was a cipher in this august company, and felt subdued, not to say torpid. I was not even of sufficient consequence to assist at the wheel when it was necessary to put the tiller hard down in a hurry; the guest that stood nearest did that when occasion required—and this was pretty much all the time, because of the crookedness of the channel and the scant water. I stood in a corner; and the talk I listened to took the hope all out of me. One visitor said to another:

"Jim, how did you run Plum Point, coming up?"

"It was in the night, there, and I ran it the way one of the boys on the Diana told me; started out about fifty yards above the wood-pile on the false point, and held on the cabin under Plum Point till I raised the reef—quarter less twain—then straightened up for the middle bar till I got well abreast the old one-limbed cottonwood in the bend, then got my stern on the cottonwood, and head on the low place above the point, and came through a-booming—nine and a half."

"Pretty square crossing, ain't it?"

"Yes, but the upper bar's working down fast."

Another pilot spoke up and said:

"I had better water than that, and ran it lower down; started out from the false point—mark twain—raised the second reef abreast the big snag in the bend, and had quarter less twain."

One of the gorgeous ones remarked:

"I don't want to find fault with your leadsmen, but that's a good deal of water for Plum Point, it seems to me."

There was an approving nod all around as this quiet snub dropped on the boaster and "settled" him. And so they went on talk-talk-talking. Meantime, the thing that was running in my mind was, "Now, if my ears hear aright, I have not only to get the names of all the towns and islands and bends, and so on, by heart, but I must even get up a personal acquaintanceship with every old snag and one-limbed cottonwood and obscure wood-pile that ornaments the banks of this river for twelve hundred miles; and more than that, I must actually know where these things are in the dark, unless these guests are gifted with eyes that can pierce through two miles of solid blackness. I wish the piloting business was in Jericho and I had never thought of it."

At dusk, Mr. Bixby tapped the big bell three times (the signal to land), and the captain emerged from his drawing-room in the forward end of the "texas," and looked up inquiringly. Mr. Bixby said:

"We will lay up here all night, captain."

"Very well, sir."

That was all. The boat came to 10 shore and was tied up for the night. It seemed to me a fine thing that the pilot could do as he pleased, without asking so grand a captain's permission. I took my supper and went immediately to bed, discouraged by my day's observations and experiences. My late voyage's note-bookings was but a confusion of meaningless names. It had tangled me all up in a knot every 20 time I had looked at it in the daytime. I now hoped for respite in sleep; but no, it reveled all through my head till sunrise again, a frantic and tireless nightmare.

Next morning I felt pretty rusty and low-spirited. We went booming along, taking a good many chances, for we were anxious to "get out of the river" (as getting on to Cairo was called) before night should overtake us. But Mr. Bixby's partner, the other pilot, presently grounded the boat, and we lost so much time getting her off that it was plain the darkness would overtake us a good long way above the mouth. This was a great misfortune, especially to certain of our visiting pilots, whose boats would have to wait for their return, no matter how long 40 that might be. It sobered the pilot-house talk a good deal. Coming up stream, pilots did not mind low water or any kind of darkness; nothing stopped them but fog. But downstream work was different; a boat was too nearly helpless, with a stiff current pushing behind her; so it was not customary to run down-stream at night in low water.

There seemed to be one small hope, however. If we could get through the intricate and dangerous Hat Island crossing before night, we could venture the rest, for we would have plainer sailing and better water. But it would be insanity to attempt Hat Island at night. So there was a good deal of looking at watches all the rest of the day, and a constant ciphering upon the speed we were making; Hat Island was the eternal subject; sometimes hope was high and sometimes we were delayed in a bad crossing, and down it went again. For hours all hands lay under the burden of this suppressed excitement; it was even communicated to me, and I got to feeling so solicitous about Hat Island, and under such an awful pressure of responsibility, that I wished I might have five minutes on shore to draw a good, full, relieving breath, and start over again. We were standing no regular watches. Each of our pilots ran such portions of the river as he had run when coming up-stream, because of his greater familiarity with it; but both remained in the pilot-house constantly.

An hour before sunset Mr. Bixby took the wheel, and Mr. W. stepped aside. For the next thirty minutes every man held his watch in his hand and was restless, silent, and uneasy. At last somebody said, with a doomsday sigh:

"Well, yonder's Hat Island—and we can't make it."

All the watches closed with a snap, everybody sighed and muttered something about its being "too bad, too bad—ah, if we could only have got here half an hour sooner!" and the place 40 was thick with the atmosphere of disappointment. Some started to go out, but loitered, hearing no bell-tap to land. The sun dipped behind the horizon, the boat went on. Inquiring looks passed from one guest to another; and one who had his hand on the door-knob and had turned it, waited, then presently took away his hand and let the knob turn back again. We bore 50 steadily down the bend. More looks were exchanged, and nods of surprised admiration—but no words. Insensibly the men drew together behind Mr. Bixby, as the sky darkened and one or two dim stars came out. The dead silence and sense of waiting became oppressive. Mr. Bixby pulled the cord, and two deep, mellow notes from the big bell floated off on the night. The watchman's voice followed, from the hurricane deck:

"Labboard lead, there! Stabboard lead!"

The cries of the leadsmen began to rise out of the distance, and were gruffly repeated by the word-passers on the hurricane deck.

"M-a-r-k three! M-a-r-k three! Quarter-less-three! Half twain! Quarter twain! M-a-r-k twain! Quarter-less——"

Mr. Bixby pulled two bell-ropes, and was answered by faint jinglings far below in the engine-room, and our speed slackened. The steam began to whistle through the gauge-cocks. The cries of the leadsmen went on—and it is a weird sound, always, in the night. Every pilot in the lot was watching now, with fixed eyes, and talking under his breath. Nobody was calm and easy but Mr. Bixby. He would put his wheel down and stand on a spoke, and as the steamer swung into her (to me) utterly invisible marks—for we seemed to be in the midst of a wide and gloomy sea—he would meet and fasten her there. Out of the murmur of half-audible talk, one caught a coherent sentence now and then—such as:

"There; she's over the first reef all right!"

After a pause, another subdued voice:

"Her stern's coming down just exactly right, by George!"

"Now she's in the marks; over she goes!"

Somebody else muttered:

"Oh, it was done beautiful—beautiful!"

Now the engines were stopped altogether, and we drifted with the current. Not that I could see the boat drift, for I could not, the stars being all gone by this time. The drifting was the dismalest work; it held one's heart still. Presently I discovered a blacker gloom than that which surrounded us. It was the head of the island. We were closing right down upon it. We entered its deeper shadow, and so imminent seemed the peril that I was likely to suffocate; and I had the strongest impulse to do something, anything, to save the vessel. But still Mr. Bixby stood by his wheel, silent, intent as a cat, and all the pilots stood shoulder to shoulder at his back.

"She'll not make it!" somebody whispered.

The water grew shoaler and shoaler, by the leadsmen's cries, till it was down to:

"Eight-and-a-half! E-i-g-h-t feet! E-i-g-h-t feet!"

"Seven-and——"

Mr. Bixby said warningly through his speaking tube to the engineer:

"Stand by, now!"

"Ay, ay, sir!"

"Seven-and-a-half! Seven feet! Six-and——"

We touched bottom! Instantly Mr. Bixby set a lot of bells ringing, shouted through the tube, "Now, let her have it—every ounce you've got!" Then to his partner, "Put her hard down! snatch her! snatch her!" The boat rasped and ground her way through the sand, hung upon the apex of disaster a single tremendous instant, and then over she went! And such a shout as went up at Mr. Bixby's back never loosened the roof of a pilot-house before!

There was no more trouble after that. Mr. Bixby was a hero that night; and it was some little time, too, before his exploit ceased to be talked about by the river men.

Fully to realize the marvelous precision required in laying the great steamer in her marks in that murky waste of water, one should know that not only must she pick her intricate way through snags and blind reefs, and then shave the head of the island so closely as to brush the overhanging foliage with her stern, but at one place she must pass almost within arm's reach of a sunken and invisible wreck that would snatch the hull timbers from under her if she should strike it, and destroy a quarter of a million dollars' worth of steamboat and cargo in five minutes, and maybe a hundred and fifty human lives into the bargain.

The last remark I heard that night was a compliment to Mr. Bixby uttered in soliloquy and with unction by one of our guests. He said:

"By the Shadow of Death, but he's a lightning pilot!"

CHAPTER VIII

PERPLEXING LESSONS

At the end of what seemed a tedious while, I had managed to pack my head full of islands, towns, bars, "points," and bends; and a curiously inanimate mass of lumber it was, too. However, inasmuch as I could shut my eyes and reel off a good long string of these names without leaving out more than ten miles of river in every fifty, I began to feel that I could take a boat down to New Orleans if I could make her skip those little gaps. But of course my complacency could hardly get start enough to lift my nose a trifle into the air, before Mr. Bixby would think of something to fetch it down again. One day he turned on me suddenly with this settler:

"What is the shape of Walnut Bend?"

He might as well have asked me my grandmother's opinion of protoplasm. I reflected respectfully, and then said I didn't know it had any particular shape. My gun-powdery chief went off with a bang, of course, and then went on loading and firing until he was out of adjectives.

I had learned long ago that he only carried just so many rounds of ammunition, and was sure to subside into a very placable and even remorseful old smoothbore as soon as they were all gone. That word "old" is merely affectionate; he was not more than thirty-four. I waited. By and by he said:

"My boy, you've got to know the shape of the river perfectly. It is all there is left to steer by on a very dark night. Everything else is blotted out and gone. But mind you, it hasn't the same shape in the night that it has in the daytime."

"How on earth am I ever going to learn it, then?"

"How do you follow a hall at home in the dark? Because you know the shape of it. You can't see it."

"Do you mean to say that I've got to know all the million trifling variations of shape in the banks of this interminable river as well as I know the shape of the front hall at home?"

"On my honor, you've got to know them better than any man ever did know the shapes of the halls in his own house."

"I wish I was dead!"

"Now I don't want to discourage you, but—"

"Well, pile it on me; I might as well have it now as another time."

"You see, this has got to be learned; there isn't any getting around it. A clear starlight night throws such heavy shadows that, if you didn't know the shape of a shore perfectly, you would claw away from every bunch of timber, because you would take the black shadow of it for a solid cape; and you see you would be getting scared to death every fifteen minutes by the watch. You would be fifty yards from shore all the time when you ought to be within fifty feet of it. You can't see a snag in one of those shadows, but you know exactly where it is, and the shape of the river tells you when you are coming to it. Then there's your pitch-dark night; the river is a very different shape on a pitch-dark night from what it is on a starlight night. All shores seem to be straight lines, then, and mighty dim ones, too; and you'd run them for straight lines, only you know better. You boldly drive your boat into what seems to be a solid, straight wall (you knowing very well that in reality there is a curve there), and that wall falls back and makes way for you. Then there's your gray mist. You take a night when there's one of these grisly, drizzly, gray mists, and then there isn't any particular shape to a shore. A gray mist would tangle the head of the oldest man that ever lived. Well, then, different kinds of moonlight change the shape of the river in different ways. You see——"

"Oh, don't say any more, please! Have I got to learn the shape of the river according to all these five hundred thousand different ways? If I tried to carry all that cargo in my head it would make me stoop-shouldered."

"No! you only learn the shape of the river; and you learn it with such absolute certainty that you can always steer by the shape that's in your head, and never mind the one that's before your eyes."

"Very well, I'll try it; but, after I have learned it, can I depend on it? Will it keep the same form and not go fooling around?"

Before Mr. Bixby could answer, Mr. W. came in to take the watch, and he said:

"Bixby, you'll have to look out for President's Island, and all that country clear away up above the Old Hen and Chickens. The banks are caving and the shape of the shores changing like everything. Why, you wouldn't know the point above 40. You can go up inside the old sycamore snag, now."

So that question was answered. Here were leagues of shore changing shape. My spirits were down in the mud again. Two things seemed pretty apparent to me. One was, that in order to be a pilot a man had got to learn more than any one man ought to be allowed to know; and the other was, that he must learn it all over again in a different way every twenty-four hours.

That night we had the watch until twelve. Now it was an ancient river custom for the two pilots to chat a bit when the watch changed. While the relieving pilot put on his gloves and lit his cigar, his partner, the retiring pilot, would say something like this:

"I judge the upper bar is making down a little at Hale's Point; had quarter twain with the lower lead and mark twain with the other."

"Met one abreast the head of 21, but she was away over hugging the bar, and I couldn't make her out entirely. 10 I took her for the Sunny South—hadn't any skylights forward of the chimneys."

And so on. And as the relieving pilot took the wheel his partner would mention that we were in such-and-such a bend, and say we were abreast of such-and-such a man's woodyard or plantation. This was courtesy; I supposed it was necessity. But Mr. W. came on watch full twelve minutes late on this particular night—a tremendous breach of etiquette; in fact, it is the unpardonable sin among pilots. So Mr. Bixby gave him no greeting whatever, but simply surrendered the wheel and marched out of the pilot-house without a word. I was appalled; it was a villainous night for blackness, we were in a particularly wide and blind part of the river, where there was no shape or substance to anything, and it seemed incredible that Mr. Bixby should have left that poor fellow to kill the boat, trying to find out where he was. But I resolved that I would stand by him anyway. He should find that he was not wholly friendless. So I stood around, and waited to be asked where we were. But Mr. W. plunged on serenely through the solid firmament of black cats that stood for an atmosphere, and never opened his mouth. "Here is a proud devil!" thought I; "here is a limb of Satan that would rather send us all to destruction than put himself under obligations to me, because I am not yet one of the salt of the earth and privileged to snub captains and lord it over everything dead and alive in a steamboat." I presently climbed upon the bench; I did not think it was safe to go to sleep while this lunatic was on watch.

However, I must have gone to sleep in the course of time, because the next thing I was aware of was the fact that day was breaking, Mr. W. gone, and Mr. Bixby at the wheel again. So it was four o'clock and all well—but me; I felt like a skinful of dry bones, and all of them trying to ache at once.

Mr. Bixby asked me what I had stayed up there for. I confessed that it was to do Mr. W. a benevolence—tell him where he was. It took five minutes for the entire preposterousness of the thing to filter into Mr. Bixby's system, and then I judge it filled him nearly up to the chin; because he paid me a compliment—and not much of a one either. He said:

"Well, taking you by and large, you do seem to be more different kinds of an ass than any creature I ever saw before. What did you suppose he wanted to know for?"

I said I thought it might be a convenience to him.

"Convenience! D—nation! Didn't I tell you that a man's got to know the river in the night the same as he'd know his own front hall?"

"Well, I can follow the front hall in the dark if I know it is the front hall; but suppose you set me down in the middle of it in the dark and not tell me which hall it is, how am I to know?"

"Well, you've got to, on the river!"

"All right. Then I'm glad I never said anything to Mr. W."

"I should say so! Why, he'd have slammed you through the window and utterly ruined a hundred dollars' worth of window-sash and stuff."

I was glad this damage had been saved, for it would have made me unpopular with the owners. They always hated anybody who had the name of being careless and injuring things.

I went to work now to learn the shape of the river; and of all the eluding and ungraspable objects that ever I tried to get mind or hands on, that was the chief. I would fasten my eyes upon a sharp, wooded point that projected far into the river some miles ahead of me, and go to laboriously photographing its shape in my brain; and just as I was beginning to succeed to my satisfaction, we would draw up toward it and the exasperating thing would begin to melt away and fold back into the bank! If there had been a conspicuous dead tree standing upon the very point of the cape, I would find that tree inconspicuously merged into the general forest, when I got abreast of it! No prominent hill would stick to its shape long enough for me to make up my mind what its form really was, but it was as dissolving and changeful as if it had been a mountain of butter in the hottest corner of the tropics. Nothing ever had the same shape when I was coming down-stream that it had borne when I went up. I mentioned these little difficulties to Mr. Bixby. He said:

"That's the very main virtue of the thing. If the shapes didn't change every three seconds they wouldn't be of any use. Take this place where we are now, for instance. As long as that hill over yonder is only one hill, I can boom right along the way I'm going; but the moment it splits at the tops and forms a V, I know I've got to scratch to starboard in a hurry, or I'll bang this boat's brains out against a rock; and then the moment one of the prongs of the V swing behind the other, I've got to waltz around to larboard again, or I'll have a misunderstanding with a snag that would snatch the keelson out of this steamboat as neatly as if it were a sliver in your hand. If that hill didn't change its shape on bad nights there would be an awful steamboat graveyard around here inside of a year."

It was plain that I had got to learn the shape of the river in all the different ways that could be thought of, —upside down, wrong end first, inside out, fore-and-aft, and "thort-ships,"—and then know what to do on gray nights when it hadn't any shape at all. So I set about it. In the course of time I began to get the best of this knotty lesson, and my self-complacency moved to the front once more. Mr. Bixby was all fixed and ready to start it to the rear again. He opened on me after this fashion:

"How much water did we have in the middle crossing at Hole-in-the-Wall, trip before last?"

I considered this an outrage. I said:

"Every trip, down and up, the leadsmen are singing through that tangled place for three-quarters of an hour on a stretch. How do you reckon I can remember such a mess as that?"

"My boy, you've got to remember it. You've got to remember the exact spot and the exact marks the boat lay in when we had the shoalest water, in every one of the five hundred shoal places between St. Louis and New Orleans; and you mustn't get the shoal soundings and marks of one trip mixed up with the shoal soundings and marks of another, either, for they're not often twice alike. You must keep them separate."

When I came to myself again, I said:

"When I get so that I can do that, I'll be able to raise the dead, and then I won't have to pilot a steamboat to make a living. I want to retire from this business. I want a slush-bucket and a brush; I'm only fit for a roustabout. I haven't got brains enough to be a pilot; and if I had I wouldn't have the strength to carry them around, unless I went on crutches."

"Now drop that! When I say I'll learn a man the river, I mean it. And you can depend on it, I'll learn him or kill him."

THE ADVENTURES OF HUCKLEBERRY FINN¹

CHAPTER X

After breakfast I wanted to talk about the dead man and guess out how he come to be killed, but Jim didn't want to. He said it would fetch bad luck; and besides, he said, he might come and ha'n't us; he said a man that warn't buried was more likely to go a-ha'n'ting around than one that was planted and comfortable. That sounded pretty reasonable, so I didn't say no more; but I couldn't keep from studying over it and wishing I knowed who shot the man, and what they done it for.

We rummaged the clothes we'd got, and found eight dollars in silver sewed up in the lining of an old blanket overcoat. Jim said he reckoned the people in that house stole the coat, because if they'd 'a' knowed the money was there they wouldn't 'a' left it. I said I reckoned they killed him, too; but Jim didn't want to talk about that. I says:

"Now you think it's bad luck; but what did you say when I fetched in the snake-skin that I found on the top of the ridge, day before yesterday? You said it was the worst bad luck in the world to touch a snake-skin with my hands. Well, here's your bad luck! We've raked in all this truck and eight dollars besides. I wish we could have some bad luck like this every day, Jim."

"Never you mind, honey, never you mind. Don't you git too peart. It's a comin'! Mind I tell you, it's a-comin'!"

It did come, too. It was a Tuesday that we had that talk. Well, after dinner Friday we was laying around in the grass at the upper end of the ridge, and got out of tobacco. I went to the cavern to get some, and found a rattlesnake in there. I killed him, and curled him up on the foot of Jim's blanket, ever so natural, thinking there'd be some fun when Jim found him there. Well, by night I forgot all about the snake, and when Jim flung himself down on the blanket while I struck a light the snake's mate was there, and bit him.

He jumped up yelling, and the first thing the light showed was the varmint curled up and ready for another spring. I laid him out in a second with a stick, and Jim grabbed pap's whiskey-jug and begun to pour it down.

He was barefooted, and the snake bit him right on the heel. That all comes of my being such a fool as to not remember that wherever you leave a dead snake its mate always comes there and curls around it. Jim told me to chop off the snake's head and throw it away, and then skin the body and roast a piece of it. I done it, and he eat it and said it would help cure him. He made me take off the rattles and tie them around his wrist, too. He said that that would help. Then I slid out 10 quiet and throwed the snakes clear away amongst the bushes; for I warn't going to let Jim find out it was all my fault, not if I could help it.

Jim sucked and sucked at the jug, and now and then he got out of his head and pitched around and yelled; but every time he come to himself he went to sucking at the jug again. His foot swelled up pretty big, and so did 20 his leg; but by and by the drunk begun to come, and so I judged he was all right; but I'd druther been bit with a snake than pap's whiskey.

Jim was laid up for four days and nights. Then the swelling was all gone and he was around again. I made up my mind I wouldn't ever take a-holt of a snake-skin again with my hands, now that I see what had come of it. 30 Jim said he reckoned I would believe him next time. And he said that handling a snake-skin was such awful bad luck that maybe we hadn't got to the end of it yet. He said he'd ruther see the new moon over his left shoulder as much as a thousand times than take up a snake-skin in his hand. Well, I was getting to feel that way myself, though I've always reckoned that look- 40 ing at the new moon over your left shoulder is one of the carelessst and foolishst things a body can do. Old Hank Bunker done it once, and bragged about it; and in less than two years he got drunk and fell off of the shot-tower, and spread himself out so that he was just a kind of a layer, as you may say; and they slid him edgeways between two barn doors for a coffin, 50 and buried him so, so they say; but I didn't see it. Pap told me. But anyway, it all come of looking at the moon that way, like a fool.

Well, the days went along, and the river went down between its banks again; and about the first thing we done was to bait one of the big hooks with a skinned rabbit and set it and catch a catfish that was as big as a man, being six foot two inches long, and weighed over two hundred pounds. We couldn't handle him, of course, he would 'a' flung us into Illinois. We just set there and watched him rip and tear around till he drowned. We found a brass button in his stomach and a round ball, and lots of rubbage. We split the ball open with the hatchet, and there was a spool in it. Jim said he'd had it there a long time, to coat it over so and make a ball of it. It was as big a fish as was ever catched in the Mississippi, I reckon. Jim said he hadn't ever seen a bigger one. He would 'a' been worth a good deal over at the village. They peddle out such a fish as that by the pound in the market-house there; everybody buys some of him; his meat's as white as snow and makes a good fry.

Next morning I said it was getting slow and dull, and I wanted to get a stirring-up some way. I said I reckoned I would slip over the river and find out what was going on. Jim liked that notion; but he said I must go in the dark and look sharp. Then he studied it over and said, couldn't I put on some of them old things and dress up like a girl? That was a good notion, too. So we shortened up one of the calico gowns, and I turned up my 40 trouser-legs to my knees and got into it. Jim hitched it behind with the hooks, and it was a fair fit. I put on the sunbonnet and tied it under my chin, and then for a body to look in and see my face was like looking down a joint of stovepipe. Jim said nobody would know me, even in the daytime, hardly. I practised around all day to get the hang of the things, and by and by I could do pretty well in them, only Jim said I didn't walk like a girl; and he said I must quit pulling up my gown to get at my britches-pocket. I took notice, and done better.

I started up the Illinois shore in the canoe just after dark.

I started across to the town from a little below the ferry-landing, and the drift of the current fetched me in at the bottom of the town. I tied up and started along the bank. There was a light burning in a little shanty that hadn't been lived in for a long time, and I wondered who had took up quarters there. I slipped up and peeped in at the window. There was a woman about forty year old in there knitting by a candle that was on a pine table. I didn't know her face; she was a stranger, for you couldn't start a face in that town that I didn't know. Now this was lucky, because I was weakening; I was getting afraid I had come; people might know my voice and find me out. But if this woman had been in such a little town two days she could tell me all I wanted to know; so I knocked at the door, and made up my mind I wouldn't forget I was a girl.

CHAPTER XI

"Come in," says the woman, and I did. She says: "Take a cheer."

I done it. She looked me all over with her little shiny eyes, and says:

"What might your name be?"

"Sarah Williams."

"Where'bouts do you live? In the neighborhood?"

"No'm. In Hookerville, seven mile below. I've walked all the way and I'm all tired out."

"Hungry, too, I reckon. I'll find you something."

"No'm, I ain't hungry. I was so hungry I had to stop two miles below here at a farm; so I ain't hungry no more. It's what makes me so late. My mother's down sick, and out of money and everything, and I come to tell my uncle Abner Moore. He lives at the upper end of the town, she says. I hain't ever been here before. Do you know him?"

"No; but I don't know everybody yet. I haven't lived here quite two weeks. It's a considerable ways to the upper end of the town. You better stay here all night. Take off your bonnet."

"No," says I; "I'll rest awhile, I reckon, and go on. I ain't afeard of the dark."

She said she wouldn't let me go by myself, but her husband would be in by and by, maybe in a hour and a half, and she'd send him along with me. Then she got to talking about her husband, and about her relations up the river, and her relations down the river, and about how much better off they used to was, and how they didn't know but they'd made a mistake coming to our town, instead of letting well alone—and so on and so on, till I was afeard I had made a mistake coming to her to find out what was going on in the town; but by and by she dropped on to pap and the murder, and then I was pretty willing to let her clatter right along. She told about me and Tom Sawyer finding the twelve thousand dollars (only she got it twenty) and all about pap and what a hard lot he was, and what a hard lot I was, and at last she got down to where I was murdered. I says:

"Who done it? We've heard considerable about these goings-on down in Hookerville, but we don't know who 'twas that killed Huck Finn."

"Well, I reckon there's a right smart chance of people here that'd like to know who killed him. Some think old Finn done it himself."

"No—is that so?"

"Most everybody thought it at first. He'll never know how nigh he come to getting lynched. But before night they changed around and judged it was done by a runaway nigger named Jim."

"Why he——"

I stopped. I reckoned I better keep still. She run on, and never noticed I had put in at all:

"The nigger run off the very night Huck Finn was killed. So there's a reward out for him—three hundred dollars. And there's a reward out for old Finn, too—two hundred dollars. You see, he come to town the morning after the murder, and told about it, and was out with 'em on the ferry-boat hunt, and right away after he up and left. Before night they wanted to lynch him, but he was gone, you see. Well, next day they found out the nigger was gone; they found out he hadn't ben seen sence ten o'clock the night the murder was done. So then they put it on him, you see; and while they was full of it, next day, back comes old Finn, and went boo-hooing to Judge Thatcher to get money to hunt for the nigger all over Illinois with. The judge gave him some, and that evening he got drunk, and was around till after midnight with a couple of mighty hard-looking strangers, and then went off with them. Well, he ain't come back sence, and they ain't looking for him back till this thing blows over a little, for people thinks now that he killed his boy and fixed things so folks would think robbers done it, and then he'd get Huck's money without having to bother a long time with a lawsuit. People do say he warn't any too good to do it. Oh, he's sly, I reckon. If he don't come back for a year he'll be all right. You can't prove anything on him, you know; everything will be quieted down then, and he'll walk in Huck's money as easy as nothing."

"Yes, I reckon so, 'm. I don't see nothing in the way of it. Has everybody quit thinking the nigger done it?"

"Oh, no, not everybody. A good many thinks he done it. But they'll get the nigger pretty soon now, and maybe they can scare it out of him."

"Why, are they after him yet?"

"Well, you're innocent, ain't you? Does three hundred dollars lay around every day for people to pick up? Some folks think the nigger ain't far from here. I'm one of them—but I hain't talked it around. A few days ago I was talking with an old couple that lives next door in the log shanty, and they happened to say hardly anybody ever goes to that island over yonder that they call Jackson's Island. Don't anybody live there? says I. No, nobody, says they. I didn't say any more, but I done some thinking. I was pretty near certain I'd seen smoke over there, about the head of the island, a day or two before that, so I says to myself, like as not that nigger's hiding over there; anyway, says I, it's worth the trouble to give the place a hunt. I hain't seen any smoke sence, so I reckon maybe he's gone, if it was him; but husband's going over to see—him and another man. He was gone up the river; but he got back to-day, and I told him as soon as he got here two hours ago."

I had got so uneasy I couldn't set still. I had to do something with my hands; so I took up a needle off of the table and went to threading it. My hands shook, and I was making a bad job of it. When the woman stopped talking I looked up, and she was looking at me pretty curious and smiling a little. I put down the needle and thread, and let on to be interested—and I was, too—and says:

"Three hundred dollars is a power of money. I wish my mother could get it. Is your husband going over there to-night?"

"Oh, yes. He went up-town with the man I was telling you of, to get a boat and see if they could borrow another gun. They'll go over after midnight."

"Couldn't they see better if they was to wait till daytime?"

"Yes. And couldn't the nigger see better, too? After midnight he'll likely be asleep, and they can slip around through the woods and hunt up his campfire all the better for the dark, if he's got one."

"I didn't think of that."

The woman kept looking at me pretty curious, and I didn't feel a bit comfortable. Pretty soon she says:

"What did you say your name was, honey?"

"M—Mary Williams."

Somehow it didn't seem to me that I said it was Mary before, so I didn't look up—seemed to me I said it was Sarah; so I felt sort of cornered, and was afeard maybe I was looking it, too.

I wished the woman would say something more; the longer she set still the uneasier I was. But now she says:

"Honey, I thought you said it was Sarah when you first come in?"

"Oh, yes'm, I did. Sarah Mary Williams. Sarah's my first name. Some calls me Sarah, some calls me Mary."

"Oh, that's the way of it?"

"Yes'm."

I was feeling better then, but I wished I was out of there, anyway. I couldn't look up yet.

Well, the woman fell to talking about how hard times was, and how poor they had to live, and how the rats was as free as if they owned the place, and so forth and so on, and then I got easy again. She was right about the rats. You'd see one stick his nose out of a hole in the corner every little while. She said she had to have things handy to throw at them when she was alone, or they wouldn't give her no peace. She showed me a bar of lead twisted up into a knot, and said she was a good shot with it generly, but she'd wrenched her arm a day or two ago, and didn't know whether she could throw true now. But she watched for a chance, and directly banged away at a rat; but she missed him wide, and said, "Ouch!" it hurt her arm so. Then she told me to try for the next one. I wanted to be getting away before the old man got back, but of course I didn't let on. I got the thing, and the first rat that showed his nose I let drive, and if he'd 'a' stayed where he was he'd 'a' been a tolerable sick rat. She said that was first-rate, and she reckoned I would hive the next one. She went and got the lump of lead and fetched it back, and brought along a hank of yarn which she wanted me to help her with. I held up my two hands and she put the hank over them, and went on talking about her husband's matters. But she broke off to say:

"Keep your eye on the rats. You better have the lead in your lap, handy."

So she dropped the lump into my lap just at that moment, and I clapped my legs together on it, and she went on talking. But only about a minute. Then she took off the hank and looked me straight in the face, and very pleasant, and says:

"Come, now, what's your real name?"

"Wh-hat, mum?"

"What's your real name? Is it Bill, or Tom, or Bob?—or what is it?"

I reckon I shook like a leaf, and I didn't know hardly what to do. But I says:

"Please to don't poke fun at a poor girl like me, mum. If I'm in the way here, I'll——"

"No, you won't. Set down and stay where you are. I ain't going to hurt you, and I ain't going to tell on you, nuther. You just tell me your secret, and trust me. I'll keep it; and, what's more, I'll help you. So'll my old man if you want him to. You see, you're a runaway 'prentice, that's all. It ain't anything. There ain't no harm in it. You've been treated bad, and you made up your mind to cut. Bless you, child, I wouldn't tell on you. Tell me all about it now, that's a good boy."

So I said it wouldn't be no use to try to play it any longer, and I would just make a clean breast and tell her everything, but she mustn't go back on her promise. Then I told her my father and mother was dead, and the law had bound me out to a mean old farmer in the country thirty mile back from the river, and he treated me so bad I couldn't stand it no longer; he went away to be gone a couple of days, and so I took my chance and stole some of his daughter's old clothes and cleared out, and I had been three nights coming the thirty miles. I traveled nights, and hid daytimes and slept, and the bag of bread and meat I carried from home lasted me all the way, and I had a-plenty. I said I believed my uncle Abner Moore would take care of me, and so that was why I struck out for this town of Goshen.

"Goshen, child? This ain't Goshen. This is St. Petersburg. Goshen's ten mile further up the river. Who told you this was Goshen?"

"Why, a man I met at daybreak this morning, just as I was going to turn into the woods for my regular sleep. He told me when the roads forked I must take the right hand, and five mile would fetch me to Goshen."

"He was drunk, I reckon. He told you just exactly wrong."

"Well, he did act like he was drunk, but it ain't no matter now. I got to be moving along. I'll fetch Goshen before 10 daylight."

"Hold on a minute. I'll put you up a snack to eat. You might want it."

So she put me up a snack, and says:

"Say, when a cow's laying down, which end of her gets up first? Answer up prompt now—don't stop to study over it. Which end gets up first?"

"The hind end, mum."

"Well, then, a horse?"

"The for'ard end, mum."

"Which side of a tree does the moss grow on?"

"North side."

"If fifteen cows is browsing on a hillside, how many of them eats with their heads pointed the same direction?"

"The whole fifteen, mum."

"Well, I reckon you have lived in the 30 country. I thought maybe you was trying to hocus me again. What's your real name, now?"

"George Peters, mum."

"Well, try to remember it, George. Don't forget and tell me it's Elexander before you go, and then get out by saying it's George Alexander when I catch you. And don't go about women in that old calico. You do a girl tolerable 40 poor, but you might fool men, maybe. Bless you, child, when you set out to thread a needle don't hold the thread still and fetch the needle up to it; hold the needle still and poke the thread at it; that's the way a woman most always does, but a man always does t'other way. And when you throw at a rat or anything, hitch yourself up a-tiptoe and fetch your hand up over your head 50 as awkward as you can, and miss your rat about six or seven foot. Throw stiff-armed from the shoulder, like there was a pivot there for it to turn on, like a girl; not from the wrist and elbow, with your arm out to one side, like a boy. And, mind you, when a girl tries to catch anything in her lap she throws her knees apart; she don't clap them together, the way you did when you caught the lump of lead. Why, I spotted you for a boy when you was threading the needle; and I contrived the other things just to make certain. Now trot along to your uncle, Sarah Mary Williams George Elexander Peters, and if you get into trouble you send word to Mrs. Judith Loftus, which is me, and I'll do what I can to get you out of it. Keep the river road all the way, and next time you tramp take shoes and socks with you. The river road's a rocky one, and your feet'll be 20 in a condition when you get to Goshen, I reckon."

I went up the bank about fifty yards, and then I doubled on my tracks and slipped back to where my canoe was, a good piece below the house. I jumped in, and was off in a hurry. I went upstream far enough to make the head of the island, and then started across. I took off the sun-bonnet, for I didn't want no blinders on then. When I was about the middle I heard the clock begin to strike, so I stops and listens; the sound come faint over the water but clear—eleven. When I struck the head of the island I never waited to blow, though I was most winded, but I shoved right into the timber where my old camp used to be, and started a good fire there on a high and dry spot.

Then I jumped in the canoe and dug out for our place, a mile and a half below, as hard as I could go. I landed, and slopped through the timber and up the ridge and into the cavern. There Jim laid, sound asleep on the ground. I roused him out and says:

"Git up and hump yourself, Jim! There ain't a minute to lose. They're after us!"

Jim never asked no questions, he never said a word; but the way he worked for the next half an hour showed about how he was scared. By that time everything we had in the world was on our raft, and she was ready to be shoved out from the willow cove where she was hid. We put out the camp-fire at the cavern the first thing, and didn't show a candle outside after that.

I took the canoe out from the shore a little piece, and took a look; but if there was a boat around I couldn't see it, for stars and shadows ain't good to see by. Then we got out the raft and slipped along down in the shade, past the foot of the island dead still—never saying a word.

CHAPTER XII

It must 'a' been close onto one o'clock when we got below the island at last, and the raft did seem to go mighty slow. If a boat was to come along we was going to take to the canoe and break for the Illinois shore; and it was well a boat didn't come, for we hadn't ever thought to put the gun in the canoe, or a fishing-line, or anything to eat. We was in ruther too much of a sweat to think of so many things. It warn't good judgment to put everything on the raft.

If the men went to the island I just expect they found the camp-fire I built, and watched it all night for Jim to come. Anyways, they stayed away from us, and if my building the fire never fooled them it warn't no fault of mine. I played it as low down on them as I could.

When the first streak of day began to show we tied up to a tow-head in a big bend on the Illinois side, and hacked off cottonwood branches with the hatchet, and covered up the raft with them so she looked like there had been a cave-in in the bank there. A towhead is a sand-bar that has cottonwoods on it as thick as harrow-teeth.

We had mountains on the Missouri shore and heavy timber on the Illinois side, and the channel was down the Missouri shore at that place, so we warn't afraid of anybody running across us. We laid there all day, and watched the rafts and steamboats spin down the Missouri shore, and up-bound steamboats fight the big river in the middle. I told Jim all about the time I had jabbering with that woman; and Jim said she was a smart one, and if she was to start after us herself she wouldn't set down and watch a camp-fire—no, sir, she'd fetch a dog. Well, then, I said, why couldn't she tell her husband to fetch a dog? Jim said he bet she did think of it by the time the men was ready to start, and he believed they must 'a' gone up-town to get a dog and so they lost all that time, or else we wouldn't be here on a tow-head sixteen or seventeen mile below the village—no, indeedy, we would be in that same old town again. So I said I didn't care what was the reason they didn't get us as long as they didn't.

When it was beginning to come on dark we poked our heads out of the cottonwood thicket, and looked up and down and across; nothing in sight; so Jim took up some of the top planks of the raft and built a snug wigwam to get under in blazing weather and rainy, and to keep the things dry. Jim made a floor for the wigwam, and raised it a foot or more above the level of the raft, so now the blankets and all the traps was out of reach of steamboat waves. Right in the middle of the wigwam we made a layer of dirt about five or six inches deep with a frame around it for to hold it to its place; this was to build a fire on in sloppy weather or chilly; the wigwam would keep it from being seen. We made an extra steering-oar too, because one of the others might get broken on a snag or something. We fixed up a short forked stick to hang the old lantern on, because we must always light the lantern whenever we see a steamboat coming down-stream, to keep from getting run over; but we wouldn't have to light it for up-stream boats unless we see we was in what they call a "crossing"; for the river was pretty high yet, very low banks being still a little under water; so up-bound boats didn't always run the channel, but hunted easy water.

This second night we run between seven and eight hours, with a current that was making over four mile an hour. We caught fish and talked, and we took a swim now and then to keep off sleepiness. It was kind of solemn, drifting along down the big, still river, laying on our backs looking up at the stars, and we didn't ever feel like talking aloud, and it warn't often that we laughed—only a little kind of a low chuckle. We had mighty good weather, as a general thing, and nothing ever happened to us at all—that night, nor the next, nor the next.

Every night we passed towns, some of them away up on black hillsides, nothing but just a shiny bed of lights, not a house could you see. The fifth night we passed St. Louis, and it was like the whole world lit up. In St. Petersburg they used to say there was twenty or thirty thousand people in St. Louis, but I never believed it till I see that wonderful spread of lights at two o'clock that still night. There warn't a sound there; everybody was asleep.

Every night now I used to slip ashore toward ten o'clock at some little village, and buy ten or fifteen cents' worth of meal or bacon or other stuff to eat; and sometimes I lifted a chicken that warn't roosting comfortable, and took him along. Pap always said, take a chicken when you get a chance, because if you don't want him yourself you can easy find somebody that does, and a good deed ain't never forgot. I never see pap when he didn't want the chicken himself, but that is what he used to say, anyway.

Mornings before daylight I slipped into corn-fields and borrowed a watermelon, or a mushmelon, or a punkin, or some new corn, or things of that kind. Pap always said it warn't no harm to borrow things if you was meaning to pay them back some time; but the widow said it warn't anything but a soft name for stealing, and no decent body would do it. Jim said he reckoned the widow was partly right and pap was partly right; so the best way would be for us to pick out two or three things from the list and say we wouldn't borrow them any more—then he reckoned it wouldn't be no harm to borrow the others. So we talked it over all one night, drifting along down the river, trying to make up our minds whether to drop the watermelons, or the cantelopes, or the mushmelons, or what. But toward daylight we got it all settled satisfactorily, and concluded to drop crab-apples and p'simmons. We warn't feeling just right before that, but it was all comfortable now. I was glad the way it come out, too, because crab-apples ain't very good, and the p'simmons wouldn't be ripe for two or three months yet.

We shot a water-fowl now and then that got up too early or didn't go to bed early enough in the evening. Take it all round, we lived pretty high.

The fifth night below St. Louis we had a big storm after midnight, with a power of thunder and lightning, and the rain poured down in a solid sheet. We stayed in the wigwam and let the raft take care of itself. When the lightning glared out we could see a big straight river ahead, and high, rocky bluffs on both sides. By and by, says I, "Hel-lo, Jim, looky yonder!" It was a steamboat that had killed herself on a rock. We was drifting straight down for her. The lightning showed her very distinct. She was leaning over, with part of her upper deck above water, and you could see every little chimbley-guy clean and clear, and a chair by the big bell, with an old slouch hat hanging on the back of it, when the flashes come.

Well, it being away in the night and stormy, and all so mysterious-like, I felt just the way any other boy would 'a' felt when I seen that wreck laying there so mournful and lonesome in the middle of the river. I wanted to get aboard of her and slink around a little, and see what there was there. So I says:

"Le's land on her, Jim."

But Jim was dead against it at first. He says:

"I doan' want to go foolin' 'long er no wrack. We's doin' blame' well, en

we better let blame' well alone, as de good book says. Like as not dey's a watchman on dat wrack."

"Watchman your grandmother," I says; "there ain't nothing to watch but the texas¹ and the pilothouse; and do you reckon anybody's going to resk his life for a texas and a pilothouse such a night as this, when it's likely to break up and wash off down the river any 10 minute?" Jim couldn't say nothing to that, so he didn't try. "And besides," I says, "we might borrow something worth having out of the captain's stateroom. Seegars, I bet you—and cost five cents apiece, solid cash. Steamboat captains is always rich, and get sixty dollars a month, and they don't care a cent what a thing costs, you know, long as they want it. Stick a 20 candle in your pocket; I can't rest, Jim, till we give her a rummaging. Do you reckon Tom Sawyer would ever go by this thing? Not for pie, he wouldn't. He'd call it an adventure—that's what he'd call it; and he'd land on that wreck if it was his last act. And wouldn't he throw style into it?—wouldn't he spread himself, nor nothing? Why, you'd think it was Christopher C'lumbus discovering Kingdom Come. I wish 30 Tom Sawyer was here."

Jim he grumbled a little, but give in. He said we mustn't talk any more than we could help, and then talk mighty low. The lightning showed us the wreck again just in time, and we fetched the stabboard derrick, and made fast there.

The deck was high out here. We 40 went sneaking down the slope of it to labboard, in the dark, towards the texas, feeling our way slow with our feet, and spreading our hands out to fend off the guys, for it was so dark we couldn't see no sign of them. Pretty soon we struck the forward end of the skylight, and clumb on to it; and the next step fetched us in front of the captain's door, which was open, and by 50 Jimminy, away down through the texas-hall we see a light! and all in the same second we seem to hear low voices in yonder!

Jim whispered and said he was feeling powerful sick, and told me to come along. I says, all right, and was going to start for the raft; but just then I heard a voice wail out and say:

"Oh, please don't, boys; I swear I won't ever tell!"

Another voice said, pretty loud:

"It's a lie, Jim Turner. You've acted this way before. You always want mor'n your share of the truck, and you've always got it, too, because you've swore 't if you didn't you'd tell. But this time you've said it just one time too many. You're the meanest, treacherousest hound in this country."

By this time Jim was gone for the 20 raft. I was just-a-biling with curiosity; and I says to myself, Tom Sawyer wouldn't back out now, and so I won't either; I'm a-going to see what's going on here. So I dropped on my hands and knees in the little passage, and crept aft in the dark till there warn't but one stateroom betwixt me and the cross-hall of the texas. Then in there I see a man stretched on the floor and tied hand and foot, and two men standing over him, and one of them had a dim lantern in his hand, and the other one had a pistol. This one kept pointing the pistol at the man's head on the floor, saying:

"I'd like to! And I orter, too—a mean skunk!"

The man on the floor would shrivel up and say.

"Oh, please don't, Bill; I hain't ever going to tell."

And every time he said that the man with the lantern would laugh and say:

"Deed you ain't! You never said no truer thing 'n that, you bet you." And once he said: "Hear him beg! and yit if we hadn't got the best of him and tied him he'd 'a' killed us both. And what 50 for? Jist for nothin'. Jist because we stood on our rights—that's what for. But I lay you ain't a-goin' to threaten nobody any more, Jim Turner. Put up that pistol, Bill."

Bill says:

¹a structure on the upper deck containing officers' cabins, etc.

"I don't want to, Jake Packard. I'm for killin' him—and didn't he kill old Hatfield jist for the same way—and don't he deserve it?"

"But I don't want him killed, and I've got my reasons for it."

"Bless yo' heart for them words, Jake Packard! I'll never forgit you long's I live!" says the man on the floor, sort of blubbering.

Packard didn't take no notice of that, but hung up his lantern on a nail and started toward where I was, there in the dark, and motioned Bill to come. I crawfished as fast as I could about two yards, but the boat slanted so that I couldn't make very good time, so to keep from getting run over and caught I crawled into a stateroom on the upper side. The man came a-pawing along in the dark, and when Packard got to my stateroom, he says:

"Here—come in here."

And in he come, and Bill after him. But before they got in I was up in the upper berth, cornered, and sorry I come. Then they stood there, with their hands on the ledge of the berth, and talked. I couldn't see them, but I could tell where they was by the whiskey they'd been having. I was glad I didn't drink whiskey; but it wouldn't made much difference anyway, because most of the time they couldn't 'a' treed me because I didn't breathe. I was too scared. And, besides, a body couldn't breathe and hear such talk. They talked low and earnest. Bill wanted to kill Turner. He says:

"He's said he'll tell, and he will. If we was to give both our shares to him now it wouldn't make no difference after the row and the way we've served him. Shore's you're born, he'll turn state's evidence; now you hear me. I'm for putting him out of his troubles."

"So'm I," says Packard, very quiet.

"Blame it, I'd sorter begun to think you wasn't. Well, then, that's all right. Le's go and do it."

"Hold on a minute; I hain't had my say yit. You listen to me. Shooting's good, but there's quieter ways if the thing's got to be done. But what I say is this: it ain't good sense to go court'n' around after a halter if you can git at what you're up to in some way that's just as good and at the same time don't bring you into no resks. Ain't that so?"

"You bet it is. But how you goin' to manage it this time?"

"Well, my idea is this: we'll rustle around and gather up whatever pick-in's we've overlooked in the staterooms, and shove for shore and hide the truck. Then we'll wait. Now I say it ain't a-goin' to be more'n two hours befo' this wrack breaks up and washes off down the river. See? He'll be drowned, and won't have nobody to blame for it but his own self. I reckon that's a considerable sight better 'n killin' him. I'm unfavorable to killin' a man as long as you can git aroun' it; it ain't good sense, it ain't good morals. Ain't I right?"

"Yes, I reck'n you are. But s'pose she don't break up and wash off?"

"Well, we can wait the two hours anyway and see, can't we?"

"All right, then; come along."

So they started, and I lit out, all in a cold sweat, and scrambled forward. It was dark as pitch there; but I said, in a kind of a coarse whisper, "Jim!" and he answered up, right at my elbow, with a sort of a moan, and I says:

"Quick, Jim, it ain't no time for fooling around and moaning; there's a gang of murderers in yonder, and if we don't hunt up their boat and set her drifting down the river so these fellows can't get away from the wreck there's one of 'em going to be in a bad fix. But if we find their boat we can put all of 'em in a bad fix—for the sheriff'll get 'em. Quick—hurry! I'll hunt the labboard side, you hunt the stabboard. You start at the raft, and——"

"Oh, my lordy, lordy! Raf'? Dey ain't no raf' no mo'; she done broke loose en gone!—en here we is!"

CHAPTER XIII

Well, I catched my breath and most fainted. Shut up on a wreck with such a gang as that! But it warn't no time to be sentimentering. We'd got to find that boat now—had to have it for ourselves. So we went a-quaking and shaking down the stabboard side, and slow work it was, too—seemed a week before we got to the stern. No sign of a boat. Jim said he didn't believe he could go any farther—so scared he hadn't hardly any strength left, he said. But I said, come on, if we get left on this wreck we are in a fix, sure. So on we prowled again. We struck for the stern of the texas, and found it, and then scrabbled along forwards on the skylight, hanging on from shutter to shutter, for the edge of the skylight was in the water. When we got pretty close to the cross-hall door there was the skiff, sure enough! I could just barely see her. I felt ever so thankful. In another second I woud'a' been aboard of her, but just then the door opened. One of the men stuck his head out only about a couple of foot from me, and I thought I was gone; but he jerked it in again, and says:

"Heave that blame lantern out o' sight, Bill!"

He flung a bag of something into the boat, and then got himself in and set down. It was Packard. Then Bill he come out and got in. Packard says, in a low voice:

"All ready—shove off!"

I couldn't hardly hang on to the shutters, I was so weak. But Bill says:

"Hold on—'d you go through him?"

"No. Didn't you?"

"No. So he's got his share o' the cash yet."

"Well, then, come along; no use to take truck and leave money."

"Say, won't he suspicion what we're up to?"

"Maybe he won't. But we got to have it anyway. Come along."

So they got out and went in.

The door slammed to because it was on the careened side; and in a half second I was in the boat, and Jim come tumbling after me. I out with my knife and cut the rope, and away we went!

We didn't touch an oar, and we didn't speak nor whisper, nor hardly even breathe. We went gliding swift along, dead silent, past the tip of the paddle-box, and past the stern; then in a second or two more we was a hundred yards below the wreck, and the darkness soaked her up, every last sign of her, and we was safe, and knowed it.

When we was three or four hundred yards downstream we see the lantern show like a little spark at the texas door for a second, and we knowed by that that the rascals had missed their boat, and was beginning to understand that they was in just as much trouble now as Jim Turner was.

Then Jim manned the oars, and we took out after our raft. Now was the first time that I begun to worry about the men—I reckon I hadn't had time to before. I begun to think how dreadful it was, even for murderers, to be in such a fix. I says to myself, there ain't no telling but I might come to be a murderer myself yet, and then how would I like it? So says I to Jim:

"The first light we see we'll land a hundred yards below it or above it, in a place where it's a good hiding place for you and the skiff, and then I'll go and fix up some kind of a yarn, and get somebody to go for that gang and get them out of their scrape, so they can be hung when their time comes."

But that idea was a failure; for pretty soon it begun to storm again, and this time worse than ever. The rain poured down, and never a light showed; everybody in bed, I reckon. We boomed along down the river, watching for lights and watching for our raft. After a long time the rain let up, but the clouds stayed, and the lightning kept whimpering, and by and by a flash showed us a black thing ahead, floating, and we made for it.

It was the raft, and mighty glad was we to get aboard it again. We seen a light now away down to the right, on shore. So I said I would go for it. The skiff was half full of plunder which that gang had stole there on the wreck. We hustled it on to the raft in a pile, and I told Jim to float along down, and show a light when he judged he had gone about two mile, and keep it burning till I come; then I manned my oars and shoved for the light. As I got down towards it three or four more showed—up on a hillside. It was a village. I closed in above the shore light, and laid on my oars and floated. As I went by I see it was a lantern hanging on the jackstaff of a double-hull ferryboat. I skimmed around for the watchman, a-wondering whereabouts he slept; and by and by I found him roosting on the bitts forward, with his head down between his knees. I gave his shoulder two or three little shoves, and begun to cry.

He stirred up in a kind of a startlish way; but when he see it was only me he took a good gap and stretch, and he says:

"Hello, what's up? Don't cry, bub. What's the trouble?"

I says:

"Pap, and mam, and sis, and——"

Then I broke down. He says:

"Oh, dang it now, don't take on so; we all has to have our troubles, and this'n 'll come out all right. What's the matter with 'em?"

"They're — they're — are you the watchman of the boat?"

"Yes," he says, kind of pretty-well-satisfied like. "I'm the captain and the owner and the mate and the pilot and watchman and head deck-hand; and sometimes I'm the freight and passengers. I ain't as rich as old Jim Hornback, and I can't be so blame' generous and good to Tom, Dick, and Harry as what he is, and slam around money the way he does; but I've told him many a time 't I wouldn't trade places with him; for, says I, a sailor's life's the life for me, and I'm derved if I'd live two miles out of town, where there ain't nothing ever goin' on, not for all his spondulicks and as much more on top of it. Says I——"

I broke in and says:

"They're in an awful peck of trouble, and——"

"Who is?"

"Why, pap and mam and sis and Miss Hooker; and if you'd take your ferryboat and go up there——"

"Up where? Where are they?"

"On the wreck."

"What wreck?"

"Why, there ain't but one."

"What, you don't mean the Walter Scott?"

"Yes."

"Good land! what are they doin' there, for gracious sakes?"

"Well, they didn't go there a-purpose."

"I bet they didn't! Why, great goodness, there ain't no chance for 'em if they don't git off mighty quick! Why, how in the nation did they ever git into such a scrape?"

"Easy enough. Miss Hooker was a-visiting up there to the town——"

"Yes, Booth's Landing—go on."

"She was a-visiting there at Booth's Landing, and just in the edge of the evening she started over with her nigger woman in the horse-ferry to stay all night at her friend's house, Miss What-you-may-call-her—I disremember her name—and they lost their steering-oar, and swung around and went a-floating down, stern first, about two mile, and saddle-baggsed on the wreck, and the ferryman and the nigger woman and the horses was all lost, but Miss Hooker she made a grab and got aboard the wreck. Well, about an hour after dark we come along down in our trading-scow, and it was so dark we didn't notice the wreck till we was right on it; and so we saddle-baggsed; but all of us was saved but Bill Whipple—and oh, he was the best cretur!—I most wish 't it had been me, I do."

"By George! It's the beatenest thing I ever struck. And then what did you all do?"

"Well, we hollered and took on, but it's so wide there we couldn't make nobody hear. So pap said somebody got to get ashore and get help somehow. I was the only one that could swim, so I made a dash for it, and Miss Hooker she said if I didn't strike help sooner, come here and hunt up her uncle, and he'd fix the thing. I made the land about a mile below, and been fooling along ever since, trying to get people to do something, but they said, 'What, in such a night and such a current? There ain't no sense in it; go for the steam-ferry.' Now if you'll go and——"

"By Jackson, I'd like to, and, blame it, I don't know but I will; but who in the dingnation's a-going to pay for it? Do you reckon your pap——"

"Why that's all right. Miss Hooker, she tole me, particular, that her uncle Hornback——"

"Great guns! is he her uncle? Looky here, you break for that light over yonder-way, and turn out west when you git there, and about a quarter of a mile out you'll come to the tavern; tell 'em to dart you out to Jim Hornback's, and he'll foot the bill. And don't you fool around any, because he'll want to know the news. Tell him I'll have his niece all safe before he can get to town. Hump yourself, now; I'm a-going up around the corner here to roust out my engineer."

I struck for the light, but as soon as he turned the corner I went back and got into my skiff and bailed her out, and then pulled up shore in the easy water among some wood-boats—for I couldn't rest easy till I could see the ferryboat start. But take it all around, I was feeling ruther comfortable on accounts of taking all this trouble for that gang, for not many would 'a' done it. I wished the widow knowed about it. I judged she would be proud of me for helping these rapsallions, because rapsallions and dead-beats is the kind the widow and good people takes the most interest in.

Well, before long here comes the wreck, dim and dusky, sliding along down! A kind of cold shiver went through me, and then I struck out for her. She was very deep, and I see in a minute there warn't much chance for anybody being alive in her. I pulled all around her and hollered a little, but there wasn't any answer; all dead still. I felt a little bit heavy-hearted about the gang, but not much, for I reckoned if they could stand it I could.

Then here comes the ferryboat; so I shoved for the middle of the river on a long down-stream slant; and when I judged I was out of eye-reach I laid on my oars, and looked back and see her go and smell around the wreck for Miss Hooker's remainders, because the captain would know her uncle Hornback would want them; and then pretty soon the ferryboat gave it up and went for the shore, and I laid into my work and went a-booming down the river.

It did seem a powerful long time before Jim's light showed up; and when it did show it looked like it was a thousand mile off. By the time I got there the sky was beginning to get a little gray in the east; so we struck for an island, and hid the raft, and sunk the skiff, and turned in and slept like dead people.

WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS (1837-1920)

From LITERARY BOSTON AS I KNEW IT ¹

IX

The first time I saw Whittier was in Fields's room at the publishing office, where I had come upon some editorial errand to my chief. He introduced me to the poet: a tall, spare figure in black of Quaker cut, with a keen, clean-shaven face, black hair, and vivid black eyes. It was just after his poem, Snow-Bound, had made its great success, in the modest fashion of those days, and had sold not two hundred thousand but twenty thousand, and I tried to make my compliment. I contrived to say that I could not tell him how much I liked it; and he received the inadequate expression of my feeling with doubtless as much effusion as he would have met something more explicit and abundant. If he had judged fit to take my contract off my hands in any way, I think he would have been less able to do so than any of his New England contemporaries. In him, as I have suggested, the Quaker calm was bound by the frosty Puritanic air, and he was doubly cold to the touch of the stranger, though he would thaw out to old friends, and sparkle in laugh and joke. I myself never got so far with him as to experience this geniality, though afterwards we became such friends as an old man and a young man could be who rarely met. Our better acquaintance began with some talk, at a second meeting, about Bayard Taylor's Story of Kennett, which had then lately appeared, and which he praised for its fidelity to Quaker character in its less amiable aspects. No doubt I had made much of my own Quaker descent (which I felt was one of the things I had to be proud of), and he therefore spoke the more frankly of those traits of brutality into which the primitive sincerity of the sect sometimes degenerated. He thought the habit of plain-speaking had to be jealously guarded to keep it from becoming rude-speaking, and he matched with stories of his own some things I had heard my father tell of Friends in the backwoods who were Foes to good manners.

Whittier was one of the most generous of men towards the work of others, especially the work of a new man, and if I did anything that he liked, I could count upon him for cordial recognition. In the quiet of his country home at Danvers he apparently read all the magazines, and kept himself fully abreast of the literary movement, but I doubt if he so fully appreciated the importance of the social movement. Like some others of the great anti-slavery men, he seemed to imagine that mankind had won itself a clear field by destroying chattel slavery, and he had no sympathy with those who think that the man who may any moment be out of work is industrially a slave. This is not strange; so few men last over from one reform to another that the wonder is that any should, not that one should not. Whittier was prophet for one great need of the divine to man, and he spoke his message with a fervor that at times was like the trembling of a flame, or the quivering of midsummer sunshine. It was hard to associate with the man as one saw him, still, shy, stiff, the passion of his verse. This imbued not only his anti-slavery utterances, but equally his ballads of the old witch and Quaker persecution, and flashed a far light into the dimness where his interrogations of Mystery pierced. Whatever doubt there can be of the fate of other New England poets in the great and final account, it seems to me that certain of these pieces make his place secure.

There is great inequality in his work, and I felt this so strongly that when I came to have full charge of the Magazine,¹ I ventured once to distinguish. He sent me a poem, and I had the temerity to return it, and beg him for something else. He magnanimously refrained from all show of offence, and after a while, when he had printed the poem elsewhere, he gave me another. By this time, I perceived that I had been wrong, not as to the poem returned, but as to my function regarding him and such as he. I had made my reflections, and never again did I venture to pass upon what contributors of his quality sent me. I took it and printed it, and praised the gods; and even now I think that with such men it was not my duty to play the censor in the periodical which they had made what it was. They had set it in authority over American literature, and it was not for me to put myself in authority over them. Their fame was in their own keeping, and it was not my part to guard it against them.

After that experience I not only practised an eager acquiescence in their wish to reach the public through the Atlantic, but I used all the delicacy I was master of in bowing the way to them. Sometimes my utmost did not avail, or more strictly speaking it did not avail in one instance with Emerson. He had given me upon much entreaty a poem which was one of his greatest and best, but the proof-reader found a nominative at odds with its verb. We had some trouble in reconciling them, and some other delays, and meanwhile Doctor Holmes offered me a poem for the same number. I now doubted whether I should get Emerson's poem back in time for it, but unluckily the proof did come back in time, and then I had to choose between my poets, or acquaint them with the state of the case, and let them choose what I should do. I really ¹⁰ felt that Doctor Holmes had the right to precedence, since Emerson had withheld his proof so long that I could not count upon it; but I wrote to Emerson, and asked (as nearly as I can remember) whether he would consent to let me put his poem over to the next number, or would prefer to have it appear in the same number with Doctor Holmes's; the subjects were cognate, and I had my ²⁰ misgivings. He wrote me back to "return the proofs and break up the forms." I could not go to this iconoclastic extreme with the electrotypes of the magazine, but I could return the proofs.

I did so, feeling that I had done my possible, and silently grieving that there could be such ire in heavenly minds.

Emerson, as I say, I had once met in Cambridge, but Whittier never; and I have a feeling that poet as Cambridge felt him to be, she had her reservations concerning him. I cannot put these into words which would not oversay them, but they were akin to those she might have refined upon in regard to Mrs. ⁴⁰ Stowe. Neither of these great writers would have appeared to Cambridge of the last literary quality; their fame was with a world too vast to be the test that her own

"One entire and perfect crysolite" would have formed. Whittier in fact had not arrived at the clear splendor of his later work without some earlier ⁵⁰ turbidity; he was still from time to time capable of a false rhyme, like morn and dawn. As for the author of Uncle Tom's Cabin her syntax was such a snare to her that it sometimes needed the combined skill of all the proof-readers and the assistant editor to extricate her. Of course, nothing was ever written into her work, but in changes of diction, in correction of solecisms, in transposition of phrases, the text was largely rewritten on the margin of her proofs. The soul of her art was present, but the form was so often absent, that when it was clothed on anew, it would have been hard to say whose cut the garment was of in many places. In fact, the proof-reading of the Atlantic Monthly was something almost fearfully scrupulous and perfect. The proofs were first read by the under proof-reader in the printing-office; then the head reader passed them to me perfectly clean as to typography, with his own abundant and most intelligent comments on the literature; and then I read them, making what changes I chose, and verifying every quotation, every date, every geographical and biographical name, every foreign word to the last accent, every technical and scientific term. Where it was possible or at all desirable, the proof was next ³⁰ submitted to the author. When it came back to me, I revised it, accepting or rejecting the author's judgment according as he was entitled by his ability and knowledge or not to have them. The proof now went to the printers for correction; they sent it again to the head reader, who carefully revised it and returned it again to me. I read it a second time, and it was again corrected. ⁴⁰ After this it was revised in the office and sent to the stereotyper, from whom it came to the head reader for a last revision in the plates.

It would not do to say how many of the first American writers owed their correctness in print to the zeal of our proof-reading, but I may say that there were very few who did not owe something. The wisest and ablest were the ⁵⁰ most patient and grateful, like Mrs. Stowe, under correction; it was only the beginners and the more ignorant who were angry; and almost always the proof-reading editor had his way on disputed points. I look back now, with respectful amazement at my proficiency in detecting the errors of the great as well as the little. I was able to discover mistakes even in the classical quotations of the deeply lettered Sumner, and I remember, in the earliest years of my service on the Atlantic, waiting in this statesman's study amidst the prints and engravings that attested his personal 10 resemblance to Edmund Burke, with his proofs in my hand and my heart in my mouth, to submit my doubts of his Latinity. I forget how he received them; but he was not a very gracious person.

Mrs. Stowe was a gracious person, and carried into age the inalienable charm of a woman who must have been very charming earlier. I met her only 20 at the Fieldses' in Boston, where one night I witnessed a controversy between her and Doctor Holmes concerning homœopathy and allopathy which lasted well through dinner. After this lapse of time, I cannot tell how the affair ended, but I feel sure of the liking with which Mrs. Stowe inspired me. There was something very simple, very motherly in her, and something divinely 30 sincere. She was quite the person to take au grand sérieux the monstrous imaginations of Lady Byron's jealousy and to feel it on her conscience to make public report of them when she conceived that the time had come to do so.

In Francis Parkman I knew much 40 later than in some others a differentiation of the New England type which was not less characteristic. He, like so many other Boston men of letters, was of patrician family, and of those easy fortunes which Clio prefers her sons to be of; but he paid for these advantages by the suffering in which he wrought at what is, I suppose, our greatest history. He wrought at it 50 piecemeal, and sometimes only by moments, when the terrible headaches which tormented him, and the disorder of the heart which threatened his life, allowed him a brief respite for the task which was dear to him. He must have been more than a quarter of a century in completing it, and in this time, as he once told me, it had given him a day-laborer's wages; but of course money was the least return he wished from it. I read the irregularly successive volumes of The Jesuits in North America, The Old Régime in Canada, 10 the Wolfe and Montcalm, and the others that went to make up the whole history with a sufficiently noisy enthusiasm, and our acquaintance began by his expressing his gratification with the praises of them that I had put in print. We entered into relations as contributor and editor, and I know that he was pleased with my eagerness to 20 get as many detachable chapters from the book in hand as he could give me for the magazine, but he was of too fine a politeness to make this the occasion of his first coming to see me. He had walked out to Cambridge, where I then lived, in pursuance of a regimen which, I believe, finally built up his health; that it was unsparing, I can testify from my own share in one of his 30 constitutionals in Boston, many years later.

His experience in laying the groundwork for his history, and his researches in making it thorough, were such as to have liberated him to the knowledge of other manners and ideals, but he remained strictly a Bostonian, and as immutably of the Boston social and literary faith as any I knew in that capital of accomplished facts. He had lived like an Indian among the wild Western tribes; he consorted with the Canadian archæologists in their mousings among the colonial archives of their fallen state; every year he went to Quebec or Paris to study the history of New France in the original documents; European society was open to him everywhere; but he had those 50 limitations which I nearly always found in the Boston men. I remember his talking to me of The Rise of Silas Lap- ham, in a somewhat troubled and uncertain strain, and interpreting his rise as the achievement of social recognition, without much or at all liking it or me for it. I did not think it my part to point out that I had supposed the rise to be a moral one; and later I fell under his condemnation for certain high crimes and misdemeanors I had been guilty of against a well-known ideal in fiction. These in fact constituted lese-majesty of romanticism, which seemed to be disproportionately dear to a man who was in his own way trying to tell the truth of human nature as I was in mine. His displeasures passed, however, and my last meeting with our greatest historian, as I think him, was of unalloyed friendliness. He came to me during my final year in Boston for nothing apparently but to tell me of his liking for a book of mine describing boy-life in Southern Ohio a half-century ago. He wished to talk about many points of this, which he found the same as his own boyhood in the neighborhood of Boston; and we could agree that the life of the Anglo-Saxon boy was pretty much the same everywhere. He had helped himself into my apartment with a crutch, but I do not remember how he had fallen lame. It was the end of his long walks, I believe, and not long afterwards I had the grief to read of his death. I noticed that perhaps through his enforced quiet, he had put on weight; his fine face was full; whereas when I first knew him he was almost delicately thin of figure and feature. He was always of a distinguished presence, and his face had a great distinction.

It had not the appealing charm I found in the face of James Parton, another historian I knew in my Boston days. I cannot say how much his books, once so worthily popular, are now known, but I have an abiding sense of their excellence. I have not read the Life of Voltaire, which was the last, but all the rest, from the first, I have read, and if there are better American biographies than those of Franklin or of Jefferson, I could not say where to find them. The Greeley and the Burr were younger books, and so was the

Jackson, and they were not nearly so good; but to all the author had imparted the valuable humanity in which he abounded. He was never of the fine world of literature, the world that sniffs and sneers, and abashes the simple-hearted reader. But he was a true artist, and English born as he was, he divined American character as few Americans have done. He was a man of eminent courage, and in the days when to be an agnostic was to be almost an outcast, he had the heart to say of the Mysteries, that he did not know them. He outlived the condemnation that this brought, and I think that no man ever came near him without in some measure loving him. To me he was of a most winning personality, which his strong, gentle face expressed, and a cast in the eye which he could not bring to bear directly upon his vis-à-vis, endeared. I never met him without wishing more of his company, for he seldom failed to say something to whatever was most humane and most modern in me. Our last meeting was at Newburyport, whither he had long before removed from New York, and where in the serene atmosphere of the ancient Puritan town he found leisure and inspiration for his work. He was not then engaged upon any considerable task, and he had aged and broken somewhat. But the old geniality, the old warmth glowed in him, and made a summer amidst the storm of snow that blinded the wintry air without. A new light had then lately come into my life, by which I saw all things that did not somehow tell for human brotherhood dwarfish and ugly, and he listened, as I imagined, to what I had to say with the tolerant sympathy of a man who has been a long time thinking those things, and views with a certain amusement the zeal of the fresh discoverer.

There was yet another historian in Boston, whose acquaintance I made later than either Parkman's or Parton's, and whose very recent death leaves me with the grief of a friend. No one, indeed, could meet John Codman Ropes without wishing to be his friend, or without finding a friend in him. He had his likes and his dislikes, but he could have had no enmities except for evil and meanness. I never knew a man of higher soul, or sweeter nature, and his whole life was a monument of character. It cannot wound him now to speak of the cruel deformity which came upon him in his boyhood, and haunted all his after days with suffering. His gentle face showed the pain which is always the part of the hunchback, but nothing else in him confessed a sense of the affliction, and the resolute activity of his mind denied it in every way. He was, as is well known, a very able lawyer, in full practice, while he was making his studies of military history, and winning recognition for almost unique insight and thoroughness in that direction, though I believe that when he came to embody the results in those extraordinary volumes recording the battles of our civil war, he retired from the law in some measure. He knew these battles more accurately than the generals who fought them, and he was of a like proficiency in the European wars from the time of Napoleon down to our own time. I have heard a story, which I cannot vouch for, that when foreknowledge of his affliction, at the outbreak of our civil war, forbade him to be a soldier, he became a student of soldiership, and wreaked in that sort the passion of his most gallant spirit. But whether this was true or not, it is certain that he pursued the study with a devotion which never blinded him to the atrocity of war. Some wars he could excuse and even justify, but for any war that seemed wanton or aggressive, he had only abhorrence.

The last summer of a score that I had known him, we sat on the veranda of his cottage at York Harbor, and looked out over the moonlit sea, and he talked of the high and true things, with the inextinguishable zest for the inquiry which I always found in him, though he was then feeling the approaches of the malady which was so soon to end all groping in these shadows for him. He must have faced the fact with the same courage and the same trust with which he faced all facts. From the first I found him a deeply religious man, not only in the ecclesiastical sense, but in the more mystical meanings of the word, and he kept his faith as he kept his youth to the last. Every one who knew him, knows how young he was in heart, and how he liked to have those that were young in years about him. He wished to have his house in Boston, as well as his cottage at York, full of young men and young girls, whose joy of life he made his own, and whose society he preferred to his contemporaries'. One could not blame him for that, or for seeking the sun, whenever he could, but it would be a false notion of him to suppose that his sympathies were solely or chiefly with the happy. In every sort, as I knew him, he was fine and good. The word is not worthy of him, after some of its uses and associations, but if it were unsmutched by these, and whitened to its primitive significance, I should say he was one of the most perfect gentlemen I ever knew.

THE FURNISHED ROOM¹

Restless, shifting, fugacious as time itself is a certain vast bulk of the population of the red brick district of the lower West Side. Homeless, they have a hundred homes. They flit from furnished room to furnished room, transients forever—transients in abode, transients in heart and mind. They sing “Home, Sweet Home” in ragtime; they carry their lares et penates in a bandbox; their vine is entwined about a picture hat; a rubber plant is their fig tree.

Hence the houses of this district,

having had a thousand dwellers, should have a thousand tales to tell, mostly dull ones no doubt; but it would be strange if there could not be found a ghost or two in the wake of all these vagrant guests.

One evening after dark a young man prowled among these crumbling red mansions, ringing their bells. At the twelfth he rested his lean hand-baggage upon the step and wiped the dust from his hat-band and forehead. The bell sounded faint and far away in some remote, hollow depths.

To the door of this, the twelfth house whose bell he had rung, came a housekeeper who made him think of an unwholesome surfeited worm that had eaten its nut to a hollow shell and now sought to fill the vacancy with edible lodgers.

He asked if there was a room to let. "Come in," said the housekeeper. Her voice came from her throat; her throat seemed lined with fur. "I have a third floor back, vacant since a week back. Should you wish to look at it?"

The young man followed her up the stairs. A faint light from no particular source mitigated the shadows of the halls. They trod noiselessly upon a stair carpet that its own loom would have forsworn. It seemed to have become vegetable; to have degenerated in that rank, sunless air to lush lichen or spreading moss that grew in patches to the staircase and was viscid under the foot like organic matter. At each turn of the stairs were vacant niches in the wall. Perhaps plants had once been set within them. If so they had died in that foul and tainted air. It may be that statues of the saints had stood there, but it was not difficult to conceive that imps and devils had dragged them forth in the darkness and down to the unholy depths of some furnished pit below.

"This is the room," said the housekeeper, from her furry throat. "It's a nice room. It ain't often vacant. I had some most elegant people in it last summer—no trouble at all, and paid in advance to the minute. The water's at the end of the hall. Sprowls and Mooney kept it three months. They done a vaudeville sketch. Miss B'retta Sprowls—you may have heard of her—Oh, that was just the stage names—right there over the dresser is where the marriage certificate hung, framed. The gas is here, and you see there is plenty of closet room. It's a room everybody likes. It never stays idle long."

"Do you have many theatrical people rooming here?" asked the young man.

"They comes and goes. A good proportion of my lodgers is connected with the theatres. Yes, sir, this is the theatrical district. Actor people never stays long anywhere. I get my share. Yes, they comes and they goes."

He engaged the room, paying for a week in advance. He was tired, he said, and would take possession at once. He counted out the money. The room had been made ready, she said, even to towels and water. As the housekeeper moved away he put, for the thousandth time, the question that he carried at the end of his tongue.

"A young girl—Miss Vashner—Miss Eloise Vashner—do you remember such a one among your lodgers? She would be singing on the stage, most likely. A fair girl, of medium height and slender, with reddish, gold hair and a dark mole near her left eyebrow."

"No, I don't remember the name. Them stage people has names they changes as often as their rooms. They comes and they goes. No, I don't call that one to mind."

No. Always no. Five months of ceaseless interrogation and the inevitable negative. So much time spent by day in questioning managers, agents, schools and choruses; by night among the audiences of theatres from all-star casts down to music halls so low that he dreaded to find what he most hoped for. He who had loved her best had tried to find her. He was sure that since her disappearance from home this great, water-girt city held her somewhere, but it was like a monstrous quicksand, shifting its particles constantly, with no foundation, its upper granules of to-day buried to-morrow in ooze and slime.

The furnished room received its latest guest with a first glow of pseudo-hospitality, a hectic, haggard, perfunctory welcome like the specious smile of a demirep. The sophisticated comfort came in reflected gleams from the decayed furniture, the ragged brocade upholstery of a couch and two chairs, a foot-wide cheap pier glass between two windows, from one or two gilt picture frames and a brass bedstead in a corner.

The guest reclined, inert, upon a chair, while the room, confused in speech as though it were an apartment in Babel, tried to discourse to him of its diverse tenantry.

A polychromatic rug like some brilliant-flowered rectangular, tropical islet lay surrounded by a billowy sea of soiled matting. Upon the gray-papered wall were those pictures that pursue the homeless one from house to house—The Huguenot Lovers, The First Quarrel, The Wedding Breakfast, Psyche at the Fountain. The mantel's chastely severe outline was ingloriously veiled behind some pert drapery drawn rakishly askew like the sashes of the Amazonian ballet. Upon it were some desolate flotsam cast aside by the room's marooned when a lucky sail had borne them to a fresh port—a trifling vase or two, pictures of actresses, a medicine bottle, some stray cards out of a deck.

One by one, as the characters of a cryptograph become explicit, the little signs left by the furnished room's procession of guests developed a significance. The threadbare space in the rug in front of the dresser told that lovely woman had marched in the throng. Tiny finger prints on the wall spoke of little prisoners trying to feel their way to sun and air. A splattered stain, raying like the shadow of a bursting bomb, witnessed where a hurled glass or bottle had splintered with its contents against the wall. Across the pier glass had been scrawled with a diamond in staggering letters the name "Marie." It seemed that the succession of dwellers in the furnished room had turned in fury—perhaps tempted beyond forbearance by its garish coldness—and wreaked upon it their passions. The furniture was chipped and bruised; the couch, distorted by bursting springs, seemed a horrible monster that had been slain during the stress of some grotesque convulsion. Some more potent upheaval had cloven a great slice from the marble mantel. Each plank in the floor owned its particular cant and shriek as from a separate and individual agony. It seemed incredible that all this malice and injury had been wrought upon the room by those who had called it for a time their home; and yet it may have been the cheated home instinct surviving blindly, the resentful rage at false household gods that had kindled their wrath. A hut that is our own we can sweep and adorn and cherish.

The young tenant in the chair allowed these thoughts to file, softshod, through his mind, while there drifted into the room furnished sounds and furnished scents. He heard in one room a tittering and incontinent, slack laughter; in others the monologue of a scold, the rattling of dice, a lullaby, and one crying dully; above him a banjo tinkled with spirit. Doors banged somewhere; the elevated trains roared intermittently; a cat yowled miserably upon a back fence. And he breathed the breath of the house—a dank savour rather than a smell—a cold, musty effluvium as from underground vaults mingled with the reeking exhalations of linoleum and mildewed and rotten woodwork.

Then suddenly, as he rested there, the room was filled with the strong, sweet odour of mignonette. It came as upon a single buffet of wind with such sureness and fragrance and emphasis that it almost seemed a living visitant. And the man cried aloud: "What, dear?" as if he had been called, and sprang up and faced about. The rich odour clung to him and wrapped him around. He reached out his arms for it, all his senses for the time confused and commingled. How could one be peremptorily called by an odour? Surely it must have been a sound. But, was it not the sound that had touched, that had caressed him?

"She has been in this room," he cried, and he sprang to wrest from it a token, for he knew he would recognize the smallest thing that had belonged to her or that she had touched. This enveloping scent of mignonette, the odour that she had loved and made her own—whence came it?

The room had been but carelessly set in order. Scattered upon the flimsy dresser scarf were half a dozen hair-pins—those discreet, indistinguishable friends of womankind, feminine of gender, infinite of mood, and uncommunicative of tense. These he ignored, conscious of their triumphant lack of identity. Ransacking the drawers of the dresser he came upon a discarded, tiny, ragged handkerchief. He pressed it to his face. It was racy and insolent with heliotrope; he hurled it to the floor. In another drawer he found odd buttons, a theatre programme, a pawnbroker's card, two lost marshmallows, a book on the divination of dreams. In the last was a woman's black satin hair-bow, which halted him, poised between ice and fire. But the black satin hair-bow also is femininity's demure, impersonal, common ornament, and tells no tales.

And then he traversed the room like a hound on the scent, skimming the walls, considering the corners of the bulging matting on his hands and knees, rummaging mantel and tables, the curtains and hangings, the drunken cabinet in the corner, for a visible sign, unable to perceive that she was there beside, around, against, within, above him, clinging to him, wooing him, calling him so poignantly through the finer senses that even his grosser ones became cognisant of the call. Once again he answered loudly: "Yes, dear!" and turned, wild-eyed, to gaze on vacancy, for he could not yet discern form and colour and love and outstretched arms in the odour of mignonette. Oh, God! whence that odour, and since when have odours had a voice to call? Thus he groped.

He burrowed in crevices and corners, and found corks and cigarettes. There he passed in passive contempt. But once he found in a fold of the matting a half-smoked cigar, and this he ground beneath his heel with a green and trenchant oath. He sifted the room from end to end. He found dreary and ignoble small records of many a peripatetic tenant; but of her whom he sought, and who may have lodged there, and whose spirit seemed to hover there, he found no trace.

And then he thought of the house-keeper.

He ran from the haunted room downstairs and to a door that showed a crack of light. She came out to his knock. He smothered his excitement as best he could.

"Will you tell me, madam," he besought her, "who occupied the room I have before I came?"

"Yes, sir. I can tell you again. 'Twas Sprowls and Mooney, as I said. Miss B'retta Sprowls it was in the theatres, but Misses Mooney she was. My house is well known for respectability. The marriage certificate hung, framed, on a nail over——"

"What kind of a lady was Miss Sprowls—in looks, I mean?"

"Why, black-haired, sir, short, and stout, with a comical face. They left a week ago Tuesday."

"And before they occupied it?"

"Why, there was a single gentleman connected with the draying business. He left owing me a week. Before him was Missis Crowder and her two children, that stayed four months; and back of them was old Mr. Doyle, whose sons paid for him. He kept the room six months. That goes back a year, sir, and further I do not remember."

He thanked her and crept back to his room. The room was dead. The essence that had vivified it was gone. The perfume of mignonette had departed.

In its place was the old, stale odour of mouldy house furniture, of atmosphere in storage.

The ebbing of his hope drained his faith. He sat staring at the yellow, singing gaslight. Soon he walked to the bed and began to tear the sheets into strips. With the blade of his knife he drove them tightly into every crevice around windows and door. When all was snug and taut he turned out the light, turned the gas full on again, and laid himself gratefully upon the bed.

It was Mrs. McCool's night to go with the can for beer. So she fetched it and sat with Mrs. Purdy in one of those subterranean retreats where housekeepers fgather and the worm dieth seldom.

"I rented out my third floor, back, this evening," said Mrs. Purdy across a fine circle of foam. "A young man took it. He went up to bed two hours ago."

"Now, did ye, Mrs. Purdy, ma'am?" said Mrs. McCool, with intense admiration. "You do be a wonder for rentin' rooms of that kind. And did ye tell him, then?" she concluded in a husky whisper, laden with mystery.

"Rooms," said Mrs. Purdy, in her furriest tones, "are furnished for to rent. I did not tell him, Mrs. McCool."

"'Tis right ye are, ma'am; 'tis by renting rooms we kape alive. Ye have the rale sense for business, ma'am. There be many people will rayjiet the rentin' of a room if they be tould a suicide has been after dyin' in the bed of it."

"As you say, we has our living to be making," remarked Mrs. Purdy.

"Yis, ma'am; 'tis true. 'Tis just one wake ago this day I helped ye lay out the third floor, back. A pretty slip of a colleen she was to be killin' herself wid the gas—a swate little face she had, Mrs. Purdy, ma'am."

"She'd a-been called handsome, as you say," said Mrs. Purdy, assenting but critical, "but for that mole she had a-growin' by her left eyebrow. Do fill up your glass again, Mrs. McCool."

ALL GOLD CANYON¹

It was the green heart of the canyon, where the walls swerved back from the rigid plan and relieved their harshness of line by making a little sheltered nook and filling it to the brim with sweetness and roundness and softness. Here all things rested. Even the narrow stream ceased its turbulent down-rush long enough to form a quiet pool. Knee-deep in the water, with drooping head and half-shut eyes, drowsed a red-coated, many-antlered buck.

On one side, beginning at the very lip of the pool, was a tiny meadow, a cool, resilient surface of green that extended to the base of the frowning wall. Beyond the pool a gentle slope of earth ran up and up to meet the opposing wall. Fine grass covered the slope—grass that was spangled with flowers, with here and there patches of color, orange and purple and golden. Below, the canyon was shut in. There was no view. The walls leaned together abruptly and the canyon ended in a chaos of rocks, moss-covered and hidden by a green screen of vines and creepers and boughs of trees. Up the canyon, rose far hills and peaks, the big foothills, pine-covered and remote. And far beyond, like clouds upon the border of the sky, towered minarets of white, where the Sierra's eternal snows flashed austere the blazes of the sun.

There was no dust in the canyon. The leaves and flowers were clean and virginal. The grass was young velvet. Over the pool three cottonwoods sent their snowy fluffs fluttering down the quiet air. On the slope the blossoms of the wine-wooded manzanita filled the air with springtime odors, while the leaves, wise with experience, were already beginning their vertical twist against the coming aridity of summer. In the open spaces on the slope, beyond the farthest shadow reach of the manzanita, poised the mariposa lilies, like so many flights of jeweled moths suddenly arrested and on the verge of trembling into flight again. Here and there that woods harlequin, the madrone, permitting itself to be caught in the act of changing its pea green trunk to madder red, breathed its fragrance into the air from great clusters of waxen bells. Creamy white were these bells, shaped like lilies of the valley, with the sweetness of perfume that is of the springtime.

There was not a sigh of wind. The air was drowsy with its weight of perfume. It was a sweetness that would have been cloying had the air been heavy and humid. But the air was sharp and thin. It was as starlight transmuted into atmosphere, shot through and warmed by sunshine, and flower-drenched with sweetness.

An occasional butterfly drifted in and out through the patches of light and shade. And from all about rose the low and sleepy hum of mountain bees—feasting Sybarites that jostled one another good-naturedly at the board, nor found time for rough discourtesy. So quietly did the little stream drip and ripple its way through the canyon that it spoke only in faint and occasional gurgles. The voice of the stream was as a drowsy whisper, ever interrupted by dozings and silences, ever lifted again in the awakenings.

The motion of all things was a drifting in the heart of the canyon. Sunshine and butterflies drifted in and out among the trees. The hum of the bees and the whisper of the stream were a drifting of sound. And the drifting sound and drifting color seemed to weave together in the making of a delicate and intangible fabric which was the spirit of the place. It was a spirit of peace that was not of death, but of smooth-pulsing life, of quietude that was not silence, of movement that was not action, of repose that was quick with existence without being violent with struggle and travail. The spirit of the place was the spirit of the peace of the living, somnolent with the easement and content of prosperity, and undisturbed by rumors of far wars.

The red-coated, many-antlered buck acknowledged the lordship of the spirit of the place and dozed knee-deep in the cool, shaded pool. There seemed no flies to vex him, and he was languid with rest. Sometimes his ears moved when the stream awoke and whispered; but they moved lazily, with foreknowledge that it was merely the stream grown garrulous at discovery that it had slept.

But there came a time when the buck's ears lifted and tensed with swift eagerness for sound. His head was turned down the canyon. His sensitive, quivering nostrils scented the air. His eyes could not pierce the green screen through which the stream rippled away, but to his ears came the voice of a man. It was a steady, monotonous, singsong voice. Once the buck heard the harsh clash of metal upon rock. At the sound he snorted with a sudden start that jerked him through the air from water to meadow, and his feet sank into the young velvet, while he pricked his ears and again scented the air. Then he stole across the tiny meadow, pausing once and again to listen, and faded away out of the canyon like a wraith, soft-footed and without sound.

The clash of steel-shod soles against the rocks began to be heard, and the man's voice grew louder. It was raised in a sort of chant and became distinct with nearness, so that the words could be heard:

Tu'n around an' tu'n yo' face
Untoe them sweet hills of grace
(D' pow'rs of sin yo' am scornin'!).
Look about an' look aroun',
Fling yo' sin-pack on d' groun',
(Yo' will meet wid d' Lord in d' mornin'!).

A sound of scrambling accompanied the song, and the spirit of the place fled away on the heels of the red-coated buck. The green screen was burst asunder, and a man peered out at the meadow and the pool and the sloping sidehill. He was a deliberate sort of man. He took in the scene with one embracing glance, then ran his eyes over the details to verify the general impression. Then, and not until then, did he open his mouth in vivid and solemn approval:—

"Smoke of life an' snakes of purgatory! Will you just look at that! Wood an' water an' grass an' a side-hill! A pocket hunter's delight an' a cayuse's paradise! Cool green for 10 tired eyes! Pink pills for pale people ain't in it. A secret pasture for prospectors and a resting place for tired burros, by damn!"

He was a sandy-complexioned man in whose face geniality and humor seemed the salient characteristics. It was a mobile face, quick-changing to inward mood and thought. Thinking was in him a visible process. Ideas 20 chased across his face like wind-flaws across the surface of a lake. His hair, sparse and unkempt of growth, was as indeterminate and colorless as his complexion. It would seem that all the color of his frame had gone into his eyes, for they were startlingly blue. Also, they were laughing and merry eyes, within them much of the naïveté and wonder of the child; and yet, in an unassertive way, they contained much of calm self-reliance and strength of purpose founded upon self-experience and experience of the world.

From out the screen of vines and creepers he flung ahead of him a miner's pick and shovel and gold-pan. Then he crawled out himself into the open. He was clad in faded overalls and black cotton shirt, with hob-nailed 40 brogans on his feet, and on his head a hat whose shapelessness and stains advertised the rough usage of wind and rain and sun and camp smoke. He stood erect, seeing wide-eyed the secrecy of the scene and sensuously inhaling the warm, sweet breath of the canyon garden through nostrils that dilated and quivered with delight. His eyes narrowed to laughing slits of blue, 50 his face wreathed itself in joy, and his mouth curled in a smile as he cried aloud:—

"Jumping dandelions and happy hollyhocks, but that smells good to me! Talk about your attar o' roses an' cologne factories! They ain't in it!"

He had the habit of soliloquy. His quick-changing facial expressions might tell every thought and mood, but the tongue, perforce, ran hard after, repeating, like a second Boswell.

The man lay down on the lip of the pool and drank long and deep of its water. "Tastes good to me," he murmured, lifting his head and gazing across the pool at the sidehill, while he wiped his mouth with the back of his hand. The sidehill attracted his attention. Still lying on his stomach, he studied the hill formation long and carefully. It was a practised eye that traveled up the slope to the crumbling canyon-wall and back and down again to the edge of the pool. He scrambled to his feet and favored the sidehill with a second survey.

"Looks good to me," he concluded, picking up his pick and shovel and gold-pan.

He crossed the stream below the pool, stepping agilely from stone to stone. Where the sidehill touched the water he dug up a shovelful of dirt and put it into the gold-pan. He squatted down, holding the pan in his two hands, and partly immersing it in the stream. Then he imparted to the pan a deft circular motion that sent the water sluicing in and out through the dirt and gravel. The larger and the lighter particles worked to the surface, and these, by a skillful dipping movement 40 of the pan, he spilled out and over the edge. Occasionally, to expedite matters, he rested the pan and with his fingers raked out the large pebbles and pieces of rock.

The contents of the pan diminished rapidly until only fine dirt and the smallest bits of gravel remained. At this stage he began to work very deliberately and carefully. It was fine washing, and he washed fine and finer, with a keen scrutiny and delicate and fastidious touch. At last the pan seemed empty of everything but water; but with a quick semicircular flint that sent the water flying over the shallow rim into the stream, he disclosed a layer of black sand on the bottom of the pan. So thin was this layer that it was like a streak of paint. He examined it closely. In the midst of it was a tiny golden speck. He dribbled a little water in over the depressed edge of the pan. With a quick flint he sent the water sluicing across the bottom, turning the grains of black sand over and over. A second tiny golden speck rewarded his effort.

The washing had now become very fine—fine beyond all need of ordinary placer mining. He worked the black sand, a small portion at a time, up the shallow rim of the pan. Each small portion he examined sharply, so that his eyes saw every grain of it before he allowed it to slide over the edge and away. Jealously, bit by bit, he let the black sand slip away. A golden speck, no larger than a pin point, appeared on the rim, and by his manipulation of the water it returned to the bottom of the pan. And in such fashion another speck was disclosed, and another. Great was his care of them. Like a shepherd he herded his flock of golden specks so that not one should be lost. At last, of the pan of dirt nothing remained but his golden herd. He counted it, and then, after all his labor, sent it flying out of the pan with one final swirl of water.

But his blue eyes were shining with desire as he rose to his feet. "Seven," he muttered aloud, asserting the sum of the specks for which he had toiled so hard and which he had so wantonly thrown away. "Seven," he repeated, with the emphasis of one trying to impress a number on his memory.

He stood still a long while, surveying the hillside. In his eyes was a curiosity, new aroused and burning. There was an exultance about his bearing and keenness like that of a hunting animal catching the fresh scent of game.

He moved down the stream a few steps and took a second panful of dirt.

Again came the careful washing, the jealous herding of the golden specks, and the wantonness with which he sent them flying into the stream when he had counted their number.

"Five," he muttered, and repeated, "five."

He could not forbear another survey of the hill before filling the pan farther down the stream. His golden herds diminished. "Four, three, two, two, one," were his memory tabulations as he moved down the stream. When but one speck of gold rewarded his washing, he stopped and built a fire of dry twigs. Into this he thrust the gold-pan and burned it till it was blue-black. He held up the pan and examined it critically. Then he nodded approbation. Against such a color background he could defy the tiniest yellow speck to elude him.

Still moving down the stream, he panned again. A single speck was his reward. A third pan contained no gold at all. Not satisfied with this, he panned three times again, taking his shovels of dirt within a foot of one another. Each pan proved empty of gold, and the fact, instead of discouraging him, seemed to give him satisfaction. His elation increased with each barren washing, until he arose, exclaiming jubilantly,—

"If it ain't the real thing, may God knock off my head with sour apples!"

Returning to where he had started operations, he began to pan up the stream. At first his golden herds increased — increased prodigiously. "Fourteen, eighteen, twenty-one, twenty-six," ran his memory tabulations. Just above the pool he struck his richest pan—thirty-five colors.

"Almost enough to save," he remarked regretfully as he allowed the water to sweep them away.

The sun climbed to the top of the sky. The man worked on. Pan by pan, he went up the stream, the tally of results steadily decreasing.

"It's just booful, the way it peters out," he exulted when a shovelful of dirt contained no more than a single speck of gold.

And when no specks at all were found in several pans, he straightened up and favored the hillside with a confident glance.

"Ah, ha! Mr. Pocket!" he cried out, as though to an auditor hidden somewhere above him beneath the surface of the slope. "Ah, ha! Mr. Pocket! I'm a-comin', I'm a-comin', an' I'm shorely gwine to get yer! You heah me, Mr. Pocket? I'm gwine to get yer as shore as punkins ain't cauliflowers!"

He turned and flung a measuring glance at the sun poised above him in the azure of the cloudless sky. Then he went down the canyon, following the line of shovel holes he had made in filling the pans. He crossed the stream below the pool and disappeared through the green screen. There was little opportunity for the spirit of the place to return with its quietude and repose, for the man's voice, raised in ragtime song, still dominated the canyon with possession.

After a time, with a greater clashing of steel-shod feet on rock, he returned. The green screen was tremendously agitated. It surged back and forth in the throes of a struggle. There was a loud grating and clanging of metal. The man's voice leaped to a higher pitch and was sharp with imperative-ness. A large body plunged and panted. There was a snapping and ripping and rending, and amid a shower of falling leaves a horse burst through the screen. On its back was a pack, and from this trailed broken vines and torn creepers. The animal gazed with astonished eyes at the scene into which it had been precipitated, then dropped its head to the grass and began contentedly to graze. A second horse scrambled into view, slipping once on the mossy rocks and regaining equilibrium when its hoofs sank into the yielding surface of the meadow. It was riderless, though on its back was a high-horned Mexican saddle, scarred and discolored by long usage.

The man brought up the rear. He threw off pack and saddle, with an eye to camp location, and gave the animals their freedom to graze. He unpacked his food and got out frying pan and coffeepot. He gathered an armful of dry wood, and with a few stones made a place for his fire.

"My!" he said, "but I've got an appetite. I could scoff iron filings an' horseshoe nails an' thank you kindly, ma'am, for a second helpin'."

He straightened up, and, while he reached for matches in the pocket of his overalls, his eyes traveled across the pool to the sidehill. His fingers had clutched the matchbox, but they relaxed their hold and the hand came out empty. The man wavered perceptibly. He looked at his preparations for cooking and he looked at the hill.

"Guess I'll take another whack at her," he concluded, starting to cross the stream.

"They ain't no sense in it, I know," he mumbled apologetically. "But keepin' grub back an hour ain't goin' to hurt none, I reckon."

A few feet back from his first line of test pans he started a second line. The sun dropped down the western sky, the shadows lengthened, but the man worked on. He began a third line of test pans. He was cross-cutting the hillside, line by line, as he ascended. The center of each line produced the richest pans, while the ends came where no colors showed in the pan. And as he ascended the hillside the lines grew perceptibly shorter. The regularity with which their length diminished served to indicate that somewhere up the slope the last line would be so short as to have scarcely length at all, and that beyond could come only a point. The design was growing into an inverted "V." The converging sides of this "V" marked the boundaries of the gold-bearing dirt.

The apex of the "V" was evidently the man's goal. Often he ran his eye along the converging sides and on up the hill, trying to divine the apex, the point where the gold-bearing dirt must cease. Here resided "Mr. Pocket"—

for so the man familiarly addressed the imaginary point above him on the slope, crying out,—

"Come down out o' that, Mr. Pocket! Be right smart an' agreeable, an' come down!"

"All right," he would add later, in a voice resigned to determination. "All right, Mr. Pocket. It's plain to me I got to come right up an' snatch you out bald-headed. An' I'll do it! I'll do it!" he would threaten still later.

Each pan he carried down to the water to wash, and as he went higher up the hill the pans grew richer, until he began to save the gold in an empty baking-powder can which he carried carelessly in his hip pocket. So engrossed was he in his toil that he did not notice the long twilight of oncoming night. It was not until he tried vainly to see the gold colors in the bottom of the pan that he realized the passage of time. He straightened up abruptly. An expression of whimsical wonderment and awe overspread his face as he drawled,—

"Gosh darn my buttons! if I didn't plumb forget dinner!"

He stumbled across the stream in the darkness and lighted his long delayed fire. Flapjacks and bacon and warmed-over beans constituted his supper. Then he smoked a pipe by the smoldering coals, listening to the night noises and watching the moonlight stream through the canyon. After that he unrolled his bed, took off his heavy shoes, and pulled the blankets up to his chin. His face showed white in the moonlight, like the face of a corpse. But it was a corpse that knew its resurrection, for the man rose suddenly on one elbow and gazed across at his hillside.

"Good night, Mr. Pocket," he called sleepily. "Good night."

He slept through the early gray of morning until the direct rays of the sun smote his closed eyelids, when he awoke with a start and looked about him until he had established the continuity of his existence and identified his present self with the days previously lived.

To dress, he had merely to buckle on his shoes. He glanced at his fireplace and at his hillside, wavered, but fought down the temptation and started the fire.

"Keep yer shirt on, Bill; keep yer shirt on," he admonished himself. "What's the good of rushin'? No use in gettin' all het up an' sweaty. Mr. Pocket'll wait for you. He ain't a-runnin' away before you can get yer breakfast. Now, what you want, Bill, is something fresh in yer bill o' fare. So it's up to you to go an' get it."

He cut a short pole at the water's edge and drew from one of his pockets a bit of line and a draggled fly that had once been a royal coachman.

"Mebbe they'll bite in the early morning," he muttered, as he made his first cast into the pool. And a moment later he was gleefully crying: "What'd I tell you, eh? What'd I tell you?"

He had no reel, nor any inclination to waste time, and by main strength, and swiftly, he drew out of the water a flashing ten inch trout. Three more, caught in rapid succession, furnished his breakfast. When he came to the stepping-stones on his way to his hillside, he was struck by a sudden thought, and paused.

"I'd just better take a hike downstream a ways," he said. "There's no tellin' what cuss may be snoopin' around."

But he crossed over on the stones, and with a "I really oughter take that hike," the need of the precaution passed out of his mind and he fell to work.

At nightfall he straightened up. The small of his back was stiff from stooping toil, and as he put his hand behind him to soothe the protesting muscles, he said:—

"Now what d'ye think of that, by damn? I clean forgot my dinner again! If I don't watch out, I'll sure be degeneratin' into a two-meal-a-day crank."

"Pockets is the damndest things I ever see for makin' a man absent-minded," he communed that night, as he crawled into his blankets. Nor did he forget to call up the hillside, "Good night, Mr. Pocket! Good night!"

Rising with the sun, and snatching a hasty breakfast, he was early at work. A fever seemed to be growing in him, nor did the increasing richness of the test pans allay this fever. There was a flush in his cheek other than that made by the heat of the sun, and he was oblivious to fatigue and the passage of time. When he filled a pan with dirt, he ran down the hill to wash it; nor could he forbear running up the hill again, panting and stumbling profanely, to refill the pan.

He was now a hundred yards from the water, and the inverted "V" was assuming definite proportions. The width of the pay dirt steadily decreased, and the man extended in his mind's eye the sides of the "V" to their meeting place far up the hill. This was his goal, the apex of the "V," and he panned many times to locate it.

"Just about two yards above that manzanita bush an' a yard to the right," he finally concluded.

Then the temptation seized him. "As plain as the nose on your face," he said, as he abandoned his laborious crosscutting and climbed to the indicated apex. He filled a pan and carried it down the hill to wash. It contained no trace of gold. He dug deep, and he dug shallow, filling and washing a dozen pans, and was unrewarded even by the tiniest golden speck. He was enraged at having yielded to the temptation, and cursed himself blasphemously and pridelessly. Then he went down the hill and took up the crosscutting.

"Slow an' certain, Bill; slow an' certain," he crooned. "Short cuts to fortune ain't in your line, an' it's about time you know it. Get wise, Bill; get wise. Slow an' certain's the only hand you can play; so go to it, an' keep to it, too."

As the crosscuts decreased, showing that the sides of the "V" were converging, the depth of the "V" increased. The gold trace was dipping into the hill. It was only at thirty inches beneath the surface that he could get colors in his pan. The dirt he found at twenty-five inches from the surface, and at thirty-five inches, yielded barren pans. At the base of the "V," by the water's edge, he had found the gold colors at the grass roots. The higher he went up the hill, the deeper the gold dipped. To dig a hole three feet deep in order to get one test pan was a task of no mean magnitude; while between the man and the apex intervened an untold number of such holes to be dug. "An' there's no tellin' how much deeper it'll pitch," he sighed, in a moment's pause, while his fingers soothed his aching back.

Feverish with desire, with aching back and stiffening muscles, with pick and shovel gouging and mauling the soft brown earth, the man toiled up the hill. Before him was the smooth slope, spangled with flowers and made sweet with their breath. Behind him was devastation. It looked like some terrible eruption breaking out on the smooth skin of the hill. His slow progress was like that of a slug, befouling beauty with a monstrous trail.

Though the dipping gold trace increased the man's work, he found consolation in the increasing richness of the pans. Twenty cents, thirty cents, fifty cents, sixty cents, were the values of the gold found in the pans, and at nightfall he washed his banner pan, which gave him a dollar's worth of gold dust from a shovelful of dirt.

"I'll just bet it's my luck to have some inquisitive cuss come buttin' in here on my pasture," he mumbled sleepily that night as he pulled the blankets up to his chin.

Suddenly he sat upright. "Bill!" he called sharply. "Now, listen to me, Bill; d'ye hear! It's up to you, tomorrow mornin', to mosey round an' see what you can see. Understand? To-morrow morning, an' don't you forget it!"

He yawned and glanced across at his sidehill. "Good night, Mr. Pocket," he called.

In the morning he stole a march on the sun, for he had finished breakfast when its first rays caught him, and he was climbing the wall of the canyon where it crumbled away and gave footing. From the outlook at the top he found himself in the midst of loneliness. As far as he could see, chain after chain of mountains heaved themselves into his vision. To the east his eyes, leaping the miles between range and range and between many ranges, brought up at last against the white-peaked Sierras—the main crest, where the backbone of the Western world reared itself against the sky. To the north and south he could see more distinctly the cross systems that broke through the main trend of the sea of mountains. To the west the ranges fell away, one behind the other, diminishing and fading into the gentle foothills that, in turn, descended into the great valley which he could not see.

And in all that mighty sweep of earth he saw no sign of man nor of the handiwork of man—save only the torn bosom of the hillside at his feet. The man looked long and carefully. Once, far down his own canyon, he thought he saw in the air a faint hint of smoke. He looked again and decided that it was the purple haze of the hills made dark by a convolution of the canyon wall at its back.

"Hey, you, Mr. Pocket!" he called down into the canyon. "Stand out from under! I'm a-comin', Mr. Pocket! I'm a-comin'!"

The heavy brogans on the man's feet made him appear clumsy-footed, but he swung down from the giddy height as lightly and airily as a mountain goat. A rock, turning under his foot on the edge of the precipice, did not disconcert him. He seemed to know the precise time required for the turn to culminate in disaster, and in the meantime he utilized the false footing itself for the momentary earth contact necessary to carry him on into safety. Where the earth sloped so steeply that it was impossible to stand for a second upright, the man did not hesitate. His foot pressed the impossible surface for but a fraction of the fatal second and gave him the bound that carried him onward. Again, where even the fraction of a second's footing was out of the question, he would swing his body past by a moment's hand-grip on a jutting knob of rock, a crevice, or a precariously rooted shrub. At last, with a wild leap and yell, he exchanged the face of the wall for an earth slide and finished the descent in the midst of several tons of sliding earth and gravel.

His first pan of the morning washed out over two dollars in coarse gold. It was from the center of the "V." To either side the diminution in the values of the pans was swift. His lines of crosscutting holes were growing very short. The converging sides of the inverted "V" were only a few yards apart. Their meeting point was only a few yards above him. But the pay streak was dipping deeper and deeper into the earth. By early afternoon he was sinking the test holes five feet before the pans could show the gold trace.

For that matter, the gold trace had become something more than a trace; it was a placer mine in itself, and the man resolved to come back after he had found the pocket and work over the ground. But the increasing richness of the pans began to worry him. By late afternoon the worth of the pans had grown to three and four dollars. The man scratched his head perplexedly and looked a few feet up the hill at the manzanita bush that marked approximately the apex of the "V." He nodded his head and said oracularly:—

"It's one o' two things, Bill; one o' two things. Either Mr. Pocket's spilled himself all out an' down the hill, or else Mr. Pocket's that damned rich you maybe won't be able to carry him all away with you. And that'd be hell, wouldn't it, now?" He chuckled at contemplation of so pleasant a dilemma.

Nightfall found him by the edge of the stream, his eyes wrestling with the gathering darkness over the washing of a five-dollar pan.

"Wisht I had an electric light to go on working," he said.

He found sleep difficult that night. Many times he composed himself and closed his eyes for slumber to overtake him; but his blood pounded with too strong desire, and as many times his eyes opened and he murmured wearily, "Wisht it was sun-up."

Sleep came to him in the end, but his eyes were open with the first paling of the stars, and the gray of dawn caught him with breakfast finished and climbing the hillside in the direction of the secret abiding place of Mr. Pocket.

The first crosscut the man made, there was space for only three holes, so narrow had become the pay streak and so close was he to the fountain-head of the golden stream he had been following for four days.

"Be ca'm, Bill; be ca'm," he admonished himself, as he broke ground for the final hole where the sides of the "V" had at last come together in a point.

"I've got the almighty cinch on you, Mr. Pocket, an' you can't lose me," he said many times as he sank the hole deeper and deeper.

Four feet, five feet, six feet, he dug his way down into the earth. The digging grew harder. His pick grated on broken rock. He examined the rock. "Rotten quartz," was his conclusion as, with the shovel, he cleared the bottom of the hole of loose dirt. He attacked the crumbling quartz with the pick, bursting the disintegrating rock asunder with every stroke.

He thrust his shovel into the loose mass. His eye caught a gleam of yellow. He dropped the shovel and squatted suddenly on his heels. As a farmer rubs the clinging earth from fresh dug potatoes, so the man, a piece of rotten quartz held in both hands, rubbed the dirt away.

"Sufferin' Sardanapolis!" he cried.

"Lumps an' chunks of it! Lumps an' chunks of it!"

It was only half rock he held in his hand. The other half was virgin gold. He dropped it into his pan and examined another piece. Little yellow was to be seen, but with his strong fingers he crumbled the rotten quartz away till both hands were filled with glowing yellow. He rubbed the dirt away from fragment after fragment, tossing them into the gold-pan. It was a treasure hole. So much had the quartz rotted away that there was less of it than there was of gold. Now and again he found a piece to which no rock clung—a piece that was all gold. A chunk, where the pick had laid open the heart of the gold, glittered like a handful of yellow jewels, and he cocked his head at it and slowly turned it around and over to observe the rich play of the light upon it.

"Talk about yer Too Much Gold diggin's!" the man snorted contemptuously. "Why, this diggin' 'd make it look like thirty cents. This diggin' is All Gold. An' right here an' now I name this yere canyon 'All Gold Canyon,' b' gosh!"

Still squatting on his heels, he continued examining the fragments and tossing them into the pan. Suddenly there came to him a premonition of danger. It seemed a shadow had fallen upon him. But there was no shadow. His heart had given a great jump up into his throat and was choking him. Then his blood slowly chilled and he felt the sweat of his shirt cold against his flesh.

He did not spring up nor look around. He did not move. He was considering the nature of the premonition he had received, trying to locate the source of the mysterious force that had warned him, striving to sense the imperative presence of the unseen thing that threatened him. There is an aura of things hostile, made manifest by messengers too refined for the senses to know; and this aura he felt, but knew not how he felt it. His was the feeling as when a cloud passes over the sun. It seemed that between him and life had passed something dark and smothering and menacing; a gloom, as it were, that swallowed up life and made for death—his death.

Every force of his being impelled him to spring up and confront the unseen danger, but his soul dominated the panic, and he remained squatting on his heels, in his hands a chunk of gold. He did not dare to look around, but he knew by now that there was something behind him and above him. He made believe to be interested in the gold in his hand. He examined it critically, turned it over and over, and rubbed the dirt from it. And all the time he knew that something behind him was looking at the gold over his shoulder.

Still feigning interest in the chunk of gold in his hand, he listened intently and he heard the breathing of the thing behind him. His eyes searched the ground in front of him for a weapon, but they saw only the uprooted gold, worthless to him now in his extremity. There was his pick, a handy weapon on occasion; but this was not such an occasion. The man realized his predicament. He was in a narrow hole that was seven feet deep. His head did not come to the surface of the ground. He was in a trap.

He remained squatting on his heels. He was quite cool and collected; but his mind, considering every factor, showed him only his helplessness. He continued rubbing the dirt from the quartz fragments and throwing the gold into the pan. There was nothing else for him to do. Yet he knew that he would have to rise up, sooner or later, and face the danger that breathed at his back. The minutes passed, and with the passage of each minute he knew that by so much he was nearer the time when he must stand up, or else—and his wet shirt went cold against his flesh again at the thought—or else he might receive death as he stooped there over his treasure.

Still he squatted on his heels, rubbing dirt from gold and debating in just what manner he should rise up. He might rise up with a rush and claw his way out of the hole to meet whatever threatened on the even footing above ground. Or he might rise up slowly and carelessly, and feign casually to discover the thing that breathed at his back. His instinct and every fighting fiber of his body favored the mad, clawing rush to the surface. His intellect, and the craft thereof, favored the slow and cautious meeting with the thing that menaced and which he could not see. And while he debated, a loud, crashing noise burst on his ear. At the same instant he received a stunning blow on the left side of the back, and from the point of impact felt a rush of flame through his flesh. He sprang up in the air, but halfway to his feet collapsed. His body crumpled in like a leaf withered in sudden heat, and he came down, his chest across his pan of gold, his face in the dirt and rock, his legs tangled and twisted because of the restricted space at the bottom of the hole. His legs twitched convulsively several times. His body was shaken as with a mighty ague. There was a slow expansion of the lungs, accompanied by a deep sigh. Then the air was slowly, very slowly, exhaled, and his body as slowly flattened itself down into inertness.

Above, revolver in hand, a man was peering down over the edge of the hole. He peered for a long time at the prone and motionless body beneath him. After a while the stranger sat down on the edge of the hole so that he could see into it, and rested the revolver on his knee. Reaching his hand into a pocket, he drew out a wisp of brown paper. Into this he dropped a few crumbs of tobacco. The combination became a cigarette, brown and squat, with the ends turned in. Not once did he take his eyes from the body at the bottom of the hole. He lighted the cigarette and drew its smoke into his lungs with a caressing intake of the breath. He smoked slowly. Once the cigarette went out and he relighted it.

And all the while he studied the body beneath him.

In the end he tossed the cigarette stub away and rose to his feet. He moved to the edge of the hole. Spanning it, a hand resting on each edge, and with the revolver still in the right hand, he muscled his body down into the hole. While his feet were yet a yard from the bottom he released his hands and dropped down.

At the instant his feet struck bottom he saw the pocket miner's arm leap out, and his own legs knew a swift, jerking grip that overthrew him. In the nature of the jump his revolver hand was above his head. Swiftly as the grip had flashed about his legs, just as swiftly he brought the revolver down. He was still in the air, his fall in process of completion, when he pulled the trigger. The explosion was deafening in the confined space. The smoke filled the hole so that he could see nothing. He struck the bottom on his back, and like a cat's the pocket miner's body was on top of him. Even as the miner's body passed on top, the stranger crooked in his right arm to fire; and even in that instant the miner, with a quick thrust of elbow, struck his wrist. The muzzle was thrown up and the bullet thudded into the dirt of the side of the hole.

The next instant the stranger felt the miner's hand grip his wrist. The struggle was now for the revolver. Each man strove to turn it against the other's body. The smoke in the hole was clearing. The stranger, lying on his back, was beginning to see dimly. But suddenly he was blinded by a handful of dirt deliberately flung into his eyes by his antagonist. In that moment of shock his grip on the revolver was broken. In the next moment he felt a smashing darkness descend upon his brain, and in the midst of the darkness even the darkness ceased.

But the pocket miner fired again and again, until the revolver was empty. Then he tossed it from him and, breathing heavily, sat down on the dead man's legs.

The miner was sobbing and struggling for breath. "Measly skunk!" he panted; "a-campin' on my trail an' lettin' me do the work, an' then shootin' me in the back!"

He was half crying from anger and exhaustion. He peered at the face of the dead man. It was sprinkled with loose dirt and gravel, and it was difficult to distinguish the features.

"Never laid eyes on him before," the miner concluded his scrutiny. "Just a common an' ordinary thief, damn him! An' he shot me in the back! He shot me in the back!"

He opened his shirt and felt himself, front and back, on his left side. "Went clean through, and no harm done!" he cried jubilantly. "I'll bet he aimed all right all right; but he drew the gun over when he pulled the trigger—the cuss! But I fixed 'm! Oh, I fixed 'm!"

His fingers were investigating the bullet hole in his side, and a shade of regret passed over his face. "It's goin' to be stiffer'n hell," he said. "An' it's up to me to get mended an' get out o' here."

He crawled out of the hole and went down the hill to his camp. Half an hour later he returned, leading his pack horse. His open shirt disclosed the rude bandages with which he had dressed his wounds. He was slow and awkward with his left-hand movements, but that did not prevent his using the arm.

The bight of the pack rope under the dead man's shoulders enabled him to heave the body out of the hole. Then he set to work gathering up his gold. He worked steadily for several hours, pausing often to rest his stiffening shoulder and to exclaim:—

"He shot me in the back, the measly skunk! He shot me in the back!"

When his treasure was quite cleaned up and wrapped securely into a number of blanket covered parcels, he made an estimate of its value.

"Four hundred pounds, or I'm a Hot-tentot," he concluded. "Say two hundred in quartz an' dirt—that leaves two hundred pounds of gold. Bill! Wake up! Two hundred pounds of gold! Forty thousand dollars! An' it's yourn—all yourn!"

He scratched his head delightedly and his fingers blundered into an unfamiliar groove. They quested along it for several inches. It was a crease ¹⁰ through his scalp where the second bullet had plowed.

He walked angrily over to the dead man.

"You would, would you?" he bullied. "You would, eh? Well, I fixed you good an' plenty, an' I'll give you decent burial, too. That's more'n you'd have done for me."

He dragged the body to the edge of ²⁰ the hole and toppled it in. It struck the bottom with a dull crash, on its side, the face twisted up to the light. The miner peered down at it.

"An' you shot me in the back!" he said accusingly.

With pick and shovel he filled the hole. Then he loaded the gold on his horse. It was too great a load for the animal, and when he had gained his ³⁰ camp he transferred part of it to his saddle horse. Even so, he was compelled to abandon a portion of his outfit—pick and shovel and gold-pan, extra food and cooking utensils, and divers odds and ends.

The sun was at the zenith when the man forced the horses at the screen of vines and creepers. To climb the huge boulders the animals were com- ⁴⁰ pelled to uprear and struggle blindly through the tangled mass of vegetation. Once the saddle horse fell heavily and the man removed the pack to get the animal on his feet. After it started on its way again the man thrust his head out from among the leaves and peered up at the sidehill.

"The measly skunk!" he said, and disappeared.

There was a ripping and tearing of ⁵⁰ vines and boughs. The trees surged back and forth, marking the passage of the animals through the midst of them. There was a clashing of steel-shod hoofs on stone, and now and again an oath or a sharp cry of command. Then the voice of the man was raised in song:—

Tu'n around an' tu'n yo' face
Untoe them sweet hills of grace
(D' pow'rs of sin yo' am scornin'!).
Look about an' look aroun',
Fling yo' sin-pack on d' groun'
(Yo' will meet wid d' Lord in d' mornin'!).

The song grew faint and fainter, and through the silence crept back the spirit of the place. The stream once more drowsed and whispered; the hum of the mountain bees rose sleepily. Down through the perfume-weighted air fluttered the snowy fluffs of the cottonwoods. The butterflies drifted in and out among the trees, and over all blazed the quiet sunshine. Only remained the hoof marks in the meadow and the torn hillside to mark the boisterous trail of the life that had broken the peace of the place and passed on.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT (1858-1919)

THE STRENUOUS LIFE¹

In speaking to you, men of the greatest city of the West, men of the State which gave to the country Lincoln and Grant, men who preëminently and distinctly embody all that is most American in the American character, I wish to preach, not the doctrine of ignoble ease, but the doctrine of the strenuous life, the life of toil and effort, of labor and strife; to preach that highest form of success which comes, not to the man who desires mere easy peace, but to the man who does not shrink from danger, from hardship, or from bitter toil, and who out of these wins the splendid ultimate triumph.

A life of slothful ease, a life of that ⁵⁰ peace which springs merely from lack either of desire or of power to strive after great things, is as little worthy of a nation as of an individual. I ask only that what every self-respecting American demands from himself and from his sons shall be demanded of the American nation as a whole. Who among you would teach your boys that ease, that peace, is to be the first consideration in their eyes—to be the ultimate goal after which they strive? You men of Chicago have made this city 10 great, you men of Illinois have done your share, and more than your share, in making America great, because you neither preach nor practise such a doctrine. You work yourselves, and you bring up your sons to work. If you are rich and are worth your salt, you will teach your sons that though they may have leisure, it is not to be spent in idleness; for wisely used leisure 20 merely means that those who possess it, being free from the necessity of working for their livelihood, are all the more bound to carry on some kind of non-remunerative work in science, in letters, in art, in exploration, in historical research—work of the type we most need in this country, the successful carrying out of which reflects most honor upon the nation. We do not 30 admire the man of timid peace. We admire the man who embodies victorious effort; the man who never wrongs his neighbor, who is prompt to help a friend, but who has those virile qualities necessary to win in the stern strife of actual life. It is hard to fail, but it is worse never to have tried to succeed. In this life we get nothing save by effort. Freedom from effort in the present 40 merely means that there has been stored up effort in the past. A man can be freed from the necessity of work only by the fact that he or his fathers before him have worked to good purpose. If the freedom thus purchased is used aright, and the man still does actual work, though of a different kind, whether as a writer or a general, whether in the field of politics or in the 50 field of exploration and adventure, he shows he deserves his good fortune. But if he treats this period of freedom from the need of actual labor as a period, not of preparation, but of mere enjoyment, even though perhaps not of vicious enjoyment, he shows that he is simply a cumberer of the earth's surface, and he surely unfits himself to hold his own with his fellows, if the need to do so should again arise. A mere life of ease is not in the end a very satisfactory life, and, above all, it is a life which ultimately unfits those who follow it for serious work in the world.

In the last analysis a healthy state can exist only when the men and women who make it up lead clean, vigorous, healthy lives; when the children are so trained that they shall endeavor, not to shirk difficulties, but to overcome them; not to seek ease, but to know how to wrest triumph from toil and risk. The man must be glad to do a man's work, to dare and endure and to labor; to keep himself, and to keep those dependent upon him. The woman must be the housewife, the helpmeet of the homemaker, the wise and fearless mother of many healthy children. In one of Daudet's powerful and melancholy books he speaks of "the fear of 30 maternity, the haunting terror of the young wife of the present day." When such words can be truthfully written of a nation, that nation is rotten to the heart's core. When men fear work or fear righteous war, when women fear motherhood, they tremble on the brink of doom; and well it is that they should vanish from the earth, where they are fit subjects for the scorn of all men and 40 women who are themselves strong and brave and high-minded.

As it is with the individual, so it is with the nation. It is a base untruth to say that happy is the nation that has no history. Thrice happy is the nation that has a glorious history. Far better it is to dare mighty things, to win glorious triumphs, even though checkered by failure, than to take rank with those 50 poor spirits who neither enjoy much nor suffer much, because they live in the gray twilight that knows not victory nor defeat. If in 1861 the men who loved the Union had believed that peace was the end of all things, and war and strife the worst of all things, and had acted up to their belief, we would have saved hundreds of thousands of lives, we would have saved hundreds of millions of dollars. Moreover, besides saving all the blood and treasure we then lavished, we would have prevented the heartbreak of many women, the dissolution of many homes, 10 and we would have spared the country those months of gloom and shame when it seemed as if our armies marched only to defeat. We could have avoided all this suffering simply by shrinking from strife. And if we had thus avoided it, we would have shown that we were weaklings, and that we were unfit to stand among the great nations of the earth. Thank God for the iron in the 20 blood of our fathers, the men who upheld the wisdom of Lincoln, and bore sword or rifle in the armies of Grant! Let us, the children of the men who proved themselves equal to the mighty days, let us, the children of the men who carried the great Civil War to a triumphant conclusion, praise the God of our fathers that the ignoble counsels of peace were rejected; that the suffer- 30 ing and loss, the blackness of sorrow and despair, were unflinchingly faced, and the years of strife endured; for in the end the slave was freed, the Union restored, and the mighty American republic placed once more as a helmeted queen among nations.

We of this generation do not have to face a task such as that our fathers faced; but we have our tasks, and woe 40 to us if we fail to perform them! We cannot, if we would, play the part of China, and be content to rot by inches in ignoble ease within our borders, taking no interest in what goes on beyond them, sunk in a scrambling commercialism; heedless of the higher life, the life of aspiration, of toil and risk, busying ourselves only with the wants of our bodies for the day, until sud- 50 denly we should find, beyond a shadow of question, what China has already found, that in this world the nation that has trained itself to a career of unwarlike and isolated ease is bound, in the end, to go down before other nations which have not lost the manly and adventurous qualities. If we are to be a really great people, we must strive in good faith to play a great part in the world. We cannot avoid meeting great issues. All that we can determine for ourselves is whether we shall meet them well or ill. In 1898 we could not help being brought face to face with the problem of war with Spain. All we could decide was whether we should shrink like cowards from the contest, or enter into it as be- seemed a brave and high-spirited people; and, once in, whether failure or success should crown our banners. So it is now. We cannot avoid the re- sponsibilities that confront us in Ha- waii, Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philip- pines. All we can decide is whether we shall meet them in a way that shall redound to the national credit, or whether we shall make of our dealings with these new problems a dark and shameful page in our history. To re- fuse to deal with them at all merely amounts to dealing with them badly. We have a given problem to solve. If we undertake the solution, there is, of course, always danger that we may not solve it aright; but to refuse to under- take the solution simply renders it cer- tain that we cannot possibly solve it aright. The timid man, the lazy man, the man who distrusts his country, the over-civilized man, who has lost the great fighting, masterful virtues, the ignorant man, and the man of dull mind, whose soul is incapable of feeling the mighty lift that thrills "stern men with empires in their brains"—all these, of course, shrink from seeing the na- tion undertake its new duties; shrink from seeing us build a navy and an army adequate to our needs; shrink from seeing us do our share of the world's work, by bringing order out of chaos in the great, fair tropic islands from which the valor of our soldiers and sailors has driven the Spanish flag. These are the men who fear the strenu- ous life, who fear the only national life which is really worth leading. They believe in that cloistered life which saps the hardy virtues in a nation, as it saps them in the individual; or else they are wedded to that base spirit of gain and greed which recognizes in commercialism the be-all and end-all of national life, instead of realizing that, though an indispensable element, it is, after all, but one of the many elements that go ¹⁰ to make up true national greatness. No country can long endure if its foundations are not laid deep in the material prosperity which comes from thrift, from business energy and enterprise, from hard, unsparing effort in the fields of industrial activity; but neither was any nation ever yet truly great if it relied upon material prosperity alone. All honor must be paid to the archi- ²⁰ tects of our material prosperity, to the great captains of industry who have built our factories and our railroads, to the strong men who toil for wealth with brain or hand; for great is the debt of the nation to these and their kind. But our debt is still greater to the men whose highest type is to be found in a statesman like Lincoln, a soldier like Grant. They showed by their lives ³⁰ that they recognized the law of work, the law of strife; they toiled to win a competence for themselves and those dependent upon them; but they recognized that there were yet other and even loftier duties—duties to the nation and duties to the race.

We cannot sit huddled within our own borders and avow ourselves merely an assemblage of well-to-do hucksters ⁴⁰ who care nothing for what happens beyond. Such a policy would defeat even its own end; for as the nations grow to have ever wider and wider interests, and are brought into closer and closer contact, if we are to hold our own in the struggle for naval and commercial supremacy, we must build up our power without our own borders. We must build the isthmian canal, and we must ⁵⁰ grasp the points of vantage which will enable us to have our say in deciding the destiny of the oceans of the East and the West.

So much for the commercial side. From the standpoint of international honor the argument is even stronger. The guns that thundered off Manila and Santiago left us echoes of glory, but they also left us a legacy of duty. If we drove out a mediæval tyranny only to make room for savage anarchy, we had better not have begun the task at all. It is worse than idle to say that we have no duty to perform, and can leave to their fates the islands we have conquered. Such a course would be the course of infamy. It would be followed at once by utter chaos in the wretched islands themselves. Some stronger, manlier power would have to step in and do the work, and we would have shown ourselves weaklings, unable to carry to successful completion the labors that great and high-spirited nations are eager to undertake.

The work must be done; we cannot escape our responsibility; and if we are worth our salt, we shall be glad of the chance to do the work—glad of the chance to show ourselves equal to one of the great tasks set modern civilization. But let us not deceive ourselves ^{as to the importance of the task.} Let us not be misled by vainglory into underestimating the strain it will put on our powers. Above all, let us, as we value our own self-respect, face the responsibilities with proper seriousness, courage, and high resolve. We must demand the highest order of integrity and ability in our public men who are to grapple with these new problems. We must hold to a rigid accountability those public servants who show unfaithfulness to the interests of the nation or inability to rise to the high level of the new demands upon our strength and our resources.

Of course we must remember not to judge any public servant by any one act, and especially should we beware of attacking the men who are merely the occasions and not the causes of disaster. Let me illustrate what I mean by the army and the navy. If twenty years ago we had gone to war, we should have found the navy as absolutely unprepared as the army. At that time our ships could not have encountered with success the fleets of Spain any more than nowadays we can put untrained soldiers, no matter how brave, who are armed with archaic black-powder weapons, against well-drilled regulars armed with the highest type of modern repeating rifle. But in the early eighties the attention of the nation became directed to our naval needs. Congress most wisely made a series of appropriations to build up a new navy, and under a succession of able and patriotic secretaries, of both political parties, the navy was gradually built up, until its material became equal to its splendid personnel, with the result that in the summer of 1898 it leaped to its proper place as one of the most brilliant and formidable fighting navies in the entire world. We rightly pay all honor to the men controlling the navy at the time it won these great deeds, honor to Secretary Long and Admiral Dewey, to the captains who handled the ships in action, to the daring lieutenants who braved death in the smaller craft, and to the heads of bureaus at Washington who saw that the ships were so commanded, so armed, so equipped, so well engined, as to insure the best results. But let us also keep ever in mind that all this would not have availed if it had not been for the wisdom of the men who during the preceding fifteen years had built up the navy. Keep in mind the secretaries of the navy during those years; keep in mind the senators and congressmen who by their votes gave the money necessary to build and to armor the ships, to construct the great guns, and to train the crews; remember also those who actually did build the ships, the armor, and the guns; and remember the admirals and captains who handled battle-ship, cruiser, and torpedo-boat on the high seas, alone and in squadrons, developing the seamanship, the gunnery, the power of acting together, which their successors utilized so gloriously at Manila and off Santiago. And, gentlemen, remember the converse, too. Remember that justice has two sides. Be just to those who built up the navy, and, for the sake of the future of the country, keep in mind those who opposed its building up. Read the Congressional Record. Find out the senators and congressmen who opposed the grants for building the new ships; who opposed the purchase of armor, without which the ships were worthless; who opposed any adequate maintenance for the Navy Department, and strove to cut down the number of men necessary to man our fleets. The men who did all these things were one and all working to bring disaster on the country. They have no share in the glory of Manila, in the honor of Santiago. They have no cause to feel proud of the valor of our sea-captains, of the renown of our flag. Their motives may or may not have been good, but their acts were heavily fraught with evil. They did ill for the national honor, and we won in spite of their sinister opposition.

Now, apply all this to our public men of to-day. Our army has never been built up as it should be built up. I shall not discuss with an audience like this the puerile suggestion that a nation of seventy millions of freemen is in danger of losing its liberties from the existence of an army of one hundred thousand men, three-fourths of whom will be employed in certain foreign islands, in certain coast fortresses, and on Indian reservations. No man of good sense and stout heart can take such a proposition seriously. If we are such weaklings as the proposition implies, then we are unworthy of freedom in any event. To no body of men in the United States is the country so much indebted as to the splendid officers and enlisted men of the regular army and navy. There is no body from which the country has less to fear, and none of which it should be prouder, none which it should be more anxious to upbuild.

Our army needs complete reorganization,—not merely enlarging,—and the reorganization can only come as the result of legislation. A proper general staff should be established, and the positions of ordnance, commissary, and quartermaster officers should be filled by detail from the line. Above all, the army must be given the chance to exercise in large bodies. Never again should we see, as we saw in the Spanish war, major-generals in command of divisions who had never before com-

 10 manded three companies together in the field. Yet, incredible to relate, Congress has shown a queer inability to learn some of the lessons of the war. There were large bodies of men in both branches who opposed the declaration of war, who opposed the ratification of peace, who opposed the upbuilding of the army, and who even opposed the purchase of armor at a reasonable price
 20 for the battle-ships and cruisers, thereby putting an absolute stop to the building of any new fighting-ships for the navy. If, during the years to come, any disaster should befall our arms, afloat or ashore, and thereby any shame come to the United States, remember that the blame will lie upon the men whose names appear upon the roll-call of Congress on the wrong side of these 30 great questions. On them will lie the burden of any loss of our soldiers and sailors, of any dishonor to the flag; and upon you and the people of this country will lie the blame if you do not repudiate, in no unmistakable way, what these men have done. The blame will not rest upon the untrained commander of untried troops, upon the civil officers of a department the organization of 40 which has been left utterly inadequate, or upon the admiral with an insufficient number of ships; but upon the public men who have so lamentably failed in forethought as to refuse to remedy these evils long in advance, and upon the nation that stands behind those public men.

So, at the present hour, no small share of the responsibility for the blood 50 shed in the Philippines, the blood of our brothers, and the blood of their wild and ignorant foes, lies at the thresholds of those who so long delayed the adoption of the treaty of peace, and of those who by their worse than foolish words deliberately invited a savage people to plunge into a war fraught with sure disaster for them—a war, too, in which our own brave men who follow the flag must pay with their blood for the silly, mock humanitarianism of the prattlers who sit at home in peace.

The army and the navy are the sword and the shield which this nation must carry if she is to do her duty among the nations of the earth—if she is not to stand merely as the China of the western hemisphere. Our proper conduct toward the tropic islands we have wrested from Spain is merely the form which our duty has taken at the moment. Of course we 20 are bound to handle the affairs of our own household well. We must see that there is civic honesty, civic cleanliness, civic good sense in our home administration of city, State, and nation. We must strive for honesty in office, for honesty toward the creditors of the nation and of the individual; for the widest freedom of individual initiative where possible, and for the wisest control of individual initiative where it is 30 hostile to the welfare of the many. But because we set our own household in order we are not thereby excused from playing our part in the great affairs of the world. A man's first duty is to his own home, but he is not thereby excused from doing his duty to the State; for if he fails in this second duty it is under the penalty of ceasing to be a 40 freeman. In the same way, while a nation's first duty is within its own borders, it is not thereby absolved from facing its duties in the world as a whole; and if it refuses to do so, it merely forfeits its right to struggle for a place among the peoples that shape the destiny of mankind.

In the West Indies and the Philippines alike we are confronted by most 50 difficult problems. It is cowardly to shrink from solving them in the proper way; for solved they must be, if not by us, then by some stronger and more manful race. If we are too weak, too selfish, or too foolish to solve them, some bolder and abler people must undertake the solution. Personally, I am far too firm a believer in the greatness of my country and the power of my countrymen to admit for one moment that we shall ever be driven to the ignoble alternative.

The problems are different for the different islands. Porto Rico is not large enough to stand alone. We must govern it wisely and well, primarily in the interest of its own people. Cuba is, in my judgment, entitled ultimately to settle for itself whether it shall be an independent state or an integral portion of the mightiest of republics. But until order and stable liberty are secured, we must remain in the island to insure them; and infinite tact, judgment, moderation, and courage must be shown by our military and civil representatives in keeping the island pacified, in relentlessly stamping out brigandage, in protecting all alike, and yet in showing proper recognition to the men who have fought for Cuban liberty. The Philippines offer a yet graver problem. Their population includes half-caste and native Christians, warlike Moslems, and wild pagans. Many of their people are utterly unfit for self-government, and show no signs of becoming fit. Others may in time become fit, but at present can only take part in self-government under a wise supervision, at once firm and beneficent. We have driven Spanish tyranny from the islands. If we now let it be replaced by savage anarchy, our work has been for harm and not for good. I have scant patience with those who fear to undertake the task of governing the Philippines, and who openly avow that they do fear to undertake it, or that they shrink from it because of the expense and trouble; but I have even scantier patience with those who make a pretense of humanitarianism to hide and cover their timidity, and who cant about "liberty" and the "consent of the governed," in order to excuse themselves for their unwillingness to play the part of men. Their doctrines, if carried out, would make it incumbent upon us to leave the Apaches of Arizona to work out their own salvation, and to decline to interfere in a single Indian reservation. Their doctrines condemn your forefathers and mine for ever having settled in these United States.

England's rule in India and Egypt has been of great benefit to England, for it has trained up generations of men accustomed to look at the larger and loftier side of public life. It has been of even greater benefit to India and Egypt. And finally, and most of all, it has advanced the cause of civilization. So, if we do our duty aright in the Philippines, we will add to that national renown which is the highest and finest part of national life, will greatly benefit the people of the Philippine Islands, and, above all, we will play our part well in the great work of uplifting mankind. But to do this work, keep ever in mind that we must show in a very high degree the qualities of courage, of honesty, and of good judgment. Resistance must be stamped out. The first and all-important work to be done is to establish the supremacy of our flag. We must put down armed resistance before we can accomplish anything else, and there should be no parleying, no faltering, in dealing with our foe. As for those in our own country who encourage the foe, we can afford contemptuously to disregard them; but it must be remembered that their utterances are not saved from being treasonable merely by the fact that they are despicable.

When once we have put down armed resistance, when once our rule is acknowledged, then an even more difficult task will begin, for then we must see to it that the islands are administered with absolute honesty and with good judgment. If we let the public service of the islands be turned into the prey of the spoils politician, we shall have begun to tread the path which Spain trod to her own destruction. We must send out there only good and able men, chosen for their fitness, and not because of their partizan service, and these men must not only administer impartial justice to the natives and serve their own government with honesty and fidelity, but must show the utmost tact and firmness, remembering that, with such people as those with whom we are to deal, weakness is the greatest of crimes, and that next to weakness comes lack of consideration¹⁰ for their principles and prejudices.

I preach to you, then, my countrymen, that our country calls not for the life of ease but for the life of strenuous endeavor. The twentieth century looms before us big with the fate of many nations. If we stand idly by, if we seek merely swollen, slothful ease and ignoble peace, if we shrink from the hard contests where men must win at hazard of their lives and at the risk of all they hold dear, then the bolder and stronger peoples will pass us by, and will win for themselves the domination of the world. Let us therefore boldly face the life of strife, resolute to do our duty well and manfully; resolute to uphold righteousness by deed and by word; resolute to be both honest and brave, to serve high ideals, yet²⁰ to use practical methods. Above all, let us shrink from no strife, moral or physical, within or without the nation, provided we are certain that the strife is justified; for it is only through strife, through hard and dangerous endeavor, that we shall ultimately win the goal of true national greatness.

No people on earth have more cause to be thankful than ours, and this is said reverently, in no spirit of boastfulness in our own strength, but with gratitude to the Giver of Good, who has blessed us with the conditions which have enabled us to achieve so large a measure of well-being and of happiness. To us as a people it has been granted to lay the foundations of our national life in a new continent. We are the heirs of the ages, and yet we have had to pay few of the penalties which in old countries are exacted by the dead hand of a bygone civilization. We have not been obliged to fight for our existence against any alien race; and yet our life has called for the vigor and effort without which the manlier and hardier virtues wither away. Under such conditions it would be our own fault if we failed; and the success which we have had in the past, the success which we confidently believe the future will bring, should cause in us no feeling of vainglory, but rather a deep and abiding realization of all which life has offered us; a full acknowledgment of the responsibility which is ours; and a fixed determination to show that under a free government a mighty people can thrive best, alike as regards the things of the body and the things of the soul.

Much has been given to us, and much will rightfully be expected from us. We have duties to others and duties to ourselves; and we can shirk neither. We have become a great nation, forced by the fact of its greatness into relations with the other nations of the earth; and we must behave as beseems a people with such responsibilities. Toward all other nations, large and small, our attitude must be one of cordial and sincere friendship. We must show not only in our words but in our deeds that we are earnestly desirous of securing their good will by acting toward them in a spirit of just and generous recognition of all their rights.
⁴⁰ But justice and generosity in a nation, as in an individual, count most when shown not by the weak but by the strong. While ever careful to refrain from wronging others, we must be no less insistent that we are not wronged ourselves. We wish peace; but we wish the peace of justice, the peace of righteousness. We wish it because we think it is right and not because we are afraid.
⁵⁰ No weak nation that acts manfully and justly should ever have cause to fear us, and no strong power should ever be able to single us out as a subject for insolent aggression.

Our relations with the other Powers of the world are important; but still more important are our relations among ourselves. Such growth in wealth, in population, and in power as this nation has seen during the century and a quarter of its national life is inevitably accompanied by a like growth in the problems which are ever before every nation that rises to greatness. Power invariably means both responsibility and danger. Our forefathers faced certain perils which we have outgrown. We now face other perils, the very existence of which it was impossible that they should foresee. Modern life is both complex and intense, and the tremendous changes wrought by the extraordinary industrial development of the last half century are felt in every fiber of our social and political being. Never before have men tried so vast and formidable an experiment as that of administering the affairs of a continent under the form of a democratic republic. The conditions which have told for our marvelous material well-being, which have developed to a very high degree our energy, self-reliance, and individual initiative, have also brought the care and anxiety inseparable from the accumulation of great wealth in industrial centers. Upon the success of our experiment much depends; not only as regards our own welfare, but as regards the welfare of mankind. If we fail, the cause of free self-government throughout the world will rock to its foundations; and therefore our responsibility is heavy, to ourselves, to the world as it is today, and to the generations yet unborn. There is no good reason why we should fear the future, but there is every reason why we should face it seriously, neither hiding from ourselves the gravity of the problems before us nor fearing to approach these problems with the unbending, unflinching, purpose to solve them aright.

Yet, after all, though the problems are new, though the tasks set before us differ from the tasks set before our fathers who founded and preserved the Republic, the spirit in which these tasks must be undertaken and these problems faced, if our duty is to be well done, remains essentially unchanged. We know that self-government is difficult. We know that no people needs such high traits of character as that people which seeks to govern its affairs aright through the freely expressed will of the freemen who compose it. But we have faith that we shall not prove false to the memories of the men of the mighty past. They did their work, they left us the splendid heritage we now enjoy. We in our turn have an assured confidence that we shall be able to leave this heritage unwasted and enlarged to our children and our children's children. To do so we must show, not merely in great crises, but in the everyday affairs of life, the qualities of practical intelligence, of courage, of hardihood and endurance, and above all the power of devotion to a lofty ideal, which made great the men who founded this Republic in the days of Washington, which made great the men who preserved this Republic in the days of Abraham Lincoln.

MONT-SAINT-MICHEL AND CHARTRES¹

From CHAPTER VIII

THE TWELFTH-CENTURY GLASS

At last we are face to face with the crowning glory of Chartres. Other churches have glass,—quantities of it, and very fine,—but we have been trying to catch a glimpse of the glory which stands behind the glass of Chartres, and gives it quality and feeling of its own. For once the architect is useless and his explanations are pitiable; the painter helps still less; and the decorator, unless he works in glass, is the poorest guide of all, while if he works in glass, he is sure to lead wrong; and all of them may toil until Pierre Mauclerc's stone Christ comes to life, and condemns them among the unpardonable sinners on the southern portal, but neither they nor any other artist will ever create another Chartres. You had better stop here, once for all, unless you are willing to feel that Chartres was made what it is, not by the artist, but by the Virgin.

If this imperial presence is stamped on the architecture and the sculpture with an energy not to be mistaken, it radiates through the glass with a light and color that actually blind the true servant of Mary. One becomes, sometimes, a little incoherent in talking about it; one is ashamed to be as extravagant as one wants to be; one has no business to labor painfully to explain and prove to one's self what is as clear as the sun in the sky; one loses temper in reasoning about what can only be felt, and what ought to be felt instantly, as it was in the twelfth century, even by the truie qui file and the ane qui vielle. Any one should feel it that wishes; any one who does not wish to feel it can let it alone. Still, it may be that not one tourist in a hundred—perhaps not one in a thousand of the English-speaking race—does feel it, or can feel it even when explained to him, for we have lost many senses. . . .

No artist would have ventured to put up, before the eyes of Mary in Majesty, above the windows so dear to her, any object that she had not herself commanded. Whether a miracle was necessary, or whether genius was enough, is a point of casuistry which you can settle with Albertus Magnus or Saint Bernard, and which you will understand as little when settled as before; but for us, beyond the futilities of unnecessary doubt, the Virgin designed this rose; not perhaps in quite the same perfect spirit in which she designed the lancets, but still wholly for her own pleasure and as her own idea. She placed upon the breast of her Church—which symbolized herself—a jewel so gorgeous that no earthly majesty could bear comparison with it, and which no other heavenly majesty has rivalled. As one watches the light play on it, one is still overcome by the glories of the jewelled rose and its three gemmed pendants; one feels a little of the effect she meant it to produce even on infidels, Moors, and heretics, but infinitely more on the men and women who adored her;—not to dwell too long upon it, one admits that hers is the only Church. One would admit anything that she should require. If you had only the soul of a shrimp, you would crawl, like the Abbé Suger, to kiss her feet.

Unfortunately she is gone, or comes here now so rarely that we never shall see her; but her genius remains as individual here as the genius of Blanche of Castile and Pierre de Dreux in the transepts. That the three lancets were her own taste, as distinctly as the Trianon was the taste of Louis XIV, is self-evident. They represent all that was dearest to her; her Son's glory on her right; her own beautiful life in the middle; her royal ancestry on her left: the story of her divine right, thrice-told. The pictures are all personal, like family portraits. Above them the man who worked in 1200 to carry out the harmony, and to satisfy the Virgin's wishes, has filled his rose with a dozen or two little compositions in glass, which reveal their subjects only to the best powers of a binocle. Looking carefully, one discovers at last that this gorgeous combination of all the hues of Paradise contains or hides a Last Judgment—the one subject carefully excluded from the old work, and probably not existing on the south portal for another twenty years. If the scheme of the western rose dates from 1200, as is reasonable to suppose, this Last Judgment is the oldest in the church, and makes a link between the theology of the first crusade, beneath, and the theology of Pierre Mauclerc in the south porch. The churchman is the only true and final judge on his own doctrine, and we neither know nor care to know the facts; but we are as good judges as he of the feeling, and we are at full liberty to feel that such a Last Judgment as this was never seen before or since by churchman or heretic, unless by virtue of the heresy which held that the true Christian must be happy in being damned since such is the will of God. That this blaze of heavenly light was intended, either by the Virgin or by her workmen, to convey ideas of terror or pain, is a notion which the Church might possibly preach, but which we sinners knew to be false in the thirteenth century as well as we know it now. Never in all these seven hundred years has one of us looked up at this rose without feeling it to be Our Lady's promise of Paradise.

Here as everywhere else throughout the church, one feels the Virgin's presence, with no other thought than her majesty and grace. To the Virgin and to her suppliants, as to us, who though outcasts in other churches can still hope in hers, the Last Judgment was not a symbol of God's justice or man's corruption, but of her own infinite mercy. The Trinity judged, through Christ;—Christ loved and pardoned, through her. She wielded the last and highest power on earth and in hell. In the glow and beauty of her nature, the light of her Son's infinite love shone as the sunlight through the glass, turning the Last Judgment itself into the highest proof of her divine and supreme authority. The rudest ruffian of the Middle Ages, when he looked at this Last Judgment, laughed; for what was the Last Judgment to her! An ornament, a plaything, a pleasure! a jewelled decoration which she wore on her breast! Her chief joy was to pardon; her eternal instinct was to love; her deepest passion was pity! On her imperial heart the flames of hell showed only the opaline colours of heaven. Christ the Trinity might judge as much as He pleased, but Christ the Mother would rescue; and her servants could look boldly into the flames.

If you, or even our friends the priests who still serve Mary's shrine, suspect that there is some exaggeration in this language, it will only oblige you to admit presently that there is none; but for the moment we are busy with glass rather than with faith, and there is a world of glass here still to study. Technically, we are done with it. The technique of the thirteenth century comes naturally and only too easily out of that of the twelfth. Artistically, the motive remains the same, since it is always the Virgin; but although the Virgin of Chartres is always the Virgin of Majesty, there are degrees in the assertion of her majesty even here, which effect the art and qualify its feeling. Before stepping down to the thirteenth century, one should look at these changes of the Virgin's royal presence.

First and most important as record is the Stone Virgin on the south door of the western portal, which we studied, with her Byzantine Court; and the second, also in stone, is of the same period, on one of the carved capitals of the portal, representing the Adoration of the Magi. The third is the glass Virgin at the top of the central lancet. All three are undoubted twelfth-century work; and you can see another at Paris, on the same door of Notre Dame, and still more on Abbé Suger's window at Saint-Denis, and, later, within a beautiful grisaille at Auxerre; but all represent the same figure; a Queen, enthroned, crowned, with the symbols of royal power, holding in her lap the infant King whose guardian she is. Without pretending to know what special crown she bears, we can assume, till corrected, that it is the Carolingian imperial, not the Byzantine. The Trinity nowhere appears except as implied in the Christ. At the utmost, a mystic hand may symbolize the Father. The Virgin as represented by the artists of the twelfth century in the Ile de France and at Chartres seems to be wholly French in spite of the Greek atmosphere of her workmanship. One might almost insist that she is blonde, full in face, large in figure, dazzlingly beautiful, and not more than thirty years of age. The child never seems to be more than five.

You are equally free to see a Southern or Eastern type in her face, and perhaps the glass suggests a dark type, but the face of the Virgin on the central lancet is a fourteenth-century restoration which may or may not reproduce the original, while all the other Virgins represented in the glass, except 10 one, belong to the thirteenth century. The possible exception is a well-known figure called Notre-Dame-de-la-Belle-Verrière in the choir next the south transept. A strange, almost uncanny feeling seems to haunt this window, heightened by the veneration in which it was long held as a shrine, though it is now deserted for Notre-Dame-du-Pilier on the opposite side of the choir. 20 The charm is partly due to the beauty of the scheme of the angels, supporting, saluting, and incensing the Virgin and Child with singular grace and exquisite feeling, but rather that of the thirteenth than of the twelfth century. Here too the face of the Virgin is not ancient. Apparently the original glass was injured by time or accident, and the colors were covered or renewed by 30 a simple drawing in oil. Elsewhere the color is thought to be particularly good, and the window is a favorite mine of motives for artists to exploit; but to us its chief interest is its singular depth of feeling. The Empress Mother sits full-face, on a rich throne and dais, with the Child on her lap repeating her attitude, except that her hands support His shoulders. She wears her crown; 40 her feet rest on a stool, and both stool, rug, robe, and throne are as rich as color and decoration can make them. At last a dove appears, with the rays of the Holy Ghost. Imperial as the Virgin is, it is no longer quite the unlimited empire of the western lancet. The aureole encircles her head only; she holds no sceptre; the Holy Ghost seems to give her support which she did not need before, while Saint Gabriel 50 and Saint Michael, her archangels, with their symbols of power, have disappeared. Exquisite as the angels are who surround and bear up her throne, they assert no authority. The window itself is not a single composition; the panels below seem inserted later merely to fill up the space; six represent the Marriage of Cana, and the three at the bottom show a grotesque little démon tempting Christ in the Desert. The effect of the whole, in this angle which is almost always dark or filled with shadow, is deep and sad, as though the Empress felt her authority fail, and had come down from the western portal to reproach us for neglect. The face is haunting. Perhaps its force may be due to nearness, for this is the only instance in glass of her descending so low that we can almost touch her, and see what the twelfth century instinctively felt in the features which, even in their beatitude, were serious and almost sad under the austere responsibilities of infinite pity and power.

No doubt the window is very old, or perhaps an imitation or reproduction of one which was much older; but to the pilgrim its interest lies mostly in its personality, and there it stands alone. Although the Virgin reappears 30 again and again in the lower windows,—as in those on either side of the Belle-Verrière; in the remnant of window representing her miracles at Chartres, in the south aisle next the transept; in the fifteenth century window of the chapel of Vendôme which follows; and in the third window which follows that of Vendôme and represents her coronation,—she does not show herself again 40 in all her majesty till we look up to the high windows above. There we shall find her in her splendor on her throne, above the high altar, and still more conspicuously in the Rose of France in the north transept. Still again she is enthroned in the first window of the choir next the north transept. Elsewhere we can see her standing, but never does she come down to us in the full splendor of her presence. Yet 50 wherever we find her at Chartres, and of whatever period, she is always Queen. Her expression and attitude are always calm and commanding.

She never calls for sympathy by hysterical appeals to our feelings; she does not even altogether command, but rather accepts the voluntary, unquestioning, unhesitating, instinctive faith, love, and devotion of mankind. She will accept ours, and we have not the heart to refuse it; we have not even the right, for we are her guests.

WOODROW WILSON (1856-1924)

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

No more significant memorial could have been presented to the nation than this. It expresses so much of what is singular and noteworthy in the history of the country; it suggests so many of the things that we prize most highly in our life and in our system of government. How eloquent this little house within this shrine is of the vigor of democracy! There is nowhere in the land any home so remote, so humble, that it may not contain the power of mind and heart and conscience to which nations yield and history submits its processes. Nature pays no tribute to aristocracy, subscribes to no creed of caste, renders fealty to no monarch or master of any name or kind. Genius is no snob. It does not run after titles or seek by preference the high circles of society. It affects humble company as well as great. It pays no special tribute to universities or learned societies or conventional standards of greatness, but serenely chooses its own comrades, its own haunts, its own cradle even, and its own life of adventure and of training. Here is proof of it. This little hut was the cradle of one of the great sons of men, a man of singular, delightful, vital genius who presently emerged upon the great stage of the nation's history, gaunt, shy, ungainly, but dominant and majestic, a natural ruler of men, himself inevitably the central figure of the great plot. No man can explain this, but every man can see how it demonstrates the vigor of democracy, where every door is open, in every hamlet and countryside, in city and wilderness alike, for the ruler to emerge when he will and claim his leadership in the free life. Such are the authentic proofs of the validity and vitality of democracy.

Here, no less, hides the mystery of democracy. Who shall guess this secret of nature and providence and a free polity? Whatever the vigor and vitality of the stock from which he sprang, its mere vigor and soundness do not explain where this man got his great heart that seemed to comprehend all mankind in its catholic and benignant sympathy, the mind that sat enthroned behind those brooding, melancholy eyes, whose vision swept many an horizon which those about him dreamed not of,—that mind that comprehended what it had never seen, and understood the language of affairs with the ready ease of one to the manner born,—or that nature which seemed in its varied richness to be the familiar of men of every way of life. This is the sacred mystery of democracy; that its richest fruits spring up out of soils which no man has prepared and in circumstances amidst which they are the least expected. This is a place alike of mystery and of reassurance.

It is likely that in a society ordered otherwise than our own, Lincoln could not have found himself or the path of fame and power upon which he walked serenely to his death. In this place it is right that we should remind ourselves of the solid and striking facts upon which our faith in democracy is founded. Many another man besides Lincoln has served the nation in its highest places of counsel and of action whose origins were as humble as his. Though the greatest example of the universal energy, richness, stimulation, and force of democracy, he is only one example among many. The permeating and all-pervasive virtue of the freedom which challenges us in America to make the most of every gift and power we possess, every page of our history serves to emphasize and illustrate.

Standing here in this place, it seems almost the whole of the stirring story.

Here Lincoln had his beginnings. Here the end and consummation of that great life seem remote and a bit incredible. And yet there was no break anywhere between beginning and end, no lack of natural sequence anywhere. Nothing really incredible happened. 10 Lincoln was unaffectedly as much at home in the White House as he was here. Do you share with me the feeling, I wonder, that he was permanently at home nowhere? It seems to me that in the case of a man,—I would rather say of a spirit,—like Lincoln the question where he was is of little significance, that it is always what he was that really arrests our thought and takes hold of our imagination. It is the spirit always that is sovereign. Lincoln, like the rest of us, was put through the discipline of the world,—a very rough and exacting discipline for him, an indispensable discipline for every man who would know what he is about in the midst of the world's affairs; but his spirit got only its school- 20 ing there. It did not derive its character or its vision from the experiences which brought it to its full revelation. The test of every American must always be, not where he is, but what he is. That, also, is of the essence of democracy, and is the moral of which this place is most gravely expressive.

We would like to think of men like Lincoln and Washington as typical 40 Americans, but no man can be typical who is so unusual as these great men were. It was typical of American life that it should produce such men with supreme indifference as to the manner in which it produced them, and as readily here in this hut as amidst the little circle of cultivated gentlemen to whom Virginia owed so much in leadership and example. And Lincoln and Washington were typical Americans in the use they made of their genius. But there will be few such men at best, and we will not look into the mystery of how and why they come. We will only keep the door open for them always, and a hearty welcome,—after we have recognized them.

I have read many biographies of Lincoln; I have sought out with the greatest interest the many intimate stories that are told of him, the narratives of nearby friends, the sketches at close quarters, in which those who had the privilege of being associated with him have tried to depict for us the very man himself "in his habit as he lived"; but I have nowhere found a real intimate of Lincoln's. I nowhere get the impression in any narrative or reminiscence that the writer had in fact penetrated to the heart of his mystery, or that any man could penetrate to the heart of it. That brooding spirit had no real familiars. I get the impression that it never spoke out in complete self-revelation, and that it could not reveal itself completely to anyone. It was a very lonely spirit that looked out from underneath those shaggy brows and comprehended men without fully communing with them, as if, in spite of all its genial efforts at comradeship, it dwelt apart, saw its visions of duty where 30 no man looked on. There is a very holy and very terrible isolation for the conscience of every man who seeks to read the destiny in affairs for others as well as for himself, for a nation as well as for individuals. That privacy no man can intrude upon. That lonely search of the spirit for the right perhaps no man can assist. This strange child of the cabin kept company with invisible things, was born into no intimacy but that of its own silently assembling and deploying thoughts.

I have come here to-day not to utter a eulogy on Lincoln—he stands in need of none—but to endeavor to interpret the meaning of this gift to the nation of the place of his birth and origin. Is not this an altar upon which we may forever keep alive the vestal fire of democracy, as upon a shrine at which some of the deepest and most sacred hopes of mankind may from age to age be rekindled? For these hopes must constantly be rekindled, and only those who live can rekindle them. The only stuff that can retain the life-giving heat is the stuff of living hearts. And the hopes of mankind cannot be kept alive by words merely, by constitutions, and doctrines of right, and codes of liberty. The object of democracy is to transmute these into the life and action of society, the self-denial and self-sacrifice of heroic men and women willing to make their lives an embodiment of right and service and enlightened purpose. The commands of democracy are as imperative as its privileges and opportunities are wide and generous. Its compulsion is upon us. It will be great and lift a great light for the guidance of the nations only if we are great and carry that light high for the guidance of our own feet. We are not worthy to stand here unless we ourselves be in deed and in truth real democrats and servants of mankind, ready to give our very lives for the freedom and justice and spiritual exaltation of the great nation which shelters and nurtures us.

FLAG-DAY ADDRESS

We meet to celebrate Flag Day because this flag which we honor and under which we serve is the emblem of our unity, our power, our thought and purpose as a nation. It has no other character than that which we give it from generation to generation. The choices are ours. It floats in majestic silence above the hosts that execute those choices, whether in peace or in war. And yet, though silent, it speaks to us,—speaks to us of the past, of the men and women who went before us and of the records they wrote upon it. We celebrate the day of its birth; and from its birth until now it has witnessed a great history, has floated on high the symbol of great events, of a great plan of life worked out by a great people. We are about to carry it into battle, to lift it where it will draw the fire of our enemies. We are about to bid thousands, hundreds of thousands, it may be millions, of our men, the young, the strong, the capable men of the nation, to go forth and die beneath it on fields of blood far away,—for what? For some unaccustomed thing? For something for which it has never sought the fire before? American armies were never before sent across the seas. Why are they sent now? For some new purpose, for which this great flag has never been carried before, or for some old, familiar, heroic purpose for which it has seen men, its own men, die on every battlefield upon which Americans have borne arms since the Revolution?

These are questions which must be answered. We are Americans. We in our turn serve America, and can serve her with no private purpose. We must use her flag as she has always used it. We are accountable at the bar of history and must plead in utter frankness what purpose it is we seek to serve.

It is plain enough how we were forced into the war. The extraordinary insults and aggressions of the Imperial German Government left us no self-respecting choice but to take up arms in defense of our rights as a free people and of our honor as a sovereign government. The military masters of Germany denied us the right to be neutral. They filled our unsuspecting communities with vicious spies and conspirators and sought to corrupt the opinion of our people in their own behalf. When they found that they could not do that, their agents diligently spread sedition amongst us and sought to draw our own citizens from their allegiance,—and some of these agents were men connected with the official Embassy of the German Government itself here in our own Capital. They sought by violence to destroy our industries and arrest our commerce. They tried to incite Mexico to take up arms against us, and to draw Japan into a hostile alliance with her,—and that, not by indirection, but by direct suggestion from the Foreign Office in Berlin. They impudently denied us the use of the high seas and repeatedly executed their threat that they would send to their death any of our people who ventured to approach the coasts of Europe. And many of our own people were corrupted. Men began to look upon their own neighbors with suspicion and to wonder in their hot resentment and surprise whether there was any community in which hostile intrigue did not lurk. What great nation in such circumstances would not have taken up arms? Much as we had desired peace, it was denied us, and not of our own choice. This flag under which we serve would have been dishonored had we withheld our hand.

But that is only part of the story. We know now, as clearly as we knew before we were ourselves engaged, that we are not the enemies of the German people and that they are not our enemies. They did not originate or desire this hideous war or wish that we should be drawn into it; and we are vaguely conscious that we are fighting their cause, as they will some day see it, as well as our own. They are themselves in the grip of the same sinister power that has now at last stretched its ugly talons out and drawn blood from us. The whole world is at war because the whole world is in the grip of that power, and is trying out the great battle which shall determine whether it is to be brought under its mastery or fling itself free.

The war was begun by the military masters of Germany, who proved to be also the masters of Austria-Hungary. These men have never regarded nations as peoples, men, women, and children of like blood and frame as themselves, for whom governments existed and in whom governments had their life. They have regarded them merely as serviceable organizations which they could by force or intrigue bend or corrupt to their own purpose. They have regarded the smaller states, in particular, and the peoples who could be overwhelmed by force, as their natural tools and instruments of domination.

Their purpose has long been avowed. The statesmen of other nations, to whom that purpose was incredible, paid little attention; regarded what German professors expounded in their classrooms and German writers set forth to the world as the goal of German policy as rather the dream of minds detached from practical affairs, as preposterous private conceptions of German destiny, than as the actual plans of responsible rulers; but the rulers of Germany themselves knew all the while what concrete plans, what well advanced intrigues lay back of what the professors and the writers were saying, and were glad to go forward unmolested, filling the thrones of Balkan states with German princes, putting German officers at the service of Turkey to drill her armies and make interest with her government, developing plans of sedition and rebellion in India and Egypt, setting their fires in Persia. The demands made by Austria upon Servia were a mere single step in a plan which compassed Europe and Asia, from Berlin to Bagdad. They hoped those demands might not arouse Europe, but they meant to press them whether they did or not, for they thought themselves ready for the final issue of arms.

Their plan was to throw a broad belt of German military power and political control across the very center of Europe and beyond the Mediterranean into the heart of Asia; and Austria-Hungary was to be as much their tool and pawn as Servia or Bulgaria or Turkey or the ponderous states of the East. Austria-Hungary, indeed, was to become part of the central German Empire, absorbed and dominated by the same forces and influences that had originally cemented the German states themselves. The dream had its heart at Berlin. It could have had a heart nowhere else! It rejected the idea of solidarity of race entirely. The choice of peoples played no part in it at all. It contemplated binding together racial and political units which could be kept together only by force,—Czechs, Magyars, Croats, Roumanians, Turks, Armenians,—the proud states of Bohemia and Hungary, the stout little commonwealths of the Balkans, the indomitable Turks, the subtle peoples of the East. These peoples did not wish to be united. They ardently desired to direct their own affairs, would be 10 satisfied only by undisputed independence. They could be kept quiet only by the presence or the constant threat of armed men. They would live under a common power only by sheer compulsion and await the day of revolution.

But the German military statesmen had reckoned with all that and were ready to deal with it in their own 20 way.

And they have actually carried the greater part of that amazing plan into execution. Look how things stand. Austria is at their mercy. It has acted, not upon its own initiative or upon the choice of its own people, but at Berlin's dictation, ever since the war began. Its people now desire peace, but cannot have it until leave is granted from Ber- 30 lin. The so-called Central Powers are in fact but a single Power. Servia is at its mercy, should its hands be but for a moment freed. Bulgaria has consented to its will, and Roumania is overrun. The Turkish armies, which Germans trained, are serving Germany, certainly not themselves, and the guns of German warships lying in the harbor at Constantinople remind Turkish 40 statesmen every day that they have no choice but to take their orders from Berlin. From Hamburg to the Persian Gulf the net is spread.

Is it not easy to understand the eagerness for peace that has been manifested from Berlin ever since the snare was set and sprung? Peace, peace, peace has been the talk of her Foreign Office for now a year and more; not 50 peace upon her own initiative, but upon the initiative of the nations over which she now deems herself to hold the advantage. A little of the talk has been public, but most of it has been private. Through all sorts of channels it has come to me, and in all sorts of guises, but never with the terms disclosed which the German Government would be willing to accept.

That government has other valuable pawns in its hands besides those I have mentioned. It still holds a valuable part of France, though with slowly relaxing grasp, and practically the whole of Belgium. Its armies press close upon Russia and overrun Poland at their will. It cannot go farther; it dare not go back. It wishes to close its bargain before it is too late and it has little left to offer for the pound of flesh it will demand.

The military masters under whom Germany is bleeding see very clearly to what point Fate has brought them. If they fall back or are forced back an inch, their power both abroad and at home will fall to pieces like a house of cards. It is their power at home they are thinking about now more than their power abroad. It is that power which is trembling under their very feet; and deep fear has entered their hearts. They have but one chance to perpetuate 30 their military power or even their controlling political influence. If they can secure peace now with the immense advantages still in their hands which they have up to this point apparently gained, they will have justified themselves before the German people: they will have gained by force what they promised to gain by it—an immense expansion of German power, an immense enlargement of German industrial and commercial opportunities. Their prestige will be secure, and with their prestige their political power. If they fail, their people will thrust them aside; a government accountable to the people themselves will be set up in Germany as it has been in England, in the United States, in France, and in all the great countries of the modern time except Germany. If they succeed they are safe, and Germany and the world are undone; if they fail Germany is saved and the world will be at peace. If they succeed, America will fall within the menace. We and all the rest of the world must remain armed, as they will remain, and must make ready for the next step in their aggression; if they fail, the world may unite for peace and Germany may be of the union.

Do you not now understand the new intrigue, the intrigue for peace, and why the masters of Germany do not hesitate to use any agency that promises to effect their purpose, the deceit of the nations? Their present particular aim is to deceive all those who throughout the world stand for the rights of peoples and the self-government of nations; for they see what immense strength the forces of justice and of liberalism are gathering out of this war. They are employing liberals in their enterprise. They are using men, in Germany and without, as their spokesmen whom they have hitherto despised and oppressed, using them for their own destruction.—Socialists, the leaders of labor, the thinkers they have hitherto sought to silence. Let them once succeed, and these men, now their tools, will be ground to powder beneath the weight of the great military empire they will have set up; the revolutionists in Russia will be cut off from all succor or coöperation in western Europe, and a counter-revolution fostered and supported; Germany herself will lose her chance of freedom; and all Europe will arm for the next, the final struggle.

The sinister intrigue is being no less actively conducted in this country than in Russia and in every country in Europe to which the agents and dupes of the Imperial German Government can get access. That government has many spokesmen here, in places high and low. They have learned discretion. They keep within the law. It is opinion they utter now, not sedition. They proclaim the liberal purposes of their masters; declare this a foreign war which can touch America with no danger to either her lands or her institutions; set England at the center of the stage and talk of her ambition to assert economic dominion throughout the world; appeal to our ancient tradition of isolation in the politics of the nations; and seek to undermine the government with false professions of loyalty to its principles.

But they will make no headway. The false betray themselves always in every accent. It is only friends and partisans of the German Government whom we have already identified who utter these thinly disguised disloyalties. The facts are patent to all the world, and nowhere are they more plainly seen than in the United States, where we are accustomed to deal with facts and not with sophistries; and the great fact that stands out above all the rest is that this is a people's war, a war for freedom and justice and self-government amongst all the nations of the world, a war to make the world safe for the peoples who live upon it and have made it their own, the German people themselves included; and that with us rests the choice to break through all these hypocrisies and patent cheats and masks of brute force and help set the world free, or else stand aside and let it be dominated a long age through by sheer weight of arms and the arbitrary choices of self-constituted masters, by the nation which can maintain the biggest armies and the most irresistible armaments,—a power to which the world has afforded no parallel and in the face of which political freedom must wither and perish.

For us there is but one choice. We have made it. Woe be to the man or group of men that seeks to stand in our way in this day of high resolution when every principle we hold dearest is to be vindicated and made secure for the salvation of the nations. We are ready to plead at the bar of history, and our flag shall wear a new luster. Once more we shall make good with our lives and fortunes the great faith to which we were born, and a new glory shall shine in the face of our people.

To EDWARD M. HOUSE

LONDON, February 24, 1914.

MY DEAR HOUSE:

You'll be interested in these pamphlets by Sir Max Waechter, who has opened an office here and is spending much money to "federate" Europe. I enclose also an article about him from the Daily Telegraph, which tells how he has interviewed most of the Old World monarchs. Get also, immediately, the new two-volume life of Lord Lyons, Minister to the United States during the Civil War, and subsequently Ambassador to France. You will find an interesting account of the campaign of about 1870 to reduce armaments, when old Bismarck dumped the whole basket of apples by marching against France. You know I sometimes fear some sort of repetition of that experience. Some government (probably Germany) will see bankruptcy staring it in the face, and the easiest way out will seem a great war. Bankruptcy before a war would be ignominious; after a war, it could be charged to "glory." . . .

Always heartily yours,

W. H. P.

P. S. There's nothing like the President. By George! the passage of the arbitration treaty (renewal) almost right off the bat, and apparently the tolls discrimination coming presently to its repeal! Sir Edward Grey remarked to me yesterday: "Things are clearing up!" I came near saying to him: "Have you any miracles in mind that you'd like to see worked?" Wilson stock is at a high premium on this side of the water, in spite of the momentary impatience caused by Benton's death.

W. H. P.

TO THE PRESIDENT

LONDON, Sunday, August 9, 1914.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT:

God save us! What a week it has been! Last Sunday I was down at the cottage ² I have taken for the summer—an hour out of London—uneasy because of the apparent danger and 10 of what Sir Edward Grey had told me. During the day people began to go to the Embassy, but not in great numbers—merely to ask what to do in case of war. The Secretary whom I had left in charge on Sunday telephoned me every few hours and laughingly told funny experiences with nervous women who came in and asked absurd questions. Of course, we all knew 20 the grave danger that war might come, but nobody could by the wildest imagination guess at what awaited us. On Monday I was at the Embassy earlier than I think I had ever been there before, and every member of the staff was already on duty. Before breakfast time the place was filled—packed like sardines. This was two days before war was declared. There was no 30 chance to talk to individuals, such was the jam. I got on a chair and explained that I had already telegraphed to Washington—on Saturday—suggesting the sending of money and ships, and asking them to be patient. I made a speech to them several times during the day, and kept the Secretaries doing so at intervals. More than 2,000 Americans crowded into those offices (which 40 are not large) that day. We were kept there till two o'clock in the morning. The Embassy has not been closed since.

Mr. Kent, of the Bankers Trust Company in New York, volunteered to form an American Citizens' Relief Committee. He and other men of experience and influence organized themselves at the Savoy Hotel. . . . We now have an orderly organization at 50 four places: The Embassy, the Consul-General's Office, the Savoy, and the American Society in London, and everything is going well. Those two first days, there was, of course, great confusion. Crazy men and weeping women were imploring and cursing and demanding—God knows it was bedlam turned loose. I have been called a man of the greatest genius for an emergency by some, by others a damned fool, by others every epithet between these extremes. Men shook English banknotes in my face and demanded United States money and swore our Government and its agents ought all to be shot. Women expected me to hand them steamship tickets home. When some found out they could not get tickets on the transports (which they assumed would sail the next day) they accused me of favoritism. . . .

Then came the declaration of war, most dramatically. Tuesday night, five minutes after the ultimatum had expired, the Admiralty telegraphed to the fleet "Go." In a few minutes the answer came back, "Off." Soldiers began to march through the city, going to the railway stations. An indescribable crowd so blocked the streets about the Admiralty, the War Office, and the Foreign Office, that at one o'clock in the morning I had to drive in my car by other streets to get home.

The next day the German Embassy was turned over to me. I went to see the German Ambassador at three o'clock in the afternoon. He came down in his pajamas, a crazy man. I feared he might literally go mad. He is of the anti-war party, and he had done his best and utterly failed. This interview was one of the most pathetic experiences of my life. The poor man had not slept for several nights. Then came the crowds of frightened Germans, afraid that they would be arrested. They besieged the German Embassy and our Embassy. I put one of our naval officers in the German Embassy, put the United States seal on the door to protect it, and we began business there, too. Our naval officer has moved in—sleeps there. He has an assistant, a stenographer, a messenger: and I gave him the German automobile and chauffeur and two English servants that were left there. He has the job well in hand now, under my and Laughlin's supervision. But this has brought still another new lot of diplomatic and governmental problems—a lot of them. Three enormous German banks in London have, of course, been closed. Their managers pray for my aid. Howling women come and say their innocent German husbands have been arrested as spies. English, Germans, Americans—everybody has daughters and wives and invalid grandmothers alone in Germany. In God's name, they ask, what can I do for them? Here come stacks of letters sent under the impression that I can send them to Germany. . . .

I am having a card catalogue, each containing a sort of who's who, of all Americans in Europe of whom we hear. This will be ready by the time the Tennessee comes. Fifty or more stranded Americans—men and women—are doing this work free.

I have a member of Congress in the general reception room of the Embassy answering people's questions—three other volunteers as well.

We had a world of confusion for two or three days. But all this work is now well organized and it can be continued without confusion or cross purposes. I meet committees and lay plans and read and write telegrams from the time I wake till I go to bed. But, since it is now all in order, it is easy. Of course I am running up the expenses of the Embassy—there is no help for that; but the bill will be really exceedingly small because of the volunteer work—for a while. I have not and shall not consider the expense of whatever it seems absolutely necessary to do—of other things I shall always consider the expense most critically. Everybody is working with everybody else in the finest possible spirit. I have made out a sort of military order to the Embassy staff, detailing one man with clerks for each night, and forbidding the others to stay there till midnight. None of us slept more than a few hours last week. It was not the work that kept them after the first night or two, but the sheer excitement of this awful cataclysm. All London has been awake for a week. Soldiers are marching day and night; immense throngs block the streets about the government offices. But they are all very orderly. Every day Germans are arrested on suspicion; and several of them have committed suicide. Yesterday one poor American woman yielded to the excitement and cut her throat. I find it hard to get about much. People stop me on the street, follow me to luncheon, grab me as I come out of any committee meeting—to know my opinion of this or that—how can they get home? Will such-and-such a boat fly the American flag? Why did I take the German Embassy? I have to fight my way about and rush to an automobile. I have had to buy me a second one to keep up the racket. Buy?—no—only bargain for it, for I have not any money. But everybody is considerate, and that makes no matter for the moment. This little cottage in an out-of-the-way place, twenty-five miles from London, where I am trying to write and sleep, has been found by people today, who come in automobiles to know how they may reach their sick kinspeople in Germany. I have not had a bath for three days: as soon as I got in the tub, the telephone rang an "urgent" call.

Upon my word, if one could forget the awful tragedy, all this experience would be worth a lifetime of commonplace. One surprise follows another so rapidly that one loses all sense of time: it seems an age since last Sunday.

I shall never forget Sir Edward Grey's telling me of the ultimatum—while he wept; nor the poor German Ambassador who has lost in his high game—almost a demented man; nor the King as he declaimed at me for half-an-hour and threw up his hands and said, "My God, Mr. Page, what else could we do?" Nor the Austrian Ambassador's wringing his hands and weeping and crying out, "My dear Colleague, my dear Colleague."

Along with all this tragedy came two reverend American peace delegates who got out of Germany by the skin of their teeth and complain that they lost all the clothes they had except what they had on. "Don't complain," said I, "but thank God you saved your skins." Everybody has forgotten what war means—forgotten that folks get hurt. But they are coming around to it now. A United States Senator telegraphs me: "Send my wife and daughter home on the first ship." Ladies and gentlemen filled the steerage of that ship—not a bunk left; and his wife and daughter are found three days later sitting in a swell hotel waiting for me to bring them stateroom tickets on a silver tray! One of my young fellows in the Embassy rushes into my office saying that a man from Boston with letters of introduction from Senators and Governors and Secretaries, et. al., was demanding tickets of admission to a picture-gallery, and a Secretary to escort him there.

"What shall I do with him?"

"Put his proposal to a vote of the 200 Americans in the room, and see them draw and quarter him."

I have not yet heard what happened. A woman writes me four pages to prove how dearly she loves my sister and invites me to her hotel—five miles away—"please to tell her about the sailing of the steamships." Six American preachers pass a resolution unanimously "urging our Ambassador to telegraph our beloved, peace-loving President to stop this awful war"; and they come with simple solemnity to present their resolution. Lord save us, what a world!

And this awful tragedy moves on to—what? We do not know what is really happening, so strict is the censorship. But it seems inevitable to me that Germany will be beaten, that the horrid period of alliances and armaments will not come again, that England will gain even more of the earth's surface, that Russia may next play the menace; that all Europe (as much as survives) will be bankrupt; that relatively we shall be immensely stronger financially and politically—there must surely come many great changes—very many, yet undreamed of. Be ready; for you will be called on to compose this huge quarrel. I thank Heaven for many things—first, the Atlantic Ocean; second, that you ¹⁰ refrained from war in Mexico; third, that we kept our treaty—the canal tolls victory, I mean. Now, when all this half of the world will suffer the unspeakable brutalization of war, we shall preserve our moral strength, our political powers, and our ideals.

God save us!

TO ARTHUR W. PAGE

WILSFORD MANOR, SALISBURY,
July 8, 1917.

DEAR ARTHUR:

Since admirals and generals began to come from home, they and the war have taken my time so completely, day and night, that I haven't lately written you many things that I should like to tell you. I'll try here—a house of ³⁰ a friend where the only other guest besides your mother and me is Edward Grey. This is the first time I've seen him since he left office. . . .

Sims is the idol of the British Admiralty, and he is doing his job just as well as any man could with the tools and the chance that he has. He has made the very best of the chance, and he has completely won the confidence and admiration of this side of the world.

Pershing made an admirable impression here, and in France he has simply set them wild with joy. His coming and his little army have been worth what a real army will be worth later. It is well he came to keep the French in line.

The army of doctors and nurses have ⁵⁰ had a similar effect.

Even the New England saw-mill units have caused a furor of enthusiasm. They came with absolute Yankee completeness of organization—with duplicate parts of all their machinery, tents, cooks, pots, and pans, and everything ship-shape. The only question they asked was, "Say, where the hell are them trees you want sawed up?" That's the way to do a job! Yankee stock is made high here by such things as that. . . .

The chief fact that grows upon me is that all the facts must be brought out to show the kinship in blood and ideals of the two great English-speaking nations. . . . The truth should be forcibly and convincingly told and retold to the end of the chapter, and our national life should proceed on its natural historic lines, with its proper historic outlook and background. We ²⁰ can do something to bring this about.

Affectionately,

W. H. P.

THE POET AND HIS ART ¹

"A good prose style," says Dr. Otto ³⁰ Jespersen in his great monograph, The Growth and Structure of the English Language, "is everywhere a late acquirement, and the work of whole generations of good authors is needed to bring about the easy flow of written prose." The learned philologist is here speaking of Old English, or, as it used to be called when you and I were at the breast of enlightenment, Anglo-⁴⁰ Saxon. An inch or so lower down the page he points out that what he says of prose is by no means true of verse—that poetry of very respectable quality is often written by peoples and individuals whose prose is quite as crude and graceless as that, say, of a latter-day American statesman—that even the so-called Anglo-Saxons of Beowulf's time, a race as barbarous as the modern Jugo-Slavs or Mississippians, were yet capable, on occasion, of writing dithyrambs of an indubitable sweet gaudiness.

The point needs no laboring. A glance at the history of any literature will prove its soundness. Moreover, it is supported by what we see around us every day—that is, if we look in literary directions. Some of the best verse in the modern movement, at home and abroad, has been written by intellectual adolescents who could no more write a first rate paragraph in prose than they could leap the Matterhorn—girls just out of Newnham and Vassar, young army officers, elderly fat women, obscure lawyers and doctors, newspaper reporters, all sorts of hollow dilettanti, male and female. Ninetenths of the best poetry of the world has been written by poets less than 20 thirty years old; a great deal more than half of it has been written by poets under twenty-five. One always associates poetry with youth, for it deals chiefly with the ideas that are peculiar to youth, and its terminology is quite as youthful as its content. When one hears of a poet past thirty-five, he seems somehow unnatural and even a trifle obscene; it is as if one encountered a greying man who still played the Chopin waltzes and believed in elective affinities. But prose, obviously, is a sterner and more mature matter. All the great masters of prose (and especially of English prose, for its very resilience and brilliance make it extraordinarily hard to write) have had to labor for years before attaining to their mastery of it. The early prose of Abraham Lincoln was remarkable 40 only for its badness; it was rhetorical and bombastic, and full of supernumerary words; in brief, it was a kind of poetry. It took years and years of hard striving for him to develop the simple and exquisite prose of his last half-decade. So with Thomas Henry Huxley, perhaps the greatest virtuoso of plain English who has ever lived. 50 His first writings were competent but undistinguished; he was almost a grandfather before he perfected his superb style. And so with Anatole

France, and Addison, and T. B. Macaulay, and George Moore, and A. E., and Lord Dunsany, and Nietzsche, and to go back to antiquity, Marcus Tullius Cicero. I have been told that the average age of the men who made the Authorized Version of the Bible was beyond sixty years. Had they been under thirty they would have made it 10 lyrical; as it was, they made it colossal.

The reason for all this is not far to seek. Prose, however powerful in its appeal to the emotions, is always based primarily upon logic, and is thus scientific; poetry, whatever its so-called intellectual content, is always based upon mere sensations, and is thus loose and disorderly. A man must have acquired discipline over his feelings before he can write sound prose; he must have learned how to subordinate his transient ideas to more general and permanent ideas; above all, he must have acquired a good "head" for words, which is to say, a capacity for resisting their mere lascivious lure. But to write acceptable poetry, or even good poetry, he needs none of these things. If his hand runs away with his head it 30 is actually a merit. If he writes what everyone knows to be untrue, in terms that no sane adult would ever venture to use in real life, it is a proof of his divine afflation. If he slops over and heaves around in a manner never hitherto observed on land or sea, the fact proves his originality. The so-called "forms" of verse and the rules of rhyme and rhythm do not offer him 40 difficulties; they offer him refuges. Their purpose is not to keep him in order, but simply to give him countenance by providing him with a formal orderliness when he is most out of order. Using them is like swimming with bladders. The first literary composition of a quick-minded child is always some sort of jingle. It starts out with an inane idea—half an idea. Sticking 50 to prose, it could go no further. But to its primary imbecility it nows adds a meaningless phrase which, while logically unrelated, provides an agreeable concord in mere sound—and the result is the primordial tadpole of a sonnet. All the sonnets of the world, save a few of miraculous (and perhaps accidental) quality, partake of this fundamental nonsensicality. In all of them there are ideas that would sound idiotic in prose, and phrases that would sound clumsy and uncouth in prose. But the rhyme scheme conceals this nonsensicality. As a substitute for the missing logical plausibility it offers a sensuous harmony. Reading the thing, one gets a vague effect of agreeable sound, and so the intrinsic feebleness is overlooked. It is, in a sense, like observing a pretty girl, competently dressed and made up, across the footlights. But translating the poem into prose is like meeting and marrying her.

II

Much of the current discussion of poetry is corrupted by a fundamental error. That error consists in regarding the thing itself as a simple entity, to be described conveniently in a picturesque phrase. "Poetry," says one critic, "is the statement of overwhelming emotional values." "Poetry," says another, "is an attempt to purge language of everything except its music and its pictures." "Poetry," says a third, "is the entering of delicately imaginative plateaus." "Poetry," says a fourth, "is truth carried alive into the heart by a passion." "Poetry," says a fifth, "is compacted of what seems, not of what is." "Poetry," says a sixth, "is the expression of thought in musical language." "Poetry," says a seventh, "is the language of a state of crisis." And so on, and so on. Quod est poetica? They all answer, and yet they all fail to answer. Poetry, in fact, is two quite distinct things. It may be either or both. One is a series of words that are intrinsically musical, in clang-tint and rhythm, as the single word cellar-door is musical. The other is a series of ideas, false in themselves, that offer a means of emotional and imaginative escape from the harsh realities of every day. In brief (I succumb, like all the rest, to phrase-making), poetry is a comforting piece of fiction set to more or less lascivious music—a slap on the back in waltz time—a grand release of longings and repressions to the tune of flutes, harps, sackbuts, psalteries and the usual strings.

As I say, poetry may be either the one thing or the other—caressing music or caressing assurance. It need not necessarily be both. Consider a familiar example from Othello:

Not poppy, nor mandragora,
Nor all the drowsy syrups of the world,
Shall ever medicine thee to that sweet sleep
Which thou owed'st yesterday.

Here the sense, at best, is surely very vague. Probably not one auditor in a hundred, hearing an actor recite these glorious lines, attaches any intelligible meaning to the archaic word owed'st, the corner-stone of the whole sentence. Nevertheless, the effect is stupendous. The passage assaults and benumbs the faculties like Schubert's "Ständchen" or the slow movement of his Tragische symphony; hearing it is a sensuous debauch; the man anæsthetic to it could stand unmoved before Chartres cathedral. One easily recalls many other such bursts of pure music—in Poe, in Heine, in Swinburne, in Marlowe, even in Tennyson. Two-thirds of the charm of reading Chaucer (setting aside the Rabelaisian comedy) comes out of the mere burble of the words; the meaning, to a modern Englishman or American, is often extremely obscure, and sometimes downright undecipherable. The whole fame of Poe, as a poet, is based upon five short poems. Of them, three are almost pure music. Their intellectual content is of the vaguest. No one would venture to reduce them to plain English. Even Poe himself always thought of them, not as statements of poetic ideas, but as simple utterances of poetic (i.e., musical) sounds.

It was the American, Sidney Lanier, himself a competent poet, who first showed the dependence of poetry upon music. He had little to say, unfortunately, about the clang-tint of words; what concerned him almost exclusively was rhythm. In The Science of English Verse, he showed that the charm of this rhythm could be explained in the technical terms of music—that all the old gabble about dactyls and spondees was no more than a dog Latin in-10 vented by men who were fundamentally ignorant of the thing they discussed. Lanier's book was the first intelligent work ever published upon the nature and structure of the sensuous content of poetry. He struck out into such new and far paths that the professors of prosody still lag behind him after half a century, quite unable to understand a poet who was also a shrewd critic and 20 a first-rate musician. But if, so deeply concerned with rhythm, he marred his treatise by forgetting clang-tint, he marred it still more by forgetting content. Poetry that is all music is obviously relatively rare, for only a poet who is also a natural musician can write it, and natural musicians are much rarer in the world than poets. Ordinary poetry, average poetry, thus 30 depends in part upon its ideational material, and perhaps even chiefly. It is the idea expressed in a poem, and not the mellifluousness of the words used to express it, that arrests and enchants the average connoisseur. Often, indeed, he disdains this mellifluousness, and argues that the idea ought to be set forth without the customary pretty jingling, or, at most, with only the scant 40 jingling that lies in rhythm—in brief, he wants his ideas in the nude, and so advocates vers libre.

It was another American, this time Professor F. C. Prescott, of Cornell University, who first gave scientific attention to the intellectual content of poetry. His book is called Poetry and Dreams. Its virtue lies in the fact that it rejects all the customary mysti-50 cal and romantic definitions of poetry, and seeks to account for the thing in straightforward psychological terms. Poetry, says Prescott, is simply the verbal materialization of a day-dream, the statement of a cherished wish, an attempt to satisfy a subconscious longing by saying that it is satisfied. In brief, poetry represents imagination's bold effort to escape from the cold and clammy facts that hedge us in—to soothe the wrinkled and fevered brow with beautiful balderdash.

On the precise nature of this beautiful balderdash you can get all the information you need by opening at random the nearest book of verse. The ideas you will find in it may be divided into two main divisions. The first consists of denials of objective facts; the second of denials of subjective facts. Specimen of the first sort:

God's in His heaven,
 All's well with the world.

Specimen of the second:

I am the master of my fate;
 I am the captain of my soul.

It is my contention that all poetry (forgetting, for the moment, its possible merit as mere sound) may be resolved into either the one or the other of these frightful imbecilities—that its essential character lies in its bold flouting of what every reflective adult knows to be the truth. The poet, imagining him to be sincere, is simply one who disposes of all the horrors of life on this earth, and of all the difficulties presented by his own inner weaknesses no less, by the childish device of denying them. Is it a well-known fact that love is an emotion that is almost as perishable as eggs—that it is biologically impossible for a given male to yearn for a given female more than a few brief years? Then the poet disposes of it by assuring his girl that he will nevertheless love her forever—more, by pledging his word of honour that he believes that she will love him forever. Is it equally notorious that there is no such thing as justice in the world—that the good are tortured 50 insanely and the evil go free and prosper? Then the poet composes a piece crediting God with a mysterious and unintelligible theory of jurisprudence, whereby the torture of the good is a sort of favor conferred upon them for their goodness. Is it of almost equally widespread report that no healthy man likes to contemplate his own inevitable death—that even in time of war, with a vast pumping up of emotion to conceal the fact, every soldier hopes and believes that he, personally, will escape? Then the poet, first carefully introducing himself into a bomb-proof, achieves strophes declaring that he is free from all such weakness—that he will deliberately seek a rendezvous with death, and laugh ha-ha when the bullet finds him.

The precise nature of the imbecility thus solemnly set forth depends, very largely, of course, upon the private prejudices and yearnings of the poet, and the reception that is given it depends, by the same token, upon the private prejudices and yearnings of the reader. That is why it is often so difficult to get any agreement upon the merits of a definite poem, i.e., to get any agreement upon its capacity to soothe. There is the man who craves only the animal delights of a sort of Moslem paradise; to him, if he be an American, The Frost is on the Pumpkin is a noble poem. There is the man who yearns to get out of the visible universe altogether, and tread the fields of asphodel: for him there is delight only in the mystical poetry of Crashaw, Thompson, Yeats and company. There is the man who revolts against the sordid Christian notion of immortality—an eternity to be spent flapping wings with pious green-grocers and oleaginous bishops; he finds his escape in the gorgeous blasphemies of Swinburne. There is, to make an end of examples, the man who, with an inferiority complex eating out his heart, is moved by a great desire to stalk the world in heroic guise: he may go to the sonorous swanking of Kipling, or he may go to something more subtle, to some poem in which the boasting is more artfully concealed, say Christina Rossetti's When I am Dead. Many men, many complexes, many secret yearnings! They collect, of course, in groups; if the group happens to be large enough, the poet it is devoted to becomes famous. Kipling's great fame, in the days before the War, is thus easily explained. He appealed to the commonest of all types of man, next to the sentimental type—which is to say, he appealed to the bully and braggart type, the chest-slapping type, the patriot type. Less harshly described, to the boy type. All of us have been Kiplingomaniacs at some time or another. I was myself a very ardent one at seventeen, and wrote many grandiloquent sets of verse in the manner of Tommy Atkins and Fuzzy-Wuzzy. But if the gifts of observation and reflection have been given to us, by war or increasing years, we get over it. There comes a time when we no longer yearn to be heroes, but seek only peace—maybe even hope for quick extinction. Then we turn to Swinburne and The Garden of Proserpine—more false assurances, more mellifluous play-acting, another tinkling make-believe—but how sweet on blue days!

Thus a man's preferences in poetry constitute an excellent means of estimating his inner cravings and credulities. The music disarms his critical sense, and he confesses to cherishing ideas that he would repudiate with indignation if they were put into plain words. I say he cherishes those ideas. Maybe he simply tolerates them unwillingly; maybe they are simply inescapable heritages from his barbarous ancestors, like his vermiform appendix. Think of the poems you like, and you will come upon many such intellectual fossils—ideas that you by no means subscribe to openly, but that nevertheless give you a strange joy. I put myself on the block as Exhibit A. There is my delight in a sonnet, Tears, by Lizette Woodworth Reese, an American who should be better known than she is. Nothing could do more violence to my overt beliefs. Put into prose, the doctrine in the poem would exasperate and even enrage me. There is no man in Christendom who is less a Christian than I am. But here the dead hand grabs me by the ear: My heathen ancestors were converted to Christianity in the year 1535, and remained of that faith until near the middle of the eighteenth century. Observe, now, the load I carry; more than two hundred years of Christianity, and a thousand or more years of worship of heathen gods before that—at least twelve hundred years of uninterrupted belief in the immortality of the soul. Is it any wonder that, betrayed by the incomparable music of Miss Reese's Anglo-Saxon monosyllables, my conscious faith is lulled to sleep, thus giving my subconscious a chance to wallow in its immemorial superstitions?

Even so, my vulnerability to such superstitions is very low, and it tends to grow less as I increase in years and wisdom. As I have said, I once throbbed to the drum-beat of Kipling; later on, I was responsive to the mellow romanticism of Tennyson; now it takes one of the genuinely fundamental delusions of the human race to move me. But progress is not continuous; it has interludes. There are days when every one of us experiences a sort of ontogenetic back-firing, and returns to an earlier stage of development. It is on such days that grown men break down and cry like children; it is then that they play games, or cheer the flag, or fall in love. And it is then that they are in the mood for poetry, and get comfort out of its asseverations of the obviously not true. A truly civilized man, when he is wholly himself, derives no pleasure from hearing a poet state, as Browning stated, that this world is perfect. Such tosh not only does not please him; it definitely offends him, as he is offended by an idiotic article in a newspaper; it roils him to encounter so much stupidity in Christendom. But he may like it when he is drunk, or suffering from some low fever, or staggering beneath some great disaster. Then, as I say, the ontogenetic process reverses itself, and he slides back into infancy. Then he goes to poets, just as he goes to women and to dogmatic theology. The very highest orders of men, perhaps, never suffer from such malaises of the spirit, or, if they suffer from them, never succumb to them. These are men who are so thoroughly civilized, that even the most severe attack upon the emotions is not sufficient to dethrone their reason. Charles Darwin was such a man. There was never a moment in his life when he sought religious consolation, and there was never a moment when he turned to poetry; in fact, he regarded all poetry as silly. Other first-rate men, more sensitive to the possible music in it, regard it with less positive aversion, but I have never heard of a truly first-rate man who got any permanent satisfaction out of its content. The Browning Societies of the latter part of the nineteenth century (and I choose the Browning Societies because Browning's poetry was often more or less logical in content, and thus above the ordinary intellectually) were not composed of such men as Huxley, Spencer, Lecky, Buckle and Trevelyan, but of third-rate schoolmasters, moony old maids, candidates for theosophy, literary vicars, collectors of Rogers groups, and other such Philistines. The chief propagandist for Browning in the United States was not Henry Adams, or William Sumner, or Daniel C. Gilman, but an obscure professor of English who was also an ardent spook-chaser. And what is thus true ontogenetically is also true phylogenetically. That is to say, poetry is chiefly produced and esteemed by peoples that have not yet come to maturity. The Romans had a dozen poets of the first talent before they had a single prose writer of any skill whatsoever. So did the English. So did the Germans. In our own day we see the Negroes of the Southern American States producing religious and secular verse of such quality that it is taken over by the whites, and yet the number of Negroes who show a decent prose style is still very small, and there is no sign of it increasing. Similarly, the white authors of America, during the past ten or fifteen years, have produced a great mass of very creditable poetry, and yet the quality of the national prose remains very low, and the Americans with prose styles of any distinction could be counted on the fingers of the two hands.

IV

So far I have spoken chiefly of the content of poetry. In its character as a sort of music it is plainly a good deal more respectable, and makes an appeal to a far higher variety of reader, or, at all events, to a reader in a state of greater mental clarity. A capacity for music—by which I mean melody, harmony and clang-tint—comes late in the history of every race. The savage can apprehend rhythm, but he is quite incapable of carrying a tune in any intelligible scale. The Negro navvies of the American South, who are commonly regarded as very musical, are actually only rhythmical; they never invent melodies, but only rhythms. And the whites to whom their barbarous dance-tunes chiefly appeal are in their own stage of culture. When one observes a room full of well-dressed men and women swaying and wriggling to the tune of some villainous dance from the Mississippi levees, one may assume very soundly that they are the sort of folk who play golf and bridge, and prefer The Rosary to Heart of Darkness, and believe in the League of Nations. A great deal of superficial culture is compatible with that pathetic barbarism, and even a high degree of æsthetic sophistication in other directions. The Greeks who built the Parthenon knew no more about music than a hog knows of predestination; they were almost as ignorant in that department as the modern Iowans or New Yorkers. It was not, indeed, until the Renaissance that music as we know it appeared in the world, and it was not until less than two centuries ago that it reached a high development. In Shakespeare's day music was just getting upon its legs in England; in Goethe's day it was just coming to full flower in Germany; in France and America it is still in the savage state. It is thus the youngest of the arts, and the most difficult, and hence, the noblest. Any sane young man of twenty-two can write an acceptable sonnet, or design a habitable house, or draw a horse that will not be mistaken for an automobile, but before he may write even a bad string quartette he must go through a long and arduous training, just as he must sweat and strive for years before he may write prose that is instantly recognizable as prose, and not as a string of mere words.

The virtue of such great poets as Shakespeare does not lie in the content of their poetry, but in its music. The content of the Shakespearean plays, in fact, is often puerile, and sometimes quite incomprehensible. No scornful essays by George Bernard Shaw and Frank Harris were needed to demonstrate the fact; it lies plainly in the text. One moans sourly over the spectacle of generations of pedants debating the question of Hamlet's mental processes; the simple fact is that Shakespeare gave him no more mental processes than a bishop has, but merely employed him as a convenient spout for some of the finest music ever got into words. Assume that he has all the hellish sagacity of a Nietzsche, and that music remains unchanged; assume that he is as idiotic as an ambassador, and it still remains unchanged. As it is intoned on the stage by actors, the poetry of Shakespeare commonly loses content altogether. One cannot make out what the cabotin is saying; one can only observe that it is beautiful. There are whole speeches in the Shakespearean plays whose meaning is unknown even to scholars—and yet they remain favorites, and well deserve to. Who knows, again, what the sonnets are about? Is the bard talking about the inn-keeper's wife at Oxford, or about a love affair of a pathological character? Some say one thing, and some the other. But all who have ears must agree that the sonnets are extremely beautiful stuff—that the English language reaches in them the topmost heights of conceivable beauty. Shakespeare thus ought to be ranked among the musicians, along with 10 Beethoven. As a philosopher he was a ninth-rater—but so was old Ludwig. I wonder what he would have done with prose? I can't make up my mind about it. One day I believe that he would have written prose as good as Dryden's, and the next I begin to fear that he would have produced something as bad as Swinburne's. He had the ear, but he lacked the logical sense. 20 Poetry has done enough when it charms, but prose must also convince.

I do not forget, of course, that there is a borderland in which it is hard to say, of this or that composition, whether it is prose or poetry. Lincoln's Gettysburg Address is commonly reckoned as prose, and yet I am convinced that it is quite as much poetry as the Queen Mab speech, or Marlowe's mighty 30 elegy of Helen of Troy. More, it is so read and admired by the great masses of the American people. It is an almost perfect specimen of a comforting but unsound asseveration put into rippling and hypnotizing words; done into plain English, the statements of fact in it would make even a writer of school history-books laugh. In the main, the test is to be found in the 40 audience rather than in the poet. If that audience is naturally intelligent and in a sober and critical mood, demanding sense and proofs, then nearly all poetry becomes prose; if, on the contrary, it is congenitally maudlin, or has a few drinks aboard, or is in love, or is otherwise in a soft and believing mood, then even the worst of prose, if it has a touch of soothing sing-song 50 in it, becomes moving poetry.

But at the extremes, of course, there are indubitable poetry and incurable prose, and the difference is not hard to distinguish. Prose is simply a form of writing in which the author intends that his statements shall be accepted as conceivably true, even when they are about imaginary persons and events. Its appeal is to the fully conscious and alertly reasoning man. Poetry is a form of writing in which the author attempts to disarm reason 10 and evoke emotion, partly by presenting images that awaken a powerful response in the subconscious and partly by the mere sough and blubber of words. Poetry is not distinguished from prose, as Dr. Lowes says in his Convention and Revolt in Poetry, by an exclusive phraseology, but by a peculiar attitude of mind—an attitude of self-delusion, of fact-denying, of 20 saying what isn't true. It is essentially an effort to elude the bitter facts of life, whereas prose is essentially a means of unearthing and exhibiting them. Immediately the thing acquires a literal meaning it ceases to be poetry; immediately it becomes capable of convincing an adult and perfectly sober man during the hours between breakfast and luncheon it is indisputably 30 prose.

This quality of untruthfulness pervades all poetry, good and bad. You will find it in the very best poetry that the world has so far produced, to wit, in the sonorous poems of the Jewish Scriptures. The ancient Jews were stupendous poets. Moreover, they were shrewd psychologists, and so knew the capacity of poetry, given the believing 40 mind, to convince and enchant—in other words, its capacity to drug the auditor in such a manner that he accepts it literally, as he might accept the baldest prose. This danger in poetry, given auditors impressionable enough, is too little estimated and understood. It is largely responsible for the persistence of sentimentality in a world apparently designed for the one purpose of manufacturing cynics. It is probably chiefly responsible for the survival of Christianity, despite the hard competition that it has met with from other religions. The theology of Christianity—i.e., its prose—is certainly no more convincing than that of half a dozen other religions that might be named; it is, in fact, a great deal less convincing than the theology of, say, Buddhism. But the poetry of Christianity is infinitely more lush and beautiful than that of any other religion ever heard of. There is more lovely poetry in one of the Psalms than in all the non-Christian scriptures of the world taken together. More, this poetry is in both Testaments, the New as well as the Old. Who could imagine a more charming poem than that of the Child in the Manger? It has enchanted the world for nearly two thousand years. It is simple, exquisite, and overwhelming. Its power to arouse emotion is so great that even in our age, it is at the bottom of fully a half of the kindliness, romanticism, and humane sentimentality that survive in Christendom. It is worth a million syllogisms.

Once, after ploughing through sixty or seventy volumes of bad verse, I described myself as a poetry-hater. The epithet was and is absurd. The truth is that I enjoy poetry quite as much as the next man—when the mood is on me. But what mood? The mood, in a few words, of intellectual and spiritual fatigue, the mood of revolt against the insoluble riddle of existence, the mood of disgust and despair. Poetry, then, is a capital medicine. First its sweet music lulls, and then its artful presentation of the beautifully improbable soothes and gives surcease. It is an escape from life, like religion, like enthusiasm, like glimpsing a pretty girl. And to the mere sensuous joy in it, to the mere low delight in getting away from the world for a bit, there is added, if the poetry be good, something vastly better, something reaching out into the realm of the intelligent, to wit, appreciation of good workmanship. A sound sonnet is almost as pleasing an object as a well-written fugue. A pretty lyric, deftly done, has all the technical charm of a fine carving. I think it is craftsmanship that I admire most in the world. Brahms enchants me because he knew his trade perfectly. I like Richard Strauss because he is full of technical ingenuities, because he is a master-workman. Well, who ever heard of a finer craftsman than William Shakespeare? His music was magnificent, he played superbly upon all the common emotions—and he did it with an air. No, I am no poetry hater. But even Shakespeare I most enjoy, not on brisk mornings when I feel fit for any deviltry, but on dreary evenings when my old wounds are troubling me, and some fickle fair one has just sent back the autographed set of my first editions, and bills are piled up on my desk, and I am too sad to work. Then I mix a stiff dram—and read poetry.

STUART P. SHERMAN (1881-1926)

THE POINT OF VIEW IN AMERICAN CRITICISM¹

According to all the critics, domestic and foreign, who have prophesied against America during the last hundred years, the great and ever-present danger of a democratic society lies in its tendency to destroy high standards of excellence and to accept the average man as a satisfactory measure of all things. Instead of saying, like Antigone in the drama of Sophocles, "I know I please the souls I ought to please," democracy, we are told, is prone to dismiss the question whether she has any high religious obligation, and to murmur complacently, "I know I please the souls of average men." I propose to examine a little the origins of this belief, and then to inquire whether it is justified by the present condition of our civilization, as reflected in our current literature. In the course of the inquiry I shall at least raise the question whether the average man is as easy to please as he is ordinarily supposed to be.

¹ From The Genius of America; copyright, 1923, by Charles Scribner's Sons. By permission of the publishers.

At the very foundation of the Republic, the menace of the average man was felt by a distinguished group of our own superior men, including Washington, John Adams, Hamilton, and many other able and prosperous country gentlemen. To them the voice of the people was not the voice of God, but the clamor of a hydra-headed monster, requiring to be checked and bridled. Thus, at the outset of our civilization, they established a point of view and they instituted a criticism, which was unfriendly to the average man and his aspirations and to all his misguided friends. They possessed, for example, certain standards of character and manners, which they applied with some austerity to what they regarded as the vulgar Jacobinism of Thomas Paine, to the disintegrating demagoguery of Jefferson, to the cosmopolitan laxity of Franklin, and to all the tendencies of French radicalism towards leveling by law the inequalities created by law and by nature.

Edmund Burke explained England's relative immunity to the equalitarian speculations of the French by this fact: "We continue," he said, "as in the last two ages, to read more generally, than, I believe, is now done on the Continent, the authors of sound antiquity. These occupy our minds. They give us another taste and turn, and will not suffer us to be more than transiently amused with paradoxical morality." Now, it is insufficiently recognized that, in the third quarter of the eighteenth century, America, like England, was at the height of her classical period—I mean the period when statesmen, poets, and painters most deliberately and successfully imitated the example of the ancients. The public characters of Washington and his friends, like those of Burke and his friends, were in the grand style, were in a style more or less consciously moulded upon that of the great republicans of England, Rome, and Athens. From Cromwell and Milton, and, above all, from the heroes of Plutarch, the friends of Washington inherited the ardor and the elevation of their public spirit, and, at the same time, their lofty disdain for the vulgar herd and a conviction that the salvation of the people depended upon the perpetuation of their own superiorities.

At its best, near the source, and on its positive side, there is something very august and inspiring in the utterances of this old Roman or aristocratic republicanism. It is not far from its best in the letters of Abigail Adams.

Glory, my son [she writes to John Quincy Adams], in a country which has given birth to characters, both in the civil and military departments, which may vie with the wisdom and valor of antiquity. As an immediate descendant of one of these characters, may you be led to an imitation of that disinterested patriotism and that noble love of country, which will teach you to despise wealth, titles, pomp, and equipage, as mere external advantages, which cannot add to the excellence of your mind, or compensate for the want of integrity or virtue.

It is not difficult to despise "wealth, pomp, and equipage" when one is adequately supplied with them; John Quincy Adams, accordingly, found his occasion for pride in the excellence of his mind and in his integrity and virtue. And, true to his breeding, he maintained, like Coriolanus, a kind of passionate and scornful opposition to the vulgar mob. In 1795, he writes to his mother that France will remain without the means to form a Constitution till she has exploded the doctrine of submission to and veneration for public opinion. A little later, he admits to his father that "the struggle against a popular clamor is not without its charms in my mind."

There he sounds the rallying cry of our great conservative tradition. I shall not ask here whether the creative ardor of the aristocratic spirit which we observed in the mother is not already beginning to be transformed in the son to a certain ardor for repression. Nor am I concerned here to trace the evolution of this Roman-American pride from its pure high source, down through the ages, till it reappears in aristocratic republicans of our own times, who still find a charm in opposing the popular clamor. I am thinking of the railway magnate, author of the celebrated phrase, "The public be damned"; and I am thinking of our most aggressive literary critic, a professed Federalist, who remarked the other day in language savoring a bit, perhaps, of the Roman decadence: "I don't care a damn what happens to the Republic after I am dead."

We must pause here, however, long enough to recall that the classical models of society, which the more conservative of our forefathers kept in their minds' eye, rested upon a slave population, and that the government which they set up actually countenanced, in opposition to the plebeian taste of Paine and the demagoguery of Jefferson, a slave population. It is a question of more than academic interest to-day, whether or not the government which they set up necessarily implies the continued existence of an illiterate peasantry.

Those who believe that the salvation of the people depends upon the perpetuation of their own superiorities are likely, in the long run, to make the end subservient to the means, to grow rather careless about the salvation of the people and rather over-careful about the preservation of their own superiorities. They incline, also, to a belief that these superiorities can best be perpetuated through their own offspring—a belief which, so far as I can learn, is inadequately supported by statistics. On this assumption, however, they endeavor to make a kind of closed corporation of their own class, and seek to monopolize it for the administration of government, the possession of property, the enjoyment of higher education and culture, and the literary production of the country.

These tendencies, as we know, appeared very early in the history of the Republic. John Adams nearly ruined himself in 1787 by his frank declaration that wealth and birth should be qualifications for the Senate. Hamilton, at the same time, put forth his proposals for restraining the vulgar herd by perpetuating wealth and leadership of established families in the nearest possible American imitation of the British monarchical and aristocratic system.

The irrepressible conflict provoked by such attempts to check the rich fecundity and the unpredictable powers of our colonial "populace" is ordinarily presented to us as a contention over political principles. In its most comprehensive aspect, it may profitably be regarded as a conflict of religions. The short interval between the adoption of the Constitution and the end of the eighteenth century is the period of antique Republicanism triumphant, dominated by the religion of the superior man. In 1800, this religion received a blow in the election of Jefferson, the St. Paul of the religion of the populace, who preached faith, hope, and charity for the masses. In 1828, the religion of the superior man received a still more ominous blow, when the fiery, pistoling rough-rider from Tennessee, Andrew Jackson, defeated John Quincy Adams. At this reverse to the sons of light, John Quincy Adams lost his faith in God, the God of superior men.

We have recently had, from the fourth eminent generation of the Adams family, Brooks, Charles Francis, and Henry, a voluminous commentary upon the effort of "the heirs of Washington" to stand against the popular clamor and uphold their great tradition. On the whole, if we may trust their testimony, it has been a tragically unavailing effort. In Boston and Cambridge and in a few tributary villages, in old New York and Washington, on a few great plantations of Virginia and the Carolinas, the civilization which the superior men contemplated obtained a struggling foothold before the Civil War. And this civilization achieved some literary expression in the classical oratory of Webster, in the fine old English gentility of Irving's prose, and in the pale provincial flowering of our New England poetry. Sanguine observers saw in this literary renaissance promise that the intrenched intelligence and culture of the settled, civilized East was to take and hold the mastery in the national life.

But for Henry Adams, at least, that hope ended with his return from England in 1868. He discovered, when he went to Washington to offer his services in carrying on the great tradition—he discovered that the great tradition was broken. There had taken place, not merely a Civil War, but a far more fundamental revolution. He and his kind, bred on the classics, and versed in law and European diplomacy, were anachronisms, survivors out of the classical eighteenth century, belated revelers in the Capitol. A multitude of unknown or ignored forces had developed in his absence, and had combined to antiquate him, to extrude him from the current of national life, and to incapacitate him for a place in the public councils. This singular new nation was no respecter of grandfathers. It took its superior men wherever it found them. It picked its chief statesman out of a log cabin in Illinois, its chief military hero out of an Ohio tannery, its most eminent poet from a carpenter's shop, and its leading man of letters from a pilot-house on the Mississippi. Such standards! Henry spent a life-time elaborating his grand principle of the degradation of energy, to explain to himself why the three grandsons of two presidents of the United States all ended miserably: one as President of the Kansas City Stock Yards; one as a member of the Massachusetts Bar; while one had sunk to the level of a Professor of History at Harvard.

From the point of view of these antique republicans, the period from the Civil War to the end of the nineteenth century proves the truth of all the prophecies against the average man. This is the period of triumphant democracy—meaning, of course, the triumph, not of the political party, but of the religious principle. In this epoch, the gates of opportunity open as never before to the populace, to the new men. What are the results? Throughout the period, the steadily waning influence of Eastern intelligence and culture in the national life, steadily increasing immigration from the peasant stocks of Europe, expansion of the population into new western territory, prosperity of industrial pioneers, rise of the railway magnate, the iron-master, the organizer of large-scale production of material commodities—immense rewards and glory for supplying the average man what the average man, at that particular moment, wanted and had to have.

Midway in this epoch, one of its heroes, Andrew Carnegie, wrote a book which he called Triumphant Democracy—a work which exults and rejoices in the goodness and greatness of American life. It was an industrial captain's reply to the foreign critics who had flitted across the country year after year, like ravens, boding disaster. It was a reply from the point of view of a Scotch radical, a self-made man who could compare the poor little Scotch town of Dunfermline, where the revolution in machinery had ruined his father, to the booming city of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, where the same revolution had made him one of the masters of his generation.

Carnegie's point of view was inadequate. He offered no effective answer to the savage criticism which Dickens had made of our civilization forty years earlier, when he pictured the democracy as brutal, boisterous, boastful, ignorant, and hypocritical. He made no effective reply to Carlyle, who had cried twenty-two years later than Dickens, "My friend, brag not yet of our American cousins! Their quantity of cotton, dollars, industry and resources, I believe to be almost unspeakable; but I can by no means worship the like of these."

Matthew Arnold, a critical friend of ours, far more friendly to our political institutions and to our social organizations than Carlyle, dropped in upon us at about the time Carlyle published his book. "The trouble with Carnegie and his friends," said Arnold, "is that they have no conception of the chief defect of American life; namely, that it is so dreadfully uninteresting." This dullness, he explained, was due to the average man's quite inadequate conception of the good life, which did not go beyond being diligent in business¹⁰ and serving the Lord—making money and observing a narrow code of morality.

The particularly hopeless aspect of our case, Arnold thought, was that we, as a people, seemed quite unconscious of our deficiencies on the human side of our civilization. We displayed a self-satisfaction which is "vulgarizing and retarding." Nationally we were²⁰ boosters, or, as we say nowadays, "boosters." "The worst of it is," he continues, "that this tall talk and self-glorification meets with hardly any sane criticism over there." He cites some examples; and then adds that "the new West promises to beat in the game of brag even the stout champions I have been quoting."

Now, no Englishman will ever fathom³⁰ the mystery of Uncle Sam's boasting. No outsider can ever know, as we all know, how often, out of the depths of self-distrust and self-contempt and cutting self-criticism, he has whistled to keep his courage up in the dark, and has smiled reassuringly while his heart was breaking. Still, if you look into the literature of the period, you will find that there is much warrant for⁴⁰ Arnold's strictures, though not always precisely where he found it. The little boasts of men like Lowell and Thomas Wentworth Higginson and Brander Matthews are only Yankee whistling, the turning of the trodden worm, a decent pride in the presence of "a certain condescension in foreigners." Lowell knew a man, he says, who thought Cambridge the best spot on the habit-⁵⁰able globe. "Doubtless God could have made a better, but doubtless He never did." I myself am fond of declaring that the campus of the University of Illinois is finer than the meadows of Christ Church College, Oxford. But no one in America thinks anything a whit the finer for what an academic person has said in its favor. Nor, on the other hand, does anyone, outside academic circles, think anything in American a whit the worse for what a foreign critic has said against it. The Chicago journalists, for example, with true Jacksonian hilarity, ridiculed Arnold and, after his departure, stigmatized him as a "cur."

The only criticism which ever, as we say, "gets across" to the Jacksonian democracy is that which comes from one of their own number. The really significant aspects of our self-complacency in Carnegie's time were reflected in the popular literature of the period by writers sprung from the new democracy, self-made authors, who flattered the average man into satisfaction with his present state and his average achievement. I am thinking of Western writers, like Joaquin Miller and Riley and Carleton and Bret Harte and Mark Twain. I am thinking of the romantic glamor which these men contrived to spread over the hard rough life and the rougher characters of the middle-borers, the Argonauts, and the Forty-Niners.

You recall the method. First, they admit certain facts—for picturesque effect. For example, these settlers of the Golden West, they say, included a few decent men, but they were in great part the riff-raff of the world—foreign adventurers, offscourings of Eastern cities, uncouth, red-shirted illiterates from the Middle States, lawless, dirty, tobacco-spitting, blaspheming, drunken, horse-thieves, murderers, and gamblers. And then, with noble poetic vision, they cry: "But what delicacy of sentiment beneath those shaggy bosoms! What generosity and chivalry under those old red shirts! Horse-thieves, yet nature's noblemen! Gamblers and drunk-^{ards}, yet kings of men!" "I say to you," chants "the poet of the Sierras," "that there is nothing in the pages of history so glorious, so entirely grand, as the lives of these noble Spartan fathers and mothers of Americans, who begot and brought forth and bred the splendid giants of the generation that is now fast following the setting sun of their unselfish and all immortal lives."

Here is the point of view of the Jacksonian democracy in its romantic mood. This, in general, was the point of view of Mark Twain, the most original force in American letters and, on the whole, the most broadly representative American writer between the close of the Civil War and the end of the century. Most of us have enough pioneer blood in our veins, or in our imaginative sympathies, to love Mark Twain nowadays. But academic people, they tell us,—and they tell us truly,—had little to do with establishing his earlier reputation. He neither flattered them nor pleased them. He pleased and flattered and liberated the emotions of that vast mass of the population which had been suppressed and inarticulate. He was the greatest booster for the average man that the country ever produced. Confident in the political and mechanical and natural superiorities conferred upon every son of these States by his mere birth under the American flag, Mark Twain laughed at the morality of France, the language of Germany, the old masters of Italy, the caste system of India, the imperialism of England, the romances of Scott, the penal laws of the sixteenth century, and at the chivalry of the court of King Arthur—he laughed at all the non-American world, from the point of view of the average American, stopping only from time to time to pat his countrymen on the back and to cry, like Jack Horner, "What a brave boy am I!" To make a climax to the bold irreverence of this Jacksonian laughter, he laughed at New England and at all her starchy immortals.

In the Connecticut Yankee at King Arthur's Court, published in 1889, we hear the last full-hearted laughter of triumphant democracy. Twain himself became sombre in his later years; he became cynical, and touched with misanthropy. I cannot go here, in any detail, into the causes for the darkening of his outlook. The most interesting of these causes, perhaps, was that Mark Twain had one foot over the threshold of a new age, our present era, which I shall call the era of critical and pessimistic democracy. He had begun to emerge, as I think we are all now beginning to emerge, from the great romantic illusion about the average man, namely that liberty or equality or any kind of political recognition or literary exploitation, or even economic independence, can make him a happy or a glorious being.

Poets and novelists, since the French Revolution, have fostered this romantic illusion in a laudable but misdirected effort to bestow dignity upon the humblest units of humanity. They liberated the emotion for a religion of democracy. They did little to give to that emotion intelligent direction.

You will recall Wordsworth's poem called Resolution and Independence. The poet, wandering on the moor in richly gloomy thought, comes upon a poor old man, bent, broken, leaning over a pool, gathering leeches for his livelihood. The poet questions him how it goes with him. The old man replies, quietly enough, that it goes pretty hard, that it is going rather worse; but that he still perseveres and manages to get on, in one way or another. Whereupon Wordsworth falls into a kind of visionary trance. The old peasant looms for him to a gigantic stature. He becomes the heroic "man with the hoe"; a shadowy shape against the sky; man in the abstract, clothed in all the moral splendor of the poet's own imagination.

This same trick of the fancy Hardy plays with his famous dairy-maid, Tess of the D'Urbervilles. She is but an ignorant, instinctive, erring piece of Eve's flesh. Yet, says Hardy, drawing upon the riches of his own poetic associations, "The impressionable peasant leads a larger, fuller, more dramatic life than the pachydermatous king." Thereupon he proceeds to invest the dairy-maid with the tragic emotions and import of a heroine of Thebes or Pelops' line. He infers, by a poetic fallacy, that she is as interesting and as significant to herself as she is to him.

I will take one other case, the hero of a recently translated novel, Knut Hamsun's Growth of the Soil. Here we have an illiterate peasant of Norway, going into the public land almost empty-handed; gradually acquiring a pig, a cow, a woman, a horse, building a turf-shelter, a cowshed, a cabin, a mill—and so, little by little, toiling like an ox, becoming a prosperous farmer, owner of rich lands and plentiful flocks and herds. It is, in a sense, a very cheerful book, a sort of new Robinson Crusoe. Its moral appears to be that, so long as men stick to the soil and preserve their ignorance and their natural gusto, they may be happy. It is a glorification of the beaver, the building animal. It is an idealization of the peasant at the instinctive level.

The trick of the literary imagination in all these cases is essentially the same as that which Bret Harte played with his Argonauts, and Miller and Riley with their Indiana pioneers, and Mark Twain with his Connecticut Yankee. We are changing all that.

I chanced the other day upon an impressive new American novel, strikingly parallel in some respects to Hamsun's Growth of the Soil, but utterly different from it in the mood and the point of view. I refer to the story of Kansas life, called Dust, by Mr. and Mrs. Haldeman-Julius. Here again we have the hardy pioneer, rough, dirty, and capable, entering on the new land, with next to nothing but his expectations; acquiring a pig, a hut, cattle, and a wife; and gradually "growing up with the country" into a prosperous western farmer, with stock in the bank, and a Cadillac, and electric lights in the cowbarns, and kerosene lamps in the house. Our human beaver in America, toiling with the same ox-like fortitude as Isak in Norway, achieves the same material success. But—and this is the difference—the story is one of unrelieved gloom ending in bitter tragedy. Why this sustained note of gloom? Why has our Kansas tale none of the happy gusto of Hamsun's Growth of the Soil? Because the Kansas farmer is not content with the life of a peasant. Because our Kansas authors refuse to glorify a man on the instinctive level, or to disguise the essential poverty and squalor of his personal life with a poetic fallacy. The book is written from a point of view at which it is apparent that our civilization has failed to solve the human problem.

Since the time of The Connecticut Yankee and Carnegie's Triumphant Democracy, our literary interpreters have been gradually shifting their ground. They are giving us now a criticism of life from a position at which it is possible to see through the poetic illusion about the average man. Making an effort now to see him as he really is, our authors are reporting that he is not satisfied with his achievements, he is not happy, he is very miserable. The most hopeful aspect of American literature to-day is its widespread pessimism. I call this symptom hopeful, because it is most fully exhibited by precisely that part of the country, and by those elements of the population, which were thought forty years ago to be most addicted to boasting and most deeply infected with the vulgarizing and retarding self-complacency of the Philistine, the red-shirted Jacksonian from Missouri. This pessimism comes out of Wisconsin, Minnesota, Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, Kansas, and California; from the sons and daughters of pioneer farmers, country doctors, small-town lawyers, and country editors; from the second generation of immigrant stock, German, Swedish, Scotch, Irish; from the hungry, nomadic semi-civilization of the West.

I call this Western pessimism auspicious, because it is so sharply critical, and because the criticism is directed, not so much against the political and economic framework of society as against the kind of personalities which this society produces, and against the quantity and quality of the human satisfactions which these personalities have at their disposal. It is directed against that defect in our civilization which Arnold pointed out; it is so lacking in elevation and beauty; it is so humdrum, so dreadfully uninteresting; it so fails to appease the vague yet acutely painful hunger of the average man for a good life. "Beguile us no longer," cry the new voices; "beguile us no longer with heroic legends and romantic idyls. The life which you celebrate is not beautiful, not healthy, not satisfying. It is ugly, obscene, devastating. It is driving us mad. And we are going to revolt from it."

The manifestation of this spirit which, at the present moment, is attracting most attention is what Mr. Van Doren, in his interesting book on Contemporary American Novelists, has called "the revolt from the village." I need only remind you of that long series of narratives, beginning in the early eighties with E. W. Howe's Story of a Country Town, and followed by Hamlin Garland's Main Travelled Roads, Mr. Masters's Spoon River Anthology, Sherwood Anderson's Winesburg, Ohio, Sinclair Lewis's Main Street, Zona Gale's Miss Lulu Bett, and the novel of which I have already spoken, Dust, by Mr. and Mrs. Haldeman-Julius.

But the interesting pessimistic and critical note in our current literature is by no means confined to representations of country life and the small town. Take Mrs. Wharton's pictures of metropolitan society, from The House of Mirth to The Age of Innocence, remembering only that Mrs. Wharton cannot be classed as a Jacksonian; then consider the dreary wide wilderness of Mr. Dreiser's picture of big business; Ben Hecht's story of a city-editor in Erik Dorn; Mr. Cabell's Cream of the Jest; Mr. Norris's broad picture of the California scene in Brass; Mr. Fitzgerald's account of the younger generation in The Beautiful and Damned; Mr. Hergesheimer's admirable new novel, Cytharea; and, finally, Mr. Lewis's Babbitt.

Here we are invited to consider a class of which the discontent cannot be explained by their struggle with the churlishness of the soil and the rigor and tragic whimsicality of the elements. Most of the characters, indeed, have reached a level at which even the economic struggle is as much a pastime as a necessity. They are business men and their womenkind, with a sprinkling of professional men, people who, as we say, know "how to live," people who live expensively, purchasing with free hand whatever gratifications are available for the senses. Nevertheless, if we may trust their interpreters, these people, too, are dreadfully uninteresting to one another, alternating between a whipped-up excitement and a stifed yawn. Their entire stratum of society is permeated by a terrible ennui. Jaded with business and card-parties, Mr. Hergesheimer's persons, for example, can conceive no relief from the boredom of the week but to meet at one another's houses at the week-ends and, in a state of half-maudlin tipsiness, kiss one another's wives on the stairs. Even when the average man is sheltered on all sides, weariness, as Pascal says, springs from the depths of his own heart and fills the soul with its poison. Our "bourgeoisie," no less than our "peasantry," are on the verge of a cultural revolt; they are quarreling with the quality of their civilization.

Now, at the time when a man quarrels with his wife, either one of two interesting things may happen. He may elope with his neighbor's wife for Cuba, fancying for the moment that she is the incarnation of all his unsatisfied desires, the divine Cytharea. Or this man and his old wife may turn over a new leaf and put their relations on a more satisfactory basis. Which course will be followed depends on the power of self-criticism which the interested persons possess.

This is a parable, with wide possibilities of social application. Our average man, in town and country, is quarreling with his wife, that is to say, with our average American civilization. If he listens to certain counselors who appeal to certain of his instincts and to his romantic imagination, his household, the material civilization which he has slowly built up out of the dust by faithfully working on certain traditional principles—this household will be in danger of disruption. If, on the other hand, his discontent with himself and his human conditions is adequately diagnosed, and if an adequate remedy is accepted, then he will look back upon this period of pessimism as ²⁰ preliminary to the reintegration of the national spirit and its expression in literature. Which course will be followed depends in no small measure upon our power of criticism, which, in its turn, depends upon an adequate point of view.

The elder critics in the academic tradition have in general not dealt sympathetically, or even curiously, with ³⁰ the phenomena. Fixed in an inveterate fidelity to the point of view established by the early classical Americans, they look with a mingling of disdain and abhorrence upon our impious younger world, as upon a darkling plain

Where ignorant armies clash by night.

The critics, on the other hand, who ⁴⁰ are endeavoring to deal sympathetically and curiously with the phenomena, are utterly unorganized; are either without standards of judgment, or in a wild state of confusion with regard to their standards. They are making efforts to get together; but they have no principle of integration. I have not time to do more than mention some of their incongruous points of view. ⁵⁰

A man whose hearty geniality touches the affections of us all, Mr. William Allen White, proposed the other day, as an integrating principle, the entire abandonment of all standards and a general adoption of the policy of live and let live. His theory of universal sympathy, which he mis-calls "the democratic theory in criticism," would, if applied, destroy both criticism and democracy.

Our journalistic critics in general, conscious of the incompatibility between their private beliefs and the political and economic interests which they serve, tend at the present time, I should say, to adopt the point of view of universal cynicism.

In order precisely to escape from the troublesome clashes of political, social, and moral judgment, in order to escape, in other words, from the real problem of critical reintegration, another group has adopted the æsthetic point of view, and has made a feeble effort to revive in America, with the aid of the Crocean philosophy, the doctrine of art for art's sake.

I will mention, finally, one other point of view, to which an increasing company of the younger writers are repairing, which we may call for convenience the Freudian point of view. ³⁰ The champions of this point of view attempt a penetrating diagnosis of all maladies of American civilization, with the assistance of the new psychology. To sum up their findings briefly, they hold that the trouble with American life is, at the root, due to age-long and cankering inhibitions, attributable to our traditional Puritanism. The remedy is a drop to the instinctive level; the opening of the gates to impulse; a free and spontaneous doing as one pleases in all directions.

Popular Freudianism is, perhaps, the most pestilential of all the prevailing winds of doctrine. Yet its champions have penetrated, I believe, nearer to the heart of our difficulty, they are nearer to an adequate point of view and an integrating principle, than any ⁵⁰ of the other seekers. They at least recognize that the kingdom of disorganization is within the individual breast. The fact that they approach so near to the true destination, and yet fall short of it, renders their counsels peculiarly seductive and peculiarly perilous.

They are right when they attribute the central malady of our civilization to suppressed desires. They are tragically wrong if they believe that this malady is due to the suppression by religion of any specific isolable physical instinct. They are tragically wrong if they think that this malady can be cured by the destruction of religious restraint and the release of any specific isolable physical instinct. When they prescribe, as many of them do with as much daring as they can muster, giving a new and large license, for example, to the sexual impulses; when they prescribe, as if with the countenance of fresh scientific discoveries, the restoration of the grand old liberative force of alcohol; when they flatter any of the more or less disciplined instincts of our animal nature with the promise of happiness in emancipation, they are offering us intoxicants, anodynes, opiates, every one of which has been proved, by the experience of innumerable generations, hopeless even to accomplish any permanent alleviation of the malady which they profess to cure. And when they attack the essential religious principle of Puritanism,—its deep human passion for perfection,—they are seeking to destroy the one principle which can possibly result in the integration of the national life.

Now, as I talk with members of the beautiful younger generation which comes through my class-room year after year, I find that the Freudians are profoundly mistaken in their analysis of human nature. The deepest craving of the average young men and women is not to be unbound, and released, and to be given a license for a free and spontaneous doing as they please in all directions. They recognize that nature and environment and lax educational discipline have made them beings of sufficiently uncoördinated desires and scattering activities.

What they deeply crave is a binding generalization of philosophy, or religion, or morals, which will give direction and purpose, which will give channel and speed, to the languid diffusive drift of their lives. The suppressed desire which causes their unhappiness is a suppressed desire for a good life, for the perfection of their human possibilities. The average unreflective man does not always know that this is, in fact, his malady. And in the blind hunger and thirst of his unenlightened nature, he reaches out eagerly for opiates and anodynes, which leave him unsatisfied. But what the innermost law of his being demands, what his human nature craves, is something good and great that he can do with his heart and mind and body. He craves the active peace of surrender and devotion to something greater than himself. Surrender to anything less means the degradation and humiliation of his spirit.

This is the tragedy involved in any surrender to subordinate passions or instincts. I think that our current pessimistic literature indicates that our average man is discovering this fact about his own nature, and that, therefore, like the sinner made conscious of guilt, he is ripe for regeneration; he is ready for the reception of a higher culture than he has yet enjoyed.

Democratic civilization suffereth long, because it is always waiting for the hindmost to catch up with the middle. It is always reluctant to consign the hindmost to the devil. But in the long run, I do not believe that the history of our civilization is going to verify the apprehensions entertained by our old Roman-Americans regarding the average man. To one whose measure of national accomplishment is not the rich flowering of a small aristocratic class, but the salvation of the people, the choices of the average man in the past do not conclusively prove the danger of giving him what he wants. In his first period, he wanted stable government; and he got it, and wholeheartedly glorified the political and military heroes who gave it to him.

In his second period, he wanted a rapid and wide diffusion of the material instruments of civilized life; he got them, and wholeheartedly glorified the industrial heroes who provided them. In his third period, the average man is growing almost as scornful of "wealth and pomp and equipage," as John Quincy Adams. The captains of industry are no longer his heroes; they have communicated to him what they had of virtue for their hour. What the average man now wants is the large-scale production and the wide diffusion of science, art, music, literature, health, recreation, manners, human intercourse, happiness—the best to be had; and he is going to get them and to glorify wholeheartedly the heroes of culture who provide them for him.

The great civilizations of the world hitherto have been integrated in their religion. By religion I mean that which, in the depths of his heart, a man really believes desirable and praiseworthy. A great civilization begins to form when men reach an agreement as to what is desirable and praiseworthy. The leading Athenians, in their best period, reached such an agreement; and that is why, whether you meditate on their art, their poetry, or their philosophy, whether you gaze at the frieze of the Parthenon, or read a drama of Sophocles, or the prayer of Socrates, you feel yourself in the presence of one and the same formative spirit—one superb stream of energy, superbly controlled by a religious belief that moral and physical symmetry are the most desirable and praiseworthy things in the outer and inner man.

The prospects for our American civilization depend at present upon our capacity for a similar religious integration. Our present task is, primarily, to become clear in our minds as to what is our own formative spirit. The remedy for our present discontents is indicated by the character of the malady. The remedy is, first, to help the average man to an understanding of his own nature, so that he may recognize more fully what part the things of the mind and the imagination may play in the satisfaction of his suppressed desires. It is to help him to recognize that even an intellectual and imaginative life will yield him little content unless it is organized around some central principle and animating purpose. It is to give the average man what the literature of our pessimistic democracy has at last proved that he wants, namely, an object to which he can joyfully surrender the full strength of his soul and body.

But this is not the whole of the remedy. It is necessary, at the same time, to persuade the superior men that the gods of the old Roman-American aristocrats have forsaken them, and that the time has come when even they may safely accept the purified religion of democracy. To oppose it now is to oppose the formative spirit of our national life and to doom one's self to sterility. The remedy is, in short, to effect a reintegration of the national will on the basis of a genuinely democratic humanism, recognizing as its central principle the duty of bringing the whole body of the people to the fullest and fairest human life of which they are capable.

The point of view which I advocate is not, as it has been called, moralistic. It is essentially religious. And the religion of an intelligent man is not a principle of repression, any more than it is a principle of release. Religion binds us to old morals and customs so long as they help us towards the attainment of our object; but it releases from old morals and customs as soon as they impede our progress towards that object. The object gives the standard. Confronted with heirlooms or with innovations, one's first question is, does this, or does it not, tend to assist the entire body of the people toward the best human life of which they are capable? Advance to this point of view, and you leave behind you universal sympathy, universal cynicism, universal æstheticism, and the black bats of the Freudian cave. You grasp again a power of choice which enables you to accept or reject, with something of that lost serenity which Socrates displayed when he rejected escape from prison and accepted the hemlock. You recover something of the high elation which

Emerson displayed when he said: "I am primarily engaged to myself to be a public servant of all the gods, to demonstrate to all men that there is intelligence and good-will at the heart of things, and ever higher and higher leadings."

RECENT AND CONTEMPORARY POETRY

WALT WHITMAN¹ (1819-1892)

I HEAR AMERICA SINGING

I hear America singing, the varied carols I hear,
Those of mechanics, each one singing his as it should be blithe and strong,
The carpenter singing his as he measures his plank or beam,
The mason singing his as he makes ready for work, or leaves off work,
The boatman singing what belongs to him in his boat, the deck-hand singing on the steamboat deck, 5
The shoemaker singing as he sits on his bench, the hatter singing as he stands,
The wood-cutter's song, the ploughboy's on his way in the morning, or at noon intermission or at sundown,
The delicious singing of the mother, or of the young wife at work, or of the girl sewing or washing,
Each singing what belongs to him or her and to none else,
The day what belongs to the day—at night the party of young fellows, robust, 10 friendly,
Singing with open mouths their strong melodious songs.

SONG OF MYSELF

1

I celebrate myself, and sing myself,
And what I assume you shall assume,
For every atom belonging to me as good belongs to you.

I loafe and invite my soul,
I lean and loafe at my ease observing a spear of summer grass. 5

My tongue, every atom of my blood, form'd from this soil, this air, Born here of parents born here from parents the same, and their parents the same,
I, now thirty-seven years old in perfect health begin,
Hoping to cease not till death.

Creeds and schools in abeyance, 10
Retiring back a while sufficed at what they are, but never forgotten,
I harbor for good or bad, I permit to speak at every hazard,
Nature without check with original energy.

Alone far in the wilds and mountains I hunt, 175
Wandering amazed at my own lightness and glee,

In the late afternoon choosing a safe spot to pass the night,
Kindling a fire and broiling the fresh-kill'd game,
Falling asleep on the gather'd leaves with my dog and gun by my side.

The Yankee clipper is under her sky-sails, she cuts the sparkle and scud, 180
My eyes settle the land, I bend at her prow or shout joyously from the deck.

The boatmen and clam-diggers arose early and stopt for me,
I tuck'd my trowser-ends in my boots and went and had a good time;
You should have been with us that day round the chowder-kettle.

I saw the marriage of the trapper in the open air in the far west, the bride was a red girl, 185

Her father and his friends sat near cross-legged and dumbly smoking, they had moccasins to their feet and large thick blankets hanging from their shoulders,

On a bank lounged the trapper, he was drest mostly in skins, his luxuriant beard and curls protected his neck, he held his bride by the hand,
She had long eyelashes, her head was bare, her coarse straight locks descended upon her voluptuous limbs and reach'd to her feet.

The runaway slave came to my house and stopt outside,
I heard his motions crackling the twigs of the woodpile, 190
Through the swung half-door of the kitchen I saw him limpsy and weak,
And went where he sat on a log and led him in and assured him,
And brought water and fill'd a tub for his sweated body and bruise'd feet,
And gave him a room that enter'd from my own, and gave him some coarse clean clothes,

And remember perfectly well his revolving eyes and his awkwardness, 195
And remember putting plasters on the galls of his neck and ankles;
He staid with me a week before he was recuperated and pass'd north,
I had him sit next me at table, my fire-lock lean'd in the corner.

I am the poet of the Body and I am the poet of the Soul,
The pleasures of heaven are with me and the pains of hell are with me,
The first I graft and increase upon myself, the latter I translate into a new tongue.

I am the poet of the woman the same as the man, 425
And I say it is as great to be a woman as to be a man,
And I say there is nothing greater than the mother of men.

I chant the chant of dilation or pride,
We have had ducking and deprecating about enough, 430
I show that size is only development.

Have you outstript the rest? are you the President?
It is a trifle, they will more than arrive there every one, and still pass on.

I am he that walks with the tender and growing night,
I call to the earth and sea half-held by the night:

Press close bare-bosom'd night—press close magnetic nourishing night! 435
 Night of south winds—night of the large few stars!
 Still nodding night—mad naked summer night.

Smile O voluptuous cool-breath'd earth!
 Earth of the slumbering and liquid trees!
 Earth of departed sunset—earth of the mountains misty-topt! 440
 Earth of the vitreous pour of the full moon just tinged with blue!
 Earth of shine and dark mottling the tide of the river!
 Earth of the limpid gray of clouds brighter and clearer for my sake!
 Far-swooping elbow'd earth—rich apple-blossom'd earth!
 Smile, for your lover comes. 445

Prodigal, you have given me love—therefore I to you give love!
 O unspeakable passionate love.

I think I could turn and live with animals, they're so placid and self-contain'd, 685
 I stand and look at them long and long.

They do not sweat and whine about their condition,
 They do not lie awake in the dark and weep for their sins,
 They do not make me sick discussing their duty to God,
 Not one is dissatisfied, not one is demented with the mania of owning things, 690
 Not one kneels to another, nor to his kind that lived thousands of years ago,
 Not one is respectable or unhappy over the whole earth.

So they show their relations to me and I accept them,
 They bring me tokens of myself, they evince them plainly in their possession.

I wonder where they get those tokens, 695
 Did I pass that way huge times ago and negligently drop them?

Myself moving forward then and now and forever,
 Gathering and showing more always and with velocity,
 Infinite and omnigenous, and the like of these among them,
 Not too exclusive toward the reachers of my remembrancers, 700
 Picking out here one that I love, and now go with him on brotherly terms.

A gigantic beauty of a stallion, fresh and responsive to my caresses,
 Head high in the forehead, wide between the ears,
 Limbs glossy and supple, tail dusting the ground,
 Eyes full of sparkling wickedness, ears finely cut, flexibly moving. 705

His nostrils dilate as my heels embrace him,
 His well-built limbs tremble with pleasure as we race around and return.
 I but use you a minute, then I resign you, stallion,
 Why do I need your paces when I myself out-gallop them?
 Even as I stand or sit passing faster than you. 710

I understand the large hearts of heroes,
 The courage of present times and all times,
 How the skipper saw the crowded and rudderless wreck of the steamship, and Death chasing it up and down the storm, 825
 How he knuckled tight and gave not back an inch, and was faithful of days and faithful of nights,
 And chalk'd in large letters on a board, Be of good cheer, we will not desert you;
 How he follow'd with them and tack'd with them three days and would not give it up,
 How he saved the drifting company at last,
 How the lank loose-gown'd women look'd when boated from the side of their prepared graves, 830
 How the silent old-faced infants and the lifted sick, and the sharp-lipp'd unshaved
 men;
 All this I swallow, it tastes good, I like it well, it becomes mine,
 I am the man, I suffer'd, I was there.

Would you hear of an old-time sea-fight?
 Would you learn who won by the light of the moon and stars?
 List to the yarn, as my grandmother's father the sailor told it to me. 900

Our foe was no skulk in his ship I tell you, (said he,)
 His was the surly English pluck, and there is no tougher or truer, and never was,
 and never will be;
 Along the lower'd eve he came horribly raking us.

We closed with him, the yards entangled, the cannon touch'd,
 My captain lash'd fast with his own hands. 905

We had receiv'd some eighteen pound shots under the water,
 On our lower-gun-deck two large pieces had burst at the first fire, killing all around and blowing up overhead.

Fighting at sun-down, fighting at dark,
 Ten o'clock at night, the full moon well up, our leaks on the gain, and five feet of water reported,
 The master-at-arms loosing the prisoners confined in the after-hold to give them
 a chance for themselves. 910

The transit to and from the magazine is now stopt by the sentinels,
 They see so many strange faces they do not know whom to trust.

Our frigate takes fire,
 The other asks if we demand quarter?
 If our colors are struck and the fighting done? 915

Now I laugh content, for I hear the voice of my little captain,
We have not struck, he composedly cries, we have just begun our part of the fighting.

Only three guns are in use,
 One is directed by the captain himself against the enemy's main-mast,
 Two well serv'd with grape and canister silence his musketry and clear his decks.

The tops alone second the fire of this little battery, especially the main-top, 921
 They hold out bravely during the whole of the action.

Not a moment's cease,
 The leaks gain fast on the pumps, the fire eats toward the powder-magazine.
 One of the pumps has been shot away, it is generally thought we are sinking. 925

Serene stands the little captain,
 He is not hurried, his voice is neither high nor low,
 His eyes give more light to us than our battle-lanterns.

Toward twelve there in the beams of the moon they surrender to us.

I have said that the soul is not more than the body, 1270
 And I have said that the body is not more than the soul,
 And nothing, not God, is greater to one than one's self is,
 And whoever walks a furlong without sympathy walks to his own funeral drest
 in his shroud,
 And I or you pocketless of a dime may purchase the pick of the earth.
 And to glance with an eye or show a bean in its pod confounds the learning of all times, 1275
 And there is no trade or employment but the young man following it may become a hero,
 And there is no object so soft but it makes a hub for the wheel'd universe,
 And I say to any man or woman, Let your soul stand cool and composed before a million universes.

And I say to mankind, Be not curious about God,
 For I who am curious about each am not curious about God, 1280
 (No array of terms can say how much I am at peace about God and about death.)

I hear and behold God in every object, yet understand God not in the least,
 Nor do I understand who there can be more wonderful than myself.

Why should I wish to see God better than this day?
 I see something of God each hour of the twenty-four, and each moment then, 1285
 In the faces of men and women I see God, and in my own face in the glass,
 I find letters from God dropt in the street, and every one is sign'd by God's name,
 And I leave them where they are, for I know that wheresoe'er I go
 Others will punctually come for ever and ever.

THE BASE OF ALL METAPHYSICS

And now gentlemen,
 A word I give to remain in your memories and minds,
 As base and finalè too for all metaphysics.

(So to the students the old professor,
 At the close of his crowded course.)

5

Having studied the new and antique, the Greek and Germanic systems, Kant having studied and stated, Fichte and Schelling and Hegel,
 Stated the lore of Plato, and Socrates greater than Plato,
 And greater than Socrates sought and stated, Christ divine having studied long,
 I see reminiscent to-day those Greek and Germanic systems, 10
 See the philosophies all, Christian churches and tenets see,
 Yet underneath Socrates clearly see, and underneath Christ the divine I see,
 The dear love of man for his comrade, the attraction of friend to friend,
 Of the well-married husband and wife, of children and parents,
 Of city for city and land for land. 15

I HEAR IT WAS CHARGED AGAINST ME

I hear it was charged against me that I sought to destroy institutions,
 But really I am neither for nor against institutions, (What indeed have I in common with them? or what with the destruction of
 them?)
 Only I will establish in the Mannahatta and in every city of these States inland and seaboard,
 And in the fields and woods, and above every keel little or large that dents the
 water, 5
 Without edifices or rules or trustees or any argument,
 The institution of the dear love of comrades.

SONG OF THE OPEN ROAD

1

Afoot and light-hearted I take to the open road, Healthy, free, the world before me,
 The long brown path before me leading wherever I choose.

Henceforth I ask not good-fortune, I myself am good-fortune, Henceforth I whimper no more, postpone no more, need nothing, 5
 Done with indoor complaints, libraries, querulous criticisms,
 Strong and content I travel the open road.

The earth, that is sufficient,
 I do not want the constellations any nearer,
 I know they are very well where they are, 10
 I know they suffice for those who belong to them.

(Still here I carry my old delicious burdens,
 I carry them, men and women, I carry them with me wherever I go,
 I swear it is impossible for me to get rid of them,
 I am fill'd with them; and I will fill them in return.) 15

2

You road I enter upon and look around, I believe you are not all that is here,
I believe that much unseen is also here.

Here the profound lesson of reception, nor preference nor denial,
The black with his woolly head, the felon, the diseas'd, the illiterate person, are not denied;
The birth, the hasting after the physician, the beggar's tramp, the drunkard's stagger, the laughing party of mechanics, 20
The escaped youth, the rich person's carriage, the fop, the eloping couple,
The early market-man, the hearse, the moving of furniture into the town, the return back from the town,
They pass, I also pass, any thing passes, none can be interdicted,
None but are accepted, none but shall be dear to me.

3

You air that serves me with breath to speak! 25
You objects that call from diffusion my meanings and give them shape!
You light that wraps me and all things in delicate equable showers!
You paths worn in the irregular hollows by the roadsides!
I believe you are latent with unseen existences, you are so dear to me.

You flagg'd walks of the cities! you strong curbs at the edges! 30
You ferries! you planks and posts of wharves! you timber-lined sides! you distant ships!

You rows of houses! you window-pierc'd façades! you roofs!
You porches and entrances! you copings and iron guards!
You windows whose transparent shells might expose so much!
You doors and ascending steps! you arches! 35
You gray stones of interminable pavements! you trodden crossings!
From all that has touch'd you I believe you have imparted to yourselves, and now would impart the same secretly to me,
From the living and the dead you have peopled your impassive surfaces, and the spirits thereof would be evident and amicable with me.

4

The earth expanding right hand and left hand,
The picture alive, every part in its best light, 40
The music falling in where it is wanted, and stopping where it is not wanted,
The cheerful voice of the public road, the gay fresh sentiment of the road.

O highway I travel, do you say to me Do not leave me?
Do you say Venture not—if you leave me you are lost?
Do you say I am already prepared, I am well-beaten and undenied, adhere to me?

O public road, I say back I am not afraid to leave you, yet I love you, 46
You express me better than I can express myself,
You shall be more to me than my poem.

I think heroic deeds were all conceiv'd in the open air, and all free poems also,
I think I could stop here myself and do miracles, 50
I think whatever I shall meet on the road I shall like, and whoever beholds me shall like me,
I think whoever I see must be happy.

5

From this hour I ordain myself loos'd of limits and imaginary lines,
 Going where I list, my own master total and absolute,
 Listening to others, considering well what they say, 55
 Pausing, searching, receiving, contemplating, Gently, but with undeniable will, divesting myself of the holds that would hold me.

I inhale great draughts of space,
 The east and the west are mine, and the north and the south are mine.

I am larger, better than I thought, 60
 I did not know I held so much goodness.

All seems beautiful to me,
 I can repeat over to men and women You have done such good to me I would do the same to you,
 I will recruit for myself and you as I go,
 I will scatter myself among men and women as I go, 65
 I will toss a new gladness and roughness among them,
 Whoever denies me it shall not trouble me,
 Whoever accepts me he or she shall be blessed and shall bless me.

6

Now if a thousand perfect men were to appear it would not amaze me,
 Now if a thousand beautiful forms of women appear'd it would not astonish me. 70

Now I see the secret of the making of the best persons,
 It is to grow in the open air and to eat and sleep with the earth.

Here a great personal deed has room,
 (Such a deed seizes upon the hearts of the whole race of men,
 Its effusion of strength and will overwhelms law and mocks all authority and all argument against it.) 75

Here is the test of wisdom,
 Wisdom is not finally tested in schools,
 Wisdom cannot be pass'd from one having it to another not having it,
 Wisdom is of the soul, is not susceptible of proof, is its own proof,
 Applies to all stages and objects and qualities and is content, 80
 Is the certainty of the reality and immortality of things, and the excellence of
 things;
 Something there is in the float of the sight of things that provokes it out of the soul.

Now I re-examine philosophies and religions,
 They may prove well in lecture-rooms, yet not prove at all under the spacious clouds and along the landscape and flowing currents.

Here is realization, 85
 Here is a man tallied—he realizes here what he has in him,
 The past, the future, majesty, love—if they are vacant of you, you are vacant of them.

Only the kernel of every object nourishes;
 Where is he who tears off the husks for you and me?
 Where is he that undoes stratagems and envelopes for you and me?

90

Here is adhesiveness, it is not previously fashion'd, it is apropos;
 Do you know what it is as you pass to be loved by strangers?
 Do you know the talk of those turning eye-balls?

7

Here is the efflux of the soul,
 The efflux of the soul comes from within through embower'd gates, ever provoking questions, 95
 These yearnings why are they? these thoughts in the darkness why are they?
 Why are there men and women that while they are nigh me the sunlight expands my blood?
 Why when they leave me do my pennants of joy sink flat and lank?
 Why are there trees I never walk under but large and melodious thoughts descend upon me?
 (I think they hang there winter and summer on those trees and always drop fruit as I pass;) 100
 What is it I interchange so suddenly with strangers?
 What with some driver as I ride on the seat by his side?
 What with some fisherman drawing his seine by the shore as I walk by and pause?
 What gives me to be free to a woman's and man's good-will? what gives them to be free to mine?

8

The efflux of the soul is happiness, here is happiness, 105
 I think it pervades the open air, waiting at all times,
 Now it flows unto us, we are rightly charged.

Here rises the fluid and attaching character,
 The fluid and attaching character is the freshness and sweetness of man and woman,
 (The herbs of the morning sprout no fresher and sweeter every day out of the roots of themselves, than it sprouts fresh and sweet continually out of itself.) 110
 Toward the fluid and attaching character exudes the sweat of the love of young and old,
 From it falls distill'd the charm that mocks beauty and attainments,
 Toward it heaves the shuddering longing ache of contact.

9

Allons! whoever you are come travel with me!
 Traveling with me you find what never tires.

115

The earth never tires,
 The earth is rude, silent, incomprehensible at first, Nature is rude and incomprehensible at first,
 Be not discouraged, keep on, there are divine things well envelop'd,
 I swear to you there are divine things more beautiful than words can tell.

Allons! we must not stop here, 120
 However sweet these laid-up stores, however convenient this dwelling we cannot remain here,
 However shelter'd this port and however calm these waters we must not anchor
 here,
 However welcome the hospitality that surrounds us we are permitted to receive it but a little while.

10

Allons! the inducements shall be greater,
 We will sail pathless and wild seas, 125
 We will go where winds blow, waves dash, and the Yankee clipper speeds by under full sail.

Allons! with power, liberty, the earth, the elements,
 Health, defiance, gayety, self-esteem, curiosity;
 Allons! from all formules!
 From your formules, O bat-eyed and materialistic priests. 130

The stale cadaver blocks up the passage—the burial waits no longer.

Allons! yet take warning!
 He traveling with me needs the best blood, thews, endurance,
 None may come to the trial till he or she bring courage and health,
 Come not here if you have already spent the best of yourself, 135
 Only those may come who come in sweet and determin'd bodies,
 No diseas'd person, no rum-drinker or venereal taint is permitted here.

(I and mine do not convince by arguments, similes, rhymes,
 We convince by our presence.)

11

Listen! I will be honest with you, 140
 I do not offer the old smooth prizes, but offer rough new prizes,
 These are the days that must happen to you:
 You shall not heap up what is call'd riches,
 You shall scatter with lavish hand all that you earn or achieve,
 You but arrive at the city to which you were destin'd, you hardly settle yourself to satisfaction before you are call'd by an irresistible call to depart, 145
 You shall be treated to the ironical smiles and mockings of those who remain behind you,
 What beckonings of love you receive you shall only answer with passionate kisses of parting,
 You shall not allow the hold of those who spread their reach'd hands toward you.

12

Allons! after the great Companions, and to belong to them!
 They too are on the road—they are the swift and majestic men—they are the greatest women, 150
 Enjoyers of calms of seas and storms of seas,
 Sailors of many a ship, walkers of many a mile of land,
 Habitues of many distant countries, habitues of far-distant dwellings,

Trusters of men and women, observers of cities, solitary toilers,
 Pausers and contemplators of tufts, blossoms, shells of the shore, 155
 Dancers at wedding-dances, kissers of brides, tender helpers of children, bearers of children,
 Soldiers of revolts, standers by gaping graves, lowerers-down of coffins, Journeymen over consecutive seasons, over the years, the curious years each emerging from that which preceded it,
 Journeymen as with companions, namely their own diverse phases,
 Forth-steppers from the latent unrealized baby-days, 160
 Journeymen gayly with their own youth, journeymen with their bearded and wellgrain'd manhood,
 Journeymen with their womanhood, ample, unsurpass'd, content,
 Journeymen with their own sublime old age of manhood or womanhood,
 Old age, calm, expanded, broad with the haughty breadth of the universe,
 Old age, flowing free with the delicious near-by freedom of death. 165

13

Allons! to that which is endless as it was beginningless,
 To undergo much, tramps of days, rests of nights,
 To merge all in the travel they tend to, and the days and nights they tend to,
 Again to merge them in the start of superior journeys,
 To see nothing anywhere but what you may reach it and pass it, 170
 To conceive no time, however distant, but what you may reach it and pass it,
 To look up or down no road but it stretches and waits for you, however long but it stretches and waits for you,
 To see no being, not God's or any, but you also go thither,
 To see no possession but you may possess it, enjoying all without labor or purchase, abstracting the feast yet not abstracting one particle of it,
 To take the best of the farmer's farm and the rich man's elegant villa, and the chaste blessings of the well-married couple, and the fruits of orchards and flowers of gardens, 175
 To take to your use out of the compact cities as you pass through,
 To carry buildings and streets with you afterward wherever you go,
 To gather the minds of men out of their brains as you encounter them, to gather the love out of their hearts,
 To take your lovers on the road with you, for all that you leave them behind you,
 To know the universe itself as a road, as many roads, as roads for traveling souls.
 All parts away for the progress of souls, 181
 All religion, all solid things, arts, governments—all that was or is apparent upon this globe or any globe, falls into niches and corners before the procession of souls along the grand roads of the universe.

Of the progress of the souls of men and women along the grand roads of the universe, all other progress is the needed emblem and sustenance.

Forever alive, forever forward,
 Stately, solemn, sad, withdrawn, baffled, mad, turbulent, feeble, dissatisfied, 185
 Desperate, proud, fond, sick, accepted by men, rejected by men,
 They go! they go! I know that they go but I know not where they go,
 But I know that they go toward the best—toward something great.

Whoever you are, come forth! or man or woman come forth!
 You must not stay sleeping and dallying there in the house, though you built it,
 or though it has been built for you. 190

Out of the dark confinement! out from behind the screen!
It is useless to protest, I know all and expose it.

Behold through you as bad as the rest,
Through the laughter, dancing, dining, supping, of people,
Inside of dresses and ornaments, inside of those wash'd and trimm'd faces, 195
Behold a secret silent loathing and despair.

No husband, no wife, no friend, trusted to hear the confession,
Another self, a duplicate of every one, skulking and hiding it goes, Formless and wordless through the streets of the cities, polite and bland in the parlors, 200
In the cars of railroads, in steamboats, in the public assembly,
Home to the houses of men and women, at the table, in the bedroom, everywhere, Smartly attired, countenance smiling, form upright, death under the breast-bones, hell under the skull-bones, 205
Under the broadcloth and gloves, under the ribbons and artificial flowers,
Keeping fair with the customs, speaking not a syllable of itself,
Speaking of anything else but never of itself.

14

Allons! through struggles and wars!
The goal that was named cannot be countermanded.

Have the past struggles succeeded?
What has succeeded? yourself? your nation? Nature?
Now understand me well—it is provided in the essence of things that from any fruition of success, no matter what, shall come forth something to make a greater struggle necessary. 210

My call is the call of battle, I nourish active rebellion,
He going with me must go well arm'd,
He going with me goes often with spare diet, poverty, angry enemies, desertions.

15

Allons! the road is before us!
It is safe—I have tried it—my own feet have tried it well—be not detain'd! 215
Let the paper remain on the desk unwritten, and the book on the shelf unopen'd!
Let the tools remain in the workshop! let the money remain unearn'd!
Let the school stand! mind not the cry of the teacher!
Let the preacher preach in his pulpit! let the lawyer plead in the court, and the judge expound the law.

Camerado, I give you my hand! 220
I give you my love more precious than money,
I give you myself before preaching or law;
Will you give me yourself? will you come travel with me?
Shall we stick by each other as long as we live?

CROSSING BROOKLYN FERRY

1

Flood-tide below me! I see you face to face!
 Clouds of the west—sun there half an hour high—I see you also face to face.

Crowds of men and women attired in the usual costumes, how curious you are to me!

On the ferry-boats the hundreds and hundreds that cross, returning home, are more curious to me than you suppose,

And you that shall cross from shore to shore years hence are more to me, and more in my meditations, than you might suppose. 5

2

The impalpable sustenance of me from all things at all hours of the day,
 The simple, compact, well-join'd scheme, myself disintegrated, every one disintegrated yet part of the scheme,

The similitudes of the past and those of the future,

The glories strung like beads on my smallest sights and hearings, on the walk in the street and the passage over the river,

The current rushing so swiftly and swimming with me far away, 10

The others that are to follow me, the ties between me and them,

The certainty of others, the life, love, sight, hearing of others.

Others will enter the gates of the ferry and cross from shore to shore.

Others will watch the run of the flood-tide,

Others will see the shipping of Manhattan north and west, and the heights of Brooklyn to the south and east, 15

Others will see the islands large and small;

Fifty years hence, others will see them as they cross, the sun half an hour high,

A hundred years hence, or ever so many hundred years hence, others will see them,

Will enjoy the sunset, the pouring-in of the flood-tide, the falling-back to the sea of the ebb-tide.

3

It avails not, time nor place—distance avails not, 20

I am with you, you men and women of a generation, or ever so many generations hence,

Just as you feel when you look on the river and sky, so I felt,

Just as any of you is one of a living crowd, I was one of a crowd,

Just as you are refresh'd by the gladness of the river and the bright flow, I was refresh'd,

Just as you stand and lean on the rail, yet hurry with the swift current, I stood yet was hurried, 25

Just as you look on the numberless masts of ships and the thick-stemm'd pipes of steamboats, I look'd.

I too many and many a time cross'd the river of old,

Watched the Twelfth-month sea-gulls, saw them high in the air floating with motionless wings, oscillating their bodies,

Saw how the glistening yellow lit up parts of their bodies and left the rest in strong shadow,

Saw the slow-wheeling circles and the gradual edging toward the south, 30
 Saw the reflection of the summer sky in the water,
 Had my eyes dazzled by the shimmering track of beams, Look'd at the fine centrifugal spokes of light round the shape of my head in the sunlit water,
 Look'd on the haze on the hills southward and south-westward,
 Look'd on the vapor as it flew in fleeces tinged with violet, 35
 Look'd toward the lower bay to notice the vessels arriving,
 Saw their approach, saw aboard those that were near me,
 Saw the white sails of schooners and sloops, saw the ships at anchor,
 The sailors at work in the rigging or out astride the spars,
 The round masts, the swinging motion of the hulls, the slender serpentine pennants, 40
 The large and small steamers in motion, the pilots in their pilot-houses,
 The white wake left by the passage, the quick tremulous whirl of the wheels,
 The flags of all nations, the falling of them at sunset,
 The scallop-edged waves in the twilight, the ladled cups, the frolicsome crests and glistening,
 The stretch afar growing dimmer and dimmer, the gray walls of the granite store-houses by the docks, 45
 On the river the shadowy group, the big steam-tug closely flank'd on each side by the barges, the hay-boat, the belated lighter,
 On the neighboring shore the fires from the foundry chimneys burning high and glaringly into the night, Casting their flicker of black contrasted with wild red and yellow light over the tops of houses, and down into the clefts of streets.

4

These and all else were to me the same as they are to you,
 I loved well those cities, loved well the stately and rapid river, 50
 The men and women I saw were all near to me,
 Others the same—others who look back on me because I look'd forward to them,
 (The time will come though I stop here to-day and to-night.)

5

What is it then between us?
 What is the count of the scores or hundreds of years between us? 55

Whatever it is, it avails not—distance avails not, and place avails not,
 I too lived, Brooklyn of ample hills was mine,
 I too walk'd the streets of Manhattan island, and bathed in the waters around it,
 I too felt the curious abrupt questionings stir within me.
 In the day among crowds of people sometimes they came upon me, 60
 In my walks home late at night or as I lay in my bed they came upon me,
 I too had been struck from the float forever held in solution,
 I too had receiv'd identity by my body,
 That I was, I knew was of my body, and what I should be, I knew I should be of my body.

6

It is not upon you alone the dark patches fall, 65
 The dark threw its patches down upon me also,
 The best I had done seem'd to me blank and suspicious,

My great thoughts as I supposed them, were they not in reality meagre?
 Nor is it you alone who know what it is to be evil,
 I am he who knew what it was to be evil, 70
 I too knitted the old knot of contrariety,
 Blabb'd, blush'd, resented, lied, stole, grudg'd,
 Had guile, anger, lust, hot wishes I dared not speak,
 Was wayward, vain, greedy, shallow, sly, cowardly, malignant,
 The wolf, the snake, the hog, not wanting in me, 75
 The cheating look, the frivolous word, the adulterous wish, not wanting,
 Refusals, hates, postponements, meanness, laziness, none of these wanting,
 Was one with the rest, the days and haps of the rest,
 Was call'd by my nighest name by clear loud voices of young men as they saw me approaching or passing, Felt their arms on my neck as I stood, or the negligent leaning of their flesh against me as I sat, 80 Saw many I loved in the street or ferry-boat or public assembly, yet never told them a word,
 Lived the same life with the rest, the same old laughing, gnawing, sleeping,
 Play'd the part that still looks back on the actor or actress,
 The same old role, the role that is what we make it, as great as we like,
 Or as small as we like, or both great and small. 85

7

Closer yet I approach you,
 What thought you have of me now, I had as much of you—I laid in my stores in advance,
 I consider'd long and seriously of you before you were born.

Who was to know what should come home to me?
 Who knows but I am enjoying this? 90
 Who knows, for all the distance, but I am as good as looking at you now, for all you cannot see me?

8

Ah, what can ever be more stately and admirable to me than mast-hemm'd Manhattan?
 River and sunset and scallop-edg'd waves of flood-tide?
 The sea-gulls oscillating their bodies, the hay-boat in the twilight, and the belated lighter?
 What gods can exceed these that clasp me by the hand, and with voices I love call me promptly and loudly by my nighest name as I approach? 95

What is more subtle than this which ties me to the woman or man that looks in my face?
 Which fuses me into you now, and pours my meaning into you?

We understand then do we not?
 What I promis'd without mentioning it, have you not accepted?
 What the study could not teach—what the preaching could not accomplish is accomplish'd, is it not? 100

9

Flow on, river! flow with the flood-tide, and ebb with the ebb-tide!
 Frolic on, crested and scallop-edg'd waves!

Gorgeous clouds of the sunset! drench with your splendor me, or the men and women generations after me!

Cross from shore to shore, countless crowds of passengers!

Stand up, tall masts of Mannahatta! stand up, beautiful hills of Brooklyn! 105

Throb, baffled and curious brain! throw out questions and answers!

Suspend here and everywhere, eternal float of solution!

Gaze, loving and thirsting eyes, in the house or street or public assembly!

Sound out, voices of young men! loudly and musically call me by my highest name!

Live, old life! play the part that looks back on the actor or actress! 110

Play the old role, the role that is great or small according as one makes it!

Consider, you who peruse me, whether I may not in unknown ways be looking upon you;

Be firm, rail over the river, to support those who lean idly, yet haste with the hasting current;

Fly on, sea-birds! fly sideways, or wheel in large circles high in the air;

Receive the summer sky, you water, and faithfully hold it till all downcast eyes have time to take it from you! 115

Diverge, fine spokes of light, from the shape of my head, or any one's head, in the sunlit water!

Come on, ships from the lower bay! pass up or down, white-sail'd schooners, sloops, lighters!

Flaunt away, flags of all nations! be duly lower'd at sunset!

Burn high your fires, foundry chimneys! cast black shadows at nightfall! cast red and yellow light over the tops of the houses!

Appearances, now or henceforth, indicate what you are, 120

You necessary film, continue to envelop the soul,

About my body for me, and your body for you, be hung our divinest aromas,

Thrive, cities—bring your freight, bring your shows, ample and sufficient rivers,

Expand, being than which none else is perhaps more spiritual,

Keep your places, objects than which none else is more lasting. 125

You have waited, you always wait, you dumb, beautiful ministers,

We receive you with free sense at last, and are insatiate henceforward,

Not you any more shall be able to foil us, or withhold yourselves from us,

We use you, and do not cast you aside—we plant you permanently within us,

We fathom you not—we love you—there is perfection in you also, 130

You furnish your parts toward eternity,

Great or small, you furnish your parts toward the soul.

PIONEERS! O PIONEERS!

Come my tan-faced children,

Follow well in order, get your weapons ready,

Have you your pistols? have you your sharp-edged axes?

Pioneers! O pioneers!

For we cannot tarry here,

5

We must march my darlings, we must bear the brunt of danger,

We the youthful sinewy races, all the rest on us depend,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

O you youths, Western youths,
 So impatient, full of action, full of manly pride and friendship, 10
 Plain I see you Western youths, see you tramping with the foremost,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

Have the elder races halted?
 Do they droop and end their lesson, wearied over there beyond the seas?
 We take up the task eternal, and the burden and the lesson, 15
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

All the past we leave behind,
 We debouch upon a newer mightier world, varied world,
 Fresh and strong the world we seize, world of labor and the march,
 Pioneers! O pioneers! 20

We detachments steady throwing,
 Down the edges, through the passes, up the mountains steep,
 Conquering, holding, daring, venturing as we go the unknown ways,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

We primeval forests felling, 25
 We the rivers stemming, vexing we and piercing deep the mines within,
 We the surface broad surveying, we the virgin soil upheaving,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

Colorado men are we,
 From the peaks gigantic, from the great sierras and the high plateaus, 30
 From the mine and from the gully, from the hunting trail we come,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

From Nebraska, from Arkansas,
 Central inland race are we, from Missouri, with the continental blood intervein'd,
 All the hands of comrades clasping, all the Southern, all the Northern, 35
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

O resistless restless race!
 O beloved race in all! O my breast aches with tender love for all!
 O I mourn and yet exult, I am rapt with love for all,
 Pioneers! O pioneers! 40

Raise the mighty mother mistress, Waving high the delicate mistress, over all the starry mistress, (bend your heads all,)
 Raise the fang'd and warlike mistress, stern, impassive, weapon'd mistress,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

See my children, resolute children, 45
 By those swarms upon our rear we must never yield or falter,
 Ages back in ghostly millions frowning there behind us urging,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

On and on the compact ranks,
 With accessions ever waiting, with the places of the dead quickly fill'd, 50
 Through the battle, through defeat, moving yet and never stopping,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

O to die advancing on!

Are there some of us to droop and die? has the hour come?

Then upon the march we fittest die, soon and sure the gap is fill'd, Pioneers! O pioneers!

55

All the pulses of the world,

Falling in they beat for us, with the Western movement beat,
Holding single or together, steady moving to the front, all for us,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

60

Life's involv'd and varied pageants,

All the forms and shows, all the workmen at their work,
All the seamen and the landsmen, all the masters with their slaves,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

All the hapless silent lovers,

All the prisoners in the prisons, all the righteous and the wicked,
All the joyous, all the sorrowing, all the living, all the dying,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

65

I too with my soul and body,

We, a curious trio, picking, wandering on our way,
Through these shores amid the shadows, with the apparitions pressing,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

70

Lo, the darting bowling orb!

Lo, the brother orbs around, all the clustering suns and planets,
All the dazzling days, all the mystic nights with dreams,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

75

These are of us, they are with us,

All for primal needed work, while the followers there in embryo wait behind,
We to-day's procession heading, we the route for travel clearing,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

80

O you daughters of the West!

O you young and elder daughters! O you mothers and you wives!
Never must you be divided, in our ranks you move united,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

Minstrels latent on the prairies!

(Shrouded bards of other lands, you may rest, you have done your work,)
Soon I hear you coming warbling, soon you rise and tramp amid us, Pioneers! O pioneers!

85

Not for delectations sweet,

Not the cushion and the slipper, not the peaceful and the studious,
Not the riches safe and palling, not for us the tame enjoyment,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

90

Do the feasters gluttonous feast?

Do the corpulent sleepers sleep? have they lock'd and bolted doors?
Still be ours the diet hard, and the blanket on the ground,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

95

Has the night descended?

Was the road of late so toilsome? did we stop discouraged nodding on our way?
Yet a passing hour I yield you in your tracks to pause oblivious, Pioneers! O pioneers!

100

Till with sound of trumpet,

Far, far off the daybreak call—hark! how loud and clear I hear it wind,
Swift! to the head of the army!—swift! spring to your place
Pioneers! O pioneers!

OUT OF THE CRADLE ENDLESSLY ROCKING

Out of the cradle endlessly rocking,
Out of the mocking-bird's throat, the musical shuttle,
Out of the Ninth-month midnight,
Over the sterile sands and the fields beyond, where the child leaving his bed wander'd alone, bareheaded, barefoot,
Down from the shower'd halo,
Up from the mystic play of shadows twining and twisting as if they were alive,
Out from the patches of briars and blackberries,
From the memories of the bird that chanted to me,
From your memories sad brother, from the fitful risings and fallings I heard,
From under that yellow half-moon late-risen and swollen as if with tears,
From those beginning notes of yearning and love there in the mist,
From the thousand responses of my heart never to cease,
From the myriad thence-arous'd words,
From the word stronger and more delicious than any,
From such as now they start the scene revisiting,
As a flock, twittering, rising, or overhead passing,
Borne hither, ere all eludes me, hurriedly,
A man, yet by these tears a little boy again,
Throwing myself on the sand, confronting the waves,
I, chanter of pains and joys, uniter of here and hereafter,
Taking all hints to use them, but swiftly leaping beyond them,
A reminiscence sing.

Once Paumanok,
When the lilac-scent was in the air and Fifth-month grass was growing,
Up this seashore in some briars,
Two feather'd guests from Alabama, two together,
And their nest, and four light-green eggs spotted with brown,
And every day the he-bird to and fro near at hand,
And every day the she-bird crouch'd on her nest, silent, with bright eyes,
And every day I, a curious boy, never too close, never disturbing them,
Cautiously peering, absorbing, translating.

Shine! shine! shine!
Pour down your warmth, great sun!
While we bask, we two together,

Two together!
Winds blow south, or winds blow north,
Day come white, or night come black,

35

*Home, or rivers and mountains from home,
Singing all time, minding no time,
While we two keep together.* • 40

Till of a sudden,
May-be kill'd, unknown to her mate,
One forenoon the she-bird crouch'd not on the nest,
Nor return'd that afternoon, nor the next,
Nor ever appear'd again. 45

And thenceforward all summer in the sound of the sea,
And at night under the full of the moon in calmer weather,
Over the hoarse surging of the sea,
Or flitting from brier to brier by day,
I saw, I heard at intervals the remaining one, the he-bird,
The solitary guest from Alabama. 50

*Blow! blow! blow!
Blow up sea-winds along Paumanok's shore;
I wait and I wait till you blow my mate to me.*

Yes, when the stars glisten'd, 55
All night long on the prong of a moss-scallop'd stake,
Down almost amid the slapping waves,
Sat the lone singer wonderful causing tears.
He call'd on his mate,
He pour'd forth the meanings which I of all men know. 60

Yes my brother I know,
The rest might not, but I have treasur'd every note,
For more than once dimly down to the beach gliding,
Silent, avoiding the moonbeams, blending myself with the shadows, Recalling now the obscure shapes, the echoes, the sounds and sights after their sorts, 65
The white arms out in the breakers tirelessly tossing,
I, with bare feet, a child, the wind wafting my hair,
Listen'd long and long.

Listen'd to keep, to sing, now translating the notes,
Following you my brother. 70

*Soothe! soothe! soothe!
Close on its wave soothes the wave behind,
And again another behind embracing and lapping, every one close,
But my love soothes not me, not me.*

*Low hangs the moon, it rose late, 75
It is lagging—O I think it is heavy with love, with love.*

*O madly the sea pushes upon the land,
With love, with love.*

*O night! do I not see my love fluttering out among the breakers?
What is that little black thing I see there in the white? 80*

Loud! loud! loud!
 Loud I call to you, my love!
 High and clear I shoot my voice over the waves,
 Surely you must know who is here, is here,
 You must know who I am, my love.

85

Low-hanging moon!
 What is that dusky spot in your brown yellow?
 O it is the shape, the shape of my mate!
 O moon do not keep her from me any longer.

Land! land! O land! 90
 Whichever way I turn, O I think you could give me my mate back again if you only would,
 For I am almost sure I see her dimly whichever way I look.

O rising stars!
 Perhaps the one I want so much will rise, will rise with some of you.

O throat! O trembling throat! 95
 Sound clearer through the atmosphere!
 Pierce the woods, the earth,
 Somewhere listening to catch you must be the one I want.

Shake out carols!
 Solitary here, the night's carols! 100
 Carols of lonesome love! death's carols!
 Carols under that lagging, yellow, waning moon!
 O under that moon where she droops almost down into the sea!
 O reckless despairing carols.

But soft! sink low! 105
 Soft! let me just murmur,
 And do you wait a moment you husky-nois'd sea,
 For somewhere I believe I heard my mate responding to me,
 So faint, I must be still, be still to listen,
 But not altogether still, for then she might not come immediately to me. 110

Hither my love!
 Here I am! here!
 With this just-sustain'd note I announce myself to you,
 This gentle call is for you my love, for you.

Do not be decoy'd elsewhere, 115
 That is the whistle of the wind, it is not my voice,
 That is the fluttering, the fluttering of the spray,
 Those are the shadows of leaves.

O darkness! O in vain!
 O I am very sick and sorrowful. 120
 O brown halo in the sky near the moon, drooping upon the sea!
 O troubled reflection in the sea!
 O throat! O throbbing heart!
 And I singing uselessly, uselessly all the night.

O past! O happy life! O songs of joy!
In the air, in the woods, over fields,
Loved! loved! loved! loved! loved!
But my mate no more, no more with me!
We two together no more.

125

The aria sinking,
 All else continuing, the stars shining,
 The winds blowing, the notes of the bird continuous echoing,
 With angry moans the fierce old mother incessantly moaning,
 On the sands of Paumanok's shore gray and rustling,
 The yellow half-moon enlarged, sagging down, drooping, the face of the sea almost touching,
 The boy ecstatic, with his bare feet the waves, with his hair the atmosphere dallying,
 The love in the heart long pent, now loose, now at last tumultuously bursting,
 The aria's meaning, the ears, the soul, swiftly depositing,
 The strange tears down the cheeks coursing,
 The colloquy there, the trio, each uttering,
 The undertone, the savage old mother incessantly crying,
 To the boy's soul's questions sullenly timing, some drown'd secret hissing,
 To the outsetting bard.

130

135

140

Demon or bird (said the boy's soul,
 Is it indeed toward your mate you sing? or is it really to me?
 For I, that was a child, my tongue's use sleeping, now I have heard you,
 Now in a moment I know what I am for, I awake,
 And already a thousand singers, a thousand songs, clearer, louder and more sorrowful than yours,
 A thousand warbling echoes have started to life within me, never to die.

145

O you singer solitary, singing by yourself, projecting me,
 O solitary me listening, never more shall I cease perpetuating you,
 Never more shall I escape, never more the reverberations,
 Never more the cries of unsatisfied love be absent from me,
 Never again leave me to be the peaceful child I was before what there in the night,
 By the sea under the yellow and sagging moon,
 The messenger there arous'd, the fire, the sweet hell within,
 The unknown want, the destiny of me.

155

O give me the clew! (it lurks in the night here somewhere,)
 O if I am to have so much, let me have more!

A word then, (for I will conquer it,)
 The word final, superior to all,
 Subtle, sent up—what is it?—I listen;
 Are you whispering it, and have been all the time, you sea waves?
 Is that it from your liquid rims and wet sands?

160

Whereto answering, the sea,
 Delaying not, hurrying not,
 Whisper'd me through the night, and very plainly before daybreak,
 Lisp'd to me the low and delicious word death,
 And again death, death, death, death,
 Hissing melodious, neither like the bird nor like my arous'd child's heart,

165

170

But edging near as privately for me rustling at my feet,
 Creeping thence steadily up to my ears and laving me softly all over,
 Death, death, death, death, death.

Which I do not forget,
 But fuse the song of my dusky demon and brother, 175
 That he sang to me in the moonlight on Paumanok's gray beach,
 With the thousand responsive songs at random,
 My own songs awaked from that hour,
 And with them the key, the word up from the waves,
 The word of the sweetest song and all songs, 180
 That strong and delicious word which, creeping to my feet, (Or like some old crone rocking the cradle, swathed in sweet garments, bending aside,)
 The sea whisper'd me.

WHEN I HEARD THE LEARN'D ASTRONOMER

When I heard the learn'd astronomer,
 When the proofs, the figures, were ranged in columns before me,
 When I was shown the charts and diagrams, to add, divide, and measure them,
 When I sitting heard the astronomer where he lectured with much applause in the lecture-room,
 How soon unaccountable I became tired and sick, 5
 Till rising and gliding out I wander'd off by myself,
 In the mystical moist night-air, and from time to time,
 Look'd up in perfect silence at the stars.

BEAT! BEAT! DRUMS!

Beat! beat! drums!—blow! bugles! blow!
 Through the windows—through doors—burst like a ruthless force,
 Into the solemn church, and scatter the congregation,
 Into the school where the scholar is studying;
 Leave not the bridegroom quiet—no happiness must he have now with his bride, 5
 Nor the peaceful farmer any peace, ploughing his field or gathering his grain,
 So fierce you whirr and pound you drums—so shrill you bugles blow.

Beat! beat! drums!—blow! bugles! blow!
 Over the traffic of cities—over the rumble of wheels in the streets;
 Are beds prepared for sleepers at night in the houses? no sleepers must sleep in those beds, 10
 No bargainers' bargains by day—no brokers or speculators—would they continue?
 Would the talkers be talking? would the singer attempt to sing?
 Would the lawyer rise in the court to state his case before the judge?
 Then rattle quicker, heavier drums—you bugles wilder blow.

Beat! beat! drums!—blow! bugles! blow! 15
 Make no parley—stop for no expostulation,
 Mind not the timid—mind not the weeper or prayer,
 Mind not the old man beseeching the young man,
 Let not the child's voice be heard, nor the mother's entreaties,
 Make even the trestles to shake the dead where they lie awaiting the hearses, 20
 So strong you thump O terrible drums—so loud you bugles blow.

CAVALRY CROSSING A FORD

A line in long array where they wind betwixt green islands,
 They take a serpentine course, their arms flash in the sun—hark to the musical clank,
 Behold the silvery river, in it the splashing horses loitering stop to drink, Behold the brown-faced men, each group, each person a picture, the negligent rest on the saddles,
 Some emerge on the opposite bank, others are just entering the ford—while, 5
 Scarlet and blue and snowy white,
 The guidon flags flutter gayly in the wind.

COME UP FROM THE FIELDS FATHER

Come up from the fields father, here's a letter from our Pete,
 And come to the front door mother, here's a letter from thy dear son.

Lo, 'tis autumn,
 Lo, where the trees, deeper green, yellower and redder,
 Cool and sweeten Ohio's villages with leaves fluttering in the moderate wind, 5
 Where apples ripe in the orchards hang and grapes on the trellis'd vines, (Smell you the smell of the grapes on the vines?
 Smell you the buckwheat where the bees were lately buzzing?)

Above all, lo, the sky so calm, so transparent after the rain, and with wondrous clouds,
 Below too, all calm, all vital and beautiful, and the farm prospers well. 10

Down in the fields all prospers well,
 But now from the fields come father, come at the daughter's call,
 And come to the entry mother, to the front door come right away.

Fast as she can she hurries, something ominous, her steps trembling,
 She does not tarry to smooth her hair nor adjust her cap. 15

Open the envelope quickly,
 O this is not our son's writing, yet his name is sign'd,
 O a strange hand writes for our dear son, O stricken mother's soul!
 All swims before her eyes, flashes with black, she catches the main words only, Sentences broken, gunshot wound in the breast, cavalry skirmish, taken to hospital, 20
At present low, but will soon be better.

Ah now the single figure to me,
 Amid all teeming and wealthy Ohio with all its cities and farms,
 Sickly white in the face and dull in the head, very faint,
 By the jamb of a door leans. 25

Grieve not so, dear mother, (the just-grown daughter speaks through her sobs,
The little sisters huddle around speechless and dismay'd.)
See, dearest mother, the letter says Pete will soon be better.

Alas poor boy, he will never be better, (nor may-be needs to be better, that brave and simple soul,) 30
While they stand at home at the door he is dead already,
The only son is dead.

But the mother needs to be better,
She with thin form presently drest in black,
By day her meals untouch'd, then at night fitfully sleeping, often waking, 35
In the midnight waking, weeping, longing with one deep longing,
O that she might withdraw unnoticed, silent from life escape and withdraw,
To follow, to seek, to be with her dear dead son.

VIGIL STRANGE I KEPT ON THE FIELD ONE NIGHT

Vigil strange I kept on the field one night;
When you my son and my comrade dropt at my side that day,
One look I but gave which your dear eyes return'd with a look I shall never forget,
One touch of your hand to mine O boy, reach'd up as you lay on the ground,
Then onward I sped in the battle, the even-contested battle, 5
Till late in the night reliev'd to the place at last again I made my way, Found you in death so cold dear comrade, found your body son of responding kisses, (never again on earth responding,) Bared your face in the starlight, curious the scene, cool blew the moderate night-wind,
Long there and then in vigil I stood, dimly around me the battlefield spreading, 10
Vigil wondrous and vigil sweet there in the fragrant silent night,
But not a tear fell, not even a long-drawn sigh, long, long I gazed,
Then on the earth partially reclining sat by your side leaning my chin in my hands,
Passing sweet hours, immortal and mystic hours with you dearest comrade—not a tear, not a word,
Vigil of silence, love and death, vigil for you my son and my soldier, 15
As onward silently stars aloft, eastward new ones upward stole, Vigil final for you brave boy, (I could not save you, swift was your death,
I faithfully loved you and cared for you living, I think we shall surely meet
again,)
Till at latest lingering of the night, indeed just as the dawn appear'd,
My comrade I wrapt in his blanket, envelop'd well his form, 20
Folded the blanket well, tucking it carefully over head and carefully under feet,
And there and then and bathed by the rising sun, my son in his grave, in his rude-dug grave I deposited,
Ending my vigil strange with that, vigil of night and battle-field dim,
Vigil for boy of responding kisses, (never again on earth responding,) Vigil for comrade swiftly slain, vigil I never forget, how as day brighten'd, 25
I rose from the chill ground and folded my soldier well in his blanket,
And buried him where he fell.

A MARCH IN THE RANKS HARD-PREST, AND THE ROAD UNKNOWN

A march in the ranks hard-prest, and the road unknown,
A route through a heavy wood with muffled steps in the darkness,

Our army foil'd with loss severe, and the sullen remnant retreating,
 Till after midnight glimmer upon us the lights of a dim-lighted building,
 We come to an open space in the woods, and halt by the dim-lighted building, 5
 'Tis a large old church at the crossing roads, now an impromptu hospital, Entering but for a minute I see a sight beyond all the pictures and poems ever made,
 Shadows of deepest, deepest black, just lit by moving candles and lamps,
 And by one great pitchy torch stationary with wild red flame and clouds of smoke,
 By these, crowds, groups of forms vaguely I see on the floor, some in the pews laid down, 10
 At my feet more distinctly a soldier, a mere lad, in danger of bleeding to death,
 (he is shot in the abdomen,)
 I stanch the blood temporarily, (the youngster's face is white as a lily,)
 Then before I depart I sweep my eyes o'er the scene fain to absorb it all,
 Faces, varieties, postures beyond description, most in obscurity, some of them
 dead,
 Surgeons operating, attendants holding lights, the smell of ether, the odor of blood, 15
 The crowd, O the crowd of the bloody forms, the yard outside also fill'd,
 Some on the bare ground, some on planks or stretchers, some in the death-spasm sweating,
 An occasional scream or cry, the doctor's shouted orders or calls,
 The glisten of the little steel instruments catching the glint of the torches,
 These I resume as I chant, I see again the forms, I smell the odor, 20
 Then hear outside the orders given, Fall in, my men, fall in;
 But first I bend to the dying lad, his eyes open, a half-smile gives he me,
 Then the eyes close, calmly close, and I speed forth to the darkness,
 Resuming, marching, ever in darkness marching, on in the ranks,
 The unknown road still marching. 25

GIVE ME THE SPLENDID SILENT SUN

1

Give me the splendid silent sun with all his beams full-dazzling,
 Give me juicy autumnal fruit ripe and red from the orchard,
 Give me a field where the unmow'd grass grows,
 Give me an arbor, give me the trellis'd grape,
 Give me fresh corn and wheat, give me serene-moving animals teaching content, 5
 Give me nights perfectly quiet as on high plateaus west of the Mississippi, and I looking up at the stars,
 Give me odorous at sunrise a garden of beautiful flowers where I can walk undisturb'd,
 Give me for marriage a sweet-breath'd woman of whom I should never tire, Give me a perfect child, give me away aside from the noise of the world a rural domestic life,
 Give me to warble spontaneous songs recluse by myself, for my own ears only, 10
 Give me solitude, give me Nature, give me again O Nature your primal sanities!
 These demanding to have them, (tired with ceaseless excitement. and rack'd by the war-strife,)
 These to procure incessantly asking, rising in cries from my heart,
 While yet incessantly asking still I adhere to my city,
 Day upon day and year upon year O city, walking your streets, 15

Where you hold me enchain'd a certain time refusing to give me up,
 Yet giving to make me glutted, enrich'd of soul, you give me forever faces;
 (O I see what I sought to escape, confronting, reversing my cries,
 I see my own soul trampling down what it ask'd for.)

2

Keep your splendid silent sun, 20
 Keep your woods O Nature, and the quiet places by the woods,
 Keep your fields of clover and timothy, and your corn-fields and orchards,
 Keep the blossoming buckwheat fields where the Ninth-month bees hum;
 Give me faces and streets—give me these phantoms incessant and endless along the trottoirs!
 Give me interminable eyes—give me women—give me comrades and lovers by the thousand! 25
 Let me see new ones every day—let me hold new ones by the hand every day!
 Give me such shows—give me the streets of Manhattan!
 Give me Broadway, with the soldiers marching—give me the sound of the trumpets and drums!
 (The soldiers in companies or regiments—some starting away, flush'd and reckless,
 Some, their time up, returning with thinn'd ranks, young, yet very old, worn, marching, noticing nothing;) 30
 Give me the shores and wharves heavy-fringed with black ships!
 O such for me! O an intense life, full to repletion and varied!
 The life of the theatre, bar-room, huge hotel, for me!
 The saloon of the steamer! the crowded excursion for me! the torchlight procession!
 The dense brigade bound for the war, with high piled military wagons following; 35
 People, endless, streaming, with strong voices, passions, pageants, Manhattan streets with their powerful throbs, with beating drums as now,
 The endless and noisy chorus, the rustle and clank of muskets, (even the sight of the wounded,)
 Manhattan crowds, with their turbulent musical chorus!
 Manhattan faces and eyes forever for me. 40

ETHIOPIA SALUTING THE COLORS

Who are you dusky woman, so ancient hardly human,
 With your woolly-white and turban'd head, and bare bony feet?
 Why rising by the roadside here, do you the colors greet?

('Tis while our army lines Carolina's sands and pines,
 Forth from thy hovel door thou Ethiopia com'st to me,
 As under doughty Sherman I march toward the sea.) 5

*Me master years a hundred since from my parents sunder'd,
 A little child, they caught me as the savage beast is caught,
 Then hither me across the sea the cruel slaver brought.*

No further does she say, but lingering all the day, 10
 Her high-borne turban'd head she wags, and rolls her darkling eye,
 And courtesies to the regiments, the guidons moving by.

What is it fateful woman, so bleary, hardly human?
 Why wag your head with turban bound, yellow, red and green?
 Are the things so strange and marvelous you see or have seen?

WHEN LILACS LAST IN THE DOORYARD BLOOM'D

1

When lilacs last in the dooryard bloom'd,
 And the great star early droop'd in the western sky in the night,
 I mourn'd, and yet shall mourn with ever-returning spring.

Ever-returning spring, trinity sure to me you bring,
 Lilac blooming perennial and drooping star in the west,
 And thought of him I love.

2

O powerful western fallen star!
 O shades of night—O moody, tearful night!
 O great star disappear'd—O the black murk that hides the star!
 O cruel hands that hold me powerless—O helpless soul of me!
 O harsh surrounding cloud that will not free my soul.

10

In the dooryard fronting an old farm-house near the white-wash'd palings, Stands the lilac-bush tall-growing with heart-shaped leaves of rich green,
 With many a pointed blossom rising delicate, with the perfume strong I love,
 With every leaf a miracle—and from this bush in the dooryard,
 With delicate-color'd blossoms and heart-shaped leaves of rich green,
 A sprig with its flower I break.

15

In the swamp in secluded recesses,
 A shy and hidden bird is warbling a song.
 Solitary the thrush,
 The hermit withdrawn to himself, avoiding the settlements,
 Sings by himself a song.

20

Song of the bleeding throat,
 Death's outlet song of life, (for well dear brother I know,
 If thou wast not granted to sing thou would'st surely die.)

25

Over the breast of the spring, the land, amid cities, Amid lanes and through old woods, where lately the violets peep'd from the ground, spotting the gray debris,
 Amid the grass in the fields each side of the lanes, passing the endless grass,
 Passing the yellow-spear'd wheat, every grain from its shroud in the dark-brown fields uprisen,
 Passing the apple-tree blows of white and pink in the orchards,
 Carrying a corpse to where it shall rest in the grave,
 Night and day journeys a coffin.

30

6

Coffin that passes through lanes and streets,
 Through day and night with the great cloud darkening the land,
 With the pomp of the inloop'd flags with the cities draped in black, 35
 With the show of the States themselves as of crape-veil'd women standing,
 With processions long and winding and the flambeaus of the night,
 With the countless torches lit, with the silent sea of faces and the unbared heads,
 With the waiting depot, the arriving coffin, and the sombre faces,
 With dirges through the night, with the thousand voices rising strong and 40 solemn,
 With all the mournful voices of the dirges pour'd around the coffin,
 The dim-lit churches and the shuddering organs—where amid these you journey,
 With the tolling tolling bells' perpetual clang,
 Here, coffin that slowly passes,
 I give you my sprig of lilac. 45

7

(Nor for you, for one alone,
 Blossoms and branches green to coffins all I bring,
 For fresh as the morning, thus would I chant a song for you O sane and sacred 5 death.

All over bouquets of roses,
 O death, I cover you over with roses and early lilies, 50
 But mostly and now the lilac that blooms the first,
 Copious I break, I break the sprigs from the bushes,
 With loaded arms I come, pouring for you,
 For you and the coffins all of you O death.)

8

O western orb sailing the heaven, 55
 Now I know what you must have meant as a month since I walk'd,
 As I walk'd in silence the transparent shadowy night,
 As I saw you had something to tell as you bent to me night after night,
 As you droop'd from the sky low down as if to my side, (while the other stars all look'd on,) 60
 As we wander'd together the solemn night, (for something I know not what kept me from sleep,) 60
 As the night advanced, and I saw on the rim of the west how full you were of woe,
 As I stood on the rising ground in the breeze in the cool transparent night,
 As I watch'd where you pass'd and was lost in the netherward black of the night,
 As my soul in its trouble dissatisfied sank, as where you sad orb,
 Concluded, dropt in the night, and was gone. 65

9

Sing on there in the swamp,
 O singer bashful and tender, I hear your notes, I hear your call,
 I hear, I come presently, I understand you,
 But a moment I linger, for the lustrous star has detain'd me,
 The star my departing comrade holds and detains me. 70

10

O how shall I warble myself for the dead one there I loved?
 And how shall I deck my song for the large sweet soul that has gone?
 And what shall my perfume be for the grave of him I love?

Sea-winds blown from east and west, Blown from the Eastern sea and blown from the Western sea, till there on the prairies meeting, 75
 These and with these and the breath of my chant,
 I'll perfume the grave of him I love.

11

O what shall I hang on the chamber walls?
 And what shall the pictures be that I hang on the walls,
 To adorn the burial-house of him I love? 80

Pictures of growing spring and farms and homes,
 With the Fourth-month eve at sundown, and the gray smoke lucid and bright,
 With floods of the yellow gold of the gorgeous, indolent, sinking sun, burning,
 expanding the air,
 With the fresh sweet herbage under foot, and the pale green leaves of the trees prolific,
 In the distance the flowing glaze, the breast of the river, with a wind-dapple
 here and there, 85
 With ranging hills on the banks, with many a line against the sky, and shadows,
 And the city at hand with dwellings so dense, and stacks of chimneys,
 And all the scenes of life and the workshops, and the workmen homeward returning.

12

Lo, body and soul—this land,
 My own Manhattan with spires, and the sparkling and hurrying tides, and the ships, 90
 The varied and ample land, the South and the North in the light, Ohio's shores and flashing Missouri,
 And ever the far-spreading prairies cover'd with grass and corn.

Lo, the most excellent sun so calm and haughty,
 The violet and purple morn with just-felt breezes,
 The gentle soft-born measureless light, 95
 The miracle spreading bathing all, the fulfill'd noon,
 The coming eve delicious, the welcome night and the stars,
 Over my cities shining all, enveloping man and land.

13

Sing on, sing on you gray-brown bird,
 Sing from the swamps, the recesses, pour your chant from the bushes, 100
 Limitless out of the dusk, out of the cedars and pines.

Sing on dearest brother, warble your reedy song,
 Loud human song, with voice of uttermost woe.

O liquid and free and tender!
 O wild and loose to my soul—O wondrous singer!
 You only I hear—yet the star holds me, (but will soon depart,) 105
 Yet the lilac with mastering odor holds me.

14

Now while I sat in the day and look'd forth,
 In the close of the day with its light and the fields of spring, and the farmers preparing their crops,
 In the large unconscious scenery of my land with its lakes and forests, 110
 In the heavenly aerial beauty, (after the pertub'd winds and the storms,) Under the arching heavens of the afternoon swift passing, and the voices of children and women,
 The many-moving sea-tides, and I saw the ships how they sail'd,
 And the summer approaching with richness, and the fields all busy with labor,
 And the infinite separate houses, how they all went on, each with its meals and minutia of daily usages, 115
 And the streets how their throbblings throb'd, and the cities pent—lo, then and
 there,
 Falling upon them all and among them all, enveloping me with the rest,
 Appear'd the cloud, appear'd the long black trail,
 And I knew death, its thought, and the sacred knowledge of death.

Then with the knowledge of death as walking one side of me, 120
 And the thought of death close-walking the other side of me,
 And I in the middle as with companions, and as holding the hands of companions,
 I fled forth to the hiding receiving night that talks not,
 Down to the shores of the water, the path by the swamp in the dimness,
 To the solemn shadowy cedars and ghostly pines so still. 125

And the singer so shy to the rest receiv'd me,
 The gray-brown bird I know receiv'd us comrades three,
 And he sang the carol of death, and a verse for him I love.

From deep secluded recesses,
 From the fragrant cedars and the ghostly pines so still, 130
 Came the carol of the bird.

And the charm of the carol rapt me,
 As I held as if by their hands my comrades in the night,
 And the voice of my spirit tallied the song of the bird.

Come lovely and soothing death, 135
Undulate round the world, serenely arriving, arriving,
In the day, in the night, to all, to each,
Sooner or later delicate death.

Prais'd be the fathomless universe,
For life and joy, and for objects and knowledge curious, 140
And for love, sweet love—but praise! praise! praise!
For the sure-enwinding arms of cool-enfolding death.

Dark mother always gliding near with soft feet,
Have none chanted for thee a chant of fullest welcome?

*Then I chant it for thee, I glorify thee above all,
I bring thee a song that when thou must indeed come, come unfalteringly.* 145

*Approach strong deliveress,
When it is so, when thou hast taken them I joyously sing the dead,
Lost in the loving floating ocean of thee,
Laved in the flood of thy bliss O death.* 150

*From me to thee glad serenades,
Dances for thee I propose saluting thee, adornments and feastings for thee,
And the sights of the open landscape and the high-spread sky are fitting,
And life and the fields, and the huge and thoughtful night.*

*The night in silence under many a star,
The ocean shore and the husky whispering wave whose voice I know,
And the soul turning to thee O vast and well-veil'd death,
And the body gratefully nestling close to thee.* 155

*Over the tree-tops I float thee a song,
Over the rising and sinking waves, over the myriad fields and the prairies wide, 160
Over the dense-pack'd cities all and the teeming wharves and ways,
I float this carol with joy, with joy to thee O death.*

15

*To the tally of my soul,
Loud and strong kept up the gray-brown bird,
With pure deliberate notes spreading filling the night.* 165

*Loud in the pines and cedars dim,
Clear in the freshness moist and the swamp-perfume,
And I with my comrades there in the night.*

*While my sight that was bound in my eyes unclosed,
As to long panoramas of visions.* 170

*And I saw askant the armies,
I saw as in noiseless dreams hundreds of battle-flags,
Borne through the smoke of the battles and pierc'd with missiles I saw them,
And carried hither and yon through the smoke, and torn and bloody,
And at last but a few shreds left on the staffs, (and all in silence,) 175
And the staffs all splinter'd and broken.*

*I saw battle-corpses, myriads of them,
And the white skeletons of young men, I saw them,
I saw the debris and debris of all the slain soldiers of the war,*

*But I saw they were not as was thought, 180
They themselves were fully at rest, they suffer'd not,
The living remain'd and suffer'd, the mother suffer'd,
And the wife and the child and the musing comrade suffer'd,
And the armies that remain'd suffer'd.*

16

*Passing the visions, passing the night, 185
Passing, unloosing the hold of my comrades' hands,*

Passing the song of the hermit bird and the tallying song of my soul,
 Victorious song, death's outlet song, yet varying ever-altering song,
 As low and wailing, yet clear the notes, rising and falling, flooding the night.
 Sadly sinking and fainting, as warning and warning, and yet again bursting with joy, 190

Covering the earth and filling the spread of the heaven,
 As that powerful psalm in the night I heard from recesses,
 Passing, I leave thee lilac with heart-shaped leaves,
 I leave thee there in the door-yard, blooming, returning with spring.

I cease from my song for thee, 195
 From my gaze on thee in the west, fronting the west, communing with thee,
 O comrade lustrous with silver face in the night.

Yet each to keep and all, retrievements out of the night,
 The song, the wondrous chant of the gray-brown bird,
 And the tallying chant, the echo arous'd in my soul, 200
 With the lustrous and drooping star with the countenance full of woe,
 With the holders holding my hand nearing the call of the bird,
 Comrades mine and I in the midst, and their memory ever to keep, for the dead
 I loved so well,
 For the sweetest, wisest soul of all my days and lands—and this for his dear sake.
 Lilac and star and bird twined with the chant of my soul, 205
 There in the fragrant pines and the cedars dusk and dim.

O CAPTAIN! MY CAPTAIN!

O Captain! my Captain! our fearful trip is done,
 The ship has weather'd every rack, the prizè we sought is won,
 The port is near, the bells I hear, the people all exulting,
 While follow eyes the steady keel, the vessel grim and daring;
 But O heart! heart! heart! 5
 O the bleeding drops of red,
 Where on the deck my Captain lies,
 Fallen cold and dead.

O Captain! my Captain! rise up and hear the bells;
 Rise up—for you the flag is flung—for you the bugle trills, 10
 For you bouquets and ribbon'd wreaths—for you the shores a-crowding
 For you they call, the swaying mass, their eager faces turning;
 Here Captain! dear father!
 The arm beneath your head!
 It is some dream that on the deck,
 You've fallen cold and dead. 15

My Captain does not answer, his lips are pale and still,
 My father does not feel my arm, he has no pulse nor will,
 The ship is anchor'd safe and sound, its voyage closed and done,
 From fearful trip the victor ship comes in with object won: 20
 Exult O shores, and ring O bells!
 But I with mournful tread,
 Walk the deck my Captain lies,
 Fallen cold and dead.

THERE WAS A CHILD WENT FORTH

There was a child went forth every day,
 And the first object he look'd upon, that object he became,
 And that object became part of him for the day or a certain part of the day,
 Or for many years or stretching cycles of years.

The early lilacs became part of this child, 5
 And grass and white and red morning-glories, and white and red clover, and the song of the phoebe-bird,
 And the Third-month lambs and the sow's pink-faint litter, and the mare's foal and the cow's calf,
 And the noisy brood of the barnyard or by the mire of the pond-side,
 And the fish suspending themselves so curiously below there, and the beautiful curious liquid,
 And the water-plants with their graceful flat heads, all became part of him. 10

The field-sprouts of Fourth-month and Fifth-month became part of him, Winter-grain sprouts and those of the light-yellow corn, and the esculent roots of the garden,
 And the apple-trees cover'd with blossoms and the fruit afterward, and wood-berries, and the commonest weeds by the road,
 And the old drunkard staggering home from the outhouse of the tavern whence
 he had lately risen, 15
 And the schoolmistress that pass'd on her way to the school,
 And the friendly boys that pass'd, and the quarrelsome boys,
 And the tidy and fresh-cheek'd girls, and the barefoot negro boy and girl,
 And all the changes of city and country wherever he went.

His own parents, he that had father'd him and she that had conceiv'd him in her womb and birth'd him, 20
 They gave this child more of themselves than that,
 They gave him afterward every day, they became part of him.

The mother at home quietly placing the dishes on the supper-table,
 The mother with mild words, clean her cap and gown, a wholesome odor falling off her person and clothes as she walks by,
 The father, strong, self-sufficient, manly, mean, anger'd, unjust, 25
 The blow, the quick loud word, the tight bargain, the crafty lure,
 The family usages, the language, the company, the furniture, the yearning and swelling heart,
 Affection that will not be gainsay'd, the sense of what is real, the thought if after all it should prove unreal,
 The doubts of day-time and the doubts of night-time, the curious whether and how,
 Whether that which appears so is so, or is it all flashes and specks? 30
 Men and women crowding fast in the streets, if they are not flashes and specks what are they?
 The streets themselves and the façades of houses, and goods in the windows,
 Vehicles, teams, the heavy-plank'd wharves, the huge crossing at the ferries,
 The village on the highland seen from afar at sunset, the river between,
 Shadows, aureola and mist, the light falling on roofs and gables of white or brown two miles off, 35

The schooner near by sleepily dropping down the tide, the little boat slack-tow'd astern,
 The hurrying tumbling waves, quick-broken crests, slapping,
 The strata of color'd clouds, the long bar of maroon-tint away solitary by itself,
 the spread of purity it lies motionless in,
 The horizon's edge, the flying sea-crow, the fragrance of salt marsh and shore mud,
 These became part of that child who went forth every day, and who now goes,
 and will always go forth every day.

THE SINGER IN THE PRISON

1

O sight of pity, shame and dole!
O fearful thought—a convict soul.

Rang the refrain along the hall, the prison,
 Rose to the roof, the vaults of heaven above,
 Pouring in floods of melody in tones so pensive sweet and strong the like whereof was never heard,
 Reaching the far-off sentry and the armed guards, who ceas'd their pacing,
 Making the hearer's pulses stop for ecstasy and awe.

5

The sun was low in the west one winter day,
 When down a narrow aisle amid the thieves and outlaws of the land,
 (There by the hundreds seated, sear-faced murderers, wily counterfeiters, Gather'd to Sunday church in prison walls, the keepers round, Plenteous, well-armed, watching with vigilant eyes,) 10
 Calmly a lady walk'd holding a little innocent child by either hand,
 Whom seating on their stools beside her on the platform,
 She, first preluding with the instrument a low and musical prelude, 15
 In voice surpassing all, sang forth a quaint old hymn.

A soul confined by bars and bands,
 Cries, help! O help! and wrings her hands,
 Blinded her eyes, bleeding her breast,
 Nor pardon finds, nor balm of rest. 20

Ceaseless she paces to and fro,
 O heart-sick days! O nights of woe!
 Nor hand of friend, nor loving face,
 Nor favor comes, nor word of grace.

It was not I that sinn'd the sin, 25
 The ruthless body dragg'd me in;
 Though long I strove courageously,
 The body was too much for me.

Dear prison'd soul bear up a space,
 For soon or late the certain grace; 30
 To set thee free and bear thee home,
 The heavenly pardoner death shall come.

*Convict no more, nor shame, nor dole!
Depart—a God-enfranchis'd soul!*

3

The singer ceas'd, 35
One glance swept from her clear calm eyes o'er all those upturn'd faces, Strange sea of prison faces, a thousand varied, crafty, brutal, seam'd and beauteous faces,
Then rising, passing back along the narrow aisle between them,
While her gown touch'd them rustling in the silence,
She vanish'd with her children in the dusk. 40

While upon all, convicts and armed keepers ere they stirr'd, (Convict forgetting prison, keeper his loaded pistol,)
A hush and pause fell down a wondrous minute,
With deep half-stifled sobs and sound of bad men bow'd and moved to weeping,
And youth's convulsive breathings, memories of home, 45
The mother's voice in lullaby, the sister's care, the happy childhood,
The long-pent spirit rous'd to reminiscence;
A wondrous minute then—but after in the solitary night, to many, many there,
Years after, even in the hour of death, the sad refrain, the tune, the voice, the
 words,
Resumed, the large calm lady walks the narrow aisle, 50
The wailing melody again, the singer in the prison sings,

*O sight of pity, shame and dole!
O fearful thought—a convict soul.*

A NOISELESS PATIENT SPIDER

A noiseless patient spider,
I mark'd where on a little promontory it stood isolated,
Mark'd how to explore the vacant vast surrounding,
It launch'd forth filament, filament, filament, out of itself,
Ever unreeling them, ever tirelessly speeding them. 5

And you O my soul where you stand,
Surrounded, detached, in measureless oceans of space,
Ceaselessly musing, venturing, throwing, seeking the spheres to connect them,
Till the bridge you will need be form'd, till the ductile anchor hold,
Till the gossamer thread you fling catch somewhere O my soul. 10

NIGHT ON THE PRAIRIES

Night on the prairies,
The supper is over, the fire on the ground burns low,
The wearied emigrants sleep, wrapt in their blankets;
I walk by myself—I stand and look at the stars, which I think now I never realized before.

Now I absorb immortality and peace, 5
I admire death and test propositions.

How plenteous! how spiritual; how resumé!
The same old man and soul—the same old aspirations, and the same content.

I was thinking the day most splendid till I saw what the not-day exhibited,
I was thinking this globe enough till there sprang out so noiseless around me myriads of other globes. 10

Now while the great thoughts of space and eternity fill me I will measure myself
 by them,
And now touch'd with the lives of other globes arrived as far along as those of the earth,
Or waiting to arrive, or pass'd on farther than those of the earth,
I henceforth no more ignore them than I ignore my own life,
Or the lives of the earth arrived as far as mine, or waiting to arrive. 15

O I see now that life cannot exhibit all to me, as the day cannot,
I see that I am to wait for what will be exhibited by death.

WITH HUSKY-HAUGHTY LIPS, O SEA!

With husky-haughty lips, O sea!
Where day and night I wend thy surf-beat shore,
Imaging to my sense thy varied strange suggestions,
(I see and plainly list thy talk and conference here)
Thy troops of white-maned racers racing to the goal, 5
Thy ample, smiling face, dash'd with the sparkling dimples of the sun,
Thy brooding scowl and murk—thy unloos'd hurricanes,
Thy unsubduedness, caprices, wilfulness;
Great as thou art above the rest, thy many tears—a lack from all eternity in thy content, (Naught but the greatest struggles, wrongs, defeats, could make thee greatest —no less could make thee,) 10
Thy lonely state—something thou ever seek'st and seek'st, yet never gain'st, Surely some right withheld—some voice, in huge monotonous rage, of freedom-lover pent,
Some vast heart, like a planet's, chain'd and chafing in those breakers,
By lengthen'd swell, and spasm, and panting breath,
And rhythmic rasping of thy sands and waves, 15
And serpent hiss, and savage peals of laughter,
And undertones of distant lion roar,
(Sounding, appealing to the sky's deaf ear—but now, rapport for once,
A phantom in the night thy confidant for once,)
The first and last confession of the globe, 20
Outsurging, muttering from thy soul's abyssms,
The tale of cosmic elemental passion,
Thou tellest to a kindred soul.

GOOD-BYE MY FANCY!

Good-bye my Fancy!
Farewell dear mate, dear love!
I'm going away, I know not where,

Or to what fortune, or whether I may ever see you again,
So Good-bye my Fancy.

5

Now for my last—let me look back a moment;
The slower fainter ticking of the clock is in me,
Exit, nightfall, and soon the heart-thud stopping.
Long have we lived, joy'd, caress'd together; Delightful!—now separation—Good-by my Fancy.

10

Yet let me not be too hasty,
Long indeed have we lived, slept, filter'd, become really blended into one;
Then if we die we die together, (yes, we'll remain one.)
If we go anywhere we'll go together to meet what happens,
May-be we'll be better off and blither, and learn something,
May-be it is yourself now really ushering me to the true songs (who knows?)
May-be it is you the mortal knob really undoing, turning—so now finally,
Good-bye—and hail! my Fancy.

15

A BACKWARD GLANCE O'ER TRAVELED ROADS

Perhaps the best of songs heard, or of any and all true love, or life's fairest episodes, or sailors', soldiers' trying scenes on land or sea, is the résumé of them, or any of them, long afterwards, looking at the actualities away back past, with all their practical excitations gone. How the soul loves to float amid such reminiscences!

So here I sit gossiping in the early candlelight of old age—I and my book—casting backward glances over our travel'd road. After completing, as it were, the journey—(a varied jaunt of years, with many halts and gaps and intervals—or some lengthen'd ship-voyage, wherein more than once the last hour had apparently arrived, and we seem'd certainly going down—yet reaching port in a sufficient way through all discomfitures at last)—After completing my poems, I am curious to review them in the light of their own (at the time unconscious, or mostly unconscious) intentions, with certain unfoldings of the thirty years they seek to embody. These lines, therefore, will probably blend the web of first purposes and speculations, with the warp of that experience afterwards, always bringing strange developments.

Result of seven or eight stages and struggles extending through nearly thirty years, (as I nigh my three-score-and-ten I live largely on memory,) I look upon Leaves of Grass, now finish'd to the end of its opportunities and powers, as my definite carte visite to the coming generations of the New World,¹ if I may assume to say so. That I have not gained the acceptance of my own time, but have fallen back on fond dreams of the future—anticipations—(“still lives the song, though Regnar dies”)—That from a worldly and business point of view Leaves of Grass has been worse than a failure—that public criticism on the book and myself as author of it yet shows mark'd anger and contempt more than anything else—(“I find a solid line of enemies to you everywhere,”—letter from W. S. K., Boston, May 28, 1884)—And that solely for publishing it I have been the object of two or three pretty serious special official buffetings—is all probably no more than I ought to have expected. I had my choice when I commenc'd. I bid neither for soft eulogies, big money returns, nor the approbation of existing schools and conventions. As fulfill'd or partially fulfill'd, the best comfort of the whole business (after a small band of the dearest friends and upholders ever vouchsafed to man or cause—doubtless all the more faithful and uncompromising—this little phalanx!—for being so few) is that, unstopp'd and unwarp'd by any influence outside the soul within me, I have had my say entirely my own way, and put it un-¹⁰erringly on record—the value thereof to be decided by time.

In calculating that decision, William O'Connor and Dr. Bucke are far more peremptory than I am. Behind all else that can be said, I consider Leaves of Grass and its theory experimental—as, in the deepest sense, I consider our American republic itself to be, with its theory. (I think I have at least ²⁰enough philosophy not to be too absolutely certain of anything, or any results.) In the second place, the volume is a sortie—whether to prove triumphant, and conquer its field of aim and escape and construction, nothing less than a hundred years from now can fully answer. I consider the point that I have positively gain'd a hearing, to far more than make up for ³⁰any and all other lacks and withholdings. Essentially, that was from the first, and has remain'd throughout, the main object. Now it seems to be achiev'd, I am certainly contented to waive any otherwise momentous drawbacks, as of little account. Candidly and dispassionately reviewing all my intentions, I feel that they were credit-⁴⁰able—and I accept the result, whatever it may be.

After continued personal ambition and effort, as a young fellow, to enter with the rest into competition for the usual rewards, business, political, literary, &c.—to take part in the great mêlée, both for victory's prize itself and to do some good—After years of those aims and pursuits, I found myself remaining possess'd, at the age of ⁵⁰thirty-one to thirty-three, with a special desire and conviction. Or rather, to be quite exact, a desire that had been flitting through my previous life, or hovering on the flanks, mostly indefinite hitherto, had steadily advanced to the front, defined itself, and finally dominated everything else. This was a feeling or ambition to articulate and faithfully express in literary or poetic form, and uncompromisingly, my own physical, emotional, moral, intellectual, and æsthetic Personality, in the midst of, and tallying, the momentous spirit and facts of its immediate days, and of current America—and to exploit that Personality, identified with place and date, in a far more candid and comprehensive sense than any hitherto poem or book.

Perhaps this is in brief, or suggests, all I have sought to do. Given the Nineteenth Century, with the United States, and what they furnish as area and points of view, Leaves of Grass is, or seeks to be, simply a faithful and doubtless self-will'd record. In the midst of all, it gives one man's—the author's—identity, ardors, observations, faiths, and thoughts, color'd hardly at all with any decided coloring from other faiths or other identities. Plenty of songs had been sung—beautiful, matchless songs—adjusted to other lands than these—another spirit and stage of evolution; but I would sing, and leave out or put in, quite solely with reference to America and to-day. Modern science and democracy seem'd to be throwing out their challenge to poetry to put them in its statements in contradistinction to the songs and myths of he past. As I see it now (perhaps too late), I have unwittingly taken up that challenge and made an attempt at such statements—which I certainly would not assume to do now, knowing more clearly what it means.

For grounds for Leaves of Grass, as a poem, I abandon'd the conventional themes, which do not appear in it: none of the stock ornamentation, or choice plots of love or war, or high, exceptional personages of Old-World song; nothing, as I may say, for beauty's sake—no legend, or myth, or romance, nor euphemism, nor rhyme.

But the broadest average of humanity and its identities in the now ripening Nineteenth Century, and especially in each of their countless examples and practical occupations in the United States to-day.

One main contrast of the ideas behind every page of my verses, compared with establish'd poems, is their different relative attitude towards God,¹⁰ towards the objective universe, and still more (by reflection, confession, assumption, etc.) the quite changed attitude of the ego, the one chanting or talking, towards himself and towards his fellow-humanity. It is certainly time for America, above all, to begin this readjustment in the scope and basic point of view of verse; for everything else has changed. As I write,²⁰ I see in an article on Wordsworth, in one of the current English magazines, the lines, "A few weeks ago an eminent French critic said that, owing to the special tendency to science and to its all-devouring force, poetry would cease to be read in fifty years." But I anticipate the very contrary. Only a firmer, vastly broader, new area begins to exist—nay, is already form'd³⁰—to which the poetic genius must emigrate. Whatever may have been the case in years gone by, the true use for the imaginative faculty of modern times is to give ultimate vivification to facts, to science, and to common lives, endowing them with glows and glories and final illustriousness which belong to every real thing, and to real things only. Without that ultimate⁴⁰ vivification—which the poet or other artist alone can give—reality would seem incomplete, and science, democracy, and life itself, finally in vain.

Few appreciate the moral revolutions, our age, which have been profounder far than the material or inventive or war-produced ones. The Nineteenth Century, now well towards its close (and ripening into fruit the⁵⁰ seeds of the two preceding centuries¹)

—the uprisings of national masses and shiftings of boundary-lines—the historical and other prominent facts of the United States—the war of attempted Secession—the stormy rush and haste of nebulous forces—never can future years witness more excitement and din of action—never complete change of army front along the whole line, the whole civilized world. For all these new and evolutionary facts, meanings, purposes, new poetic messages, new forms and expressions, are inevitable.

My Book and I—what a period we have presumed to span! those thirty years from 1850 to '80—and America in them! Proud, proud indeed may we be, if we have cull'd enough of that period in its own spirit to worthily waft a few live breaths of it to the future!

Let me not dare, here or anywhere, for my own purposes, or any purposes, to attempt the definition of Poetry, nor answer the question what it is. Like Religion, Love, Nature, while those terms are indispensable, and we all give a sufficiently accurate meaning to them, in my opinion no definition that has ever been made sufficiently encloses the name Poetry; nor can any rule or convention ever so absolutely obtain but some great exception may arise and disregard and overturn it.

Also it must be carefully remember'd that first-class literature does not shine by any luminosity of its own; nor do its poems. They grow of circumstances, and are evolutionary.⁴⁰ The actual living light is always curiously from elsewhere—follows unaccountable sources, and is lunar and relative at the best. There are, I know, certain controlling themes that seem endlessly appropriated to the poets—as war, in the past—in the Bible, religious rapture and adoration—always betan age in English history, the age of Francis Bacon and Shakspeare. Indeed, when we pursue it, what growth or advent is there that does not date back, back, until lost—perhaps its most tantalizing clues lost—in the receded horizons of the past?—[Whitman's note.]

¹The ferment and germination even of the United States to-day, dating back to, and in my opinion mainly founded on, the Eliza-

love, beauty, some fine plot, or pensive or other emotion. But, strange as it may sound at first, I will say there is something striking far deeper and towering far higher than those themes for the best elements of modern song.

Just as all the old imaginative works rest, after their kind, on long trains of presuppositions, often entirely unmentioned'd by themselves, yet supplying the most important bases of them, and without which they could have had no reason for being, so Leaves of Grass, before a line was written, presupposed something different from any other, and, as it stands, is the result of such presupposition. I should say, indeed, it were useless to attempt reading the book without first carefully tallying that preparatory background and quality in the mind. Think of the United States to-day—the facts of these thirty-eight or forty empires solder'd in one—sixty or seventy millions of equals, with their lives, their passions, their future—these incalculable, modern, American, seething multitudes around us, of which we are inseparable parts! Think, in comparison, of the petty environage and limited area of the poets of past or present Europe, no matter how great their genius. Think of the absence and ignorance in all cases hitherto, of the multitudinousness, vitality, and the unprecedented stimulants of to-day and here. It almost seems as if a poetry with cosmic and dynamic features of magnitude and limitlessness suitable to the human soul, were never possible before. It is certain that a poetry of absolute faith and equality for the use of the democratic masses never was.

In estimating first-class song, a sufficient Nationality, or, on the other hand, what may be call'd the negative and lack of it (as in Goethe's case, it sometimes seems to me), is often, if not always, the first element. One needs only a little penetration to see, at more or less removes, the material facts of their country and radius, with the coloring of the moods of humanity at the time, and its gloomy or hopeful prospects, behind all poets and each poet, and forming their birthmarks. I know very well that my Leaves could not possibly have emerged or been fashion'd or completed, from any other era than the latter half of the Nineteenth Century, nor any other land than democratic America, and from the absolute triumph of the National Union arms.

And whether my friends claim it for me or not, I know well enough, too, that in respect to pictorial talent, dramatic situations, and especially in verbal melody and all the conventional technique of poetry, not only the divine works that to-day stand ahead in the world's reading, but dozens more, transcend (some of them immeasurably transcend) all I have done, or could do. But it seem'd to me, as the objects in Nature, the themes of æstheticism, and all special exploitations of the mind and soul, involve not only their own inherent quality, but the quality, just as inherent and important, of their point of view,¹ the time had come to reflect all themes and things, old and new, in the lights thrown on them by the advent of America and democracy—to chant those themes through the utterance of one, not only the grateful and reverent legatee of the past, but the born child of the New World—to illustrate all through the genesis and ensemble of to-day; and that such illustration and ensemble are the chief demands of America's prospective imaginative literature. Not to carry out, in approved style, some choice plot of fortune or misfortune, or fancy, or fine thoughts, or incidents, or courtesies—all of which has been done overwhelmingly and well, probably never to be excell'd—but that while in such æsthetic presentation of objects, passions, plots, thoughts, &c., our lands and days do not want, and probably will never have, anything better than they already possess from the bequests of the past, it still remains to be said that there is even towards all those a subjective and contemporary point of view appropriate to ourselves alone, and to our new genius and environments, different from anything hitherto; and that such conception of current or gone-by life and art is for us the only means of their assimilation consistent with the Western World.

Indeed, and anyhow, to put it specifically, has not the time arrived when (if it must be plainly said, for democratic America's sake, if for no other) there must imperatively come a readjustment of the whole theory and nature of Poetry? The question is important, and I may turn the argument over and repeat it: Does not the best thought of our day and Republic conceive of a birth and spirit of song superior to anything past or present? To the effectual and moral consolidation of our lands (already, as materially establish'd the greatest factors in known history, and far, far greater through what they prelude and necessitate, and are to be in future)—to conform with and build on the concrete realities and theories of the universe furnish'd by science, and henceforth the only irrefragable basis for anything, were included—to root both influences in the emotional and imaginative action of the modern time, and dominate all that precedes or opposes them—is not either a radical advance and step forward, or a new verterber of the best song indispensable?

The New World receives with joy the poems of the antique, with European feudalism's rich fund of epics, plays, ballads—seeks not in the least to deaden or displace those voices from our ear and area—holds them indeed as indispensable studies, influences, records, comparisons. But though the dawn-dazzle of the sun of literature is in those poems for us of to-day—though perhaps the best parts of current character in nations, social groups, or any man's or woman's individuality, Old World or New, are from them—and though if I were ask'd to name the most precious bequest to current American civilization from all the hitherto ages, I am not sure but I would name those old and less old songs ferried hither from East and West—some serious words and debits remain; some acrid considerations demand a hearing. Of the great poems receiv'd from abroad and from the 10 ages, and to-day enveloping and penetrating America, is there one that is consistent with these United States, or essentially applicable to them as they are and are to be? Is there one whose underlying basis is not a denial and insult to democracy? What a comment it forms, anyhow, on this era of literary fulfillment, with the splendid day-rise of science and resuscitation of history, 20 that our chief religious and poetical works are not our own, nor adapted to our light, but have been furnish'd by far-back ages out of their arriere and darkness, or, at most, twilight dimness! What is there in those works that so imperiously and scornfully dominates all our advanced civilization and culture?

Even Shakspeare, who so suffuses current letters and art (which indeed have in most degrees grown out of him), belongs essentially to the buried past. Only he holds the proud distinction for certain important phases of that past, of being the loftiest of the singers life has yet given voice to. All, however, relate to and rest upon conditions, standards, politics, sociologies, ranges of belief, that have been quite eliminated from the Eastern hemisphere, and never existed at all in the Western. As authoritative types of song they belong in America just about as much as the persons and institutes they depict. True, it may be said, the emotional, moral, and æsthetic natures of humanity have not radically changed—that in these the old poems apply to our times and all times, 50 irrespective of date; and that they are of incalculable value as pictures of the past. I willingly make those admissions and to their fullest extent; then advance the points herewith as of serious, even paramount importance.

I have indeed put on record elsewhere my reverence and eulogy for those never-to-be-excell'd poetic bequests, and their indescribable preciousness as heirlooms for America. Another and separate point must now be candidly stated. If I had not stood before those poems with uncovered head, fully aware of their colossal grandeur and beauty of form and spirit, I could not have written Leaves of Grass. My verdict and conclusions as illustrated in its pages are arrived at through the temper and inculcation of the old works as much as through anything else. As America fully and fairly construed is the legitimate result and evolutionary outcome of the past, so I would dare to claim for my verse. Without stopping to qualify the avowal, the Old World has had the poems of myths, fictions, feudalism, conquest, caste, dynastic wars, and splendid exceptional characters and affairs, which have been great; but the New World needs the poems of realities and science and of the democratic average and basic equality, which shall be greater. In the center of all, and object of all, stands the Human Being, towards whose heroic and spiritual evolution poems and everything directly or indirectly tend, Old World or New.

Continuing the subject, my friends have more than once suggested—or maybe the garrulity of advancing age is possessing me—some further embryonic facts of Leaves of Grass, and especially how I enter'd upon them. Dr. Bucke has, in his volume, already fully and fairly described the preparation of my poetic field, with the particular and general plowing, planting, seeding, and occupation of the ground, till everything was fertilized, rooted, and ready to start its own way for good or bad. Not till after this, did I attempt any serious acquaintance with poetic literature. Along in my sixteenth year I had become the pos-

essor of a stout, well-cramm'd one thousand page octavo volume (I have it yet), containing Walter Scott's poetry entire—an inexhaustible mine and treasury of poetic forage (especially the endless forests and jungles of notes)—has been so to me for fifty years, and remains so to this day.¹

Later, at intervals, summers and falls, I used to go off, sometimes for a week at a stretch, down in the country, or to Long Island's seashores—there in the presence of outdoor influences, I went over thoroughly the Old and New Testaments, and absorb'd (probably to better advantage for me than in any library or indoor room—it makes such difference where you read), Shakespeare, Ossian, the best translated versions I could get of Homer, Eschylus, Sophocles, the old German Nibelungen, the ancient Hindoo poems, and one or two other masterpieces, Dante's among them. As it happen'd, I read the latter mostly in an old wood. The Iliad (Buckley's prose version) I read first thoroughly on the peninsula of Orient, northeast end of Long Island, in a shelter'd hollow of rocks and sand, with the sea on each side. (I have wonder'd since why I was not overwhelm'd by those mighty masters. Likely because I read them, as described, in the full presence of Nature, under the sun, with the far-spreading landscape and vistas, or the sea rolling in.)

Towards the last I had among much else looked over Edgar Poe's poems—of which I was not an admirer, though I always saw that beyond their limited range of melody (like perpetual chimes of music bells, ringing from lower b flat up to g) they were melodious expressions, and perhaps never excell'd ones, of certain pronounce'd phases of human morbidity. (The Poetic area is very spacious—has room for all—has so many mansions!) But I was repaid in Poe's prose by the idea that (at any rate for our occasions, our day) there can be no such thing as a long poem. The same thought had been haunting my mind before, but Poe's argument, though short, work'd the sum and proved it to me.

Lockhart's 1833 (or '34) edition with Scott's latest and copious revisions and annotations. (All the poems were thoroughly read by me, but the ballads of the Border Minstrelsy over and over again.)—[Whitman's note.]

Another point had an early settlement, clearing the ground greatly. I saw, from the time my enterprise and questionings positively shaped themselves (how best can I express my own distinctive era and surroundings, America, Democracy?) that the trunk and centre whence the answer was to radiate, and to which all should return from straying however far a distance, must be an identical body and soul, a personality—which personality, after many considerations and ponderings I deliberately settled should be myself—indeed could not be any other. I also felt strongly (whether I have shown it or not) that to the true and full estimate of the Present both the Past and the Future are main considerations.

These, however, and much more might have gone on and come to naught (almost positively would have come to naught), if a sudden, vast, terrible, direct and indirect stimulus for new and national declamatory expression had not been given to me. It is certain, I say, that, although I had made a start before, only from the occurrence of the Secession War, and what it show'd me as by flashes of lightning, with the emotional depths it sounded and arous'd (of course, I don't mean in my own heart only, I saw it just as plainly in others, in millions)—that only from the strong flare and provocation of that war's sights and scenes the final reasons-for-being of an autochthonic and passionate song definitely came forth.

I went down to the war fields in Virginia (end of 1862), lived thence-forward in camp—saw great battles and the days and nights afterward—partook of all the fluctuations, gloom, despair, hopes again arous'd, courage evoked — death readily risk'd — the cause, too—along and filling those agonistic and lurid following years, 1863-'64-'65—the real parturition years (more than 1776-'83) of this henceforth homogeneous Union. Without those three or four years and the experiences they gave, Leaves of Grass would not now be existing.

But I set out with the intention also of indicating or hinting some point-characteristics which I since see (though I did not then, at least not definitely) were bases and object-urgings towards those Leaves from the first. The word I myself put primarily for the description of them as they stand at last, is the word Suggestiveness. I round and finish little, if anything; and could not, consistently with my scheme. The reader will always have his or her part to do, just as much as I have had mine. I seek less to state or display any theme or thought, and more to bring you, reader, into the atmosphere of the theme or thought—there to pursue your own flight. Another impetus-word is Comradship as for all lands, and in a more commanding and acknowledg'd sense than hitherto. Other word signs would be Good Cheer, Content, and Hope.

The chief trait of any given poet is always the spirit he brings to the observation of Humanity and Nature—the mood out of which he contemplates his subjects. What kind of temper and what amount of faith report these things? Up to how recent a date is the song carried? What the equipment, and special raciness of the singer—what his tinge of coloring? The last value of artistic expressers, past and present—Greek æsthetic, Shakespeare—or in our own day Tennyson, Victor Hugo, Carlyle, Emerson—is certainly involv'd in such questions. I say the profoundest service that poems or any other writings can do for their reader is not merely to satisfy the intellect, or supply something polish'd and interesting, nor even to depict great passions, or persons or events, but to fill him with vigorous and clean manliness, religiousness, and give him good heart as a radical possession and habit. The educated world seems to have been growing more and more ennuyed for ages, leaving to our time the inheritance of it all. Fortunately there is the original inexhaustible fund of buoyancy, normally resident in the race, forever eligible to be appeal'd to and relied on.

As for native American individuality, though certain to come, and on a large scale, the distinctive and ideal type of Western character (as consistent with the operative political and even money-making features of United States' humanity in the Nineteenth Century as chosen knights, gentlemen, and warriors were the ideals of the centuries of European feudalism) it has not yet appear'd. I have allow'd the stress of my poems from beginning to end to bear upon American individuality and assist it—not only because that is a great lesson in Nature, amid all her generalizing laws, but as counterpoise to the leveling tendencies of Democracy—and for other reasons. Defiant of ostensible literary and other conventions, I avowedly chant "the great pride of man in himself," and permit it to be more or less a motif of nearly all my verse. I think this pride indispensable to an American. I think it not inconsistent with obedience, humility, deference, and self-questioning.

Democracy has been so retarded and jeopardized by powerful personalities, that its first instincts are fain to clip, conform, bring in stragglers, and reduce everything to a dead level. While the ambitious thought of my song is to help the forming of a great aggregate Nation, it is perhaps, altogether through the forming of myriads of fully develop'd and enclosing individuals. Welcome as are equality's and fraternity's doctrines and popular education, a certain liability accompanies them all, as we see. That primal and interior something in man, in his soul's abysms, coloring all, and, by exceptional fruitions, giving the last majesty to him—something continually touch'd upon and attain'd by the old poems and ballads of feudalism, and often the principal foundation of them—modern science and democracy appear to be endangering, perhaps eliminating. But that forms an appearance only; the reality is quite different. The new influences, upon the whole, are surely preparing the way for grander individualities than ever. To-day and here personal force is behind everything, just the same. The times and depictions from the Iliad to Shakespere inclusive can happily never again be realized—but the elements of courageous and lofty manhood are unchanged.

Without yielding an inch the working-man and working-woman were to be in my pages from first to last. The ranges of heroism and loftiness with which Greek and feudal poets endow'd their god-like or lordly born characters—indeed prouder and better based and with fuller ranges than those—I was to endow the democratic averages of America. I was to show that we, here and to-day, are eligible to the grandest and the best—more eligible now than any times of old were. I will also want my utterances (I said to myself before beginning) to be in spirit the poems of the morning. (They have been founded and mainly written in the sunny forenoon and early midday of my life.) I will want them to be the poems of women entirely as much as men. I have wished to put the complete Union of the States in my songs without any preference or partiality whatever. Henceforth, if they live and are read, it must be just as much South as North—just as much along the Pacific as Atlantic—in the valley of the Mississippi, in Canada, up in Maine, down in Texas, and on the shores of Puget Sound.

From another point of view Leaves of Grass is avowedly the song of Sex and Amativeness, and even Animality

—though meanings that do not usually go along with those words are behind all, and will duly emerge; and all are sought to be lifted into a different light and atmosphere. Of this feature, intentionally palpable in a few lines, I shall only say the espousing principle of those lines so gives breath of life to my whole scheme that the bulk of the pieces might as well have been left unwritten were those lines omitted. Difficult as it will be, it has become, in my opinion, imperative to achieve a shifted attitude from superior men and women towards the thought and fact of sexuality, as an element in character, personality, the emotions, and a theme in literature. I am not going to argue the question by itself; it does not stand by itself. The vitality of it is altogether in its relations, bearings, significance—like the clef of a symphony. At last analogy the lines I allude to, and the spirit in which they are spoken, permeate all Leaves of Grass, and the work must stand or fall with them, as the human body and soul must remain as an entirety.

Universal as are certain facts and symptoms of communities or individuals all times, there is nothing so rare in modern conventions and poetry as their normal recognizance. Literature is always calling in the doctor for consultation and confession, and always giving evasions and swathing suppressions in place of that "heroic nudity" on which only a genuine diagnosis of serious cases can be built. And in respect to editions of Leaves of Grass in time to come (if there should be such) I take occasion now to confirm those lines with the settled convictions and deliberate renewals of thirty years, and to hereby prohibit, as far as word of mine can do so, any elision of them.

Then still a purpose enclosing all, and over and beneath all. Ever since what might be called thought, or the budding of thought, fairly begun in my youthful mind, I had had a desire to attempt some worthy record of that entire faith and acceptance ("to justify the ways of God to man" is Milton's well-known and ambitious phrase) which is the foundation of moral America. I felt it all as positively then in my young days as I do now in my old ones; to formulate a poem whose every thought or fact should directly or indirectly be or connive at an implicit belief in the wisdom, health, mystery, beauty of every process, every concrete object, every human or other existence, not only considered from the point of view of all, but of each.

While I cannot understand it or argue it out, I fully believe in a clue and purpose in Nature, entire and several; and that invisible spiritual results, just as real and definite as the visible, eventuate all concrete life and all materialism, through Time. My book ought to emanate buoyancy and gladness legitimately enough, for it was grown out of those elements, and has been the comfort of my life since it was originally commenced.

One main genesis-motive of the Leaves was my conviction (just as strong to-day as ever) that the crowning growth of the United States is to be spiritual and heroic. To help start and favor that growth—or even to call attention to it, or the need of it—is the beginning, middle, and final purpose of the poems. (In fact, when really cipher'd out and summ'd to the last, plowing up in earnest the interminable average fallows of humanity—not "good government" merely, in the common sense—is the justification and main purpose of these United States.)

Isolated advantages in any rank or grace or fortune—the direct or indirect threads of all the poetry of the past—are in my opinion distasteful to the republican genius, and offer no foundation for its fitting verse. Established poems, I know, have the very great advantage of chanting the already perform'd, so full of glories, reminiscences dear to the minds of men. But my volume is a candidate for the future. "All original art," says

² Nineteenth Century, July, 1883.—[Whitman's note.]

Taine, anyhow, "is self-regulated from without; it carries its own counterpoise, and does not receive it from elsewhere—lives on its own blood"—a solace to my frequent bruises and sulky vanity.

As the present is perhaps mainly an attempt at personal statement or illustration, I will allow myself as further help to extract the following anecdote from a book, Annals of Old Painters, conn'd by me in youth. Rubens, the Flemish painter, in one of his wanderings, through the galleries of old convents, came across a singular work. After looking at it thoughtfully for a good while, and listening to the criticisms of his suite of students, he said to the latter, in answer to their questions (as to what school the work implied or belong'd), "I do not believe the artist, unknown and perhaps no longer living, who has given the world this legacy, ever belong'd to any school, or ever painted anything but this one picture, which is a personal affair—a piece out of a man's life."

Leaves of Grass indeed (I cannot too often reiterate) has mainly been the outcropping of my own emotional and other personal nature—an attempt, from first to last, to put a Person, a human being (myself, in the latter half of the Nineteenth Century, in America), freely, fully and truly on record. I could not find any similar personal record in current literature that satisfied me. But it is not on Leaves of Grass distinctively as literature, or a specimen thereof, that I feel to dwell, or advance claims. No one will get at my verses who insists upon viewing them as a literary performance, or attempt at such performance, or as aiming mainly towards art or æstheticism. I say no land or people or circumstances ever existed so needing a race of singers and poems differing from all others, and rigidly their own, as the land and people and circumstances of our United States need such singers and poems to-day, and for the future. Still further, as long as the States continue to absorb and be dominated by the poetry of the Old World, and remain unsupplied with autochthonous song, to express, vitalize, and give color to and define their material and political success, and minister to them distinctively, so long will they stop short of first-class nationality and remain defective.

In the free evening of my day I give to you, reader, the foregoing garrulous talk, thoughts, reminiscences,

As idly drifting down the ebb,
Such ripples, half-caught voices, echo
from the shore.

Concluding with two items for the imaginative genius of the West, when it worthily rises—First, what Herder taught to the young Goethe, that really great poetry is always (like the Homeric or Biblical canticles) the result of a national spirit, and not the privilege of a polished and select few; Second, that the strongest and sweetest songs yet remain to be sung.

COWBOY SONGS ¹

THE COWBOY'S DREAM ²

Last night as I lay on the prairie,
And looked at the stars in the sky,
I wondered if ever a cowboy
Would drift to that sweet by and by.

Roll on, roll on; 5
Roll on, little dogies,³ roll on, roll on,
Roll on, roll on;
Roll on, little dogies, roll on.

The road to that bright, happy region
Is a dim, narrow trail, so they say; 10
But the broad one that leads to perdition
Is posted and blazed all the way.

They say there will be a great round-up,
And cowboys, like dogies, will stand,

³ yearling steers

To be marked by the Riders of Judgment,¹⁵
Who are posted and know every brand.

I know there's many a stray cowboy
Who'll be lost at the great, final sale,
When he might have gone in the green pastures
Had he known of the dim, narrow trail.²⁰

I wonder if ever a cowboy
Stood ready for that Judgment Day,
And could say to the Boss of the Riders,
"I'm ready, come drive me away."

For they, like the cows that are locoed,
Stampede at the sight of a hand,²⁶
Are dragged with a rope to the round-
up,
Or get marked with some crooked man's brand.

And I'm scared that I'll be a stray yearling,—
A maverick, unbranded on high,—³⁰
And get cut in the bunch with the "rusties"
When the Boss of the Riders goes by.

For they tell of another big owner
Who's ne'er overstocked, so they say,
But who always makes room for the sinner³⁵
Who drifts from the straight, narrow
way.

They say he will never forget you,
That he knows every action and look;
So, for safety, you'd better get branded,
Have your name in the great Tally Book.⁴⁰

THE OLD CHISHOLM TRAIL

Come along, boys, and listen to my tale,
I'll tell you of my troubles on the old
Chisholm trail.

Coma ti yi youpy, youpy ya,
youpy ya,
Coma ti yi youpy, youpy ya.

I started up the trail October twenty-third,⁵
I started up the trail with the 2-U
herd.

Oh, a ten dollar hoss and a forty dollar saddle,
And I'm goin' to punchin' Texas cattle.

I woke up one morning on the old
Chisholm trail,
Rope in my hand and a cow by the tail.¹⁰

I'm up in the mornin' afore daylight,
And afore I sleep the moon shines
bright.

Old Ben Bolt was a blamed good boss,
But he'd go to see the girls on a sore-backed hoss.

Old Ben Bolt was a fine old man¹⁵
And you'd know there was whiskey wherever he'd land.

My hoss throwed me off at the creek called Mud,
My hoss throwed me off round the 2-U
herd.

Last time I saw him he was going cross
the level
A-kicking up his heels and a-running like the devil.²⁰

It's cloudy in the West, a-looking like
rain,
And my damned old slicker's in the wagon again.

Crippled my hoss, I don't know how,
Ropin' at the horn of a 2-U cow.

We hit Caldwell and we hit her on the fly,²⁵
We bedded down the cattle on the hill close by.

No chaps, no slicker, and it's pouring down rain,
And I swear by god, I'll never night-herd again.

Feet in the stirrups and seat in the saddle,
I hung and rattled with them long-horn
cattle. 30

Last night I was on guard and the leader broke the ranks,
I hit my horse down the shoulders and
I spurred him in the flanks.

The wind commenced to blow, and the rain began to fall, Hit looked, by grab, like we was goin'
to lose 'em all.

I jumped in the saddle and grabbed holt the horn, 35
Best blamed cow-puncher ever was born.

I popped my foot in the stirrup and gave a little yell,
The tail cattle broke and the leaders went to hell.

I don't give a damn if they never do stop;
I'll ride as long as an eight-day clock. 40

Foot in the stirrup and hand on the horn,
Best damned cowboy ever was born.

I herded and I hollered and I done very
well,
Till the boss said, "Boys, just let 'em go to hell."

Stray in the herd and the boss said kill it, 45
So I shot him in the rump with the handle of the skillet.

We rounded 'em up and put 'em on the cars,
And that was the last of the old Two Bars.

Oh it's bacon and beans 'most every
day,—
I'd as soon be a-eatin' prairie hay. 50

I'm on my best horse and I'm goin' at a run,
I'm the quickest shootin' cowboy that ever pulled a gun.

I went to the wagon to get my roll,
To come back to Texas, dad-burn my
soul.

I went to the boss to draw my roll, 55
He had it figgered out I was nine dollars in the hole.

I'll sell my outfit just as soon as I can,
I won't punch cattle for no damned
man.

Goin' back to town to draw my money,
Goin' back home to see my honey. 60

With my knees in the saddle and my seat in the sky,
I'll quit punchin' cows in the sweet by and by.

Coma ti yi youpy, youpy ya,
youpy ya,
Coma ti yi youpy, youpy ya.

WHOOPEE TI YI YO, GIT ALONG LITTLE DOGIES¹

As I walked out one morning for pleasure,
I spied a cow-puncher all riding alone;
His hat was throwed back and his spurs
was a-jingling,
As he approached me a-singin' this
song.

Whoopee ti yi yo, git along little dogies, 5
It's your misfortune, and none
of my own,

Whoopee ti yi yo, git along little
dogies,
For you know Wyoming will be your new home.

Early in the spring we round up the
dogies,
Mark and brand and bob off their tails; 10
Round up our horses, load up the chuck-wagon,
Then throw the dogies upon the trail.

It's whooping and yelling and driving the dogies;
Oh, how I wish you would go on;
It's whooping and punching and go on little dogies, 15
For you know Wyoming will be your new home.

Some boys goes up the trail for pleasure,
But that's where you get it most awfully wrong;
For you haven't any idea the trouble
they give us
While we go driving them all along. 20

When the night comes on and we hold them on the bedground,
These little dogies that roll on so slow;
Roll up the herd and cut out the strays,
And roll the little dogies that never rolled before.

Your mother she was raised way down in Texas, 25
Where the jimson weed and sand-burrs
grow;
Now we'll fill you up on prickly pear and cholla
Till you are ready for the trail to Idaho.

Oh you'll be soup for Uncle Sam's Injuns;
"It's beef, heap beef," I hear them
cry. 30
Git along, git along, git along little dogies,
You're going to be beef steers by and
by.

(1825-1903)

"HOW ARE SONGS BEGOT AND BRED?"

How are songs begot and bred?
How do golden measures flow?
From the heart, or from the head?
Happy Poet, let me know.

Tell me first how folded flowers 5
Bud and bloom in vernal bowers;
How the south wind shapes its tune,
The harper, he, of June.

None may answer, none may know;
Winds and flowers come and go, 10
And the selfsame canons bind Nature and the Poet's mind.

"THE YELLOW MOON LOOKS SLANTLY DOWN"

The yellow Moon looks slantly down,
Through seaward mists, upon the town;
And ghost-like there the moonshine falls
Between the dim and shadowy walls.

I see a crowd in every street 5
But cannot hear their falling feet;
They float like clouds through shade
and light,
And seem a portion of the Night.

The ships have lain for ages fled
Along the waters, dark and dead; 10
The dying waters wash no more
The long, black line of spectral shore.

There is no life on land or sea,
Save in the quiet Moon and me;
Nor ours is true, but only seems 15
Within some dead old World of Dreams.

From THE DIVAN

(PERSIA.)

A little maid of Astrakan,
An idol on a silk divan;
She sits so still, and never speaks,
She holds a cup of mine;
'Tis full of wine, and on her cheeks 5
Are stains and smears of wine.

Thou little girl of Astrakan,
I join thee on the silk divan:
There is no need to seek the land,
The rich bazaars where rubies shine;
For mines are in that little hand, 11
And on those little cheeks of thine.

The sky is thick upon the sea, ^
 The sea is sown with rain,
 And in the passing gusts we hear
 The clanging of the crane.

The cranes are flying to the south, 5
 We cut the northern foam:
 The dreary land they leave behind
 Must be our future home.

Its barren shores are long and dark,
 And gray its autumn sky; 10
 But better these than this gray sea,
 If but to land—and die!

IMOGEN

Unknown to her the maids supplied
 Her wants, and gliding noiseless
 round

Passed out again, while Leon's hound
 Stole in and slumbered at her side:

Then Cloten came, a silly ape, 5
 And wooed her in his boorish way,
 Barring the door against escape;
 But the hound woke, and stood at
 bay,

Defiant at the lady's feet,
 And made the ruffian retreat. 10

*Then for a little moment's space
 A smile did flit across the face Of Lady Imogen.*

Without the morning dried the dews
 From shaven lawns and pastures
 green: 15

Meantime the court dames and the queen

Did pace the shaded avenues:

And Cymbeline amid his train

Rode down the winding palace walks, Behind the hounds that snuffed the
 plain, 20

And in the track of wheeling hawks;
 And soon in greenwood shaws anear
 They blew their horns, and chased the deer,

*But she nor saw nor heard it
 there,*

*But sat, a statue of despair, 25
 The mournful Imogen.*

She shook her ringlets round her head,
 And clasped her hands, and thought,
 and thought,

As every faithful lady ought,
 Whose lord is far away—or dead. 30

She pressed in books his faded flowers,
 That never seemed so sweet before;

Upon his picture gazed for hours,
 And read his letters o'er and o'er,

Dreaming about the loving Past, 35
 Until her tears were flowing fast.

*With aches of heart, and aches of
 brain,*

*Bewildered in the realms of pain,
 The wretched Imogen!*

She tried to rouse herself again, 40

Began a broidery quaint and rich,
 But pricked her fingers every stitch,
 And left in every bud a stain.

She took her distaff, tried to spin,
 But tangled up the golden thread: 45

She touched her lute, but could not win
 A happy sound, her skill had fled.

The letters in her books were blurred,
 She could not understand a word.

Bewildered still, and still in tears, 50

*The dupe of hopes, the prey of
 fears,*

The weeping Imogen!

Her curtains opened in the breeze

And showed the slowly-setting sun,
 Through vines that up the sash did
 run 55

And hovering butterflies and bees.

A silver fountain gushed below,
 Where swans superbly swam the spray;

And pages hurried to and fro,

And trim gallants with ladies gay, 60

And many a hooded monk and friar Went barefoot by in coarse attire.

*But like a picture, or a dream,
 The outward world did only
 seem,*

To thoughtful Imogen. 65

When curfews rang and day was dim,

She glided to her chapel desk,

Unclassed her missal arabesque,
 And sang the solemn vespers hymn;

Before the crucifix knelt down, 70

And told her beads, and strove to pray;

But Heaven was deaf, and seemed to frown,

And push her idle words away:
And when she touched the holy urn
The icy water seemed to burn! 75
*No faith had she in saints above,
She only wanted human love,
The pining Imogen.*

The pale moon walked the waste o'er-head,

And filled the room with sickly light;
Then she arose in piteous plight, 81
Disrobed herself, and crept to bed.
The wind without was loud and deep,
The rattling casements made her start:

At last she slept, but in her sleep 85
She pressed her fingers o'er her heart,
And moaned, and once she gave a scream,
To break the clutches of a dream.

*Even in her sleep she could not sleep,
For ugly visions made her weep,
The troubled Imogen.* 91

WITHOUT AND WITHIN

I

The night is dark, and the winter winds
Go stabbing about with their icy spears;

The sharp hail rattles against the panes,
And melts on my cheek like tears.

'Tis a terrible night to be out of doors, 5
But some of us must be, early and late;

We needn't ask who, for don't we know
It has all been settled by Fate?

Not woman, but man. Give woman her flowers,

Her dresses, her jewels, or what she demands; 10

The work of the world must be done by
man,

Or why has he brawny hands?

As I feel my way in the dark and cold,
I think of the chambers warm and
bright,

The nests where these delicate birds of ours 15

Are folding their wings to-night.

Through the luminous windows, above and below,

I catch a glimpse of the life they lead:

Some sew, some sing, others dress for the ball,

While others, fair students, read. 20

There's the little lady who bears my name:

She sits at my table now, pouring her tea;

Does she think of me as I hurry home,
Hungry and wet? Not she.

She helps herself to the sugar and cream 25

In a thoughtless, dreamy, nonchalant
way;

Her hands are white as the virgin rose
That she wore on her wedding day.

My clumsy fingers are stained with
ink,

The badge of the Ledger, the mark of Trade; 30

But the money I give her is clean
enough,

In spite of the way it is made.

I wear out my life in the counting-room
Over day-book and cash-book,

Bought and Sold;

My brain is dizzy with anxious thought,
My skin is as sallow as gold. 36

How does she keep the roses of youth Still fresh in her cheek? My roses are flown.

It lies in a nutshell—why do I ask?

A woman's life is her own. 40

She gives me a kiss when we part for
the day,

Then goes to her music, blithe as a
bird;

She reads it at sight, and the language,
too,

Though I know never a word.

She sews a little, makes collars and sleeves, 45
Or embroiders me slippers (always too small,
Nets silken purses (for me to fill)
Often does nothing at all

But dream in her chamber, holding a flower,
Or reading my letters—she'd better
read me. 50
Even now, while I am freezing with
cold,
She is cosily sipping her tea.

If I ever reach home I shall laugh aloud
At the sight of a roaring fire once
more;
She must wait, I think, till I thaw myself, 55
For the nightly kiss at the door.

I'll have with my dinner a bottle of
port,
To warm up my blood and soothe my
mind;
Then a little music, for even I
Like music—when I have dined. 60

I'll smoke a pipe in the easy-chair,
And feel her behind me patting my
head;
Or drawing the little one on my knee,
Chat till the hour for bed.

II

Will he never come? I have watched for him 65
Till the misty panes are roughened with sleet;
I can see no more: shall I never hear
The welcome sound of his feet?

I think of him in the lonesome night,
Tramping along with a weary tread,
And wish he were here by the cheery
fire, 71
Or I were there in his stead.

I sit by the grate, and hark for his
step,
And stare in the fire with a troubled
mind;

The glow of the coals is bright in my face, 75
But my shadow is dark behind.

I think of woman, and think of man,
The tie that binds and the wrongs that part,
And long to utter in burning words
What I feel to-night in my heart. 80

No weak complaint of the man I love,
No praise of myself, or my sisterhood;
But—something that women understand—
By men never understood.

Their natures jar in a thousand things;
Little matter, alas, who is right or
wrong, 86
She goes to the wall. "She is weak,"
they say—
It is that which makes them strong.

Wherein am I weaker than Arthur,
pray?
He has, as he should, a sturdier frame, 90
And he labors early and late for me,
But I—I could do the same.

My hands are willing, my brain is clear,
The world is wide, and the workers few;
But the work of the world belongs to
man, 95
There is nothing for woman to do!

Yes, she has the holy duties of home,
A husband to love, and children to bear,
The softer virtues, the social arts,—
In short, a life without care! 100

So our masters say. But what do they know
Of our lives and feelings when they are away?
Our household duties, our petty tasks,
The nothings that waste the day?

Nay, what do they care? 'Tis enough for them 105
That their homes are pleasant; they seek their ease:

One takes a wife to flatter his pride,
Another to keep his keys.

They say they love us; perhaps they do,
In a masculine way, as they love their wine: 110
But the soul of woman needs something
more,
Or it suffers at times like mine.

Not that Arthur is ever unkind
In word or deed, for he loves me well;
But I fear he thinks me as weak as the
rest— 115
(And I may be, who can tell?)

I should die if he changed, or loved me
less,
For I live at best but a restless life;
Yet he may, for they say the kindest
men
Grow tired of a sickly wife. 120

O, love me, Arthur, my lord, my life,
If not for my love, and my womanly
fears,
At least for your child. But I hear his step—
He must not find me in tears.

PAUL HAMILTON HAYNE ¹
(1830-1886)

MY STUDY

This is my world! within these narrow walls,
I own a princely service; the hot care
And tumult of our frenzied life are here
But as a ghost, and echo; what befalls
In the far mart to me is less than naught; 5
I walk the fields of quiet Arcadies,
And wander by the brink of hoary seas,
Calmed to the tondance of untroubled
thought:
Or if a livelier humor should enhance The slow-timed pulse, 'tis not for present strife, 10

The sordid zeal with which our age is
rife,
Its mammon conflicts crowned by fraud
or chance,
But gleanings of the lost, heroic life,
Flashed through the gorgeous vistas of romance.

A DREAM OF THE SOUTH WINDS

O fresh, how fresh and fair
Through the crystal gulfs of air,
The fairy South Wind floateth on her subtle wings of balm!
And the green earth lapped in bliss,
To the magic of her kiss 5 Seems yearning upward fondly through the golden-crested calm!

From the distant Tropic strand,
Where the billows, bright and bland,
Go creeping, curling round the palms
with sweet, faint undertune,
From its fields of purpling flowers 10
Still wet with fragrant showers,
The happy South Wind lingering sweeps
the royal blooms of June.

All heavenly fancies rise
On the perfume of her sighs,
Which steep the inmost spirit in a languor rare and fine, 15
And a peace more pure than sleep's
Unto dim, half-conscious deeps, Transports me, lulled and dreaming, on its twilight tides divine.

Those dreams! ah me! the splendor,
So mystical and tender, 20
Wherewith like soft heat-lightnings
they gird their meaning round,
And those waters, calling, calling,
With a nameless charm enthralling,
Like the ghost of music melting on a rainbow spray of sound!

Touch, touch me not, nor wake me, 25
Lest grosser thoughts o'ertake me,
From earth receding faintly with her dreary din and jars—
What viewless arms caress me?
What whispered voices bless me,
With welcome dropping dewlike from the weird and wondrous stars? 30

Alas! dim, dim, and dimmer
 Grows the preternatural glimmer
 Of that trance the South Wind brought me on her subtle wings of balm,
 For behold! its spirit fieth
 And its fairy murmur dieth, ³⁵
 And the silence closing round me is a dull and soulless calm!

ASPECTS OF THE PINES

Tall, sombre, grim, against the morning
 sky
 They rise, scarce touched by melancholy airs,
 Which stir the fadeless foliage dream-
 fully,
 As if from realms of mystical despairs.

Tall, sombre, grim, they stand with dusky gleams ⁵
 Brightening to gold within the wood-land's core,
 Beneath the gracious noontide's tranquil beams—
 But the weird winds of morning sigh
 no more.

A stillness, strange, divine, ineffable, Broods round and o'er them in the wind's surcease, ¹⁰
 And on each tinted copse and shimmering dell Rests the mute rapture of deep-hearted peace.

Last, sunset comes—the solemn joy and might Borne from the West when cloudless day declines—
 Low, flutelike breezes sweep the waves of light, ¹⁵
 And lifting dark green tresses of the pines,

Till every lock is luminous—gently float,
 Fraught with hale odors up the heavens afar
 To faint when twilight on her virginal throat
 Wears for a gem the tremulous vesper star. ²⁰

UNVEILED

I cannot tell when first I saw her face;
 Was it athwart a sunset on the sea,
 When the huge billows heaved tumul-
 tuously,
 Or in the quiet of some woodland place,
 Wrapped by the shadowy boon ⁵
 Of breezeless verdures from the summer noon?
 Or likelier still, a rock-girdled dell Between vast mountains, while the midnight hour
 Blossomed above me like a shining
 flower,
 Whose star-wrought petals turned the fields of space ¹⁰
 To one great garden of mysterious
 light?

Vain! vain! I cannot tell When first the beauty and majestic might
 Of her calm presence, bore my soul apart
 From all low issues of the groveling world— ¹⁵
 About me their own peace and grandeur furled—
 Filling the conscious heart
 With vague, sweet wisdom drawn from earth or sky—
 Secrets that glance towards eternity,
 Visions divine, and thoughts ineffable!
 But ever since that immemorial day, ²¹
 A steadfast flame hath burned in brain
 and blood,
 Urging me onward in the perilous search
 For sacred haunts our queenly mother loves;
 By field and flood, ²⁵
 Thro' neighboring realms, and regions
 far away,
 Have I not followed, followed where she led,
 Tracking wild rivers to their fountain
 head,
 And wilder desert spaces, mournful,
 vast,
 Where Nature, fronting her inscrutable past, ³⁰
 Holds bleak communion only with
 the dead;

Yearning meanwhile, for pinions like a dove's,
 To waft me further still,
 Beyond the compass of the unwinged
 will;
 Yea, waft me northward, southward,
 east, or west, 35
 By fabled isles, and undiscovered
 lands,
 To where enthroned upon his mountain-perch,
 The sovereign eagle stands,
 Guarding the unfledged eaglets in their nest,
 Above the thunders of the sea and storm? 40

Oh! sometimes by the fire
 Of holy passion, in me, all subdued,
 And melted to a mortal woman's mood,
 Tender and warm—
 She, from her goddess height, 45
 In gracious answer to my soul's desire,
 Descending softly, lifts her Isis veil,
 To bend on me the untranslated light
 Of fathomless eyes, and brow divinely pale;
 She lays on mine her firm, immortal
 hand; 50
 And I, encompassed by a magical mist,
 Feel that her lips have kissed Mine eyes and forehead—how the influence fine
 Of her deep life runs like Arcadian wine
 Through all my being! How a moment pressed 55
 To the large fountains of her opulent
 breast,
 A rapture smites me, half akin to pain;
 A sun-flash quivering through white chords of rain!

Thenceforth, I walked
 The earth all-seeing: not her stateliest forms 60
 Alone engrossed me, nor her sounds of power;
 Mountains and oceans, and the rage of storms;
 Fierce cataracts hurled from awful steep to steep,
 Or the gray water-spouts, that whirling tower 64
 Along the darkened bosom of the deep;

But all fair, fairy forms; all vital
 things,
 That breathe or blossom 'midst our bounteous springs;
 In sylvan nooks rejoicingly I met
 The wild rose and the violet;
 On dewy hill-slopes pausing, fondly talked 70
 With the coy wild-flower, and the grasses brown,
 That in a subtle language of their own (Caught from the spirits of the wandering breeze)
 Quaintly responded; while the heavens looked down
 As graciously on these 75
 Titania growths, as on sublimer shapes
 Of century-moulded continents, that bemock
 Alike the earthquake's and the billows' shock
 By Orient inlands and cold ocean capes!

The giant constellations rose and set:
 I knew them all and worshipped all I
 knew; 81
 Yet, from their empire in the pregnant
 blue,
 Sweeping from planet-orbits to faint
 bars
 Of nebulous cloud, beyond the range
 of stars,
 I turned to worship with a heart as true,
 Long mosses dropping from the cypress
 tree; 86
 The virginal vines that stretched remotely dim,
 From forest limb to limb;
 Network of golden ferns, whose tracery weaves,
 In lingering twilights of warm August eves, 90
 Ethereal frescoes, pictures fugitive, Drawn on the flickering and fairfoliated wall
 Of the dense forest, ere the night
 shades fall:
 Rushes rock-tangled, whose mixed colors live
 In the pure moisture by a fountain's
 brim; 95
 The sylph-like reeds, wave-born, that to and fro

Move ever to the waters' rhythmic
 flow, Blent with the humming of the wildwood bee,
 And the winds' under thrills of mystery;
 The twinkling "ground-stars," full of modest cheer, 100
 Each her cerulean cup
 In humble supplication lifting
 up,
 To catch whate'er the kindly heavens may give
 Of flooded sunshine, or celestial dew;
 And even when, self-poised in airy
 grace, 105
 Their phantom lightness stirs
 Through glistening shadows of a secret
 place
 The silvery-tinted gossamers;
 For thus hath Nature taught amid her
 All—
 The complex miracles of land and
 sea, 110
 And infinite marvels of the infinite air,
 No life is trivial, no creation small!
 Ever I walk the earth,
 As one whose spiritual ear 114
 Is strangely purged and purified to hear
 Its multitudinous voices; from the shore
 Whereon the savage Arctic surges roar,
 And the stupendous bass of choral
 waves
 Thunders o'er "wandering graves,"
 From warrior-winds whose viewless cohorts charge 120
 The banded mists through Cloudland's vaporous dearth, Peeling their battle bugles round the marge
 Of dreary fen and desolated moor;
 Down to the ripple of shy woodland rills Chanting their delicate treble 'mid the hills, 125
 And ancient hollows of the enchanted
 ground,
 I pass with reverent thought,
 Attuned to every tiniest trill of sound,
 Whether by brook or bird
 The perfumed air be stirred. 130
 But most, because the unwearied strains are fraught With Nature's freedom in her happiest moods,

I love the mock-bird's, and brown
 thrush's lay,
 The melted soul of May.
 Beneath those matchless notes,
 From jocund hearts upwelled to fervid throats, 136
 In gushes of clear harmony,
 I seem, oft-times I seem
 To find remoter meanings; the far tone
 Of ante-natal music faintly blown 140
 From out the misted realms of memory;
 The pathos and the passion of a dream;
 Or broken fugues of a diviner tongue
 That e'er hath chanted, since our earth was young,
 And o'er her peace-enamored solitudes
 The stars of morning sung! 146

THE MOCKING-BIRD

A golden pallor of voluptuous light
 Filled the warm Southern night;
 The moon, clear orbéd, above the sylvan scene
 Moved like a stately queen,
 So rife with conscious beauty all the while, 5
 What could she do but smile
 At her own perfect loveliness below,
 Glassed in the tranquil flow
 Of crystal fountains and unruffled
 streams?
 Half lost in waking dreams, 10
 As down the loneliest forest dell I strayed,
 Lo! from a neighboring glade,
 Flashed through the drifts of moonshine, swiftly came
 A fairy shape of flame.
 It rose in dazzling spirals overhead, 15
 Whence, to wild sweetness wed, Poured marvellous melodies, silvery
 trill on trill;
 The very leaves grew still On the charmed trees to harken; while,
 for me,
 Heart-trilled to ecstasy, 20
 I followed—followed the bright shape that flew,
 Still circling up the blue,
 Till as a fountain that has reached its height
 Falls back in sprays of light

Slowly dissolved, so that enrapturing
 lay 25
 Divinely melts away
 Through tremulous spaces to a music-
 mist,
 Soon by the fitful breeze
 How gently kissed
 Into remote and tender silences. 30

TO HENRY W. LONGFELLOW

I think earth's noblest, most pathetic
 sight
 Is some old poet, round whose laurel-
 crown
 The long gray locks are streaming softly down;
 Whose evening, touched by prescient
 shades of night,
 Grows tranquilized, in calm, ethereal
 light:— 5
 Such, such art thou, O master! worthier grown
 In the fair sunset of thy full renown, Poising, perchance, thy spiritual wings for flight!
 Ah, heaven! why shouldst thou from thy place depart?
 God's court is thronged with minstrels,
 rich with song; 10
 Even now, a new note swells the immaculate choir;
 But thou, whose strains have filled our lives so long,
 Still from the altar of thy reverent
 heart
 Let golden dreams ascend, and thoughts of fire!

UNDER THE PINE

To the Memory of Henry Timrod

The same majestic pine is lifted high
 Against the twilight sky,
 The same low, melancholy music grieves
 Amid the topmost leaves,
 As when I watched, and mused, and dreamed with him, 5
 Beneath these shadows dim.

O Tree! hast thou no memory at thy core
 Of one who comes no more?
 No yearning memory of those scenes that were
 So richly calm and fair, 10
 When the last rays of sunset, shimmer-
 ing down,
 Flashed like a royal crown?

And he, with hand outstretched and eyes ablaze,
 Looked forth with burning gaze,
 And seemed to drink the sunset like strong wine, 15
 Or, hushed in trance divine, Hailed the first shy and timorous glance from far
 Of evening's virgin star?

O Tree! against thy mighty trunk he laid
 His weary head; thy shade 20 Stole o'er him like the first cool spell of sleep:
 It brought a peace so deep
 The unquiet passion died from out his
 eyes,
 As lightning from stilled skies.

And in that calm he loved to rest, and
 hear 25
 The soft wind-angels, clear
 And sweet, among the uppermost branches sighing:
 Voices he heard replying
 (Or so he dreamed) far up the mystic
 height,
 And pinions rustling light. 30

O Tree! have not his poet-touch, his dreams
 So full of heavenly gleams, Wrought through the folded dullness of thy bark,
 And all thy nature dark Stirred to slow throbbings, and the fluttering fire 35
 Of faint, unknown desire?

At least to me there sweeps no rugged
 ring
 That girds the forest-king,

No immemorial stain, or awful rent
 (The mark of tempest spent), 40
 No delicate leaf, no lithe bough, vine-o'ergrown,
 No distant, flickering cone,

But speaks of him, and seems to bring
 once more
 The joy, the love of yore;
 But most when breathed from out the sunset-land 45
 The sunset airs are bland,
 That blow between the twilight and the
 night,
 Ere yet the stars are bright;

For then that quiet ever comes back to
 me,
 When, deeply, thrillingly, 50
 He spake of lofty hopes which vanquish Death;
 And on his mortal breath
 A language of immortal meanings hung,
 That fired his heart and tongue.

For then unearthly breezes stir and sigh, 55
 Murmuring, "Look up! 'tis I:
 Thy friend is near thee! Ah, thou canst not see!"
 And through the sacred tree Passes what seems a wild and sentient thrill—
 Passes, and all is still!— 60

Still as the grave which holds his tranquil form,
 Hushed after many a storm,—
 Still as the calm that crowns his marble
 brow,
 No pain can wrinkle now,— Still as the peace—pathetic peace of God— 65
 That wraps the holy sod,

Where every flower from our dead
 minstrel's dust
 Should bloom, a type of trust,—
 That faith which waxed to wings of heavenward might
 To bear his soul from night,— 70
 That faith, dear Christ! whereby we pray to meet
 His spirit at God's feet!

IN HARBOR

I think it is over, over,
 I think it is over at last,
 Voices of foeman and lover,
 The sweet and the bitter have passed:
 Life, like a tempest of ocean 5
 Hath outblown its ultimate blast;
 There's but a faint sobbing sea-ward
 While the calm of the tide deepens lee-
 ward,
 And behold! like the welcoming quiver Of heart-pulses throbbed thro' the
 river, 10
 Those lights in the harbor at last,
 The heavenly harbor at last!

I feel it is over, over!
 For the winds and the waters surcease; 14
 Ah!—few were the days of the rover
 That smiled in the beauty of peace!
 And distant and dim was the omen
 That hinted redress or release:
 From the ravage of life, and its riot
 What marvel I yearn for the quiet 20
 Which bides in the harbor at last?
 For the lights with their welcoming
 quiver
 That throbbed through the sanctified
 river
 Which girdles the harbor at last,
 This heavenly harbor at last? 25

I know it is over, over,
 I know it is over at last!
 Down sail! the sheathed anchor uncover,
 For the stress of the voyage has passed:
 Life, like a tempest of ocean, 30
 Hath outbreathed its ultimate blast;
 There's but a faint sobbing sea-ward;
 While the calm of the tide deepens lee-
 ward;
 And behold! like the welcoming
 quiver
 Of heart-pulses throbbed thro' the
 river, 35
 Those lights in the harbor at last,
 The heavenly harbor at last!

SIDNEY LANIER¹ (1842-1881)THE DYING WORDS OF STONE-WALL JACKSON

"Order A. P. Hill to prepare for battle."
 "Tell Major Hawks to advance the Commissary train."

"Let us cross the river and rest in the shade."

The stars of Night contain the glittering Day

And rain his glory down with sweeter
 grace

Upon the dark World's grand, encharmed face—

All loth to turn away.

And so the Day, about to yield his
 breath,

Utters the stars unto the listening
 Night,

To stand for burning fare-thee-wells of
 light

Said on the verge of death.

O hero-life that lit us like the sun!

O hero-words that glittered like the stars

And stood and shone above the gloomy wars

When the hero-life was done!

The phantoms of a battle came to dwell
 I' the fitful vision of his dying eyes—

Yet even in battle-dreams, he sends supplies

To those he loved so well.

His army stands in battle-line arrayed:

His couriers fly: all's done: now God decide!

—And not till then saw he the Other Side

Or would accept the shade.

Thou Land whose sun is gone, thy stars remain!

Still shine the words that miniature his deeds.

O thrice-beloved, where'er thy great heart bleeds,

Solace hast thou for pain!

NIGHT AND DAY

The innocent, sweet Day is dead.

Dark Night hath slain her in her bed.

O, Moors are as fierce to kill as to wed!

—Put out the light, said he.

A sweeter light than ever rayed

From star of heaven or eye of maid

Has vanished in the unknown Shade.

—She's dead, she's dead, said he.

Now, in a wild, sad after-mood

The tawny Night sits still to brood

Upon the dawn-time when he wooed.

—I would she lived, said he.

Star-memories of happier times,

Of loving deeds and lovers' rhymes,

Throng forth in silvery pantomimes.

—Come back, O Day! said he.

SONG OF THE CHATTAHOOCHEE²

Out of the hills of Habersham,

Down the valleys of Hall

I hurry amain to reach the plain,

Run the rapid and leap the fall,

Split at the rock and together again,

Accept my bed, or narrow or wide,

And flee from folly on every side

With a lover's pain to attain the plain

Far from the hills of Habersham,

Far from the valleys of Hall.

All down the hills of Habersham,

All through the valleys of Hall,

The rushes cried Abide, abide,

The wilful waterweeds held me thrall,

The laving laurel turned my tide,

The ferns and the fondling grass said

Stay,

The dewberry dipped for to work delay,

And the little reeds sighed Abide, abide,

Here in the hills of Habersham,

Here in the valleys of Hall.

High o'er the hills of Habersham,

Veiling the valleys of Hall,

The hickory told me manifold

Fair tales of shade, the poplar tall

² a river in northern Georgia

Wrought me her shadowy self to hold, ²⁵
 The chestnut, the oak, the walnut, the pine, Overleaning, with flickering meaning and sign,
 Said, Pass not, so cold, these manifold
Deep shades of the hills of Habersham,
These glades in the valleys of Hall. ³⁰

And oft in the hills of Habersham,
 And oft in the valleys of Hall,
 The white quartz shone, and the smooth brook-stone
 Did bar me of passage with friendly brawl,
 And many a luminous jewel lone ³⁵
 —Crystals clear or a-cloud with mist,
 Ruby, garnet and amethyst—
 Made lures with the lights of streaming
 stone
 In the clefts of the hills of Habersham,
 In the beds of the valleys of Hall. ⁴⁰

But oh, not the hills of Habersham,
 And oh, not the valleys of Hall
 Avail: I am fain for to water the plain.
 Downward the voices of Duty call—Downward, to toil and be mixed with the main, ⁴⁵
 The dry fields burn, and the mills are to
 turn,
 And a myriad flowers mortally yearn,
 And the lordly main from beyond the
 plain
 Calls o'er the hills of Habersham,
 Calls through the valleys of Hall. ⁵⁰

THE STIRRUP-CUP

Death, thou'rt a cordial old and rare:
 Look how compounded, with what care!
 Time got his wrinkles reaping thee
 Sweet herbs from all antiquity.

David to thy distillage went, ⁵
 Keats, and Gotama excellent,
 Omar Khayyám, and Chaucer bright,
 And Shakspeare for a king-delight.

Then, Time, let not a drop be spilt:
 Hand me the cup whene'er thou wilt; ¹⁰

'Tis thy rich stirrup-cup to me;
 I'll drink it down right smilingly.

THE REVENGE OF HAMISH

It was three slim does and a ten-tined
 buck in the bracken lay;
 And all of a sudden the sinister smell of a man,
 Awaft on a wind-shift, wavered and ran Down the hillside and sifted along through the bracken and passed that way.

Then Nan got a-tremble at nostril; she was the daintiest doe; ⁵
 In the print of her velvet flank on the velvet fern
 She reared, and rounded her ears in turn.
 Then the buck leapt up, and his head as a king's to a crown did go

Full high in the breeze, and he stood as if Death had the form of a deer;
 And the two slim does long lazily stretching arose, ¹⁰
 For their day-dream slower came to a close,
 Till they woke and were still, breath-bound with waiting and wonder and fear.

Then Alan the huntsman sprang over the hillock, the hounds shot by,
 The does and the ten-tined buck
 made a marvellous bound,
 The hounds swept after with never a sound, ¹⁵
 But Alan loud winded his horn in sign that the quarry was nigh.

For at dawn of that day proud Maclean of Lochbuy to the hunt had waxed wild,
 And he cursed at old Alan till Alan fared off with the hounds
 For to drive him the deer to the lower glen-grounds:
 "I will kill a red deer," quoth Maclean,
 "in the sight of the wife and the child." ²⁰

So gayly he paced with the wife and the child to his chosen stand;

But he hurried tall Hamish the henchman ahead: "Go turn,"—

Cried Maclean,—“if the deer seek to cross to the burn,

Do thou turn them to me: nor fail, lest thy back be red as thy hand.”

Now hard-fortuned Hamish, half blown of his breath with the height of the hill, ²⁵

Was white in the face when the tentined buck and the does

Drew leaping to burn-ward; huskily
rose

His shouts, and his nether lip twitched, and his legs were o'er-weak for his
will.

So the deer darted lightly by Hamish and bounded away to the burn.

But Maclean never bating his watch tarried waiting below; ³⁰

Still Hamish hung heavy with fear for to go

All the space of an hour; then he went,
and his face was greenish and stern,

And his eye sat back in the socket, and shrunken the eye-balls shone,

As withdrawn from a vision of deeds
it were shame to see.

“Now, now, grim henchman, what is
't with thee?” ³⁵

Brake Maclean, and his wrath rose red as a beacon the wind hath upblown.

“Three does and a ten-tined buck made out,” spoke Hamish, full mild,

“And I ran for to turn, but my breath
it was blown, and they passed;

I was weak, for ye called ere I broke me my fast.”

Cried Maclean: “Now a ten-tined buck in the sight of the wife and the child ⁴⁰

I had killed if the gluttonous kern ¹ had not wrought me a snail's own
wrong!”

Then he sounded, and down came kinsmen and clansmen all:

“Ten blows, for ten tine, on his back
let fall,

And reckon no stroke if the blood follow not at the bite of thong!”

So Hamish made bare, and took him his strokes; at the last he smiled. ⁴⁵

“Now I'll to the burn,” quoth Maclean, “for it still may be,

If a slimmer-paunched henchman will hurry with me,

I shall kill me the ten-tined buck for a gift to the wife and the child!”

Then the clansmen departed, by this path and that; and over the hill

Sped Maclean with an outward wrath for an inward shame; ⁵⁰

And that place of the lashing full quiet became;

And the wife and the child stood sad;
and bloody-backed Hamish sat
still.

But look! red Hamish has risen; quick about and about turns he.

“There is none betwixt me and the crag-top!” he screams under breath.

Then, livid as Lazarus lately from death, ⁵⁵

He snatches the child from the mother, and clambers the crag toward the
sea.

Now the mother drops breath; she is dumb, and her heart goes dead for a space,

Till the motherhood, mistress of death, shrieks, shrieks through the glen,

And that place of the lashing is live
with men,

And Maclean, and the gillie ² that told him, dash up in a desperate race. ⁶⁰

Not a breath's time for asking; an eye-glance reveals all the tale untold.

They follow mad Hamish afar up the crag toward the sea,

And the lady cries: “Clansmen, run
for a fee!

Yon castle and lands to the two first hands that shall hook him and

¹ rustic

² man-servant

Fast Hamish back from the brink!"— and ever she flies up the steep, 65
 And the clansmen pant, and they sweat, and they jostle and strain.
 But, mother, 'tis vain; but, father, 'tis
 vain;

Stern Hamish stands bold on the brink,
 and dangles the child o'er the deep.

Now a faintness falls on the men that run, and they all stand still.

And the wife prays Hamish as if he were God, on her knees, 70

Crying: "Hamish! O Hamish! but please, but please

For to spare him!" and Hamish still dangles the child, with a wavering
 will.

On a sudden he turns; with a sea-hawk scream, and a gibe, and a song,

Cries: "So; I will spare ye the child
 if, in sight of ye all,

Ten blows on Maclean's bare back shall fall, 75

And ye reckon no stroke if the blood follow not at the bite of the thong!"

Then Maclean he set hardly his tooth to his lip that his tooth was red,

Breathed short for a space, said:
 "Nay, but it never shall be!

Let me hurl off the damnable hound
 in the sea!"

But the wife: "Can Hamish go fish us the child from the sea, if dead? 80

"Say yea!—Let them lash me, Hamish?"—"Nay!"—"Husband,
 the lashing will heal;

But, oh, who will heal me the bonny
 sweet bairn in his grave?

Could ye cure me my heart with the death of a knave?

Quick! Love! I will bare thee—so—kneel!" Then Maclean 'gan slowly to kneel

With never a word, till presently downward he jerked to the earth. 85

Then the henchman—he that smote
 Hamish—would tremble and lag;

"Strike, hard!" quoth Hamish, full stern, from the crag;
 Then he struck him, and "One" sang Hamish, and danced with the child in his mirth.

And no man spake beside Hamish; he counted each stroke with a song.

When the last stroke fell, then he moved him a pace down the height,
 And he held forth the child in the heart-aching sight 91

Of the mother, and looked all pitiful grave, as repenting a wrong.

And there as the motherly arms stretched out with the thanksgiving prayer—

And there as the mother crept up with a fearful swift pace,

Till her finger nigh felt of the bairnie's face— 95

In a flash fierce Hamish turned round and lifted the child in the air,

And sprang with the child in his arms
 from the horrible height in the sea, Shrill screeching, "Revenge!" in the wind-rush; and pallid Maclean, Age-feeble with anger and impotent
 pain,

Crawled up on the crag, and lay flat, and locked hold of dead roots of a
 tree— 100

And gazed hungrily o'er, and the blood from his back drip-dripped in the brine,

And a sea-hawk flung down a skeleton fish as he flew,

And the mother stared white on the waste of blue,

And the wind drove a cloud to seaward,
 and the sun began to shine.

THE MARSHES OF GLYNN¹

Glooms of the live-oaks, beautifulbraided and woven

With intricate shades of the vines that myriad-clöven

Clamber the forks of the multiform boughs,—

Emerald twilights,—

Virginal shy lights, 5

Wrought of the leaves to allure to the whisper of vows,

When lovers pace timidly down through the green colonnades

Of the dim sweet woods, of the dear
dark woods,

Of the heavenly woods and glades,

That run to the radiant marginal sand-beach within 10

The wide sea-marshes of Glynn;—

Beautiful glooms, soft dusks in the noon-day fire,—

Wildwood privacies, closets of lone desire,

Chamber from chamber parted with wavering arras of leaves,—

Cells for the passionate pleasure of prayer to the soul that grieves, 15

Pure with a sense of the passing of saints through the wood,

Cool for the dutiful weighing of ill with good:—

O braided dusks of the oak and woven shades of the vine,

While the riotous noon-day sun of the June-day long did shine

Ye held me fast in your heart and I held you fast in mine; 20

But now when the noon is no more, and riot is rest,

And the sun is a-wait at the ponderous gate of the West,

And the slant yellow beam down the wood-aisle doth seem

Like a lane into heaven that leads from a dream,—

Ay, now, when my soul all day hath drunken the soul of the oak, 25

And my heart is at ease from men, and the wearisome sound of the stroke

Of the scythe of time and the trowel of trade is low,

And belief overmasters doubt, and I know that I know,

And my spirit is grown to a lordly great compass within,

That the length and the breadth and the sweep of the Marshes of Glynn

Will work me no fear like the fear they have wrought me of yore 31

When length was fatigue, and when breadth was but bitterness sore,

And when terror and shrinking and dreary unnamable pain

Drew over me out of the merciless miles of the plain,—

Oh, now, unafraid, I am fain to face 35

The vast sweet visage of space.

To the edge of the wood I am drawn, I am drawn,

Where the gray beach glimmering runs,
as a belt of the dawn,

For a mete and a mark

To the forest-dark:— 40

So:

Affable live-oak, leaning low,—

Thus—with your favor—soft, with a reverent hand,

(Not lightly touching your person, Lord of the land!),

Bending your beauty aside, with a step
I stand 45

On the firm-packed sand,

Free

By a world of marsh that borders a world of sea.

Sinuous southward and sinuous northward the shimmering band

Of the sand-beach fastens the fringe of the marsh to the folds of the
land. 50

Inward and outward to northward and southward the beach-lines linger and curl

As a silver-wrought garment that clings to and follows the firm sweet limbs of a girl.

Vanishing, swerving, evermore curving
again into sight,

Softly the sand-beach wavers away to a dim gray looping of light.

And what if behind me to westward the wall of the woods stands high? 55

The world lies east: how ample, the marsh and the sea and the sky!

A league and a league of marsh-grass,
waist-high, broad in the blade,

Green, and all of a height, and un-flecked with a light or a shade,

Stretch leisurely off, in a pleasant plain,
To the terminal blue of the main. 60

Oh, what is abroad in the marsh and the terminal sea?

Somehow my soul seems suddenly
free

From the weighing of fate and the sad
discussion of sin,

By the length and the breadth and the sweep of the marshes of Glynn.

Ye marshes, how candid and simple and nothing-withholding and free 65

Ye publish yourselves to the sky and offer yourselves to the sea!

Tolerant plains, that suffer the sea and the rains and the sun,

Ye spread and span like the catholic man who hath mightily won

God out of knowledge and good out of infinite pain

And sight out of blindness and purity out of a stain. 70

As the marsh-hen secretly builds on the watery sod,

Behold I will build me a nest on the greatness of God:

I will fly in the greatness of God as the marsh-hen flies

In the freedom that fills all the space
'twixt the marsh and the skies:

By so many roots as the marsh-grass sends in the sod 75

I will heartily lay me a-hold on the greatness of God:

Oh, like to the greatness of God is the greatness within

The range of the marshes, the liberal marshes of Glynn.

And the sea lends large, as the marsh:
lo, out of his plenty the sea

Pours fast: full soon the time of the flood-tide must be: 80

Look how the grace of the sea doth go About and about through the intricate channels that flow

Here and there,

Everywhere,

Till his waters have flooded the utter-most creeks and the low-lying lanes, 85

And the marsh is meshed with a million veins,

That like as with rosy and silvery essences flow

In the rose-and-silver evening glow.

Farewell, my lord Sun!

The creeks overflow: a thousand rivulets run 90

'Twixt the roots of the sod; the blades
of the marsh-grass stir;

Passeth a hurrying sound of wings that westward whirr;

Passeth, and all is still; and the currents cease to run;

And the sea and the marsh are one.

How still the plains of the waters be! 95

The tide is in his ecstasy.

The tide is at his highest height:

And it is night.

And now from the Vast of the Lord will
the waters of sleep

Roll in on the souls of men, 100

But who will reveal to our waking ken
The forms that swim and the shapes that creep

Under the waters of sleep?

And I would I could know what swim-meth below when the tide comes in

On the length and the breadth of the marvellous marshes of Glynn. 105

MARSH SONG—AT SUNSET

Over the monstrous shambling sea,

Over the Caliban sea,

Bright Ariel-cloud, thou lingerest:

Oh wait, oh wait, in the warm red
West,—

Thy Prospero I'll be. 5

Over the humped and fishy sea,

Over the Caliban sea

O cloud in the West, like a thought in the heart

Of pardon, loose thy wing, and start,

And do a grace for me. 10

Over the huge and huddling sea,

Over the Caliban sea

Bring hither my brother Antonio,—
Man,—

My injurer: night breaks the ban:

Brother, I pardon thee. 15

HOW LOVE LOOKED FOR HELL

To heal his heart of long-time pain
One day Prince Love for to travel was fain

With Ministers Mind and Sense.

"Now what to thee most strange may be?"

Quoth Mind and Sense. "All things
above," 5

One curious thing I first would see—Hell," quoth Love.

Then Mind rode in and Sense rode out:
They searched the ways of man about.

First frightfully groaneth Sense. 10
" 'Tis here, 'tis here," and spurreth in fear

To the top of the hill that hangeth
above

And plucketh the Prince: "Come, come,
'tis here—"

"Where?" quoth Love— 14

"Not far, not far," said shivering Sense
As they rode on. "A short way hence,
—But seventy paces hence:

Look, King, dost see where suddenly
This road doth dip from the height
above?

Cold blew a mouldy wind by me." 20
("Cold?" quoth Love.)

"As I rode down, and the River was
black,

And yon-side, lo! an endless wrack
And rabble of souls," sighed Sense,
"Their eyes upturned and begged and
burned" 26

In brimstone lakes, and a Hand above Beat back the hands that upward yearned—"

"Nay!" quoth Love—

"Yea, yea, sweet Prince; thyself shalt
see,

Wilt thou but down this slope with me;
'Tis palpable," whispered Sense. 31

—At the foot of the hill a living rill Shone, and the lilies shone white above;

"But now 'twas black, 'twas a river, this rill,"

("Black?" quoth Love.) 35

"Ay, black, but lo! the lilies grow,
And yon-side where was woe, was
woe,—

Where the rabble of souls," cried
Sense,

"Did shrivel and turn and beg and burn, Thrust back in the brimstone from
above— 40

Is banked of violet, rose, and fern:"

"How?" quoth Love:

"For lakes of pain, yon pleasant plain
Of woods and grass and yellow grain

Doth ravish the soul and sense: 45

And never a sigh beneath the sky,
And folk that smile and gaze above"—

"But saw'st thou here, with thine own
eye,

Hell?" quoth Love.

"I saw true hell with mine own eye, 50
True hell, or light hath told a lie,

True, verily," quoth stout Sense.

Then Love rode round and searched the
ground,

The caves below, the hills above;
"But I cannot find where thou hast
found" 55

Hell," quoth Love.

There, while they stood in a green wood
And marvelled still on Ill and Good,

Came suddenly Minister Mind.

"In the heart of sin doth hell begin: 60

'Tis not below, 'tis not above,
It lieth within, it lieth within:"

("Where?" quoth Love.)

"I saw a man sit by a corse;
Hell's in the murderer's breast: remorse!" 65

Thus clamored his mind to his
mind:

Not fleshly dole is the sinner's goal,
Hell's not below, nor yet above,

'Tis fixed in the ever-damnèd soul"—

"Fixed?" quoth Love— 70

"Fixed: follow me, would'st thou but
see:

He weepeth under yon willow tree,
Fast chained to his corse," quoth
Mind.

Full soon they passed, for they rode
fast,

Where the piteous willow bent above. 75
 "Now shall I see at last, at last,
 Hell," quoth Love.

There when they came Mind suffered
 shame:

"These be the same and not the same,"
 A-wondering whispered Mind. 80
 Lo, face by face two spirits pace
 Where the blissful willow waves above:
 One saith: "Do me a friendly grace"—
 ("Grace!" quoth Love)

"Read me two Dreams that linger long,
 Dim as returns of old-time song 86
 That flicker about the mind.

I dreamed (how deep in mortal sleep!)
 I struck thee dead, then stood above,
 With tears that none but dreamers weep;" 90

"Dreams," quoth Love.

"In dreams, again, I plucked a flower That clung with pain and stung with power,

Yea, nettled me, body and mind."
 "'Twas the nettle of sin, 'twas medicine; 95

No need nor seed of it here Above;
 In dreams of hate true loves begin."

"True," quoth Love.

"Now strange," quoth Sense, and
 "Strange," quoth Mind,

"We saw it, and yet 'tis hard to find, 100
 —But we saw it," quoth Sense and Mind.

Stretched on the ground, beautiful-
 crowned

Of the piteous willow that wreathed
 above,

"But I cannot find where ye have found Hell," quoth Love. 105

A BALLAD OF TREES AND THE MASTER

Into the woods my Master went,
 Clean forspent, forspent.
 Into the woods my Master came,
 Forspent with love and shame.
 But the olives they were not blind to
 Him, 5

The little gray leaves were kind to
 Him:

The thorn-tree had a mind to Him
 When into the woods He came.

Out of the woods my Master went,
 And He was well content. 10

Out of the woods my Master came,
 Content with death and shame.

When Shame and Death would woo him
 last,

From under the trees they drew him
 last:

'Twas on a tree they slew Him—last 15
 When out of the woods He came.

JOHN BANISTER TABB¹ (1845-1909)

TO AN OLD WASSAIL CUP

Where Youth and Laughter lingered
 long

To quaff delight, with wanton song
 And warm caress,

Now Time and Silence strive amain
 With lips unsatisfied, to drain 5
 Life's emptiness!

AUTUMN SONG

My life is but a leaf upon the tree—
 A growth upon the stem that feedeth
 all.

A touch of frost—and suddenly I fall,
 To follow where my sister-blossoms be.

The selfsame sun, the shadow, and the rain, 5

That brought the budding verdure to the bough,

Shall strip the fading foliage as now,
 And leave the limb in nakedness again.

My life is but a leaf upon the tree;
 The winds of birth and death upon it
 blow; 10

But whence it came and whither it shall go,

Is mystery of mysteries to me.

 mission of Small, Maynard & Company.

SHADOWS

Ye shrink not wholly from us when the morn Arises red with slaughter, and the slain
 Sweet visages of tender dreams remain
 To haunt us through the wakened hours
 forlorn,
 Nor when the noontide cometh, and the thorn 5
 Of light is centered in the quivering
 brain,
 And Memory her pilgrimage of pain
 Renews, with fainting footsteps, over-worn.

Nay, then, what time the satellite of
 day
 Pursues his path victorious, and the West, 10
 Her clouds beleaguered vanishing
 away,
 A desert seems of solitude oppressed,
 Around us still your hovering pinions
 stay,
 The pledges of returning night and
 rest.

DEUS ABSCONDITUS

My God has hid Himself from me
 Behind whatever else I see;
 Myself—the nearest mystery—
 As far beyond my grasp as He

And yet, in darkest night, I know, 5
 While lives a doubt-discerning glow,
 That larger lights above it throw
 These shadows in the vale below.

FANCY

A boat unmoored, wherein a dreamer
 lies,
 The slumberous waves low-lisping of a land
 Where Love, forever with unclouded
 eyes,
 Goes, wed with wandering Music,
 hand in hand.

EMILY DICKINSON ¹ (1830-1886)"MUCH MADNESS IS DIVINEST SENSE"

Much madness is divinest sense
 To a discerning eye;
 Much sense the starkest madness.
 'Tis the majority
 In this, as all, prevails. 5
 Assent, and you are sane;
 Demur,—you're straightway dangerous,
 And handled with a chain.

"TO FIGHT ALOUD IS VERY BRAVE"

To fight aloud is very brave,
 But gallanter, I know,
 Who charge within the bosom,
 The cavalry of woe.

Who win, and nations do not see, 5
 Who fall, and none observe,
 Whose dying eyes no country
 Regards with patriot love.

We trust, in plumed procession,
 For such the angels go, 10
 Rank after rank, with even feet
 And uniforms of snow.

"THROUGH THE STRAIGHT PASS OF SUFFERING"

Through the straight pass of suffering
 The martyrs even trod,
 Their feet upon temptation,
 Their faces upon God.

A stately, shriven company; 5
 Convulsion playing round,
 Harmless as streaks of meteor
 Upon a planet's bound.

Their faith the everlasting troth;
 Their expectation fair; 10
 The needle to the north degree
 Wades so, through polar air.

"HOW HAPPY IS THE LITTLE STONE"

How happy is the little stone
That rambles in the road alone,
And doesn't care about careers,
And exigencies never fears;
Whose coat of elemental brown 5
A passing universe put on;
And independent as the sun
Associates or glows alone,
Fulfilling absolute decree
In casual simplicity. 10

"THE WAY I READ A LETTER'S THIS"

The way I read a letter's this:
'Tis first I lock the door,
And push it with my fingers next,
For transport it be sure.

And then I go the furthest off 5
To counteract a knock;
Then draw my little letter forth
And softly pick its lock.

Then, glancing narrow at the wall,
And narrow at the floor, 10
For firm conviction of a mouse
Not exorcised before,

Peruse how infinite I am
To—no one that you know!
And sigh for lack of heaven,—but not
The heaven the creeds bestow. 16

"TITLE DIVINE IS MINE"

Title divine is mine—
The Wife without
The Sign.
Acute degree
Conferred on me— 5
Empress of Calvary.
Royal all but the Crown—
Betrothed, without the swoon
God gives us women 10
When two hold
Garnet to garnet,
Gold to gold—
Born—Bridalled—Shrouded— 15

In a day
Tri-Victory—
"My Husband"
Women say
Stroking the melody, 20
Is this the way?

"I DIED FOR BEAUTY"

I died for beauty, but was scarce
Adjusted in the tomb,
When one who died for truth was laid
In an adjoining room.

He questioned softly why I failed? 5
"For beauty," I replied.
"And I for truth,—the two are one;
We brethren are," he said.

And so, as kinsmen met at night,
We talked between the rooms, 10
Until the moss had reached our lips,
And covered up our names.

"I NEVER SAW A MOOR"

I never saw a moor,
I never saw the sea;
Yet know I how the heather looks,
And what a wave must be.

I never spoke with God, 5
Nor visited in heaven;
Yet certain am I of the spot
As if the chart were given.

"THEY SAY THAT 'TIME ASSUAGES' "

They say that "time assuages,"—
Time never did assuage;
An actual suffering strengthens,
As sinews do, with age.

Time is a test of trouble, 5
But not a remedy.
If such it prove, it prove too
There was no malady.

"ADRIFT! A LITTLE BOAT ADRIFT!"

Adrift! A little boat adrift!
And night is coming down!

Will no one guide a little boat
Unto the nearest town?

So sailors say, on yesterday, 5
Just as the dusk was brown,
One little boat gave up its strife,
And gurgled down and down.

But angels say, on yesterday,
Just as the dawn was red, 10
One little boat o'erspent with gales
Retrimmed its masts, redecked its sails
Exultant, onward sped!

CELIA THAXTER ¹ (1835-1894)

LAND-LOCKED

Black lie the hills; swiftly doth daylight
flee;
And, catching gleams of sunset's dying smile,
Through the dusk land for many a changing mile
The river runneth softly to the sea.

O happy river, could I follow thee! 5
O yearning heart, that never can be still!
O wistful eyes, that watch the steadfast hill,
Longing for level line of solemn sea!

Have patience; here are flowers and songs of birds,
Beauty and fragrance, wealth of sound and sight, 10
All summer's glory thine from morn
till night,
And life too full of joy for uttered
words.

Neither am I ungrateful; but I dream Deliciously, how twilight falls tonight
Over the glimmering water, how the
light 15
Dies blissfully away, until I seem

To feel the wind, sea-scented, on my
cheek,
To catch the sound of dusky flapping sail,
And dip of oars, and voices on the gale,
Afar off, calling low,—my name they speak! 20

O Earth, thy summer song of joy may soar Ring to heaven in triumph. I but crave
The sad, caressing murmur of the wave
That breaks in tender music on the shore.

THE SPANIARDS' GRAVES AT THE ISLES OF SHOALS

O sailors, did sweet eyes look after you
The day you sailed away from sunny
Spain?

Bright eyes that followed fading ship
and crew,
Melting in tender rain?

Did no one dream of that drear night to
be, 5

Wild with the wind, fierce with the stinging snow,

When, on yon granite point that frets
the sea,

The ship met her death-blow?

Fifty long years ago these sailors died: (None know how many sleep beneath the waves:) 10

Fourteen gray headstones, rising side
by side,

Point out their nameless graves,—

Lonely, unknown, deserted, but for me,
And the wild birds that flit with mournful cry,

And sadder winds, and voices of the sea
That moans perpetually. 16

Wives, mothers, maidens, wistfully, in vain

Questioned the distance for the yearning sail,

That, leaning landward, should have stretched again

White arms wide on the gale, 20

To bring back their beloved. Year by
year,
Weary they watched, till youth and beauty passed,
And lustrous eyes grew dim, and age drew near,
And hope was dead at last.

Still summer broods o'er that delicious
land, 25
Rich, fragrant, warm with skies of golden glow:
Live any yet of that forsaken band
Who loved so long ago?

O Spanish women, over the far seas.
Could I but show you where your dead repose! 30
Could I send tidings on this northern
breeze,
That strong and steady blows!

Dear dark-eyed sisters, you remember yet
These you have lost, but you can never know
One stands at their bleak graves whose eyes are wet 35
With thinking of your woe!

ROCK WEEDS

So bleak these shores, wind-swept, and all the year
Washed by the wild Atlantic's restless tide,
You would not dream that flowers the woods hold dear
Amid such desolation dare abide.

Yet when the bitter winter breaks,
some day, 5
With soft winds fluttering her gar-
ment's hem,
Up from the sweet South comes the lingering May,
Sets the first wind-flower trembling
on its stem;

Scatters her violets with lavish hands.
White, blue, and amber; calls the columbine, 10

Till like clear flame in lonely nooks, gay bands
Swinging their scarlet bells, obey the sign;

Makes buttercups and dandelions blaze,
And throws in glimmering patches,
here and there,
The little eyebright's pearls, and gently lays 15
The impress of her beauty everywhere.

Later, June bids the sweet wild rose to blossom,
Wakes from its dream the drowsy
pimpernel;
Unfolds the bindweed's ivory buds, that glow
As delicately blushing as a shell. 20

Then purple Iris smiles, and hour by
hour,
The fair procession multiplies; and
soon,
In clusters creamy white, the elder-
flower
Waves its broad disk against the rising moon. •

O'er quiet beaches shelving to the sea 25
Tall mulleins sway, and thistles; all day long
Flows in the wooing water dreamily,
With subtle music in its slumberous
song.

Herb-robert hears, and princess'-feather
bright,
And gold-thread clasps the little skull-cap blue; 30
And troops of swallows, gathering for their flight,
O'er goldenrod and asters hold review.

The barren island dreams in flowers,
while blow
The south winds, drawing haze o'er sea and land;
Yet the great heart of ocean, throbbing
slow, 35
Makes the frail blossoms vibrate
where they stand;

And hints of heavier pulses soon to shake
Its mighty breast when summer is no
more,
And devastating waves sweep on and
break,
And clasp with girdle white the iron
shore. 40

Close-folded, safe within the sheltering seed,
Blossom and bell and leafy beauty
hide;
Nor icy blast, nor bitter spray they
heed,
But patiently their wondrous change
abide.

The heart of God through his creation stirs; 45
We thrill to feel it, trembling as the flowers
That die to live again,—his messengers,
To keep faith firm in these sad souls
of ours.

The waves of Time may devastate our lives,
The frosts of age may check our failing breath; 50
They shall not touch the spirit that survives
Triumphant over doubt and pain and death.

TWILIGHT

September's slender crescent grows
again
Distinct in yonder peaceful evening
red;
Clearer the stars are sparkling over-
head,
And all the sky is pure, without a stain.
Cool blows the evening wind from out
the West 5
And bows the flowers, the last sweet flowers that bloom,— Pale asters, many a heavy-waving plume
Of goldenrod that bends as if opprest.

The summer's songs are hushed. Up the lone shore
The weary waves wash sadly, and a grief 10
Sounds in the wind, like farewells fond and brief.
The cricket's chirp but makes the silence more.

Life's autumn comes; the leaves begin to fall;
The moods of spring and summer
pass away;
The glory and the rapture, day by
day, 15
Depart, and soon the quiet grave folds
all.

O thoughtful sky, how many eyes in vain
Are lifted to your beauty, full of tears!
How many hearts go back through all the years,
Heavy with loss, eager with questioning pain, 20

To read the dim Hereafter, to obtain
One glimpse beyond the earthly curtain, where Their dearest dwell, where they may be or e'er
September's slender crescent shines
again!

MIDSUMMER MIDNIGHT

The wide, still, moonlit water miles
away
Stretches in lonely splendor. Whispers creep
About us from the midnight wind, and play
Among the flowers that breathe so sweet in sleep;
A soft touch sways the milk-white,
stately phlox, 5
And on its slender stem the poppy rocks.
Fair faces turn to watch the dusky sea,
And clear eyes brood upon the path of light
The white moon makes, the while deliciously,

Like some vague, tender memory of delight, ¹⁰
Or like some half remembered, dear regret,
Rises the odor of the mignonette.

Midsummer glories, moonlight, flowers
asleep,
And delicate perfume, mystic winds that blow
Soft-breathing, full of balm, and the great deep ¹⁵
In leagues of shadow swaying to and fro;
And loving human thought to mark it
all,
And human hearts that to each other
call.

Needs the enchantment of the summer
night
Another touch to make it perfect?
Hark! ²⁰
What sudden shaft of sound, like piercing light,
Strikes on the ear athwart the moonlit dark?
Like some keen shock of joy is heard within
The wondrous music of the violin.

It is as if dumb Nature found a voice, ²⁵
And spoke with power, though in an unknown tongue.
What kinship has the music with the noise
Of waves, or winds, or with the flowers, slow-swung
Like censers to and fro upon the air,
Or with the shadow, or the moonlight fair? ³⁰

And yet it seems some subtle link exists,
We know not how. And over every phase
Of thought and feeling wandering as it lists,
Playing upon us as the west-wind plays
Over the wind-harp, the subduing strain ³⁵
Sweeps with resistless power of joy and pain.

Slow ebbs the golden tide, and all is
still.
Ask the magician at whose touch awoke
That mighty, penetrating, prisoned will,
The matchless voice that so divinely spoke, ⁴⁰
Kindling to fresher life the listening
soul,
What daring thought such fire from heaven stole?

He cannot tell us how the charm was wrought,
Though in his hand he holds the potent key,
Nor read the spell that to the sweet night brought ⁴⁵
This crown of rapture and of mystery,
And lifted every heart, and drew away
All trace of worldliness that marred
the day.

But every head is bowed. We watch
the sea
With other eyes, as if some hint of bliss ⁵⁰
Spoke to us, through the yearning
melody,
Of glad new worlds, of brighter lives than this;
While still the milk-white, stately phlox
waves slow,
And drowsily the poppy rocks below.

THE SANDPIPER

Across the narrow beach we flit,
One little sandpiper and I,
And fast I gather, bit by bit,
The scattered driftwood bleached and dry.
The wild waves reach their hands for it, ⁵
The wild wind raves, the tide runs
high,
As up and down the beach we flit,—
One little sandpiper and I.

Above our heads the sullen clouds
Scud black and swift across the sky;
Like silent ghosts in misty shrouds ¹¹
Stand out the white lighthouses high.

Almost as far as eye can reach
 I see the close-reefed vessels fly,
 As fast we flit along the beach,— 15
 One little sandpiper and I.

I watch him as he skims along,
 Uttering his sweet and mournful cry.
 He starts not at my fitful song,
 Or flash of fluttering drapery. 20
 He has no thought of any wrong;
 He scans me with a fearless eye;
 Staunch friends are we, well tried and strong,
 The little sandpiper and I.

Comrade, where wilt thou be to-night 25
 When the loosed storm breaks furiously?
 My driftwood fire will burn so bright!
 To what warm shelter canst thou fly?
 I do not fear for thee, though wroth
 The tempest rushes through the sky:
 For are we not God's children both, 31
 Thou, little sandpiper, and I?

THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH¹
 (1836-1907)

THE PIAZZA OF ST. MARK AT MIDNIGHT

Hushed is the music, hushed the hum
 of voices;
 Gone is the crowd of dusky promenaders,
 Slender-waisted, almond-eyed Venetians, Princes and paupers. Not a single foot-fall
 Sounds in the arches of the Procuratie. 5
 One after one, like sparks in cindered paper,
 Faded the lights out in the goldsmiths' windows.
 Drenched with the moonlight lies the still Piazza.

Fair as the palace builded for Aladdin, Yonder St. Mark uplifts its sculptured splendor— 10

Intricate fretwork, Byzantine mosaic,
 Color on color, column upon column,
 Barbaric, wonderful, a thing to kneel
 to!

Over the portal stand the four gilt
 horses,
 Gilt hoof in air, and wide distended
 nostril, 15

Fiery, untamed, as in the days of Nero.
 Skyward, a cloud of domes and spires and crosses;

Earthward, black shadows flung from jutting stonework.

High over all the slender Campanile Quivers, and seems a falling shaft of silver. 20

Hushed is the music, hushed the hum
 of voices.

Listen—from cornice and fantastic gar-goyle,

Now and again the moan of dove or pigeon,

Fairly faint, floats off into the moon-
 light.

This, and the murmur of the Adriatic, 25
 Lazily restless, lapping the mossed marble,

Staircase or buttress, scarcely break the stillness.

Deeper each moment seems to grow the silence,

Denser the moonlight in the still Piazza.
 Hark! on the Tower above the ancient gateway, 30

The twin bronze Vulcans, with their ponderous hammers,

Hammer the midnight on their brazen
 bell there!

THE CRESCENT AND THE CROSS

Kind was my friend who, in the Eastern land,

Remembered me with such a gracious
 hand,

And sent this Moorish Crescent which has been

Worn on the haughty bosom of a queen.

No more it sinks and rises in unrest 5
 To the soft music of her heathen breast;

No barbarous chief shall bow before it
 more,

No turbaned slave shall envy and adore.

¹For Aldrich's prose, see page 825. All poems by Aldrich from Household Edition. Copyright, Houghton Mifflin Company.

I place beside this relic of the Sun
 A Cross of Cedar brought from Lebanon, 10
 Once borne, perchance, by some pale monk who trod
 The desert to Jerusalem and his God.
 Here do they lie, two symbols of two creeds,
 Each with deep meaning to our human needs,
 Both stained with blood, and sacred made by faith, 15
 By tears, and prayers, and martyrdom, and death.

That for the Moslem is, but this for me.
 The waning Crescent lacks divinity:
 It gives me dreams of battles, and the woes
 Of women shut in dim seraglios. 20
 But when this Cross of simple wood I
 see,
 The Star of Bethlehem shines again
 for me,
 And glorious visions break upon my gloom—
 The patient Christ, and Mary at the Tomb.

ELMWOOD

In Memory of James Russell Lowell

Here, in the twilight, at the well-known gate
 I linger, with no heart to enter more.
 Among the elm-tops the autumnal air
 Murmurs, and spectral in the fading
 light
 A solitary heron wings its way 5 Southward—save this no sound or touch of life.
 Dark is that window where the scholar's lamp
 Was used to catch a pallor from the dawn.

Yet I must needs a little linger here.
 Each shrub and tree is eloquent of
 him, 10
 For tongueless things and silence have their speech.
 This is the path familiar to his foot
 From infancy to manhood and old age;
 For in a chamber of that ancient house

His eyes first opened on the mystery 15
 Of life, and all the splendor of the world.
 Here, as a child, in loving, curious way,
 He watched the bluebird's coming;
 learned the date
 Of hyacinth and goldenrod, and made Friends of those little redmen of the elms, 20
 And slyly added to their winter store
 Of hazel-nuts: no harmless thing that breathed,
 Footed or winged, but knew him for a friend.
 The gilded butterfly was not afraid
 To trust its gold to that so gentle
 hand, 25
 The bluebird fled not from the pendent
 spray.
 Ah, happy childhood! ringed with fortunate stars!
 What dreams were his in this enchanted sphere,
 What intuitions of high destiny!
 The honey-bees of Hybla touched his lips 30
 In that old New-World garden, unawares.

So in her arms did Mother Nature
 fold
 Her poet, breathing what of strange and sweet
 Into his ear—the state-affairs of birds,
 The lore of dawn and sunset, what the
 wind 35
 Said in the tree-tops—fine, unfathomed
 things
 Henceforth to turn to music in his
 brain:
 A various music, now like notes of flutes,
 And now like blasts of trumpets blown in wars.
 Later he paced this leafy academe 40
 A student, drinking from Greek chalices
 The ripened vintage of the antique
 world.
 And here to him came love, and love's
 dear loss;
 Here honors came, the deep applause of
 men
 Touched to the heart by some swift-winged word 45

That from his own full heart took eager flight—
Some strain of piercing sweetness or rebuke,
For underneath his gentle nature flamed
A noble scorn for all ignoble deed, Himself a bondman till all men were
free. 50

Thus passed his manhood; then to other lands
He strayed, a stainless figure among courts
Beside the Manzanares and the Thames.
Whence, after too long exile, he returned
With fresher laurel, but sedater step 55
And eye more serious, fain to breathe
the air
Where through the Cambridge marshes
the blue Charles Uncoils its length and stretches to the
sea:
Stream dear to him, at every curve a shrine
For Pilgrim Memory. Again he watched 60
His loved syringa whitening by the
door,
And knew the catbird's welcome; in his walks Smiled on his tawny kinsmen of the elms
Stealing his nuts; and in the ruined
year
Sat at his widowed hearthside with bent brows 65
Leonine, frosty with the breath of
time,
And listened to the crooning of the wind
In the wide Elmwood chimneys, as of old.
And then—and then——

The afterglow has faded from the
elms, 70
And in the denser darkness of the boughs
From time to time the firefly's tiny lamp
Sparkles. How often in still summer dusks

He paused to note that transient phantom spark
Flash on the air—a light that outlasts
him! 75

The night grows chill, as if it felt a
breath
Blown from that frozen city where he lies.
All things turn strange. The leaf that rustles here
Has more than autumn's mournfulness.
The place
Is heavy with his absence. Like fixed
eyes 80
Whence the dear light of sense and thought has fled
The vacant windows stare across the lawn.
The wise sweet spirit that informed it
all
Is elsewhere. The house itself is dead.

O autumn wind among the sombre
pines, 85
Breathe you his dirge, but be it sweet and low,
With deep refrains and murmurs of the
sea,
Like to his verse—the art is yours
alone.
His once—you taught him. Now no voice but yours,
Tender and low, O wind among the pines! 90

AN ODE

On the unveiling of the Shaw Memorial on Boston Common, May Thirty-First, 1897

I

Not with slow, funereal sound
Come we to this sacred ground;
Not with wailing fife and solemn muffled drum,
Bringing a cypress wreath
To lay, with bended knee, 5
On the cold brows of Death—
Not so, dear God, we come,
But with the trumpets' blare
And shot-torn battle-banners flung to air,
As for a victory! 10

Hark to the measured tread of martial feet,
 The music and the murmurs of the street!
 No bugle breathes this day
 Disaster and retreat!—
 Hark, how the iron lips 15
 Of the great battle-ships
 Salute the City from her azure Bay!

II

Time was—time was, ah, unforgotten
 years!—
 We paid our hero tribute of our tears.
 But now let go 20
 All sounds and signs and formulas of
 woe:
 'Tis Life, not Death, we celebrate;
 To Life, not Death, we dedicate
 This storied bronze, whereon is wrought
 The lithe immortal figure of our
 thought, 25
 To show forever to men's eyes,
 Our children's children's children's
 eyes,
 How once he stood
 In that heroic mood,
 He and his dusky braves 30
 So fain of glorious graves!—
 One instant stood, and then Drave through that cloud of purple steel and flame,
 Which wrapped him, held him, gave him not again,
 But in its trampled ashes left to Fame 35
 An everlasting name!

III

That was indeed to live—
 At one bold swoop to wrest
 From darkling death the best
 That death to life can give. 40
 He fell as Roland fell
 That day at Roncevaux, With foot upon the ramparts of the foe!
 A pæan, not a knell,
 For heroes dying so! 45
 No need for sorrow here,
 No room for sigh or tear,
 Save such rich tears as happy eyelids
 know.

See where he rides, our Knight!
 Within his eyes the light 50
 Of battle, and youth's gold about his
 brow;
 Our Paladin,¹ our Soldier of the Cross,
 Not weighing gain with loss—
 World-loser, that won all Obeying duty's call! 55
 Not his, at peril's frown,
 A pulse of quicker beat;
 Not his to hesitate
 And parley hold with Fate,
 But proudly to fling down 60
 His gauntlet at her feet.
 O soul of loyal valor and white truth,
 Here, by this iron gate,
 Thy serried ranks about thee as of yore,
 Stand thou for evermore 65
 In thy undying youth!

The tender heart, the eagle eye!
 Oh, unto him belong
 The homages of Song;
 Our praises and the praise 70
 Of coming days
 To him belong—
 To him, to him, the dead that shall not die!

LONGFELLOW

1807—1907

Above his grave the grass and snow
 Their soft antiphonal strophes write:
 Moonrise and daybreak come and go:
 Summer by summer on the height
 The thrushes find melodious breath. 5
 Here let no vagrant winds that blow
 Across the spaces of the night
 Whisper of death.

They do not die who leave their thought
 Imprinted on some deathless page. 10 Themselves may pass; the spell they wrought
 Endures on earth from age to age.
 And thou, whose voice but yesterday
 Fell upon charmed listening ears, Thou shalt not know the touch of years; 15

¹ champion

Thou holdest time and chance at bay.
 Thou livest in thy living word
 As when its cadence first was heard.
 O gracious Poet and benign,
 Belovèd presence! now as then 20
 Thou standest by the hearths of men.
 Their fireside joys and griefs are thine;
 Thou speakest to them of their dead,
 They listen and are comforted.
 They break the bread and pour the wine 25
 Of life with thee, as in those days
 Men saw thee passing on the street
 Beneath the elms—O reverend feet
 That walk in far celestial ways!

EDMUND CLARENCE STEDMAN
 (1833-1908)

HOW OLD BROWN TOOK HARPER'S FERRY

John Brown in Kansas settled, like a steadfast Yankee farmer, Brave and godly, with four sons, all stalwart men of might.
 There he spoke aloud for freedom, and the Border-strife grew warmer, Till the Rangers fired his dwelling, in his absence, in the night;
 And Old Brown, 5
 Osawatomie Brown, Came homeward in the morning—to find his house burned down.
 Then he grasped his trusty rifle and boldly fought for freedom; Smote from border unto border the fierce, invading band;
 And he and his brave boys vowed—so might Heaven help and speed
 'em!— 10
 They would save those grand old prairies from the curse that blights
 the land;
 And Old Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown,
 Said, "Boys, the Lord will aid us!" and he shoved his ramrod down.
 And the Lord did aid these men, and they labored day and even, 15 Saving Kansas from its peril; and their very lives seemed charmed,

Till the ruffians killed one son, in the blessed light of Heaven,—
 In cold blood the fellows slew him,
 as he journeyed all unarmed;
 Then Old Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown, 20
 Shed not a tear, but shut his teeth, and frowned a terrible frown!

Then they seized another brave boy,— not amid the heat of battle,
 But in peace, behind his ploughshare,
 —and they loaded him with chains,
 And with pikes, before their horses,
 even as they goad their cattle,
 Drove him cruelly, for their sport,
 and at last blew out his brains; 25
 Then Old Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown,
 Raised his right hand up to Heaven,
 calling Heaven's vengeance down.

And he swore a fearful oath, by the name of the Almighty,
 He would hunt this ravening evil that had scathed and torn him so; 30
 He would seize it by the vitals; he would crush it day and night; he Would so pursue its footsteps, so return it blow for blow,
 That Old Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown,
 Should be a name to swear by, in backwoods or in town! 35

Then his beard became more grizzled,
 and his wild blue eye grew wilder,
 And more sharply curved his hawk'snose, snuffing battle from afar;
 And he and the two boys left, though the Kansas strife waxed milder, Grew more sullen, till was over the bloody Border War;
 And Old Brown, 40
 Osawatomie Brown,
 Had gone crazy, as they reckoned by his fearful glare and frown.

So he left the plains of Kansas and their bitter woes behind him, Slipt off into Virginia, where the statesmen all are born; Hired a farm by Harper's Ferry, and no one knew where to find him, 45

Or whether he'd turned parson, or was jacketed and shorn;
 For Old Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown,
 Mad as he was, knew texts enough to wear a parson's gown.

He bought no ploughs and harrows spades and shovels, and such trifles; 50

But quietly to his rancho there came,
 by every train,
 Boxes full of pikes and pistols, and his well-beloved Sharp's rifles;
 And eighteen other madmen joined their leader there again.

Says Old Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown, 55
 "Boys, we've got an army large enough to march and take the town!

"Take the town, and seize the muskets, free the negroes and then arm
 them;

Carry the County and the State, ay,
 and all the potent South.
 On their own heads be the slaughter, if their victims rise to harm them—
 These Virginians! who believed not, nor would heed the warning mouth." 60

Says Old Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown,
 "The world shall see a Republic, or my name is not John Brown."

'Twas the sixteenth of October, on the evening of a Sunday.

"This good work," declared the captain, "shall be on a holy night!" 65
 It was on a Sunday evening, and before the noon of Monday,

With two sons, and Captain Stephens, fifteen privates—black and white,

Captain Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown.
 Marched across the bridged Potomac,
 and knocked the sentry down; 70

Took the guarded armory-building, and the muskets and the cannon; Captured all the county majors and
 the colonels, one by one;

Scared to death each gallant scion of Virginia they ran on And before the noon of Monday, I say, the deed was done.

Mad Old Brown, 75
 Osawatomie Brown,
 With his eighteen other crazy men,
 went in and took the town.

Very little noise and bluster, little smell of powder made he;
 It was all done in the midnight, like the Emperor's coup d'etat.

"Cut the wires! Stop the rail-cars!
 Hold the streets and bridges!" said
 he, 80

Then declared the new Republic, with himself for guiding star,—

This Old Brown
 Osawatomie Brown;
 And the bold two thousand citizens ran off and left the town.

Then was riding and railroading and expressing here and thither; 85

And Martinsburg Sharpshooters and the Charlestown Volunteers,
 And the Shepherdstown and Winchester Militia hastened whither

Old Brown was said to muster his ten thousand grenadiers.

General Brown!
 Osawatomie Brown!! 90

Behind whose rampant banner all the North was pouring down.

But at last, 'tis said, some prisoners escaped from Old Brown's durance,

And the effervescent valor of the Chivalry broke out,

When they learned that nineteen madmen had the marvellous assurance—

Only nineteen—thus to seize the place and drive them straight about; 95

And Old Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown,
 Found an army come to take him, encamped around the town.

But to storm, with all the forces I have mentioned, was too risky;

So they hurried off to Richmond for the Government Marines, 100

Tore them from their weeping matrons, fired their souls with Bourbon whiskey,

Till they battered down Brown's castle with their ladders and machines;

And Old Brown,
Osawatomie Brown,

Received three bayonet stabs, and a cut on his brave old crown. 105

Tallyho! the old Virginia gentry gather to the baying!

In they rushed and killed the game,
shooting lustily away;

And whene'er they slew a rebel, those who came too late for slaying,

Not to lose a share of glory, fired their bullets in his clay;

And Old Brown, 110
Osawatomie Brown,

Saw his sons fall dead beside him, and between them laid him down.

How the conquerors wore their laurels;
how they hastened on the trial;

How Old Brown was placed, half dying, on the Charlestown courthouse floor;

How he spoke his grand oration, in the
scorn of all denial; 115

What the brave old madman told them,—these are known the country o'er.

"Hang Old Brown,
Osawatomie Brown."

Said the judge, "and all such rebels!"
with his most judicial frown.

But, Virginians, don't do it! for I tell you that the flagon 120

Filled with blood of Old Brown's offspring, was first poured by Southern hands;

And each drop from Old Brown's life-veins, like the red gore of the dragon,

May spring up a vengeful Fury, hissing through your slave-worn lands!

And Old Brown, 125
Osawatomie Brown,

May trouble you more than ever, when you've nailed his coffin down!

WANTED—A MAN

Back from the trebly crimsoned field
Terrible words are thunder-tost;

Full of the wrath that will not yield,
Full of revenge for battles lost!

Hark to their echo, as it crost 5
The Capital, making faces wan:

"End this murderous holocaust;
Abraham Lincoln, give us a MAN!

"Give us a man of God's own mould,
Born to marshal his fellow-men; 10

One whose fame is not bought and sold
At the stroke of a politician's pen;

Give us the man of thousands ten,
Fit to do as well as to plan;

Give us a rallying-cry, and then, 15
Abraham Lincoln, give us a MAN!

"No leader to shirk the boasting foe,
And to march and countermarch our
brave,

Till they fall like ghosts in the marshes
low,

And swamp-grass covers each nameless grave; 20

Nor another, whose fatal banners
wave

Aye in Disaster's shameful van; Nor another, to bluster, and lie, and rave;—

Abraham Lincoln, give us a MAN!

"Hearts are mourning in the North, 25
While the sister rivers seek the main,
Red with our life-blood flowing forth,—

Who shall gather it up again?
Though we march to the battle-plain

Firmly as when the strife began, 30
Shall all our offering be in vain?—

Abraham Lincoln, give us a MAN!

"Is there never one in all the land,
One on whose might the Cause may lean?

Are all the common ones so grand, 35
And all the titled ones so mean?

What if your failure may have been In trying to make good bread from bran,

From worthless metal a weapon keen?—

Abraham Lincoln, find us a MAN! 40

"O, we will follow him to the death,
Where the foeman's fiercest columns are!

O, we will use our latest breath,
Cheering for every sacred star!
His to marshal us high and far; 45
Ours to battle, as patriots can
When a Hero leads the Holy War!—
Abraham Lincoln, give us a MAN!"

PAN IN WALL STREET

(A.D. 1867)

Just where the Treasury's marble front Looks over Wall Street's mingled nations;

Where Jews and Gentiles most are wont

To throng for trade and last quotations;

Where, hour by hour, the rates of gold 5
Outrival, in the ears of people,
The quarter-chimes, serenely tolled
From Trinity's undaunted steeple,—

Even there I heard a strange, wild
strain

Sound high above the modern clamor,
Above the cries of greed and gain, 11
The curbstone war, the auction's
hammer;

And swift, on Music's misty ways,
It led, from all this strife for millions,

To ancient, sweet-do-nothing days 15
Among the kirtle-robed Sicilians.

And as it stilled the multitude,
And yet more joyous rose, and shriller,

I saw the minstrel, where he stood
At ease against a Doric pillar; 20

One hand a droning organ played,
The other held a Pan's-pipe (fashioned

Like those of old) to lips that made
The reeds give out that strain impassioned.

'Twas Pan himself had wandered here,
A-strolling through this sordid city, 26
And piping to the civic ear
The prelude of some pastoral ditty!

The demigod had crossed the seas,—
From haunts of shepherd, nymph, and satyr, 30

And Syracusan times, to these Far shores and twenty centuries later.

A ragged cap was on his head:

But—hidden thus—there was no doubting

That, all with crispy locks o'erspread,
His gnarled horns were somewhere sprouting; 36

His club-feet, cased in rusty shoes,
Were crossed, as on some frieze you see them,

And trousers, patched of divers hues, Concealed his crooked shanks beneath them. 40

He filled the quivering reeds with
sound,

And o'er his mouth their changes shifted,

And with his goat's-eyes looked around Where'er the passing current drifted;
And soon, as on Trinacrian hills 45

The nymphs and herdsman ran to hear him,

Even now the tradesmen from their
tills,

With clerks and porters, crowded near him.

The bulls and bears together drew
From Jauncey Court and New-Street
Alley, 50

As erst, if pastorals be true,
Came beasts from every wooded valley;

The random passers stayed to list:
A boxer Ægon, rough and merry;
A Broadway Daphnis on his tryst 55
With Naïs at the Brooklyn Ferry;

A one-eyed Cyclops halted long
In tattered cloak of army pattern;
And Galatea joined the throng—

A blowsy, apple-vending slattern; 60
While old Silenus staggered out

From some new-fangled lunch-house
handy,

And bade the piper, with a shout,
To strike up Yankee Doodle Dandy!

A newsboy and a peanut-girl 65
 Like little Fauns began to caper—
 His hair was all in tangled curl,
 Her tawny legs were bare and taper;
 And still the gathering larger grew,
 And gave its pence and crowded
 nigher, 70
 While aye the shepherd-minstrel blew
 His pipe and struck the gamut higher.

O heart of Nature, beating still With throbs her vernal passion taught her,—
 Even here, as on the vine-clad hill 75
 Or by the Arethusan water!
 New forms may fold the speech, new lands
 Arise within these ocean-portals,
 But Music waves eternal wands,— Enchantress of the souls of mortals; 80

So thought I—but among us trod
 A man in blue, with legal baton,
 And scoffed the vagrant demigod,
 And pushed him from the step I sat
 on.
 Doubting, I mused upon the cry, 85
 "Great Pan is dead!"—and all the people
 Went on their ways; and clear and high
 The quarter sounded from the steeple.

"THE UNDISCOVERED COUN- TRY"

Could we but know
 The land that ends our dark, uncertain travel,
 Where lie those happier hills and meadows low,—
 Ah, if beyond the spirit's inmost cail, Aught of that country could we surely know, 5
 Who would not go?

Might we but hear
 The hovering angels' high imagined
 chorus,
 Or catch, betimes, with wakeful eyes
 and clear,
 One radiant vista of the realm before us,— 10

With one rapt moment given to see and hear,
 Ah, who would fear?

Were we quite sure
 To find the peerless friend who left us lonely,
 Or there, by some celestial stream as pure, 15
 To gaze in eyes that here were love-lit only,—
 This weary mortal coil, were we quite sure,
 Who would endure?

JOAQUIN MILLER¹ (1841-1913)

KIT CARSON'S RIDE

*Room! room to turn round in, to breathe and be free,
 To grow to be giant, to sail as at sea
 With the speed of the wind on a steed with his mane
 To the wind, without pathway or route or a rein.
 Room! room to be free where the whiteborder'd sea 5
 Blows a kiss to a brother as boundless
 as he;
 Where the buffalo come like a cloud on
 the plain,
 Pouring on like the tide of a storm-driven main,
 And the lodge of the hunter to friend or to foe
 Offers rest; and unquestion'd you come or you go. 10
 My plains of America! Seas of wild lands!
 From a land in the seas in a raiment
 of foam,
 That has reached to a stranger the welcome of home,
 I turn to you, lean to you, lift you my hands.*

"Run? Run? See this flank, sir, and I do love him so! 15
 But he's blind, badger blind. Whoa, Pache, boy, whoa,

¹ All selections from Miller by permission of the Harr Wagner Publishing Company.

No, you wouldn't believe it to look at his eyes,
But he's blind, badger blind, and it
happen'd this wise:

"We lay in the grass and the sunburnt clover
That spread on the ground like a great brown cover 20
Northward and southward, and west and away
To the Brazos,¹ where our lodges
lay,
One broad and unbroken level of
brown.
We were waiting the curtains of night to come down
To cover us trio and conceal our flight
With my brown bride, won from an Indian town 26
That lay in the rear the full ride of a
night.

"We lounged in the grass—her eyes were in mine,
And her hands on my knee, and her hair was as wine
In its wealth and its flood, pouring on and all over 30
Her bosom wine red, and press'd never by one.
Her touch was as warm as the tinge
of the clover
Burnt brown as it reach'd to the kiss of the sun.
Her words they were low as the lutethroated dove,
And as laden with love as the heart
when it beats 35
In its hot, eager answer to earliest
love,
Or the bee hurried home by its burthen of sweets.

"We lay low in the grass on the broad plain levels,
Old Revels and I, and my stolen brown bride;
'Forty full miles if a foot, to ride 40
Forty full miles if a foot, and the devils
Of red Comanches are hot on the track

¹a river in Texas

When once they strike it. Let the sun go down
Soon, very soon,' muttered bearded old Revels
As he peer'd at the sun, lying low on his back, 45
Holding fast to his lasso. Then he jerk'd at his steed
And he sprang to his feet, and glanced swiftly around,
And then dropp'd, as if shot, with an ear to the ground;
Then again to his feet, and to me, to my bride,
While his eyes were like flame, his face
like a shroud, 50
His form like a king, and his beard
like a cloud,
And his voice loud and shrill, as both trumpet and reed,—
'Pull, pull in your lassoes, and bridle
to steed,
And speed you if ever for life you would speed.
Aye, ride for your lives, for your lives
you must ride! 55
For the plain is aflame, the prairie
on fire,
And the feet of wild horses hard flying before
I heard like a sea breaking high on the shore,
While the buffalo come like a surge of
the sea,
Driven far by the flame, driving fast on us three 60
As a hurricane comes, crushing palms
in his ire.'

"We drew in the lassoes, seized saddle and rein,
Threw them on, cinched them on,
cinched them over again,
And again drew the girth; and spring
we to horse,
With head to Brazos, with a sound in
the air 65
Like the surge of a sea, with a flash
in the eye,
From that red wall of flame reaching up to the sky;
A red wall of flame and a black rolling
sea

Rushing fast upon us, as the wind sweeping free
And afar from the desert blown hollow and hoarse. 70

"Not a word, not a wail from a lip was let fall,
We broke not a whisper, we breathed
not a prayer,
There was work to be done, there was death in the air,
And the chance was as one to a thousand for all.

Twenty miles! . . . thirty miles! . . .
a dim distant speck . . . 75
Then a long reaching line, and the Brazos in sight!
And I rose in my seat with a shout of delight.

I stood in my stirrup, and look'd to my right—
But Revels was gone; I glanced by my shoulder

And saw his horse stagger; I saw his head drooping 80
Hard down on his breast, and his naked breast stooping

Low down to the mane, as so swifter and bolder

Ran reaching out for us the red-footed
fire!

He rode neck to neck with a buffalo
bull,

That made the earth shake where he came in his course, 85

The monarch of millions, with shaggy mane full

Of smoke and of dust, and it shook with desire

Of battle, with rage and with bellowings hoarse,

His keen, crooked horns, through the storm of his mane,

Like black lances lifted and lifted
again; 90

And I looked but this once, for the fire licked through,

And Revels was gone, as we rode two and two.

"I look'd to my left then—and nose,
neck, and shoulder Sank slowly, sank surely, till back to my thighs,

And up through the black blowing veil of her hair 95

Did beam full in mine her two marvelous eyes,

With a longing and love yet a look of despair

And of pity for me, as she felt the smoke fold her,

And flames leaping far for her glorious
hair.

Her sinking horse falter'd, plunged,
fell and was gone 100

As I reach'd through the flame and I bore her still on.

On! into the Brazos, she, Pache and
I—

Poor, burnt, blinded Pache. I love
him . . .

That's why."

SIERRA GRANDE DEL NORTE

Like fragments of an uncompleted
world,

From bleak Alaska, bound in ice and
spray,

To where the peaks of Darien lie curl'd

In clouds, the broken lands loom bold and gray.

The seamen nearing San Francisco Bay Forget the compass here; with sturdy
hand 6

They seize the wheel, look up, then bravely lay

The ship to shore by rugged peaks that stand

The stern and proud patrician fathers
of the land.

They stand white stairs of heaven,— stand a line 10

Of lifting, endless, and eternal white.
They look upon the far and flashing
brine,

Upon the boundless plains, the broken
height

Of Kamiakin's battlements. The flight

Of time is underneath their untopp'd
towers. 15

They seem to push aside the moon at
night,

To jostle and to loose the stars. The flowers
Of heaven fall about their brows in shining showers.

They stand in line of lifted snowy isles
High held above the toss'd and tumbled
sea,— 20
A sea of wood in wild unmeasured
miles:
White pyramids of Faith where man is
free;
White monuments of Hope that yet shall be
The mounts of matchless and immortal
song—
I look far down the hollow days; I
see 25
The bearded prophets, simple-soul'd
and strong,
That strike the sounding harp, and thrill the heeding throng.

Serene and satisfied! supreme! as lone
As God, they loom like God's archangels churl'd;
They look as cold as kings upon a throne: 30
The mantling wings of night are crush'd and curl'd
As feathers curl. The elements are hurl'd
From off their bosoms, and are bidden
go,
Like evil spirits, to an under-world.
They stretch from Cariboo to Mexico,
A line of battle-tents in everlasting
snow. 35

EXODOS FOR OREGON

A tale half told and hardly understood;
The talk of bearded men that chanced to meet,
That lean'd on long, quaint rifles in
the wood,
That look'd in fellow-faces, spoke discreet
And low, as half in doubt and in defeat 5
Of hope; a tale it was of lands of gold

That lay below the sun. Wild-wing'd and fleet
It spread among the swift Missouri's
bold
Unbridl'd men, and reach'd to where Ohio roll'd.

Then long chain'd lines of yoked and patient steers; 10
Then long white trains that pointed to
the west,
Beyond the savage west; the hopes and
fears
Of blunt, untutor'd men, who hardly guess'd
Their course; the brave and silent women, dress'd
In homely spun attire, the boys in bands, 15
The cheery babes that laugh'd at all,
and bless'd
The doubting hearts, with laughing lifted hands!—
What exodus for far untraversed
lands!

The Plains! The shouting drivers at the wheel;
The crash of leather whips; the crush and roll 20
Of wheels; the groan of yokes and grinding steel
And iron chain, and lo! at last the whole
Vast line, that reached as if to touch
the goal,
Began to stretch and stream away and
wind
Toward the west, as if with one control; 25
Then hope loom'd fair, and home lay far behind;
Before, the boundless plain, and fiercest of their kind.

At first the way lay green and fresh
as seas,
And far away as any reach of wave;
The sunny streams went by in belt of trees; 30
And here and there the tassell'd tawny
brave
Swept by on horse, look'd back, stretch'd forth and gave

A yell of warn, and then did wheel and rein Awhile, and point away, dark-brow'd
and grave,
Into the far and dim and distant plain
With signs and prophecies, and then plunged on again. 36

Some hills at last began to lift and
break;
Some streams began to fail of wood and tide,
The sombre plain began betime to take A hue of weary brown, and wild and wide 40
It stretched its naked breast on every
side.
A babe was heard at last to cry for bread
Amid the deserts; cattle lowed and
died,
And dying men went by with broken
tread,
And left a long black serpent line of wreck and dead. 45

Strange hunger'd birds, black-wing'd
and still as death,
And crown'd of red with hooked beaks, flew low
And close about, till we could touch their breath—
Strange unnamed birds, that seem'd to come and go
In circles now, and now direct and slow, 50
Continual, yet never touch the earth;
Slim foxes slid and shuttled to and fro
At times across the dusty, weary dearth
Of life, look'd back, then sank like crickets in a hearth.

Then dust arose, a long dim line like smoke 55
From out of riven earth. The wheels went groaning by,
The thousand feet in harness and in yoke,
They tore the ways of ashen alkali,
And desert winds blew sudden, swift and dry.
The dust! it sat upon and fill'd the train! 60

It seem'd to fret and fill the very sky.
Lo! dust upon the beasts, the tent, the
plain,
And dust, alas! on breasts that rose not up again.

They sat in desolation and in dust
By dried-up desert streams; the mother's hands 65
Hid all her bended face; the cattle thrust
Their tongues and faintly called across the lands.
The babes, that knew not what this way through sands
Could mean, did ask if it would end
today—
The panting wolves slid by, red-eyed,
in bands 70
To pools beyond. The men looked far
away,
And, silent, saw that all a boundless desert lay.

They rose by night; they struggled on and on
As thin and still as ghosts; then here and there
Beside the dusty way before the dawn,
Men silent laid them down in their despair, 76
And died. But woman! Woman frail as fair!
May man have strength to give to you your due;
You faltered not, nor murmured anywhere;
You held your babes, held to your course, and you 80 Bore on through burning hell your double burdens through.

Men stood at last, the decimated
few,
Above a land of running streams; and they?
They pushed aside the boughs, and,
peering through,
Beheld afar the cool, refreshing bay. 85
Then some did curse, and some bend hands to pray;
But some looked back upon the desert,
wide
And desolate with death; then all the day

They mourned. But one, with nothing left beside His dog to love, crept down among the ferns and died. 90

THE PASSING OF TENNYSON

*My kingly kinsmen, kings of thought,
I hear your gathered symphonies,
Such nights as when the world is not,
And great stars chorus through my
trees.*

We knew it, as God's prophets knew; 5
We knew it, as mute red men know,
When Mars leapt searching heaven
through
With flaming torch, that he must go.
Then Browning, he who knew the stars,
Stood forth and faced insatiate Mars.

Then up from Cambridge rose and turned 11
Sweet Lowell from his Druid trees—Turned where the great star blazed and
burned,
As if his own soul might appease.
Yet on and on through all the stars 15
Still searched and searched insatiate
Mars.

Then staunch Walt Whitman saw and
knew;
Forgetful of his "Leaves of Grass,"
He heard his "Drum Taps," and God drew
His great soul through the shining pass, 20
Made light, made bright, by burnished
stars;
Made scintillant from flaming Mars.

Then soft-voiced Whittier was heard
To cease; was heard to sing no more,
As you have heard some sweetest bird 25
The more because its song is o'er.
Yet brighter up the street of stars
Still blazed and burned and beckoned
Mars.

And then the king came; king of
thought,
King David with his harp and
crown. . . . 30

How wisely well the gods had wrought
That these had gone and sat them down
To wait and welcome mid the stars
All silent in the light of Mars. 34

All silent. . . . So, he lies in state. . . .
Our redwoods drip and drip with rain. . .
Against our rock-locked Golden Gate
We hear the great, sad, sobbing main.
But silent all. . . . He passed the stars
That year the whole world turned to Mars. 40

COLUMBUS

Behind him lay the gray Azores,
Behind the Gates of Hercules;
Before him not the ghost of shores;
Before him only shoreless seas.
The good mate said: "Now must we
pray, 5
For lo! the very stars are gone.
Brave Adm'r'l, speak; what shall I
say?"
"Why, say: 'Sail on! sail on! and on!'"

"My men grow mutinous day by
day;
My men grow ghastly, wan and weak." The stout mate thought of home; a spray 11
Of salt wave washed his swarthy cheek.
"What shall I say, brave Adm'r'l, say,
If we sight naught but seas at dawn?"
"Why, you shall say at break of day: 15
'Sail on! sail on! sail on! and on!'"

They sailed and sailed, as winds might blow,
Until at last the blanched mate said:
"Why, now not even God would know
Should I and all my men fall dead. 20
These very winds forget their way,
For God from these dread seas is gone.
Now speak, brave Adm'r'l; speak and
say—"
He said: "Sail on! sail on! and on!"

They sailed. They sailed. Then spake the mate: 25
"This mad sea shows his teeth to-night.
He curls his lip, he lies in wait,
He lifts his teeth, as if to bite!

Brave Adm'r'l, say but one good word:
What shall we do when hope is gone?"
The words leapt like a leaping sword: 31
"Sail on! sail on! sail on! and on!"

Then, pale and worn, he paced his
deck,
And peered through darkness. Ah, that
night
Of all dark nights! And then a speak—
A light! A light! At last a light! 36
It grew, a starlit flag unfurled!
It grew to be Time's burst of dawn.
He gained a world; he gave that world
Its grandest lesson: "On! sail on!" 40

SEEIN' THINGS¹

I ain't afraid uv snakes or toads, or bugs or worms or mice,
An' things 'at girls are skeered uv I think are awful nice!
I'm pretty brave I guess; an' yet I hate to go to bed,
For, when I'm tucked up warm an'
snug an' when my prayers are said, Mother tells me "Happy Dreams" an'
takes away the light, 5
An' leaves me lyin' all alone an' seein'
things at night!

Sometimes they're in the corner, sometimes they're by the door, Sometimes they're all a-standin' in the middle uv the floor;
Sometimes they are a-sittin' down,
sometimes they're walkin' round
So softly and so creepy-like they never make a sound! 10
Sometimes they are as black as ink,
an' other times they're white—
But color ain't no difference when you see things at night!

Once, when I licked a feller 'at had just moved on our street,
An' father sent me up to bed without a bite to eat,
I woke up in the dark an' saw things
standin' in a row, 15
A-lookin' at me cross-eyed an' p'intin'
at me—so!

Oh, my! I wuz so skeered 'at time I never slep' a mite—
It's almost alluz when I'm bad I see things at night.

Lucky thing I ain't a girl or I'd be skeered to death!
Bein' I'm a boy, I duck my head an'
hold my breath. 20
An' I am, oh so sorry I'm a naughty boy, an' then
I promise to be better an' I say my prayers again!
Gran'ma tells me that's the only way to make it right
When a feller has been wicked an' sees
things at night!

An' so when other naughty boys would coax me into sin, 25
I try to skwush the Tempter's voice 'at urges me within;
An' when they's pie for supper, or cakes
'at's big an' nice,
I want to—but I do not—pass my plate
f'r them things twice!
No, ruther let Starvation wipe me slowly out o' sight
Than that I should keep a-livin' on an' seein' things at night. 30

 An' when he went to bed at night, away up-stairs,
 His Mammy heerd him holler, an' his Daddy heerd him bawl, 15
 An' when they turn't the kivvers down,
 he wuzn't there at all!
 An' they seeked him in the rafter-room,
 an' cubby-hole, an' press,
 An' seeked him up the chimbly-flue, an'

 An' churish them 'at loves you, an' dry
 the orphant's tear,
 An' he'p the pore and needy ones 'at clusters all about,
 Er the Gobble-uns 'll git you
 Ef you 45
 Don't Watch
 Out!"

WHEN THE FROST IS ON THE PUNKIN¹

When the frost is on the punkin and
 the fodder's in the shock,
 And you hear the kyouck and gobble
 of the struttin' turkey-cock,
 And the clackin' of the guineys, and
 the cluckin' of the hens,
 And the rooster's hallylooyer as he tiptoes on the fence;
 O, it's then's the times a feller is a-feelin' at his best, 5
 With the risin' sun to greet him from a night of peaceful rest,
 As he leaves the house, bareheaded,
 and goes out to feed the stock,
 When the frost is on the punkin and
 the fodder's in the shock.

They's something kindo' harty-like about the atmusfere
 When the heat of summer's over and the coolin' fall is here— 10
 Of course we miss the flowers, and the blossums on the trees,
 And the mumble of the hummin'-birds
 and buzzin' of the bees;
 But the air's so appetizin'; and the landscape through the haze,

Of a crisp and sunny morning of the airy autumn days
 Is a pictur' that no painter has the colorin' to mock—¹⁵
 When the frost is on the punkin and
 the fodder's in the shock.

The husky, rusty russel of the tassels
 of the corn,
 And the raspin' of the tangled leaves,
 as golden as the morn;
 The stubbles in the furies—kindo' lonesome-like, but still A-preachin' sermons to us of the barns
 they grew to fill;²⁰
 The strawstack in the medder, and the reaper in the shed;
 The hosses in theyr stalls below—the clover overhead!—
 O, it sets my heart a-clickin' like the tickin' of a clock,
 When the frost is on the punkin and
 the fodder's in the shock!

Then your apples all is getherd, and the ones a feller keeps²⁵
 Is poured around the celler-floor in red and yeller heaps;
 And your cider-makin's over, and your wimmern-folks is through With their mince and apple-butter, and theyr souse and saussage, too! . .
 I don't know how to tell it—but ef sich a thing could be As the Angels wantin' boardin', and they'd call around on me—³⁰ I'd want to 'commodate 'em—all the whole-indurin' flock—
 When the frost is on the punkin and
 the fodder's in the shock!

EDWARD ROWLAND SILL¹
 (1841-1887)

MORNING

I entered once, at break of day,
 A chapel, lichen-stained and gray,
 Where a congregation dozed and heard
 An old monk read from a written Word.

No light through the window-panes could pass,⁵
 For shutters were closed on the rich stained glass;
 And in a gloom like the nether night
 The monk read on by a taper's light.
 Ghostly with shadows, that shrank and
 grew
 As the dim light flared, were aisle and pew;¹⁰
 And the congregation that dozed around Listened without a stir or sound—
 Save one, who rose with wistful face,
 And shifted a shutter from its place.
 Then light flashed in like a flashing gem—¹⁵
 For dawn had come unknown to them—
 And a slender beam, like a lance of
 gold,
 Shot to the crimson curtain-fold,
 Over the bended head of him
 Who pored and pored by the taper dim;²⁰
 And it kindled over his wrinkled brow
 Such words: "The law which was till
 now;"
 And I wondered that, under that morning ray,
 When night and shadow were scattered
 away,
 The monk should bow his locks of white²⁵
 By a taper's feebly flickering light—
 Should pore, and pore, and never seem
 To notice the golden morning-beam.

LIFE

Forenoon and afternoon and night,—
 Forenoon,
 And afternoon, and night,—Forenoon,
 and—what!
 The empty song repeats itself. No
 more?
 Yea, that is Life: make this forenoon
 sublime,
 This afternoon a psalm, this night a prayer,⁵
 And Time is conquered, and thy crown is won.

A TROPICAL MORNING AT SEA

Sky in its lucent splendor lifted Higher than cloud can be;

Air with no breath of earth to stain it,
Pure on the perfect sea.

Crests that touch and tilt each other, 5
Jostling as they comb;
Delicate crash of tinkling water,
Broken in pearling foam.

Plashings—or is it the pinewood's whispers,
Babble of brooks unseen, 10
Laughter of winds when they find the blossoms,
Brushing aside the green?

Waves that dip, and dash, and sparkle;
Foam-wreaths slipping by,
Soft as a snow of broken roses 15
Afloat over mirrored sky.

Off to the East the steady sun-track
Golden meshes fill—
Webs of fire, that lace and tangle, 20
Never a moment still,

Liquid palms but clap together,
Fountains, flower-like, grow—
Limpid bells on stems of silver—
Out of a slope of snow.

Sea-depths, blue as the blue of violets—
Blue as a summer sky, 26
When you blink at its arch sprung
over
Where in the grass you lie.

Dimly an orange bit of rainbow
Burns where the low west clears, 30
Broken in air, like a passionate promise
Born of a moment's tears.

Thinned to amber, rimmed with silver,
Clouds in the distance dwell, Clouds that are cool, for all their color, 35
Pure as a rose-lipped shell.

Fleets of wool in the upper heavens
Gossamer wings unfurl;
Sailing so high they seem but sleeping
Over yon bar of pearl. 40

What would the great world lose, I wonder—

Would it be missed or no—
If we stayed in the opal morning,
Floating forever so?

Swung to sleep by the swaying water,
Only to dream all day— 46
Blow, salt wind from the north up-starting,
Scatter such dreams away!

THE FOOL'S PRAYER

The royal feast was done; the King Sought some new sport to banish
care,
And to his jester cried: "Sir Fool, Kneel now, and make for us a prayer!"

The jester doffed his cap and bells, 5
And stood the mocking court before;
They could not see the bitter smile
Behind the painted grin he wore.

He bowed his head, and bent his knee
Upon the monarch's silken stool; 10
His pleading voice arose: "O Lord,
Be merciful to me, a fool!"

"No pity, Lord, could change the heart
From red with wrong to white as wool;

The rod must heal the sin: but, Lord, 15
Be merciful to me, a fool!"

"'Tis not by guilt the onward sweep
Of truth and right, O Lord, we stay;
'Tis by our follies that so long
We hold the earth from heaven
away. 20

"These clumsy feet, still in the mire,
Go crushing blossoms without end;
These hard, well-meaning hands we thrust
Among the heart-strings of a friend.

"The ill-timed truth we might have kept 25
Who knows how sharp it pierced and stung?

The word we had no sense to say—
Who knows how grandly it had rung?

"Our faults no tenderness should ask,
The chastening stripes must cleanse them all; 30
But for our blunders—oh, in shame
Before the eyes of heaven we fall.

"Earth bears no balsam for mistakes;
Men crown the knave; and scourge
the tool
That did his will; but Thou, O Lord, 35
Be merciful to me, a fool!"

The room was hushed; in silence rose
The King, and sought his gardens
cool,
And walked apart, and murmured low,
"Be merciful to me, a fool!" 40

AMERICA THE BEAUTIFUL¹

O beautiful for spacious skies,
For amber waves of grain,
For purple mountain majesties
Above the fruited plain!
America! America! 5
God shed His grace on thee
And crown thy good with brotherhood
From sea to shining sea!

O beautiful for pilgrim feet,
Whose stern, impassioned stress 10
A thoroughfare for freedom beat
Across the wilderness!
America! America!
God mend thine every flaw,
Confirm thy soul in self-control, 15
Thy liberty in law!

O beautiful for heroes proved
In liberating strife,
Who more than self their country
loved,
And mercy more than life! 20
America! America!
May God thy gold refine Till all success be nobleness
And every gain divine!

O beautiful for patriot dream 25
That sees beyond the years
Thine alabaster cities gleam Undimmed by human tears!
America! America!
God shed His grace on thee 30
And crown thy good with brotherhood
From sea to shining sea!

THE MAN WITH THE HOE¹

Written after seeing Millet's World-Famous Painting of a brutalized toiler.

God made man in his own image
in the image of God made He him.—Genesis.

Bowed by the weight of centuries he leans
Upon his hoe and gazes on the ground,
The emptiness of ages in his face,
And on his back the burden of the world.

Who made him dead to rapture and despair, 5
A thing that grieves not and that never hopes,
Stolid and stunned, a brother to the ox?

Who loosened and let down this brutal jaw?
Whose was the hand that slanted back
this brow?
Whose breath blew out the light within this brain? 10

Is this the Thing the Lord God made and gave
To have dominion over sea and land;
To trace the stars and search the heavens for power;
To feel the passion of Eternity?
Is this the dream He dreamed who shaped the suns 15
And markt their ways upon the ancient deep?
Down all the caverns of Hell to their last gulf
There is no shape more terrible than this—
More tongued with censure of the world's blind greed—

More filled with signs and portents for the soul—²⁰
More packt with danger to the universe.

What gulfs between him and the seraphim!
Slave of the wheel of labor, what to
him
Are Plato and the swing of Pleiades?
What the long reaches of the peaks of song,²⁵
The rift of dawn, the reddening of the rose?
Thru this dread shape the suffering ages look;
Time's tragedy is in that aching stoop;
Thru this dread shape humanity betrayed,
Plundered, profaned and disinherited,³⁰
Cries protest to the Judges of the World,
A protest that is also prophecy.

O masters, lords and rulers in all lands,
Is this the handiwork you give to
God,
This monstrous thing distorted and soul-quencht?³⁵
How will you ever straighten up this shape;
Touch it again with immortality;
Give back the upward looking and the
light;
Rebuild in it the music and the dream;
Make right the immemorial infamies,⁴⁰
Perfidious wrongs, immedicable woes?

O masters, lords and rulers in all lands,
How will the future reckon with this
Man?
How answer his brute question in that hour
When whirlwinds of rebellion shake all shores?⁴⁵
How will it be with kingdoms and with kings—
With those who shaped him to the thing
he is—
When this dumb Terror shall rise to judge the world,
After the silence of the centuries?

LINCOLN, THE MAN OF THE PEOPLE¹

When the Norn Mother saw the Whirlwind Hour
Greatingen and darkening as it hurried on,
She left the Heaven of Heroes and came down
To make a man to meet the mortal
need.
She took the tried clay of the common road—⁵
Clay warm yet with the genial heat of Earth,
Dasht through it all a strain of prophecy;
Tempered the heap with thrill of human tears;
Then mixt a laughter with the serious stuff.
Into the shape she breathed a flame to light¹⁰
That tender, tragic, ever-changing
face;
And laid on him a sense of the Mystic Powers,
Moving—all husht—behind the mortal veil.
Here was a man to hold against the
world,
A man to match the mountains and the sea.¹⁵

The color of the ground was in him,
the red earth;
The smack and tang of elemental
things;
The rectitude and patience of the cliff;
The good-will of the rain that loves all
leaves;
The friendly welcome of the wayside well;²⁰
The courage of the bird that dares the
sea;
The gladness of the wind that shakes
the corn;
The pity of the snow that hides all scars;
The secrecy of streams that make their way²⁴
Under the mountain to the rifted rock;
The tolerance and equity of light

That gives as freely to the shrinking
flower
As to the great oak flaring to the wind—
To the grave's low hill as to the Matterhorn
That shoulders out the sky. Sprung from the West, ³⁰
He drank the valorous youth of a new
world,
The strength of virgin forests braced
his mind,
The hush of spacious prairies stilled
his soul,
His words were oaks in acorns; and his thoughts
Were roots that firmly gript the granite truth. ³⁵

Up from log cabin to the Capitol,
One fire was on his spirit, one resolve—
To send the keen ax to the root of
wrong,
Clearing a free way for the feet of God,
The eyes of conscience testing every stroke, ⁴⁰
To make his deed the measure of a
man.
He built the rail-pile as he built the State,
Pouring his splendid strength through every blow;
The grip that swung the ax in Illinois
Was on the pen that set a people free. ⁴⁵

So came the Captain with the mighty
heart;
And when the judgment thunders split
the house,
Wrenching the rafters from their ancient rest,
He held the ridgepole up, and spik't
again
The rafters of the Home. He held his place— ⁵⁰
Held the long purpose like a growing
tree—
Held on through blame and faltered not at praise.
And when he fell in whirlwind, he went
down

As when a lordly cedar, green with
boughs,
Goes down with a great shout upon the hills, ⁵⁵
And leaves a lonesome place against the sky.

THE SEA GYPSY

I am fevered with the sunset,
I am fretful with the bay,
For the wander-thirst is on me
And my soul is in Cathay.
There's a schooner in the offing, ⁵
With her topsails shot with fire;
And my heart has gone aboard her
For the Islands of Desire.

I must forth again to-morrow!
With the sunset I must be ¹⁰
Hull down on the trail of rapture
In the wonder of the sea.

STEIN SONG

Give a rouse, then, in the Maytime,
For a life that knows no fear!
Turn night-time into day-time
With the sunlight of good cheer!
For it's always fair weather ⁵
When good fellows get together
With a stein on the table, and a good song ringing clear.

When the wind comes up from Cuba
And the birds are on the wing, ¹⁰
And our hearts are patting juba
To the banjo of the spring,
Then there's no wonder whether
The boys will get together,
With a stein on the table, and a cheer for everything.

For we're all frank-and-twenty ¹⁵
When the spring is in the air,
And we've faith and hope a-plenty
And we've life and love to spare,
And it's birds of a feather
When we all get together, ²⁰
With a stein on the table, and a heart without a care.

nard & Company.

For we know the world is glorious
 And the goal a golden thing;
 And that God is not censorious
 When his children have their fling;
 And life slips its tether 26
 When the boys get together,
 With a stein on the table in the fellowship of spring.

COMRADES

Comrades, pour the wine to-night,
 For the parting is with dawn.
 Oh, the clink of cups together,
 With the daylight coming on!
 Greet the morn 5
 With a double horn,
 When strong men drink together!

Comrades, gird your swords to-night,
 For the battle is with dawn.
 Oh, the clash of shields together, 10
 With the triumph coming on!
 Greet the foe
 And lay him low,
 When strong men fight together.

Comrades, watch the tides to-night, 15
 For the sailing is with dawn.
 Oh, to face the spray together,
 With the tempest coming on!
 Greet the sea
 With a shout of glee, 20
 When strong men roam together.

Comrades, give a cheer to-night,
 For the dying is with dawn.
 Oh, to meet the stars together,
 With the silence coming on! 25
 Greet the end
 As a friend a friend,
 When strong men die together.

THREE OF A KIND

Three of us without a care
 In the red September,
 Tramping down the roads of Maine,
 Making merry with the rain,
 With the fellow winds a-fare, 5
 Where the winds remember.

Three of us with shocking hats,
 Tattered and unbarbered,
 Happy with the splash of mud,
 With the highways in our blood, 10
 Bearing down on Deacon Platt's,
 Where last year we harbored.

We've come down from Kennebec,
 Tramping since last Sunday,
 Loping down the coast of Maine, 15
 With the sea for a refrain,
 And the maples neck and neck
 All the way to Fundy.

Sometimes lodging in an inn, 20
 Cosey as a doormouse—
 Sometimes sleeping on a knoll,
 With no roof-tree but the pole—
 Sometimes halely welcomed in
 At an old-time farmhouse.

Loafing under ledge and tree, 25
 Leaping over boulders,
 Sitting on the pasture bars,
 Hail-fellow with storm or stars—
 Three of us alive and free,
 With unburdened shoulders! 30

Three of us with hearts like pine
 That the lightnings splinter,
 Clean of cleave and white of grain—
 Three of us afoot again,
 With a rapture fresh and fine 35
 As a spring in winter!

All the hills are red and gold;
 And the horns of vision
 Call across the crackling air
 Till we shout back to them there, 40
 Taken captive in the hold
 Of their bluff derision.

Spray-salt gusts of ocean blow
 From the rocky headlands;
 Overhead the wild geese fly, 45
 Honking in the autumn sky;
 Black sinister flocks of crow
 Settle in the dead lands.

Three of us in love with life,
 Roaming like wild cattle, 50
 With the stinging air a-reel
 As a warrior might feel
 The swift orgasm of the knife
 Slay him in mid-battle.

Three of us to march abreast
 Down the hills of morrow!
 With a clean heart and a few Friends to clench the spirit to—Leave the gods to rule the rest,
 And good-by, sorrow!

AT THE CROSSROADS

You to the left and I to the right,
 For the ways of men must sever—
 And it well may be for a day and a
 night,
 And it well may be forever.
 But whether we meet or whether we
 part
 (For our ways are past our knowing),
 A pledge from the heart to its fellow
 heart
 On the ways we all are going!
 Here's luck!
 For we know not where we are going.

5 9

We have striven fair in love and war,
 But the wheel was always weighted;
 We have lost the prize that we struggled for,
 We have won the prize that was fated.
 We have met our loss with a smile and a song,
 And our gains with a wink and a whistle,—
 For, whether we're right or whether we're wrong,
 There's a rose for every thistle.
 Here's luck!
 And a drop to wet your whistle!

20

Whether we win or whether we lose
 With the hands that life is dealing,
 It is not we nor the ways we choose,
 But the fall of the cards that's sealing.
 There's a fate in love and a fate in
 fight,
 And the best of us all go under—
 And whether we're wrong or whether we're right,
 We win, sometimes, to our wonder.
 Here's luck—
 That we may not yet go under!

30

With a steady swing and an open brow
 We have tramped the ways together,

But we're clasping hands at the crossroads now,
 In the Fiend's own night for weather;
 And whether we bleed or whether we smile
 In the leagues that lie before us,
 The ways of life are many a mile,
 And the dark of Fate is o'er us.
 Here's luck!
 And a cheer for the dark before us!

35
 40

You to the left and I to the right,
 For the ways of men must sever,
 And it well may be for a day and a
 night,
 And it well may be forever!
 But whether we live or whether we die
 (For the end is past our knowing), Here's two frank hearts and the open
 sky,
 Be a fair or an ill wind blowing!
 Here's luck!
 In the teeth of all winds blowing.

RICHARD WATSON GILDER¹
 (1844-1909)

THE SONG OF A HEATHEN

(Sojourning in Galilee, A. D. 32.)

I

If Jesus Christ is a man,—
 And only a man,—I say
 That of all mankind I cleave to him,
 And to him will I cleave away.

II

If Jesus Christ is a God,—
 And the only God,—I swear
 I will follow Him through heaven and
 hell,
 The earth, the sea, and the air!

THE SONNET

What is a sonnet? 'Tis the pearly shell
 That murmurs of the far-off murmuring sea;

 ton Mifflin Company.

A precious jewel carved most curiously;
 It is a little picture painted well.
 What is a sonnet? 'Tis the tear that fell 5
 From a great poet's hidden ecstasy;
 A two-edged sword, a star, a song—
 ah me!
 Sometimes a heavy-tolling funeral bell.
 This was the flame that shook with Dante's breath;
 The solemn organ whereon Milton played, 10
 And the clear glass where Shakespeare's shadow falls:
 A sea this is—beware who ventureth!
 For like a fiord the narrow floor is laid
 Mid-ocean deep sheer to the mountain walls.

THE NIGHT PASTURE

I

In a starry night of June, before the moon had come over into our valley from the high valley beyond,
 Up the winding mountain-lane I wandered, and, stopping, leaned on the bars, and listened:
 And I heard the little brook sliding from stone to stone; and I heard the sound of the bells as the cows moved —heavily, slowly,
 In various keys, deep, or like sleigh-bells tinkling, sounded the chiming cow-bells—
 Starting and stilling, irregular; near or far away in the dusk— 5
 And the nearer cows I heard chewing the cud, and breathing warm on the cool air of the mountain slope
 In the night pasture.

II

Terrace on terrace rises the farm, from meadow and winding river to forest of chestnut and pine;
 There by the high-road, among the embowering maples, nestles the ancient homestead;

From each new point of vantage
 lovelier seems the valley, and the hill-framed sunset ever more and more moving and glorious; 10

But when in the thunderous city I think of the mountain farm, nothing so sweet of remembrance,—holding me as in a dream,—

As the silver note of the unseen brook, and the clanging of the cow-bells fitfully in the dark, and the deep breathing of the cows

In the night pasture.

III

Then I think, not of myself—but an image comes to me of one who has past, 15

Of an old man bent with labor;

He, like his father before him, for many and many a year,

When the cows down the mountains have trudged in the summer evening,
 and after the evening milking,

Night after night, and year after year, back up the lane he has driven them, while the shepherd-dog leaped and barked—

Back up the lane, and past the orchard, and through the bars

Into the night pasture. 20

IV

There in the twilight I see him stand:

He listens to the sounds of the field and the forest,

On his brow strikes the cool mountain air;

Hard is the old man's life and full indeed of sorrow—

But now, for a moment, respite from labor, in the pause 'twixt day and
 night! 25

Perhaps to his heart comes a sense of the beauty that fills all this exquisite valley—

A sense of peace and of rest; a thought of the long and toilless night that comes to all,

As he leans on the bars and listens,
 and hears the deep-breathed cows,
 and the scattered sound of the bells

In the night pasture.

"IN A NIGHT OF MIDSUMMER"

In a night of midsummer, on the still eastern shore of the ocean inlet,¹

In our hearts a sense of the inaudible pulsings of the unseen, infinite sea,

Suddenly through the clear, cool air, arose the voice of a wonderful tenor; soaring and sobbing in the music of "Otello."

I knew that the singer was long dead; I knew well that it was not his living voice;

And yet truly it was as the voice of a living man; tho' heard as through a veil, still was it human; still was it living; still was it tragic; 5

Still felt I the fire of the spirit of a man; I was moved by the passion of his art; I perceived the flower and essence of his person; the exquisite expression of his mind and soul;

His soul it was that seized my soul, through his voice, which was as the very voice of sorrow;

And then I thought: If man, by science and searching, can build a cunning instrument that takes over and keeps, beyond the term of human existence, the essence and flower of a man's art;

If he can recreate that most individual attribute, his articulate and musical voice, and thus the very art and passion which that voice conveys,

Why may not the Supreme Artificer, when the human body is utterly dissolved and dispersed, recover and keep forever, in some new and delicate structure, the living soul itself? 10

IN THE WHITE MOUNTAINS

Mountains in whose vast shadows live great names,

On whose firm pillars rest mysterious dawns,

And sunsets that redream the Apocalypse;

A world of billowing green that, veil on veil,

Turns a blue mist and melts in lucent skies; 5

A silent world, save for slow waves of wind,

Or sudden, hollow clamor of huge rocks Beaten by valleyed waters manifold;—

Airs that to breathe is life and joyousness;

Days dying into music; nights whose stars 10

Shine near, and large, and lustrous; these, O these,

These are for memory to life's ending hour.

ART

(MISS GERALDINE FARRAR IN "MADAME BUTTERFLY")

A little, loosened leaf of painted paper Slow quivering down

From a stage Nagasaki cherry-tree That screens a painted town.

And fitting back and forth in silken robes 5

A figure slight, With orient gestures, and fixt orient smile,

And voice of pure delight.

And every note she sang and word she spoke

Was for her writ; 10
Not nature here, but art and artifice,
And cunning human wit.

Yet when that paper petal trembled down,

Spring thrilled the air;
And when she sang, I knew love's high and depth 15

And passion and despair.

STEPHEN CRANE¹ (1871-1900)

WAR IS KIND

Do not weep, maiden, for war is kind.
Because your lover threw wild hands toward the sky,

¹ All selections from Stephen Crane reprinted with the permission of and by special arrangement with Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., authorized publisher.

And the affrighted steed ran on alone,
Do not weep.
War is kind. 5

Hoarse, booming drums of the regiment,
Little souls who thirst for fight,
These men were born to drill and die.
The unexplained glory flies above them,
Great is the battle-god, great, and his kingdom— 10
A field where a thousand corpses lie.

Do not weep, babe, for war is kind.
Because your father tumbled in the yellow trenches,
Raged at his breast, gulped and died,
Do not weep.
War is kind. 15

Swift blazing flag of the regiment,
Eagle with crest of red and gold,
These men were born to drill and die.
Point for them the virtue of slaughter,
Make plain to them the excellence of killing 20
And a field where a thousand corpses lie.

Mother whose heart hung humble as a button
On the bright splendid shroud of your son,
Do not weep.
War is kind.

A NEWSPAPER

A newspaper is a collection of half-injustices
Which, bawled by boys from mile to mile,
Spreads its curious opinion
To a million merciful and sneering men,
While families cuddle the joys of the fireside 5
When spurred by tale of dire love agony.
A newspaper is a court

Where everyone is kindly and unfairly tried
By a squalor of honest men.

A newspaper is a market 10
Where wisdom sells its freedom
And melons are crowned by the crowd.
A newspaper is a game
Where his error scores the player victory
While another's skill wins death. 15
A newspaper is a symbol;
It is fetless life's chronicle,
A collection of loud tales
Concentrating eternal stupidities, 19
That in remote ages lived unaltered,
Roaming through a fenceless world.

IN THE NIGHT

In the night
Grey heavy clouds muffled the valleys,
And the peaks looked toward God alone.
"O Master that movest the wind with a finger,
Humble, idle, futile peaks are we. 5
Grant that we may run swiftly across the world
To huddle in worship at Thy feet."

THE WAYFARER

The wayfarer,
Perceiving the pathway to truth,
Was struck with astonishment.
It was thickly grown with weeds.
"Ha," he said, 5
"I see that none has passed here in a long time."
Later he saw that each weed
Was a singular knife.
"Well," he mumbled at last, 10
"Doubtless there are other roads."

A SLANT OF SUN

A slant of sun on dull brown walls,
A forgotten sky of bashful blue.
Toward God a mighty hymn,
A song of collisions and cries,

Rumbling wheels, hoof-beats, bells, 5 Welcomes, farewells, love-calls, final moans,
 Voices of joy, idiocy, warning, despair,
 The unknown appeals of brutes,
 The chanting of flowers,
 The screams of cut trees, 10
 The senseless babble of hens and wise
 men—
 A cluttered incoherency that says at the stars:
 "O God, save us!"

A MAN SAID TO THE UNIVERSE

A man said to the universe:
 "Sir, I exist!"
 "However," replied the universe,
 "The fact has not created in me
 A sense of obligation." 5

ROAD-HYMN FOR THE START

Leave the early bells at chime,
 Leave the kindled hearth to blaze,
 Leave the trellised panes where children linger out the waking-time,
 Leave the forms of sons and fathers
 trudging through the misty ways, Leave the sounds of mothers taking up their sweet laborious days. 5

Pass them by! even while our soul
 Yearns to them with keen distress.
 Unto them a part is given; we will strive to see the whole.
 Dear shall be the banquet table where their singing spirits press;
 Dearer be our sacred hunger, and our pilgrim loneliness. 10

We have felt the ancient swaying
 Of the earth before the sun,
 On the darkened marge of midnight heard sidereal rivers playing;

¹ All selections from The Poems and Plays of William Vaughn Moody. Copyright, 1912, by Harriet C. Moody. Reprinted by permission of Houghton Mifflin Company

Rash it was to bathe our souls there,
 but we plunged and all was done.
 That is lives and lives behind us—lo,
 our journey is begun! 15

Careless where our face is set,
 Let us take the open way.
 What we are no tongue has told us:
 Errand-goers who forget?
 Soldiers heedless of their harry? Pilgrim people gone astray?
 We have heard a voice cry "Wander!"
 That was all we heard it say. 20

Ask no more: 'tis much, 'tis much!
 Down the road the day-star calls;
 Touched with change in the wide heavens, like a leaf the frost winds
 touch,
 Flames the failing moon a moment, ere it shrivels white and falls;
 Hid aloft, a wild throat holdeth sweet and sweeter intervals. 25

Leave him still to ease in song
 Half his little heart's unrest:
 Speech is his, but we may journey toward the life for which we long.
 God, who gives the bird its anguish,
 maketh nothing manifest,
 But upon our lifted foreheads pours
 the boon of endless quest. 30

AN ODE IN TIME OF HESITATION ²

I

Before the solemn bronze Saint Gaudens made
 To thrill the heedless passer's heart
 with awe,
 And set here in the city's talk and trade
 To the good memory of Robert Shaw,
 This bright March morn I stand, 5
 And hear the distant spring come up
 the land;
 Knowing that what I hear is not unheard

² After seeing at Boston the statue of Robert Gould Shaw, killed while storming Fort Wagner, July 18, 1863, at the head of the first enlisted negro regiment, the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts. (Moody's Note.)

Of this boy soldier and his negro band,
 For all their gaze is fixed so stern ahead, 9
 For all the fatal rhythm of their tread.
 The land they died to save from death and shame
 Trembles and waits, hearing the spring's great name,
 And by her pangs these resolute ghosts are stirred.

II

Through street and mall the tides of people go Heedless; the trees upon the Common
 show 15
 No hint of green; but to my listening
 heart
 The still earth doth impart
 Assurance of her jubilant emprise,
 And it is clear to my long-searching
 eyes
 That love at last has might upon the skies. 20
 The ice is runneled on the little pond;
 A telltale patter drips from off the
 trees;
 The air is touched with southland spi-
 ceries,
 As if but yesterday it tossed the frond
 Of pendant mosses where the live-oaks
 grow 25
 Beyond Virginia and the Carolines, Or had its will among the fruits and vines
 Of aromatic isles asleep beyond
 Florida and the Gulf of Mexico.

III

Soon shall the Cape Ann children shout in glee, 30
 Spying the arbutus, spring's dear recluse;
 Hill lads at dawn shall hearken the wild goose
 Go honking northward over Tennessee;
 West from Oswego to Sault Sainte-Marie,
 And on to where the Pictured Rocks are hung, 35
 And yonder where, gigantic, wilful,
 young,

Chicago sitteth at the northwest gates,
 With restless violent hands and casual
 tongue
 Moulding her mighty fates,
 The Lakes shall robe them in ethereal sheen; 40
 And like a larger sea, the vital green
 Of springing wheat shall vastly be out-flung
 Over Dakota and the prairie states.
 By desert people immemorial
 On Arizonan mesas shall be done 45 Dim rites unto the thunder and the
 sun;
 Nor shall the primal gods lack sacrifice
 More splendid, when the white Sierras
 call
 Unto the Rockies straightway to arise
 And dance before the unveiled ark of the year, 50
 Sounding their windy cedars as for shawms,
 Unrolling rivers clear
 For flutter of broad phylacteries;
 While Shasta signals to Alaskan seas
 That watch old sluggish glaciers downward creep 55
 To fling their icebergs thundering from the steep,
 And Mariposa through the purple calms
 Gazes at far Hawaii crowned with palms
 Where East and West are met,—
 A rich seal on the ocean's bosom set 60
 To say that East and West are twain,
 With different loss and gain:
 The Lord hath sundered them; let them be sundered yet.

IV

Alas! what sounds are these that come Sullenly over the Pacific seas,— 65
 Sounds of ignoble battle, striking dumb
 The season's half-awakened ecstasies?
 Must I be humble, then,
 Now when my heart hath need of
 pride?
 Wild love falls on me from these sculptured men; 70
 By loving much the land for which they died
 I would be justified.

My spirit was away on pinions wide
 To soothe in praise of her its passionate mood
 And ease it of its ache of gratitude. 75
 Too sorely heavy is the debt they lay
 On me and the companions of my day.
 I would remember now
 My country's goodness, make sweet her name.
 Alas! what shade art thou 80
 Of sorrow or of blame
 Lifest the lyric leafage from her brow,
 And pointest a slow finger at her shame?

V

Lies! lies! It cannot be! The wars
 we wage
 Are noble, and our battles still are won 85
 By justice for us, ere we lift the gage.
 We have not sold our loftiest heritage.
 The proud republic hath not stooped to cheat
 And scramble in the market-place of war;
 Her forehead weareth yet its solemn star. 90
 Here is her witness: this, her perfect
 son,
 This delicate and proud New England
 soul
 Who leads despised men, with just-unshackled feet,
 Up the large ways where death and glory meet,
 To show all peoples that our shame is done, 95
 That once more we are clean and spirit-whole.

VI

Crouched in the sea fog on the moaning sand
 All night he lay, speaking some simple word
 From hour to hour to the slow minds that heard,
 Holding each poor life gently in his hand 100
 And breathing on the base rejected clay
 Till each dark face shone mystical and grand

Against the breaking day;
 And lo, the shard the potter cast away
 Was grown a fiery chalice crystal-fine Fulfilled of the divine 106 Great wine of battle wrath by God's ring-finger stirred.
 Then upward, where the shadowy bastion loomed Huge on the mountain in the wet sea
 light,
 Whence now, and now, infernal flower-age bloomed, 110
 Bloomed, burst, and scattered down its deadly seed,—
 They swept, and died like freemen on the height,
 Like freemen, and like men of noble
 breed;
 And when the battle fell away at night
 By hasty and contemptuous hands were thrust 115
 Obscurely in a common grave with him
 The fair-haired keeper of their love and trust.
 Now limb doth mingle with dissolvèd
 limb
 In nature's busy old democracy
 To flush the mountain laurel when she blows 120
 Sweet by the southern sea,
 And heart with crumbled heart climbs in the rose:—
 The untaught hearts with the high heart that knew
 This mountain fortress for no earthly hold
 Of temporal quarrel, but the bastion
 old 125
 Of spiritual wrong,
 Built by an unjust nation sheer and
 strong,
 Expugnable but by a nation's rue
 And bowing down before that equal shrine
 By all men held divine, 130 Whereof his band and he were the most holy sign.

VII

O bitter, bitter shade!
 Wilt thou not put the scorn
 And instant tragic question from thine
 eye?
 Do thy dark brows yet crave 135

That swift and angry stave—
 Unmeet for this desirous morn—
 That I have striven, striven to evade?
 Gazing on him, must I not deem they err
 Whose careless lips in street and shop aver 140
 As common tidings, deeds to make his cheek
 Flush from the bronze, and his dead throat to speak?
 Surely some elder singer would arise, Whose harp hath leave to threaten and to mourn 144
 Above this people when they go astray.
 Is Whitman, the strong spirit, over-
 worn?
 Has Whittier put his yearning wrath
 away?
 I will not and I dare not yet believe!
 Though furtively the sunlight seems to grieve,
 And the spring-laden breeze 150
 Out of the gladdening west is sinister
 With sounds of nameless battle overseas;
 Though when we turn and question in suspense
 If these things be indeed after these
 ways,
 And what things are to follow after these, 155
 Our fluent men of place and consequence
 Fumble and fill their mouths with hollow phrase,
 Or for the end-all of deep arguments
 Intone their dull commercial liturgies—
 I dare not yet believe! My ears are shut! 160
 I will not hear the thin satiric praise
 And muffled laughter of our enemies, Bidding us never sheathe our valiant
 sword
 Till we have changed our birthright for a gourd
 Of wild pulse stolen from a barbarian's hut; 165
 Showing how wise it is to cast away
 The symbols of our spiritual sway,
 That so our hands with better ease
 May wield the driver's whip and grasp the jailer's keys.

VIII

Was it for this our fathers kept the
 law? 170
 This crown shall crown their struggle
 And their ruth?
 Are we the eagle nation Milton saw Mewing its mighty youth, Soon to possess the mountain winds of
 truth,
 And be a swift familiar of the sun 175
 Where aye before God's face his trumpets run?
 Or have we but the talons and the
 maw,
 And for the abject likeness of our heart
 Shall some less lordly bird be set apart?—
 Some gross-billed wader where the swamps are fat? 180
 Some gorgon in the sun? Some prowler with the bat?

IX

Ah no!
 We have not fallen so.
 We are our father's sons: let those who lead us know!
 'T was only yesterday sick Cuba's
 cry 185
 Came up the tropic wind, "Now help us, for we die!"
 Then Alabama heard,
 And rising, pale, to Maine and Idaho
 Shouted a burning word.
 Proud state with proud impassioned state conferred, 190
 And at the lifting of a hand sprang
 forth,
 East, west, and south, and north,
 Beautiful armies. Oh, by the sweet blood and young Shed on the awful hill slope at San Juan,
 By the unforgotten names of eager boys 195
 Who might have tasted girls' love and been stung
 With the old mystic joys
 And starry griefs, now the spring nights come on,
 But that the heart of youth is generous,—
 We charge you, ye who lead us, 200

Breathe on their chivalry no hint of stain!

Turn not their new-world victories to gain!

One least leaf plucked for chaffer from the bays

Of their dear praise,

One jot of their pure conquest put to hire, 205

The implacable republic will require;
With clamor, in the glare and gaze of
noon,

Or subtly, coming as a thief at night,
But surely, very surely, slow or soon
That insult deep we deeply will re-quite. 210

Tempt not our weakness, our cupidity!
For save we let the island men go free,
Those baffled and dislaureled ghosts
Will curse us from the lamentable coasts

Where walk the frustrate dead. 215

The cup of trembling shall be drained
quite,

Eaten the sour bread of astonishment,
With ashes of the hearth shall be made
white

Our hair, and wailing shall be in the tent;

Then on your guiltier head 220

Shall our intolerable self-disdain

Wreak suddenly its anger and its pain;
For manifest in that disastrous light

We shall discern the right

And do it, tardily.—O ye who lead, 225

Take heed!

Blindness we may forgive, but baseness
we will smite.

GLOUCESTER MOORS

A mile behind is Gloucester town
Where the fishing fleets put in,
A mile ahead the land dips down
And the woods and farms begin.

Here, where the moors stretch free 5

In the high blue afternoon,

Are the marching sun and talking sea,

And the racing winds that wheel and
flee

On the flying heels of June.

Jill-o'er-the-ground is purple blue, 10

Blue is the quaker-maid,

The wild geranium holds its dew
Long in the boulder's shade.

Wax-red hangs the cup
From the huckleberry boughs, 15

In barberry bells the grey moths sup,
Or where the choke-cherry lifts high up
Sweet bowls for their carouse.

Over the shelf of the sandy cove
Beach-peas blossom late. 20

By copse and cliff the swallows rove
Each calling to his mate.

Seaward the sea-gulls go,
And the land-birds all are here;

That green-gold flash was a vireo, 25
And yonder flame where the marsh-flags grow

Was a scarlet tanager.

This earth is not the steadfast place
We landsmen build upon;

From deep to deep she varies pace, 30
And while she comes is gone.

Beneath my feet I feel
Her smooth bulk heave and dip;

With velvet plunge and soft upreel
She swings and steadies to her keel 35

Like a gallant, gallant ship.

These summer clouds she sets for sail,
The sun is her masthead light,

She tows the moon like a pinnacle frail
Where her phosphor wake churns
bright. 40

Now hid, now looming clear,
On the face of the dangerous blue

The star fleets tack and wheel and veer,
But on, but on does the old earth steer

As if her port she knew. 45

God, dear God! Does she know her
port,

Though she goes so far about?
Or blind astray, does she make her sport

To brazen and chance it out?

I watched when her captains passed: 50
She were better captainless.

Men in the cabin, before the mast,
But some were reckless and some aghast,

And some sat gorged at mess.

By her battened hatch I leaned and
caught 55

Sounds from the noisome hold,—

Cursing and sighing of souls distraught
 And cries too sad to be told.
 Then I strove to go down and see;
 But they said, "Thou are not of us!" 60
 I turned to those on the deck with me
 And cried, "Give help!" But they said,
 "Let be:
 Our ship sails faster thus."

Jill-o'er-the-ground is purple blue,
 Blue is the quaker-maid, 65
 The alder-clump where the brook comes through Breeds cresses in its shade.
 To be out of the moiling street
 With its swelter and its sin!
 Who has given to me this sweet, 70
 And given my brother dust to eat?
 And when will his wage come in?
 Scattering wide or blown in ranks,
 Yellow and white and brown,
 Boats and boats from the fishing banks
 Come home to Gloucester town. 76
 There is cash to purse and spend,
 There are wives to be embraced,
 Hearts to borrow and hearts to lend,
 And hearts to take and keep to the end,— 80
 O little sails, make haste!

But thou, vast outbound ship of souls,
 What harbor town for thee?
 What shapes, when thy arriving tolls,
 Shall crowd the banks to see? 85
 Shall all the happy shipmates then Stand singing brotherly?
 Or shall a haggard ruthless few Warp her over and bring her to,
 While the many broken souls of men 90
 Fester down in the slaver's pen,
 And nothing to say or do?

THE MENAGERIE

Thank God my brain is not inclined to cut
 Such capers every day! I'm just about Mellow, but then—There goes the tent-flap shut.
 Rain's in the wind. I thought so:
 every snout
 Was twitching when the keeper turned me out. 5

That screaming parrot makes my blood run cold.
 Gabriel's trump! the big bull elephant
 Squeals "Rain!" to the parched herd.
 The monkeys scold,
 And jabber that it's rain water they want.
 (It makes me sick to see a monkey pant.) 10

I'll foot it home, to try and make believe
 I'm sober. After this I stick to beer,
 And drop the circus when the sane folks leave.
 A man's a fool to look at things too
 near:
 They look back, and begin to cut up queer. 15

Beasts do, at any rate; especially Wild devils caged. They have the coolest way
 Of being something else than what you
 see;
 You pass a sleek young zebra nosing
 hay,
 A nylghau looking bored and distin-gué,— 20

And think you've seen a donkey and a bird.
 Not on your life! Just glance back, if you dare.
 The zebra chews, the nylghau has n't
 stirred;
 But something's happened, Heaven knows what or where To freeze your scalp and pompadour your hair. 25

I'm not precisely an æolian lute
 Hung in the wandering winds of sentiment,
 But drown me if the ugliest, meanest brute
 Grunting and fretting in that sultry
 tent
 Did n't just floor me with embarrassment! 30

'T was like a thunder-clap from out
 the clear,—
 One minute they were circus beasts,
 some grand,

Some ugly, some amusing, and some queer:

Rival attractions to the hobo band,
The flying jenny, and the peanut stand. 35

Next minute they were old hearth-mates of mine!

Lost people, eyeing me with such a stare!

Patient, satiric, devilish, divine;
A gaze of hopeless envy, squalid care,
Hatred, and thwarted love, and dim despair. 40

Within my blood my ancient kindred spoke,—

Grotesque and monstrous voices, heard afar

Down ocean caves when behemoth awoke,

Or through fern forests roared the plesiosaur

Locked with the giant-bat in ghastly war. 45

And suddenly, as in a flash of light,
I saw great Nature working out her plan;

Through all her shapes from mastodon to mite

Forever groping, testing, passing on
To find at last the shape and soul of Man. 50

Till in the fulness of accomplished time,

Comes brother Forepaugh, upon business bent,

Tracks her through frozen and through torrid clime,

And shows us, neatly labeled in a tent,
The stages of her huge experiment; 55

Blabbing aloud her shy and reticent hours;

Dragging to light her blinking, slothful moods;

Publishing fretful seasons when her powers

Worked wild and sullen in her solitudes,

Or when her mordant laughter shook the woods. 60

Here, round about me, were her va-grant births;

Sick dreams she had, fierce projects she essayed;

Her qualms, her fiery prides, her crazy mirths;

The troublings of her spirit as she strayed,

Cringed, gloated, mocked, was lordly, was afraid, 65

On that long road she went to seek mankind;

Here were the darkling coverts that she beat

To find the Hider she was sent to find;

Here the distracted footprints of her feet

Whereby her soul's Desire she came to greet. 70

But why should they, her botch-work, turn about

And stare disdain at me, her finished job?

Why was the place one vast suspended shout

Of laughter? Why did all the daylight throb

With soundless guffaw and dumb-stricken sob? 75

Helpless I stood among those awful cages;

The beasts were walking loose, and I was bagged!

I, I, last product of the toiling ages,
Goal of heroic feet that never lagged,—

A little man in trousers, slightly jagged.

Deliver me from such another jury! 81

The Judgment-day will be a picnic to't.

Their satire was more dreadful than their fury,

And worst of all was just a kind of brute

Disgust, and giving up, and sinking mute. 85

Survival of the fittest, adaptation,
And all their other evolution terms,

Seem to omit one small consideration,

To wit, that tumblebugs and angleworms

Have souls: there's soul in everything that squirms. 90

And souls are restless, plagued, impatient things,

All dream and unaccountable desire;
Crawling, but pestered with the thought of wings;

Spreading through every inch of earth's old mire,

Mystical hanker after something higher. 95

Wishes are horses, as I understand.

I guess a wistful polyp that has strokes
Of feeling faint to gallivant on land
Will come to be a scandal to his folks;
Legs he will sprout, in spite of threats and jokes. 100

And at the core of every life that crawls

Or runs or flies or swims or vegetates—
Churning the mammoth's heart-blood, in the galls

Of shark and tiger planting gorgeous hates,

Lighting the love of eagles for their mates; 105

Yes, in the dim brain of the jellied fish
That is and is not living—moved and stirred

From the beginning a mysterious wish,
A vision, a command, a fatal Word:

The name of Man was uttered, and they heard. 110

Upward along the æons of old war

They sought him: wing and shank-bone, claw and bill

Were fashioned and rejected; wide and far

They roamed the twilight jungles of their will;

But still they sought him, and desired him still. 115

Man they desired, but mind you, Perfect Man,

The radiant and the loving, yet to be!

I hardly wonder, when they came to scan

The upshot of their strenuousity,
They gazed with mixed emotions upon
me. 120

Well, my advice to you is, Face the creatures,

Or spot them sideways with your weather eye,

Just to keep tab on their expansive features;

It isn't pleasant when you're stepping
high

To catch a giraffe smiling on the sly. 125

If nature made you graceful, don't get gay

Back-to before the hippopotamus;
If meek and godly, find some place to play

Besides right where three mad hyenas fuss:

You may hear language that we won't discuss. 130

If you're a sweet thing in a flower-bed
hat,

Or her best fellow with your tie tucked
in,

Don't squander love's bright springtime girding at

An old chimpanzee with an Irish chin:
There may be hidden meaning in his grin. 135

THE DAGUERRETYPE

This, then, is she,

My mother as she looked at seventeen,
When she first met my father. Young incredibly,

Younger than spring, without the faintest trace

Of disappointment, weariness, or tean 5
Upon the childlike earnestness and grace

Of the waiting face.

These close-wound ropes of pearl (Or common beads made precious by their use)

Seem heavy for so slight a throat to wear; 10

But the low bodice leaves the shoulders bare
 And half the glad swell of the breast, for news
 That now the woman stirs within the girl.

And yet,
 Even so, the loops and globes 15
 Of beaten gold
 And jet
 Hung, in the stately way of old,
 From the ears' drooping lobes
 On festivals and Lord's-day of the week, 20
 Show all too matron-sober for the cheek,—
 Which, now I look again, is perfect child,
 Or no—or no—'tis girlhood's very self,
 Moulded by some deep, mischief-ridden elf
 So meek, so maiden mild, 25
 But startling the close gazer with the sense
 Of passions forest-shy and forest-wild,
 And delicate delirious merriments.

As a moth beats sidewise
 And up and over, and tries 30
 To skirt the irresistible lure
 Of the flame that has him sure,
 My spirit, that is none too strong to-
 day,
 Flutters and makes delay,—
 Pausing to wonder on the perfect lips, Lifting to muse upon the low-drawn
 hair 36
 And each hid radiance there,
 But powerless to stem the tide-race
 bright,
 The vehement peace which drifts it toward the light
 Where soon—ah, now, with cries 40
 Of grief and giving-up unto its gain
 It shrinks no longer nor denies,
 But dips
 Hurriedly home to the exquisite heart of pain,—
 And all is well, for I have seen them
 plain, 45
 The unforgettable, the unforgotten
 eyes!

Across the blinding gush of these good
 tears
 They shine as in the sweet and heavy years
 When by her bed and chair
 We children gathered jealously to share 50
 The sunlit aura breathing myrrh and thyme,
 Where the sore-stricken body made a clime
 Gentler than May and pleasanter than
 rhyme,
 Holier and more mystical than prayer.
 God, how thy ways are strange! 55
 That this should be, even this,
 The patient head
 Which suffered years ago the dreary change!
 That these so dewy lips should be the same
 As those I stooped to kiss 60
 And heard my harrowing half-spoken
 name,
 A little ere the one who bowed above
 her,
 Our father and her very constant lover,
 Rose stoical, and we knew that she was
 dead.
 Then I, who could not understand or share 65
 His antique nobleness,
 Being unapt to bear
 The insults which time flings us for our proof,
 Fled from the horrible roof
 Into the alien sunshine merciless, 70
 The shrill satiric fields ghastly with
 day, Raging to front God in his pride of sway
 And hurl across the lifted swords of fate
 That ringed Him where He sat
 My puny gage of scorn and desolate hate 75
 Which somehow should undo Him, after
 all!
 That this girl face, expectant, vir-ginal,
 Which gazes out at me
 Boon as a sweetheart, as if nothing loth

(Save for the eyes, with other presage stored) 80

To pledge me troth,
And in the kingdom where the heart is lord

Take sail on the terrible gladness of the deep

Whose winds the grey Norns keep,—
That this should be indeed

The flesh which caught my soul, a flying seed, 85

Out of the to and fro
Of scattering hands where the seedsman Mage,

Stooping from star to star and age to age

Sings as he sows!
That underneath this breast 90

Nine moons I fed
Deep of divine unrest,

While over and over in the dark she
said,

"Blessèd! but not as happier children blessed"—

That this should be 95
Even she—

God, how with time and change
Thou makest thy footsteps strange!

Ah, now I know
They play upon me, and it is not so, 100

Why, 'tis a girl I never saw before,
A little thing to flatter and make weep,

To tease until her heart is sore,
Then kiss and clear the score;

A gypsy run-the-fields, 105
A little liberal daughter of the earth,

Good for what hour of truancy and mirth

The careless season yields Hither-side the flood of the year and yonder of the neap;

Then thank you, thanks again, and twenty light good-byes.— 110

O shrined above the skies,
Frown not, clear brow,

Darken not, holy eyes!
Thou knowest well I know that it is thou!

Only to save me from such memories
As would unman me quite, 116

Here in this web of strangeness caught
And prey to troubled thought

Do I devise

These foolish shifts and slight; 120
Only to shield me from the afflicting
sense

Of some waste influence
Which from this morning face and lustrous hair

Breathes on me sudden ruin and despair.

In any other guise, 125
With any but this girlish depth of gaze,

Your coming had not so unsealed and poured

The dusty amphoras¹ where I had stored

The drippings of the winepress of my days.

I think these eyes foresee, 130
Now in their unawakened virgin time,

Their mother's pride in me,
And dream even now, unconsciously,

Upon each soaring peak and sky-hung lea

You pictured I should climb. 135
Broken premonitions come,

Shapes, gestures visionary,
Not as once to maiden Mary

The manifest angel with fresh lilies came

Intelligibly calling her by name; 140
But vanishingly, dumb,

Thwarted and bright and wild,
As heralding a sin-defiled,

Earth-encumbered, blood-begotten, passionate man-child,

Who yet should be a trump of mighty
call 145

Blown in the gates of evil kings
To make them fall;

Who yet should be a sword of flame
before

The soul's inviolate door
To beat away the clang of hellish
wings; 150

Who yet should be a lyre
Of high unquenchable desire

In the day of little things.—
Look, where the amphoras,

The yield of many days, 155
Trod by my hot soul from the pulp of self

And set upon the shelf
In sullen pride

¹ jars

The Vineyard-master's tasting to abide—
 O mother mine! 160
 Are these the bringings-in, the doings fine,
 Of him you used to praise?
 Emptied and overthrown
 The jars lie strown.
 These, for their flavor duly nursed, 165
 Drip from the stopples vinegar accused;
 These, I thought honied to the very seal,
 Dry, dry,—a little acid meal,
 A pinch of mouldy dust,
 Sole leavings of the amber-mantling must; 170
 These, rude to look upon,
 But flasking up the liquor dearest won,
 Through sacred hours and hard,
 With watching and with wrestlings
 and with grief,
 Even of these, of these in chief, 175
 The stale breath sickens, reeking from the shard.
 Nothing is left. Ay, how much less than naught!
 What shall be said or thought
 Of the slack hours and waste imagin-
 ings,
 The cynic rending of the wings, 180
 Known to that froward, that unreckoning heart
 Whereof this brewage was the precious
 part,
 Treasured and set away with furtive
 boast?
 O dear and cruel ghost,
 Be merciful, be just! 185
 See, I was yours and I am in the dust.
 Then look not so, as if all things were
 well!
 Take your eyes from me, leave me to my shame,
 Or else, if gaze they must,
 Steel them with judgment, darken them with blame; 190
 But by the ways of light ineffable
 You bade me go and I have faltered from,
 By the low waters moaning out of hell
 Whereto my feet have come,
 Lay not on me these intolerable 195

Looks of rejoicing love, of pride, of happy trust!
 Nothing dismayed?
 By all I say and all I hint not made Afraid?
 O then, stay by me! Let 200
 These eyes afflict me, cleanse me, keep me yet,
 Brave eyes and true!
 See how the shrivelled heart, that long has lain
 Dead to delight and pain,
 Stirs, and begins again 205
 To utter pleasant life, as if it knew
 The wintry days were through;
 As if in its awakening boughs it heard
 The quick, sweet-spoken bird.
 Strong eyes and brave, 210
 Inexorable to save!

I AM THE WOMAN

I am the Woman, ark of the law and its breaker,
 Who chastened her step, and taught her knees to be meek, Bridled and bitted her heart and humbled her cheek, Parceled her will, and cried, "Take more!" to the taker, Shunned what they told her to shun, sought what they bade her seek, 5 Locked up her mouth from scornful speaking: now it is open to speak.
 I am she that is terribly fashioned, the creature
 Wrought in God's perilous mood, in His unsafe hour.
 The morning star was mute, behold-
 ing my feature,
 Seeing the rapture I was, the shame,
 and the power, 10
 Scared at my manifold meaning; he heard me call,
 "O fairest among ten thousand, acceptable brother!"
 And he answered not, for doubt; till he saw me crawl
 And whisper down to the secret worm,
 "O mother,
 Be not wroth in the ancient house; thy daughter forgets not at all." 15

I am the Woman, flee away, Soft withdrawer back from the maddened mate,
 Lurer inward and down to the gates of
 day
 And crier there in the gate,
 "What shall I give for thee, wild one,
 say!" 20
 The long slow rapture and patient anguish of life,
 Or art thou minded a swifter way?
 Ask if thou canst, the gold, but O, if thou must,
 Good is the shining dross, lovely the
 dust!
 Look at me, I am the Woman, harlot and heavenly wife; 25 Tell me thy price, be unashamed; I will assuredly pay!"

I am also the Mother: of two that I bore
 I comfort and feed the slayer, feed and comfort the slain.
 Did they number my daughters and sons? I am mother of more!
 Many a head they marked not, here in my bosom has lain, 30 Babbling with unborn lips in a tongue
 to be,
 Far, incredible matters, all familiar to
 me.
 Still would the man come whispering,
 "Wife!" but many a time my breast
 Took him not as a husband: I soothed him and laid him to rest Even as the babe of my body, and knew him for such. 35
 My mouth is open to speak, that was dumb too much!
 I say to you I am the Mother; and under the sword
 Which flamed each way to harry us forth from the Lord,
 I saw Him young at the portal, weeping and staying the rod,
 And I, even I was His mother, and I yearned as the mother of God. 40

I am also the Spirit. The Sisters laughed
 When I sat with them dumb in the portals, over my lamp,—

Half asleep in the doors: for my gown was raught Off at the shoulder to shield from the wind and the rain
 The wick I tended against the mysterious hour 45
 When the silent City of Being should ring with song,
 As the Lord came in with Life to the marriage bower.
 "Look!" laughed the elder Sisters; and crimson with shame
 I hid my breast away from the rosy
 flame.
 "Ah!" cried the leaning Sisters, pointing, doing me wrong; 50
 "Do you see?" laughed the wanton Sisters. "She will get her a lover ere long!"
 And it was but a little while till unto my need
 He was given, indeed,
 And we walked where waxing world
 after world went by;
 And I said to my lover, "Let us begone, 55
 O, let us begone, and try
 Which of them all the fairest to dwell in is,
 Which is the place for us, our desirable
 clime!"
 But he said, "They are only the huts
 and the little villages,
 Pleasant to go and lodge in rudely over the vintage-time!" 60
 Scornfully spake he, being unwise, Being flushed at heart because of our walking together.
 But I was mute with passionate prophecies;
 My heart went veiled and faint in the golden weather,
 While universe drifted by after still universe. 65
 Then I cried, "Alas, we must hasten
 and lodge therein,
 One after one, and in every star that they shed!
 A dark and a weary thing is come on our head—
 To search obedience out in the bosom
 of sin,
 To listen deep for love when thunders
 the curse; 70

For O my love, behold where the Lord hath planted
In every star in the midst his dangerous Tree!
Still I must pluck thereof and bring unto thee, Saying, "The coolness for which all night we have panted;
Taste of the goodly thing, I have tasted
first!" 75
Bringing us noway coolness, but burning thirst,
Giving us noway peace, but implacable
strife,
Loosing upon us the wounding joy and the wasting sorrow of life."

I am the Woman, ark of the Law and sacred arm to upbear it, Heathen trumpet to overthrow and idolatrous sword to shear it: 80
Yea, she whose arm was round the neck
of the morning star at song,
Is she who kneeleth now in the dust
and cries at the secret door,
"Open to me, O sleeping mother! The gate is heavy and strong.
Open to me, I am come at last; be wroth with thy child no more.
Let me lie down with thee there in the dark, and be slothful with thee as before!" 85

CLIFF KLINGENHAGEN¹

Cliff Klingenhagen had me in to dine
With him one day; and after soup and meat,
And all the other things there were to eat,
Cliff took two glasses and filled one with wine
And one with wormwood. Then, without a sign 5
For me to choose at all, he took the draught
Of bitterness himself, and lightly quaffed

It off, and said the other one was mine.

And when I asked him what the deuce
he meant
By doing that, he only looked at me 10
And smiled, and said it was a way of his.
And though I know the fellow, I have spent Long time a-wondering when I shall be
As happy as Cliff Klingenhagen is.

RICHARD CORY²

Whenever Richard Cory went down
town,
We people on the pavement looked at
him;
He was a gentleman from sole to crown,
Clean favored, and imperially slim.

And he was always quietly arrayed, 5
And he was always human when he talked;
But still he fluttered pulses when he
said,
"Good-morning," and he glittered when
he walked.

And he was rich—yes, richer than a king—
And admirably schooled in every grace:
In fine, we thought that he was everything 11
To make us wish that we were in his place.

So on we worked, and waited for the
light,
And went without the meat, and cursed
the bread;
And Richard Cory, one calm summer
night, 15
Went home and put a bullet through his head.

He wept that he was ever born,
And he had reasons.

Miniver loved the days of old 5
When swords were bright and steeds were prancing;

The vision of a warrior bold
Would set him dancing.

Miniver sighed for what was not,
And dreamed, and rested from his labors; 10

He dreamed of Thebes and Camelot,
And Priam's neighbors.

Miniver mourned the ripe renown
That made so many a name so fragrant;

He mourned Romance, now on the 15
town,
And Art, a vagrant.

Miniver loved the Medici,
Albeit he had never seen one:
He would have sinned incessantly
Could he have been one. 20

Miniver cursed the commonplace
And eyed a khaki suit with loathing;
He missed the mediæval grace
Of iron clothing.

Miniver scorned the gold he sought, 25
But sore annoyed was he without it; Miniver thought, and thought, and
thought,
And thought about it.

Miniver Cheevy, born too late, Scratched his head and kept on thinking, 30

Miniver coughed, and called it fate,
And kept on drinking.

THE RETURN OF MORGAN AND FINGAL ¹

And there we were together again—
Together again, we three:
Morgan, Fingal, fiddle, and all,
They had come for the night with
me.

¹ Copyright, The Macmillan Company. Reprinted by special permission.

The spirit of joy was in Morgan's wrist, 5
There were songs in Fingal's throat;
And secure outside, for the spray to drench,
Was a tossed and empty boat.

And there were the pipes, and there was the punch;
And somewhere were twelve years; 10
So it came, in the manner of things unsought,
That a quick knock vexed our ears.

The night wind hovered and shrieked and snarled,
And I heard Fingal swear;
Then I opened the door,—but I found
no more 15
Then a chalk-skinned woman there.

I looked, and at last, "What is it?" I
said—
"What is it that we can do?"
But never a word could I get from her
But "You—you three—it is you!" 20

Now the sense of a crazy speech like
that
Was more than a man could make;
So I said, "But we—we are what, we three?"
And I saw the creature shake.

"Be quick," she cried, "for I left her
dead— 25
And I was afraid to come;
But you—you three—God made it be—
Will ferry the dead girl home.

"Be quick! be quick!—but listen to
that!
Who is it that makes it?—hark!" 30
But I heard no more than a knocking splash
And a wind that shook the dark.

"It is only the wind that blows," I said,
"And the boat that rocks outside."
And I watched her there, and I pitied her there— 35
"Be quick! be quick!" she cried.

She cried so loud that her voice went in
 To find where my two friends were;
 So Morgan came, and Fingal came,
 And out we went with her. 40

'Twas a lonely way for a man to take
 And a fearsome way for three;
 And over the water, and all day long,
 They had come for the night with me.

But the girl was dead, as the woman had said, 45
 And the best we could see to do
 Was to lay her aboard. The north wind roared,
 And into the night we flew.

Four of us living and one for a ghost,
 Furrowing crest and swell, 50
 Through the surge and the dark, for that faint far spark,
 We ploughed with Azrael.

Three of us ruffled and one gone mad,
 Crashing to south we went;
 And three of us there were too spattered to care 55
 What this late sailing meant.

So down we steered and along we tore Through the flash of the midnight
 foam:
 Silent enough to be ghosts on guard
 We ferried the dead girl home. 60

We ferried her down to the voiceless wharf,
 And we carried her up to the light;
 And we left the two to the father there,
 Who counted the coals that night.

Then back we steered through the foam
 again, 65
 But our thoughts were fast and few;
 And all we did was to crowd the surge
 And to measure the life we knew;—

Till at last we came where a dancing
 gleam
 Skipped out to us, we three,— 70
 And the dark wet mooring pointed home
 Like a finger from the sea.

Then out we pushed the teetering skiff,
 And in we drew to the stairs;
 And up we went, each man content 75
 With a life that fed no cares.

Fingers were cold and feet were cold,
 And the tide was cold and rough;
 But the light was warm, and the room
 was warm,
 And the world was good enough. 80

And there were the pipes, and there was the punch,
 More shrewd than Satan's tears:
 Fingal had fashioned it, all by himself,
 With a craft that comes of years.

And there we were together again— 85
 Together again, we three:
 Morgan, Fingal, fiddle, and all—
 They were there for the night with
 me.

PARTNERSHIP ¹

Yes, you have it; I can see.
 Beautiful? . . . Dear, look at me!
 Look and let my shame confess Triumph after weariness.
 Beautiful? Ah, yes. 5

Lift it where the beams are bright;
 Hold it where the western light,
 Shining in above my bed,
 Throws a glory on your head.
 Now it is all said. 10

All there was for me to say
 From the first until to-day.
 Long denied and long deferred,
 Now I say it in one word—
 Now; and you have heard. 15

Life would have its way with us,
 And I've called it glorious:
 For I know the glory now
 And I read it on your brow.
 You have shown me how. 20

I can feel your cheeks all wet,
 But your eyes will not forget:
 In the frown you cannot hide

 printed by special permission.

I can read where faith and pride
Are not satisfied.

25

But the word was, two should live:
Two should suffer—and forgive:
By the steep and weary way,
For the glory of the clay,
Two should have their day.

30

We have toiled and we have wept
For the gift the gods have kept:
Clashing and unreconciled
When we might as well have smiled,
We have played the child.

35

But the clashing is all past,
And the gift is yours at last.
Lift it—hold it high again! . . .
Did I doubt you now and then?
Well, we are not men.

40

Never mind; we know the way,—
And I do not need to stay.
Let us have it well confessed:
You to triumph, I to rest.
That will be the best.

FLAMMONDE¹

The man Flammonde, from God knows
where,
With firm address and foreign air,
With news of nations in his talk
And something royal in his walk,
With glint of iron in his eyes,
But never doubt, nor yet surprise, Appeared, and stayed, and held his
head
As one by kings accredited.

5

Erect, with his alert repose
About him, and about his clothes,
He pictured all tradition hears
Of what we owe to fifty years.
His cleansing heritage of taste
Paraded neither want nor waste;
And what he needed for his fee
To live, he borrowed graciously.

15

He never told us what he was,
Or what mischance, or other cause,

printed by special permission.

Had banished him from better days
To play the Prince of Castaways. 20
Meanwhile he played surpassing well
A part, for most, unplayable;
In fine, one pauses, half afraid
To say for certain that he played.

For that, one may as well forego 25
Conviction as to yes or no;
Nor can I say just how intense
Would then have been the difference
To several, who, having striven
In vain to get what he was given, 30
Would see the stranger taken on
By friends not easy to be won.

Moreover, many a malcontent
He soothed and found munificent;
His courtesy beguiled and foiled 35
Suspicion that his years were soiled;
His mien distinguished any crowd,
His credit strengthened when he bowed;
And women, young and old, were fond
Of looking at the man Flammonde. 40

There was a woman in our town
On whom the fashion was to frown;
But while our talk renewed the tinge
Of a long-faded scarlet fringe,
The man Flammonde saw none of that,
And what he saw we wondered at— 46
That none of us, in her distress,
Could hide or find our littleness.

There was a boy that all agreed
Had shut within him the rare seed 50
Of learning. We could understand,
But none of us could lift a hand.
The man Flammonde appraised the
youth,
And told a few of us the truth;
And thereby, for a little gold, 55
A flowered future was unrolled.

There were two citizens who fought
For years and years, and over nought;
They made life awkward for their friends,
And shortened their own dividends. 60
The man Flammonde said what was
wrong
Should be made right; nor was it long Before they were again in line,
And had each other in to dine.

And these I mention are but four 65
 Of many out of many more.
 So much for them. But what of him—
 So firm in every look and limb?
 What small satanic sort of kink
 Was in his brain? What broken link 70
 Withheld him from the destinies
 That came so near to being his?

What was he, when we came to sift
 His meaning, and to note the drift
 Of incommunicable ways 75
 That make us ponder while we praise?
 Why was it that his charm revealed
 Somehow the surface of a shield?
 What was it that we never caught?
 What was he, and what was he not? 80

How much it was of him we met
 We cannot ever know; nor yet Shall all he gave us quite atone
 For what was his, and his alone;
 Nor need we now, since he knew best, 85
 Nourish an ethical unrest:
 Rarely at once will nature give
 The power to be Flammonde and live.

We cannot know how much we learn
 From those who never will return, 90
 Until a flash of unforeseen Remembrance falls on what has been.
 We've each a darkening hill to climb;
 And this is why, from time to time
 In Tilbury Town, we look beyond 95
 Horizons for the man Flammonde.

BEN JONSON ENTERTAINS A MAN FROM STRATFORD¹

You are a friend then, as I make it out,
 Of our man Shakespeare, who alone of
 us
 Will put an ass's head in Fairyland
 As he would add a shilling to more shillings,
 All most harmonious,—and out of his 5
 Miraculous inviolable increase Fills Ilion, Rome, or any town you like
 Of olden time with timeless English-
 men;
 And I must wonder what you think of
 him—

All you down there where your small Avon flows 10
 By Stratford, and where you're an Alderman.
 Some, for a guess, would have him riding back
 To be a farrier there, or say a dyer;
 Or maybe one of your adept surveyors;
 Or like enough the wizard of all tan-
 ners. 15
 Not you—no fear of that; for I discern In you a kindling of the flame that saves—
 The nimble element, the true caloric;²
 I see it, and was told of it, moreover,
 By our discriminate friend himself, no
 other. 20
 Had you been one of the sad average,
 As he would have it,—meaning, as I take it,
 The sinew and the solvent of our Island,
 You'd not be buying beer for this Ter-pander's³
 Approved and estimated friend Ben Jonson; 25
 He'd never foist it as a part of his Contingent entertainment of a towns-
 man
 While he goes off rehearsing, as he must,
 If he shall ever be the Duke of Stratford.
 And my words are no shadow on your
 town— 30
 Far from it; for one town's as like another
 As all are unlike London. Oh, he knows it,—
 And there's the Stratford in him; he denies it,
 And there's the Shakespeare in him.
 So, God help him!
 I tell him he needs Greek; but neither
 God 35
 Nor Greek will help him. Nothing will help that man.
 You see the fates have given him so
 much,
 He must have all or perish—or look out Of London, where he sees too many lords.

² essence of heat

³ a Greek musician and poet

They're part of half what ails him: I suppose 40
 There's nothing fouler down among the demons
 Than what it is he feels when he remembers
 The dust and sweat and ointment of his calling,
 With his lords looking on and laughing
 at him.
 King as he is, he can't be king de facto,
 And that's as well, because he wouldn't like it; 46
 He'd frame a lower rating of men than Than he has now; and after that would come
 An abdication or an apoplexy.
 He can't be king, not even king of Stratford,— 50
 Though half the world, if not the whole of it,
 May crown him with a crown that fits no king
 Save Lord Apollo's homesick emissary:
 Not there on Avon, or on any stream Where Naiads and their white arms are
 no more, 55
 Shall he find home again. It's all too bad.
 But there's a comfort, for he'll have that House—
 The best you ever saw; and he'll be
 there
 Anon, as you're an Alderman. Good
 God!
 He makes me lie awake o' nights and
 laugh. 60
 And you have known him from his origin,
 You tell me; and a most uncommon urchin
 He must have been to the few seeing ones—
 A trifle terrifying, I dare say, Discovering a world with his man's
 eyes, 65
 Quite as another lad might see some finches,
 If he looked hard and had an eye for nature.
 But this one had his eyes and their
 foretelling,

And he had you to fare with, and what else?
 He must have had a father and a mother— 70
 In fact I've heard him say so—and a dog,
 As a boy should, I venture; and the dog,
 Most likely, was the only man who knew him.
 A dog, for all I know, is what he needs
 As much as anything right here to-day,
 To counsel him about his disillusion, 76 Old aches, and parturitions of what's coming,—
 A dog of orders, an emeritus,
 To wag his tail at him when he comes
 home,
 And then to put his paws up on his knees 80
 And say, "For God's sake, what's it all about?"
 I don't know whether he needs a dog or
 not—
 Or what he needs. I tell him he needs
 Greek;
 I'll talk of rules and Aristotle with
 him,
 And if his tongue's at home he'll say to
 that, 85
 "I have your word that Aristotle knows,
 And you mine that I don't know Aristotle."
 He's all at odds with all the unities,
 And what's yet worse, it doesn't seem to matter;
 He treads along through Time's old wilderness 90
 As if the tramp of all the centuries
 Had left no roads—and there are none,
 for him;
 He doesn't see them, even with those
 eyes,—
 And that's a pity, or I say it is.
 Accordingly we have him as we have
 him— 95
 Going his way, the way that he goes best,
 A pleasant animal with no great noise
 Or nonsense anywhere to set him off—
 Save only divers and inclement devils Have made of late his heart their dwelling place. 100

A flame half ready to fly out sometimes

At some annoyance may be fanned up in him,

But soon it falls, and when it falls goes
out;

He knows how little room there is in
there

For crude and futile animosities, 105

And how much for the joy of being whole,

And how much for long sorrow and old
pain.

On our side there are some who may be given

To grow old wondering what he thinks of us

And some above us, who are, in his
eyes, 110

Above himself,—and that's quite right and English.

Yet here we smile, or disappoint the gods

Who made it so: the gods have always
eyes

To see men scratch; and they see one down here

Who itches, manor-bitten to the bone, Albeit he knows himself—yes, yes, he knows— 116

The lord of more than England and of
more

Than all the seas of England in all
time

Shall ever wash. D'y'e wonder that I laugh?

He sees me, and he doesn't seem to care; 120

And why the devil should he? I can't tell you.

I'll meet him out alone of a bright
Sunday,

Trim, rather spruce, and quite the gentleman.

"What ho, my lord!" say I. He doesn't hear me;

Wherefore I have to pause and look at
him. 125

He's not enormous, but one looks at
him.

A little on the round if you insist,
For now, God save the mark, he's growing old;

He's five and forty, and to hear him talk

These days you'd call him eighty; then you'd add 130

More years to that. He's old enough to be

The father of a world, and so he is.

"Ben, you're a scholar, what's the time of day?"

Says he; and there shines out of him
again

An aged light that has no eye or station— 135

The mystery that's his—a mischievous

Half-mad serenity that laughs at fame

For being won so easy, and at friends

Who laugh at him for what he wants the most,

And for his dukedom down in Warwickshire,— 140

By which you see we're all a little jealous—

Poor Greene! I fear the color of his name

Was even as that of his ascending
soul;

And he was one where there are many others,—

Some scrivening to the end against their fate, 145

Their puppets all in ink and all to die
there;

And some with hands that once would shade an eye

That scanned Euripides and Æschylus

Will reach by this time for a pot-house mop

To slush their first and last of royalties.

Poor devils! and they all play to his
hand; 151

For so it was in Athens and old Rome.

But that's not here or there; I've wandered off.

Greene does it, or I'm careful. Where's that boy?

Yes, he'll go back to Stratford. And we'll miss him? 155

Dear sir, there'll be no London here without him.

We'll all be riding, one of these fine
days,

Down there to see him—and his wife
won't like us;

And then we'll think of what he never
said 160

Of women—which, if taken all in all
With what he did say, would buy many horses.

Though nowadays he's not so much for women:

"So few of them," he says, "are worth the guessing."

But there's a worm at work when he says that, 165

And while he says it one feels in the air
A deal of circumambient hocus-pocus.

They've had him dancing till his toes
were tender,

And he can feel 'em now, come chilly rains.

There's no long cry for going into it, 170
However, and we don't know much about it.

But you in Stratford, like most here in London,

Have more now in the Sonnets than you paid for;

He's put one there with all her poison
on,

To make a singing fiction of a shadow
That's in his life a fact, and always will
be. 176

But she's no care of ours, though Time,
I fear,

Will have a more reverberant ado

About her than about another one

Who seems to have decoyed him, married him, 180

And sent him scuttling on his way to London,—

With much already learned, and more to learn,

And more to follow. Lord! how I see him now,

Pretending, maybe trying, to be like us.
Whatever he may have meant, we never had him; 185

He failed us, or escaped, or what you
will,—

And there was that about him (God knows what,—

We'd flayed another had he tried it on us)

That made as many of us as had wits
More fond of all his easy distances 190
Than one another's noise and clap-your-shoulder.

But think you not, my friend, he'd never talk!

Talk? He was eldritch¹ at it; and we listened—

Thereby acquiring much we knew before 194

About ourselves, and hitherto had held Irrelevant, or not prime to the purpose.

And there were some, of course, and
there be now,

Disordered and reduced amazingly

To resignation by the mystic seal

Of young finality the gods had laid

On everything that made him a young demon; 201

And one or two shot looks at him already

As he had been their executioner;

And once or twice he was, not knowing
it,—

Or knowing, being sorry for poor clay
And saying nothing— Yet, for all his engines, 206

You'll meet a thousand of an afternoon
Who strut and sun themselves and see around 'em

A world made out of more that has a reason

Than his, I swear, that he sees here today; 210

Though he may scarcely give a Fool an exit

But we mark how he sees in everything
A law that, given we flout it once too often,

Brings fire and iron down on our naked heads.

To me it looks as if the power that made him, 215

For fear of giving all things to one
creature,

Left out the first,—faith, innocence,
illusion,

Whatever 'tis that keeps us out o' Bedlam,—

And thereby, for his too consuming vision,

Empowered him out of nature; though to see him, 220

You'd never guess what's going on inside him.

He'll break out some day like a keg of ale

¹ uncanny

With too much independent frenzy in
it;
And all for cellaring what he knows won't keep,
And what he'd best forget—but that he can't. 225
You'll have it, and have more than I'm
foretelling;
And there'll be such a roaring at the Globe
As never stunned the bleeding gladiators.
He'll have to change the color of its
hair
A bit, for now he calls it Cleopatra. 230
Black hair would never do for Cleopatra.
But you and I are not yet two old
women,
And you're a man of office. What he does
Is more to you than how it is he does
it,—
And that's what the Lord God has never told him. 235
They work together, and the Devil
helps 'em;
They do it of a morning, or if not,
They do it of a night; in which event
He's peevish of a morning. He seems
old;
He's not the proper stomach or the
sleep— 240
And they're two sovran agents to conserve him
Against the fiery art that has no mercy
But what's in that prodigious grand new House.
I gather something happening in his boyhood Fulfilled him with a boy's determination 245
To make all Stratford 'ware of him.
Well, well,
I hope at last he'll have his joy of it,
And all his pigs and sheep and bellow-
ing beeves,
And frogs and owls and unicorns, more-
over,
Be less than hell to his attendant
ears. 250
Oh, past a doubt we'll all go down to see him.

He may be wise. With London two days off,
Down there some wind of heaven may yet revive him;
But there's no quickening breath from anywhere Shall make of him again the poised young faun 255
From Warwickshire, who'd made, it seems, already
A legend of himself before I came To blink before the last of his first lightning.
Whatever there be, there'll be no more of that;
The coming on of his old monster Time Has made him a still man; and he has dreams 261
Were fair to think on once, and all found hollow.
He knows how much of what men paint themselves
Would blister in the light of what they are;
He sees how much of what was great
now shares 265
An eminence transformed and ordinary;
He knows too much of what the world has hushed
In others, to be loud now for himself;
He knows now at what height low enemies
May reach his heart, and high friends
let him fall; 270
But what not even such as he may know Bedevils him the worst: his lark may sing
At heaven's gate how he will, and for as long
As joy may listen, but he sees no gate,
Save one whereat the spent clay waits a little 275
Before the churchyard has it, and the worm.
Not long ago, late in an afternoon,
I came on him unseen down Lambeth
way,
And on my life I was afraid of him:
He gloomed and mumbled like a soul from Tophet, 280
His hands behind him, and his head bent solemn.
"What is it now," said I,—"another woman?"

That made him sorry for me, and he smiled.

"No, Ben," he mused; "it's Nothing.
It's all Nothing.

We come, we go; and when we're done,
we're done." 285

"By God, you sing that song as if you knew it!"

Said I, by way of cheering him: "what ails ye?"

"I think I must have come down here to think,"

Says he to that, and pulls his little beard;

"Your fly will serve as well as anybody," 290

And what's his hour? He flies, and flies, and flies,

And in his fly's mind has a brave appearance;

And then your spider gets him in her
net,

And eats him out, and hangs him up to dry.

That's Nature, the kind mother of us
all. 295

And then your slattern housemaid swings her broom,

And where's your spider? And that's Nature, also.

It's Nature, and it's Nothing. It's all Nothing.

It's all a world where bugs and em-perors

Go singularly back to the same dust,
Each in his time; and the old, ordered
stars 301

That sang together, Ben, will sing the same

Old stave tomorrow."

When he talks like that,

There's nothing for a human man to do
But lead him to some grateful nook like
this 305

Where we be now, and there to make him drink.

He'll drink, for love of me, and then be sick;

A sad sign always in a man of parts,
And always very ominous. The great

Should be as large in liquor as in love,—
And our great friend is not so large in either: 311

One disaffects him, and the other fails
him;

Whatso he drinks that has an antic in
it,

He's wondering what's to pay in his in-
sides;

And while his eyes are on the Cyprian¹
He's fribbling all the time with that damned House. 316

We laugh here at his thrift, but after all
It may be thrift that saves him from the devil;

God gave it, anyhow,—and we'll suppose

He knew the compound of his handiwork. 320

To-day the clouds are with him, but anon

He'll out of 'em enough to shake the
tree

Of life itself and bring down fruit unheard-of—

And, throwing in the bruised and whole
together,

Prepare a wine to make us drunk with wonder; 325

And if he live, there'll be a sunset spell
Thrown over him as over a glassed lake

That yesterday was all a black wild
water.

God send he live to give us, if no more,
What's now a-rampage in him, and exhibit, 330

With a decent half-allegiance to the ages

An earnest of at least a casual eye Turned once on what he owes to Gutenberg,²

And to the fealty of more centuries
Than are as yet a picture in our vision.

"There's time enough,—I'll do it when I'm old, 336

And we're immortal men," he says to
that;

And then he says to me, "Ben, what's
'immortal'?

Think you by any force of ordination
It may be nothing of a sort more noisy
Than a small oblivion of component ashes 341

That of a dream-addicted world was once

¹ Aphrodite ² the inventor of printing

A moving atomy much like your friend
here?"

Nothing will help that man. To make him laugh,

I said then he was a mad mount-bank,—³⁴⁵

And by the Lord I nearer made him
cry.

I could have eat an eft then, on my knees,

Tail, claws, and all of him; for I had stung

The king of men, who had no sting for
me,

And I had hurt him in his memories; ³⁵⁰

And I say now, as I shall say again,

I love the man this side idolatry.

He'll do it when he's old, he says. I wonder.

He may not be so ancient as all that.

For such as he, the thing that is to do
Will do itself,—but there's a reckoning; ³⁵⁶

The sessions that are now too much his
own,

The roiling inward of a stilled outside,
The churning out of all those blood-fed

lines,

The nights of many schemes and little sleep, ³⁶⁰

The full brain hammered hot with too
much thinking,

The vexed heart over-worn with too much aching,—

This weary jangling of conjoined affairs
Made out of elements that have no end,

And all confused at once, I understand,
Is not what makes a man to live forever. ³⁶⁶

O no, not now! He'll not be going now:
There'll be time yet for God knows what explosions

Before he goes. He'll stay awhile.

Just wait:

Just wait a year or two for Cleopatra,
For she's to be a balsam and a comfort; ³⁷¹

And that's not all a jape ¹ of mine now, either.

For granted once the old way of Apollo Sings in a man, he may then, if he's able, ³⁷⁴

Strike unafraid whatever strings he will
Upon the last and wildest of new lyres;
Nor out of his new magic, though it hymn

The shrieks of dungeoned hell, shall he create

A madness or a gloom to shut quite out
A cleaving daylight, and a last great calm ³⁸⁰

Triumphant over shipwreck and all storms.

He might have given Aristotle creeps,
But surely would have given him his katharsis.

He'll not be going yet. There's too much yet

Unsung within the man. But when he goes, ³⁸⁵

I'll stake ye coin o' the realm his only
care

For a phantom world he sounded and found wanting

Will be a portion here, a portion there,
Of this or that thing or some other

thing

That has a patent and intrinsical ³⁹⁰

Equivalence in those egregious shillings.

And yet he knows, God help him! Tell
me, now,

If ever there was anything let loose

On earth by gods or devils heretofore

Like this mad, careful, proud, indifferent Shakespeare! ³⁹⁵

Where was it, if it ever was? By heaven,

'Twas never yet in Rhodes or Pergamon—

In Thebes or Nineveh, a thing like this!

No thing like this was ever out of England;

And that he knows. I wonder if he cares. ⁴⁰⁰

Perhaps he does— O Lord, that House in Stratford!

¹ joke

I have seen a shiver of amethyst,
And blue and cinnamon have flickered
A moment, 5
At the far end of a dusty street.

Through sheeted rain
Has come a lustre of crimson,
And I have watched moonbeams
Hushed by a film of palest green. 10

It was her wings, Goddess!
Who stepped over the clouds,
And laid her rainbow feathers
Aslant on the currents of the air. 15

I followed her for long,
With gazing eyes and stumbling feet.
I cared not where she led me,
My eyes were full of colours:
Saffrons, rubies, the yellows of beryls, 20
And the indigo-blue of quartz;
Flights of rose, layers of chrysoprase,
Points of orange, spirals of vermilion,
The spotted gold of tiger-lily petals,
The loud pink of bursting hydrangeas. 25
I followed,
And watched for the flashing of her
wings.

In the city I found her,
The narrow-streeted city.
In the market-place I came upon her, 30
Bound and trembling.
Her fluted wings were fastened to her sides with cords,
She was naked and cold,
For that day the wind blew Without sunshine. 35

Men chaffered for her,
They bargained in silver and gold,
In copper, in wheat,
And called their bids across the marketplace.

The Goddess wept! 40

Hiding my face I fled,
And the grey wind hissed behind me,
Along the narrow streets.

IN ANSWER TO A REQUEST

You ask me for a sonnet. Ah, my Dear, Can clocks tick back to yesterday at noon?
Can cracked and fallen leaves recall last June
And leap up on the boughs, now stiff and sere?
For your sake, I would go and seek the
year, 5
Faded beyond the purple ranks of dune, Blow sands of drifted hours, which the moon
Streaks with a ghostly finger, and her sneer
Pulls at my lengthening shadow. Yes,
'tis that!
My shadow stretches forward, and
the ground 10
Is dark in front because the light's behind.
It is grotesque, with such a funny
hat,
In watching it and walking I have found
More than enough to occupy my
mind.

I cannot turn, the light would make me
blind. 15

PATTERNS

I walk down the garden paths,
And all the daffodils
Are blowing, and the bright blue squills.
I walk down the patterned garden-paths
In my stiff, brocaded gown. 5
With my powdered hair and jewelled fan,
I too am a rare
Pattern. As I wander down
The garden paths.

My dress is richly figured, 10
And the train
Makes a pink and silver stain
On the gravel, and the thrift
Of the borders.

Just a plate of current fashion, 15
Tripping by in high-heeled, ribboned shoes.

Not a softness anywhere about me,
Only whalebone and brocade.
And I sink on a seat in the shade
Of a lime tree. For my passion 20
Wars against the stiff brocade.
The daffodils and squills
Flutter in the breeze
As they please.
And I weep; 25
For the lime-tree is in blossom
And one small flower has dropped upon my bosom.

And the plashing of waterdrops
In the marble fountain
Comes down the garden-paths. 30
The dripping never stops.
Underneath my stiffened gown
Is the softness of a woman bathing in a marble basin,
A basin in the midst of hedges grown
So thick, she cannot see her lover hiding, 35
But she guesses he is near,
And the sliding of the water
Seems the stroking of a dear
Hand upon her.
What is Summer in a fine brocaded
gown! 40
I should like to see it lying in a heap
upon the ground.
All the pink and silver crumpled up on the ground.

I would be the pink and silver as I ran along the paths,
And he would stumble after,
Bewildered by my laughter. 45
I should see the sun flashing from his sword-hilt and the buckles on his shoes.
I would choose
To lead him in a maze along the patterned paths,
A bright and laughing maze for my heavy-booted lover.
Till he caught me in the shade, 50
And the buttons of his waistcoat bruised my body as he clasped me,
Aching, melting, unafraid.

With the shadows of the leaves and the sundrops,
And the plopping of the waterdrops,
All about us in the open afternoon— 55
I am very like to swoon
With the weight of this brocade,
For the sun sifts through the shade.

Underneath the fallen blossom
In my bosom, 60
Is a letter I have hid.
It was brought to me this morning by a rider from the Duke.
“Madam, we regret to inform you that Lord Hartwell
Died in action Thursday se’nnight.”
As I read it in the white, morning sun-
light, 65
The letters squirmed like snakes.
“Any answer, Madam,” said my foot-
man.
“No,” I told him.
“See that the messenger takes some refreshment.
No, no answer.” 70
And I walked into the garden,
Up and down the patterned paths,
In my stiff, correct brocade.
The blue and yellow flowers stood up proudly in the sun,
Each one. 75
I stood upright too,
Held rigid to the pattern
By the stiffness of my gown.
Up and down I walked,
Up and down. 80

In a month he would have been my husband.
In a month, here, underneath this lime,
We would have broke the pattern;
He for me, and I for him,
He as Colonel, I as Lady, 85
On this shady seat.
He had a whim
That sunlight carried blessing.
And I answered, “It shall be as you have said.”
Now he is dead. 90

In Summer and in Winter I shall walk
Up and down
The patterned garden-paths
In my stiff, brocaded gown.

The squills and daffodils 95
 Will give place to pillared roses, and to asters, and to snow.
 I shall go
 Up and down
 In my gown.
 Gorgeously arrayed, 100
 Boned and stayed.
 And the softness of my body will be guarded from embrace
 By each button, hook, and lace.
 For the man who should loose me is
 dead,
 Fighting with the Duke in Flanders, 105
 In a pattern called a war.
 Christ! What are patterns for?

THE BOMBARDMENT

Slowly, without force, the rain drops into the city. It stops a moment on the carved head of Saint John, then slides on again, slipping and trickling over his stone cloak. It splashes from the lead conduit of a gargoyle, and falls from it in turmoil on the stones in the Cathedral square. Where are the people, and why does the fretted steeple sweep about in the sky? Boom! The sound swings against the rain. Boom, again! After it, only water rushing in the gutters, and the turmoil from the spout of the gargoyle. Silence. Ripples and mutters. Boom!

The room is damp, but warm. Little flashes swarm about from the firelight. The lustres of the chandelier are bright, and clusters of rubies leap in the bohemian glasses on the étagère.¹ Her hands are restless, but the white masses of her hair are quite still. Boom! Will it never cease to torture, this iteration! Boom! The vibration shatters a glass on the étagère. It lies there, formless and glowing, with all its crimson gleams shot out of pattern, spilled, flowing red, blood-red. A thin bell-note pricks through the silence. A door creaks. The old lady speaks: "Victor, clear away that broken glass." "Alas! Madame, the bohemian glass!" "Yes, Victor, one hundred years ago my father brought it—" Boom! The room shakes, the servitor quakes. Another goblet shivers and breaks. Boom!

It rustles at the window-pane, the smooth, steaming rain, and he is shut within its clash and murmur. Inside is his candle, his table, his ink, his pen, and his dreams. He is thinking, and the walls are pierced with beams of sunshine, slipping through young green. A fountain tosses itself up at the blue sky, and through the spattered water in the basin he can see copper carp, lazily floating among cold leaves. A wind-harp in a cedar-tree grieves and whispers, and words blow into his brain, bubbled, iridescent, shooting up like flowers of fire, higher and higher. Boom! The flame-flowers snap on their slender stems. The fountain rears up in long broken spears of dishevelled water and flattens into the earth. Boom! And there is only the room, the table, the candle, and the sliding rain. Again, Boom!—Boom!—Boom! He stuffs his fingers into his ears. He sees corpses, and cries out in fright. Boom! It is night, and they are shell-ing the city! Boom! Boom!

A child wakes and is afraid, and weeps in the darkness. What has made the bed shake? "Mother, where are you? I am awake." "Hush, my Darling, I am here." "But, Mother, something so queer happened, the room shook." Boom! "Oh! What is it? What is the matter?" Boom! "Where is Father? I am so afraid." Boom! The child sobs and shrieks. The house trembles and creaks. Boom!

Retorts, globes, tubes, and phials lie shattered. All his trials oozing across the floor. The life that was his choosing, lonely, urgent, goaded by a hope, all gone. A weary man in a ruined laboratory, that is his story. Boom! Gloom and ignorance, and the jig of drunken brutes. Diseases like snakes crawling over the earth, leaving trails of slime. Walls from people burying their dead. Through the window, he can see the rocking steeple. A ball of fire falls on the lead of the roof, and the sky tears apart on a spike of flame. Up the spire, behind the lacings of stone, zigzagging in and out of the carved tracings, squirms the fire. It spouts like yellow wheat from the gargoyles, coils around the head of Saint John, and aureoles him in light. It leaps into the night and hisses against the rain. The Cathedral is a burning stain on the white, wet night.

Boom! The Cathedral is a torch, and the houses next to it begin to scorch. Boom! The bohemian glass on the étagère is no longer there. Boom! A stalk of flame sways against the red damask curtains. The old lady cannot walk. She watches the creeping stalk and counts. Boom!—Boom!—Boom!

The poet rushes into the street, and the rain wraps him in a sheet of silver. But it is threaded with gold and powdered with scarlet beads. The city burns. Quivering, spearing, thrusting, lapping, streaming, run the flames. Over roofs, and walls, and shops, and stalls. Smearing its gold on the sky, the fire dances, lances itself through the doors, and lisps and chuckles along the floors.

The child wakes again and screams at the yellow petalled flower flickering at the window. The little red lips of flame creep along the ceiling beams.

The old man sits among his broken experiments and looks at the burning Cathedral. Now the streets are swarming with people. They seek shelter and crowd into the cellars. They shout and call, and over all, slowly and without force, the rain drops into the city. Boom! And the steeple crashes down among the people. Boom! Boom, again! The water rushes along the gutters. The fire roars and mutters. Boom!

REAPING

You want to know what's the matter with me, do yer?

My! ain't men blinder'n moles?
It ain't nothin' new, be sure o' that.

Why, ef you'd had eyes you'd ha' seed
Me changin' under your very nose, 5
Each day a little diff'rent.

But you never see nothin', you don't.

Don't touch me, Jake,
Don't you dars't to touch me,

I ain't in no humour. 10

That's what's come over me;
Jest a change clear through.

You lay still, an' I'll tell yer,
I've had it on my mind to tell yer

Fer some time. 15

It's a strain livin' a lie from mornin' till
night,

An' I'm goin' to put an end to it right
now.

An' don't make any mistake about one
thing,

When I married yer I loved yer.

Why, your voice 'ud make 20

Me go hot and cold all over,

An' your kisses most stopped my heart from beatin'.

Lord! I was a silly fool.

But that's the way 'twas.

Well, I married yer 25

An' thought Heav'n was comin'

To set on the door-step.

Heav'n didn't do no settin',

Though the first year warn't so bad.

The baby's fever threw you off some, I guess, 30

An' then I took her death real hard,

An' a mopey wife kind o' disgusts a
man.

I ain't blamin' yer exactly.

But that's how 'twas.

Do lay quiet,

I know I'm slow, but it's harder to say'n

I thought. 35

There come a time when I got to be

More wife agin than mother.

The mother part was sort of a waste

When we didn't have no other child.

But you'd got used ter lots o' things, 40

An' you was all took up with the farm.

Many's the time I've laid awake

Watchin' the moon go clear through the elm-tree,

Out o' sight.

I'd foller yer around like a dog, 45

An' set in the chair you'd be'n settin' in,

Jest to feel its arms around me,

So long's I didn't have yours.

It preyed on me, I guess,
 Longin' and longin' 50
 While you was busy all day, and snorin'
 all night.
 Yes, I know you're wide awake now,
 But now ain't then,
 An' I guess you'll think diff'rent
 When I'm done. 55
 Do you mind the day you went to Had-rock?
 I didn't want to stay home for reasons,
 But you said someone'd have to be here
 'Cause Elmer was comin' to see t' th' telephone.
 An' you never see why I was so set on goin' with yer. 60
 Our married life hadn't be'n any great shakes,
 Still marriage is marriage, an' I was raised God-fearin'.
 But, Lord, you didn't notice nothin',
 An' Elmer hangin' around all Winter!
 'Twas a lovely mornin'. 65
 The apple-trees was jest elegant
 With their blossoms all flared out,
 An' there warn't a cloud in the sky.
 You went, you wouldn't pay no 'tention
 to what I said,
 An' I heard the Ford chuggin' for most a mile, 70
 The air was so still.
 Then Elmer come.
 It's no use your frettin', Jake,
 I'll tell you all about it.
 I know what I'm doin', 75
 An' what's worse, I know what I done.
 Elmer fixed th' telephone in about two minits,
 An' he didn't seem in no hurry to go,
 An' I don't know as I wanted him to go either.
 I was awful mad at your not takin' me with yer, 80
 An' I was tired o' wishin' and wishin'
 An' gittin' no comfort.
 I guess it ain't necessary to tell yer all the things.
 He stayed to dinner,
 An' he helped me do the dishes, 85
 An' he said a home was a fine thing,
 An' I said dishes warn't a home
 Nor yet the room they're in.
 He said a lot of things,
 An' I fended him off at first, 90

But he got talkin' all around me,
 Clost up to the things I'd be'n thinkin'.
 What's the use o' me goin' on, Jake,
 You know.
 He got all he wanted, 95
 An' I give it to him,
 An' what's more, I'm glad!
 I ain't dead, anyway,
 An' somebody thinks I'm somethin'.
 Keep away, Jake,
 You can kill me to-morrer if you want
 to, 101
 But I'm goin' to have my say.
 Funny thing! Guess I ain't made to hold a man.
 Elmer ain't be'n here for mor'n two months.
 I don't want to pretend nothin', 105
 Mebbe if he'd be'n lately
 I shouldn't have told yer.
 I'll go away in the mornin', o' course.
 What you want the light fer?
 I don't look no different. 110
 Ain't the moon bright enough
 To look at a woman that's deceived yer
 by?
 Don't, Jake, don't; you can't love me
 now!
 It ain't a question of forgiveness.
 Why! I'd be thinkin' o' Elmer ev'ry minute; 115
 It ain't decent.
 Oh, my God! It ain't decent any more either way!

NUMBER 3 ON THE DOCKET

The lawyer, are you?
 Well! I ain't got nothin' to say.
 Nothin'!
 I told the perlice I hadn't nothin'.
 They know'd real well 'twas me. 5
 Ther warn't no supposin', Ketchin' me in the woods as they did,
 An' me in my house dress.
 Folks don't walk miles an' miles
 In the drifted snow, 10
 With no hat nor wrap on 'em
 Ef everythin's all right, I guess.
 All right? Ha! Ha! Ha!
 Nothin' warn't right with me.
 Never was. 15
 Oh, Lord! Why did I do it?

Why ain't it yesterday, and Ed here agin?
Many's the time I've set up with him
nights
When he had cramps, or rheumatizm, or somethin'.
I used ter nurse him same's ef he was a baby. 20
I wouldn't hurt him, I love him!
Don't you dare to say I killed him.
'Twarn't me!
Somethin' got ahold of me. I couldn't help it.
Oh, what shall I do! What shall I do!
Yes, sir, 25
No, Sir.
I beg your pardon, I—I—
Oh, I'm a wicked woman!
An' I'm desolate, desolate!
Why warn't I struck dead or paralyzed 30
Afore my hands done it?
Oh, my God, what shall I do!
No, Sir, ther ain't no extenuatin' circumstances,
An' I don't want none.
I want a bolt o' lightnin' 35
To strike me dead right now!
Oh, I'll tell yer.
But it won't make no diff'rence.
Nothin' will.
Yes, I killed him. 40
Why do yer make me say it?
It's cruel! Cruel!
I killed him because o' th' silence.
The long, long silence,
That watched all around me, 45
And he wouldn't break it.
I tried to make him,
Time an' agin,
But he was terrible taciturn, Ed was.
He never spoke 'cept when he had to, 50
An' then he'd only say "yes" and "no."
You can't even guess what that silence was.
I'd hear it whisperin' in my ears,
An' I got frightened, 'twas so thick,
An' al'ays comin' back. 55
Ef Ed would ha' talked sometimes
It would ha' driven it away;
But he never would.
He didn't hear it same as I did.
You see, Sir, 60

Our farm was off'n the main road,
And set away back under the mountain;
And the village was seven mile off, Measurin' after you'd got out o' our
lane.
We didn't have no hired man, 65
'Cept in hayin' time;
An' Dane's place,
That was the nearest,
Was clear way 'tother side the mountain.
They used Marley post-office 70
An' ours was Benton.
Ther was a cart-track took yer to Dane's in Summer,
An' it warn't above two mile that
way,
But it warn't never broke out Winters.
I used to dread the Winters. 75 Seem's ef I couldn't abear to see the golden-rod bloomin';
Winter'd come so quick after that.
You don't know what snow's like when yer with it
Day in an' day out.
Ed would be out all day loggin'. 80
An' I'd set at home and look at the snow
Layin' over everythin';
It 'ud dazzle me blind, Till it warn't white any more, but black as ink.
Then the quiet 'ud commence rushin'
past my ears 85
Till I most went mad listenin' to it.
Many's the time I've dropped a pan on the floor
Jest to hear it clatter.
I was most frantie when dinner-time
come
An' Ed was back from the woods. 90
I'd ha' give my soul to hear him speak.
But he'd never say a word till I asked
him
Did he like the raised biscuits or whatever,
An' then sometimes he'd jest nod his answer.
Then he'd go out agin, 95
An' I'd watch him from the kitchin winder.
It seemed the woods come marchin'
out to meet him

An' the trees 'ud press round him an'
hustle him.

I got so I was scared o' th' trees.
I thought they come nearer, 100

Every day a little nearer,
Closin' up round the house.

I never went in t' th' woods Winters,

Though in Summer I liked 'em well
enough.

It warn't so bad when my little boy was with us. 105

He used to go sleddin' and skatin',
An' every day his father fetched him to school in the pung

An' brought him back agin.
We scraped an' scraped for Neddy,

We wanted him to have a education. 110
We sent him to High School,

An' then he went up to Boston to Technology.

He was a minin' engineer,
An' doin' real well,

A credit to his bringin' up. 115
But his very first position ther was an explosion in the mine.

And I'm glad! I'm glad!

He ain't here to see me now.
Neddy! Neddy!

I'm your mother still, Neddy. 120
Don't turn from me like that.

I can't abear it. I can't! I can't!
What did you say?

Oh, yes, Sir.
I'm here. 125

I'm very sorry,
I don't know what I'm sayin'.

No, Sir,
Not till after Neddy died.

'Twas the next Winter the silence
come, 130

I don't remember noticin' it afore.
That was five year ago,

An' it's been gittin' worse an' worse.
I asked Ed to put in a telephone.

I thought ef I felt the whisperin' comin'
on 135

I could ring up some o' th' folks.
But Ed wouldn't hear of it.

He said we'd paid so much for Neddy
We couldn't hardly git along as 'twas.

An' he never understood me wantin' to talk. 140

Well, this year was worse'n all the others;

We had a terrible spell o' stormy
weather,

An' the snow lay so thick
You couldn't see the fences even.

Out o' doors was as flat as the palm o'
my hand, 145

Ther warn't a hump or a holler
Fer as you could see.

It was so quiet
The snappin' o' the branches back in the wood-lot

Sounded like pistol shots. 150
Ed was out all day

Same as usual.
An' it seemed he talked less'n ever.

He didn't even say "Good-mornin',"
once or twice,

An' jest nodded or shook his head when
I asked him things. 155

On Monday he said he'd got to go over to Benton

Fer some oats.
I'd oughter ha' gone with him,

But 'twas washin' day
An' I was afeard the fine weather'd
break, 160

An' I couldn't do my dryin'.
All my life I'd done my work punctual,

An' I couldn't fix my conscience
To go junketin' on a washin'-day.

I can't tell you what that day was to
me. 165

It dragged an' dragged, Fer ther warn't no Ed ter break it in the middle

Fer dinner.
Every time I stopped stirrin' the water

I heerd the whisperin' all about me. 170
I stopped oftener'n I should

To see if 'twas still ther,
An' it al'ays was.

An' gittin' louder,
It seemed ter me. 175

Once I threw up the winder to feel the wind.

That seemed most alive somehow.
But the woods looked so kind of men-acin'

I closed it quick
An' started to mangle's hard's I could; 180

The squeakin' was comfortin'. 181
 Well, Ed come home 'bout four.
 I seen him down the road,
 An' I run out through the shed inter
 th' barn
 To meet him quicker. 185
 I hollered out, "Hullo!"
 But he didn't say nothin',
 He jest drove right in
 An' climbed out o' th' sleigh
 An' commenced unharnessin'. 190
 I asked him a heap o' questions;
 Who he'd seed
 An' what he'd done.
 Once in a while he'd nod or shake,
 But most o' th' time he didn't do
 nothin'. 195
 'Twas gittin' dark then,
 An' I was in a state,
 With the loneliness
 An' Ed payin' no attention
 Like somethin' warn't livin'. 200
 All of a sudden it come,
 I don't know what,
 But I jest couldn't stand no more.
 It didn't seem's though that was
 Ed,
 An' it didn't seem as though I was
 me. 205
 I had to break a way out somehow;
 Somethin' was closin' in An' I was stifin'.
 Ed's loggin' axe was ther,
 An' I took it. 210
 Oh, my God!
 I can't see nothin' else afore me all the time.
 I run out inter th' woods,
 Seemed as ef they was pullin' me;
 An' all the time I was wadin' through the snow 215
 I seed Ed in front of me
 Where I'd laid him.
 An' I see him now.
 There! There!
 What you holdin' me fer? 220
 I want ter go to Ed,
 He's bleedin'!
 Stop holdin' me.
 I got to go.
 I'm comin', Ed. 225
 I'll be ther in a minit.
 Oh, I'm so tired!

VACHEL LINDSAY¹ (1879—)GENERAL WILLIAM BOOTH ENTERS INTO HEAVEN

(To be sung to the tune of The Blood of the Lamb with indicated instrument)

I

(Bass drum beaten loudly.)

Booth led boldly with his big bass drum—

(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)

The Saints smiled gravely and they said: "He's come."

(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)

Walking lepers followed, rank on rank, 5

Lurching bravos from the ditches
dank,

Drabs from the alleyways and drug fiends pale—

Minds still passion-ridden, soul-powers frail:—

Vermin-eaten saints with moldy breath,
Unwashed legions with the ways of Death— 10

(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)

(Banjos.)

Every slum had sent its half-a-score
The round world over. (Booth had groaned for more.)

Every banner that the wide world flies

Bloomed with glory and transcendent dyes. 15

Big-voiced lasses made their banjos
bang,

Tranced, fanatical they shrieked and sang:—

"Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?"

Hallelujah! It was queer to see Bull-necked convicts with that land make free. 20

Loons with trumpets blowed a blare, blare, blare

¹ All selections from The Collected Poems of Vachel Lindsay. Copyright, 1923, The Macmillan Company.

On, on upward thro' the golden air!
(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)

II

(Bass drum slower and softer.)

Booth died blind and still by Faith he trode,
Eyes still dazzled by the ways of God.
Booth led boldly, and he looked the chief— 26
Eagle countenance in sharp relief,
Beard a-flying, air of high command
Unabated in that holy land.

(Sweet flute music.)

Jesus came from out the court-house
door, 30
Stretched his hands above the passing
poor.
Booth saw not, but led his queer ones
there
Round and round the mighty courthouse square.
Yet in an instant all that blear review
Marched on spotless, clad in raiment
new. 35
The lame were straightened, withered
limbs uncurled,
And blind eyes opened on a new, sweet
world.

(Bass drum louder.)

Drabs and vixens in a flash made whole!
Gone was the weasel-head, the snout,
the jowl!

Sages and sibyls now, and athletes clean, 40
Rulers of empires, and of forests green!

(*Grand chorus of all instruments.
Tambourines to the foreground.*)

The hosts were sandalled, and their wings were fire!
(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)
But their noise played havoc with the angel-choir.
(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?) 45
Oh, shout Salvation! It was good to
see Kings and Princes by the Lamb set
free.
The banjos rattled and the tambourines
Jing-jing-jingled in the hands of Queens.

(Reverently sung, no instruments.)

And when Booth halted by the curb for prayer 50
He saw his Master thro' the flag-filled
air.
Christ came gently with a robe and
crown
For Booth the soldier, while the throng knelt down.
He saw King Jesus. They were face to face,
And he knelt a-weeping in that holy place. 55
Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?

THE CONGO

A STUDY OF THE NEGRO RACE

(Being a memorial to Ray Eldred, a Disciple missionary of the Congo River)

I. THEIR BASIC SAVAGERY

Fat black bucks in a wine-barrel room,
Barrel-house kings, with feet unstable,
Sagged and reeled and pounded on the table,
Pounded on the table,
Beat an empty barrel with the handle of a broom,
Hard as they were able,
Boom, boom, BOOM,

A deep rolling bass.

With a silk umbrella and the handle of a broom, Boomlay, boomlay, boomlay, Boom.
THEN I had religion, THEN I had a vision. I could not turn from their revel in derision.	10
THEN I SAW THE CONGO, CREEPING THROUGH THE BLACK, CUTTING THROUGH THE FOREST WITH A GOLDEN TRACK.	More deliberate. Solemnly chanied.
Then along that riverbank A thousand miles	15
Tattooed cannibals danced in files; Then I heard the boom of the blood-lust song And a thigh-bone beating on a tin-pan gong.	A rapidly piling climax of speed and racket.
And "BLOOD" screamed the whistles and the fifes of the warriors, "BLOOD" screamed the skull-faced, lean witch-doctors,	20
"Whirl ye the deadly voo-doo rattle, Harry the uplands, Steal all the cattle, Rattle-rattle, rattle-rattle, Bing.	25
Boomlay, boomlay, boomlay, Boom," A roaring, epic, rag-time tune From the mouth of the Congo To the Mountains of the Moon.	With a philo- sophic pause.
Death is an Elephant, Torch-eyed and horrible, Foam-flanked and terrible.	30
BOOM, steal the pygmies, BOOM, kill the Arabs, BOOM, kill the white men, Hoo, Hoo, Hoo.	Shrilly and with a heavily ac- cented metre.
Listen to the yell of Leopold's ghost Burning in Hell for his hand-maimed host. Hear how the demons chuckle and yell Cutting his hands off, down in Hell.	35
Listen to the creepy proclamation, Blown through the lairs of the forest-nation, Blown past the white-ants' hill of clay, Blown past the marsh where the butterflies play:— 'Be careful what you do,	40
Or Mumbo-Jumbo, God of the Congo, And all of the other Gods of the Congo, Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you, Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you, Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you."	45
	All the "o" sounds very golden. Heavy accents very heavy. Light accents very light. Last line whispered.
	50

II. THEIR IRREPRESSIBLE HIGH SPIRITS

Wild crap-shooters with a whoop and a call Danced the juba in their gambling-hall And laughed fit to kill, and shook the town, And guyed the policemen and laughed them down With a boomlay, boomlay, boomlay, Boom.	55
THEN I SAW THE CONGO, CREEPING THROUGH THE BLACK, CUTTING THROUGH THE FOREST WITH A GOLDEN TRACK.	Rather shrill and high. Read exactly as in first section.

A negro fairyland swung into view,
A minstrel river
Where dreams come true.

*Lay emphasis on the delicate ideas.
60 Keep as light-footed as possible.*

The ebony palace soared on high
Through the blossoming trees to the evening sky.
The inlaid porches and casements shone
With gold and ivory and elephant-bone.
And the black crowd laughed till their sides were sore
At the baboon butler in the agate door,
And the well-known tunes of the parrot band
That trilled on the bushes of that magic land.

65

A troupe of skull-faced witch-men came Through the agate doorway in suits of flame,
Yea, long-tailed coats with a gold-leaf crust
And hats that were covered with diamond-dust.
And the crowd in the court gave a whoop and a call
And danced the juba from wall to wall.

70 With pomposity.

But the witch-men suddenly stilled the throng
With a stern cold glare, and a stern old song:—
"Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you."—

75

With a great deliberation and ghostliness.

Just then from the doorway, as fat as shot,es,
Came the cake-walk princes in their long red coats,
Canes with a brilliant lacquer shine,
And tall silk hats that were red as wine.

80 *With overwhelming assurance,
good cheer, and pomp.*

And they pranced with their butterfly partners there,
Coal-black maidens with pearls in their hair,
Knee-skirts trimmed with the jassamine sweet,
And bells on their ankles and little black feet.

85 With growing speed and sharply marked dance-rhythm.

And the couples railed at the chant and the frown
Of the witch-men lean, and laughed them down.
(Oh, rare was the revel, and well worth while
That made those glowering witch-men smile.)

90

The cake-walk royalty then began
To walk for a cake that was tall as a man
To the tune of "Boomlay, boomlay, Boom,"
While the witch-men laughed, with a sinister air,
And sang with the scalawags prancing there:—

95 *With a touch of negro dialect,
and as rapidly as possible toward the end.*

"Walk with care, walk with care,
Or Mumbo-Jumbo, God of the Congo,
And all of the other Gods of the Congo,
Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you.

100

Beware, beware, walk with care,
Boomlay, boomlay, boomlay, boom.
Boomlay, boomlay, boomlay, boom,
Boomlay, boomlay, boomlay, boom,
Boomlay, boomlay, boomlay, Boom."

105

(Oh, rare was the revel, and well worth while
That made those glowering witch-men smile.)

Slow philosophic calm.

III. THE HOPE OF THEIR RELIGION

- A good old negro in the slums of the town
 Preached at a sister for her velvet gown.
 Howled at a brother for his low-down ways,
 His prowling, guzzling, sneak-thief days.
 Beat on the Bible till he wore it out
 Starting the jubilee revival shout.
 And some had visions, as they stood on chairs,
 And sang of Jacob, and the golden stairs,
 And they all repented, a thousand strong,
 From their stupor and savagery and sin and wrong
 And slammed with their hymn books till they shook the room
 With "Glory, glory, glory,"
 And "Boom, boom, Boom."
 THEN I SAW THE CONGO, CREEPING THROUGH THE BLACK,
 CUTTING THROUGH THE JUNGLE WITH A GOLDEN TRACK.
 And the gray sky opened like a new-rent veil
 And showed the Apostles with their coats of mail.
 In bright white steel they were seated round
 And their fire-eyes watched where the Congo wound.
 And the twelve Apostles, from their thrones on high,
 Thrilled all the forest with their heavenly cry:—
 "Mumbo-Jumbo will die in the jungle;
 Never again will he hoo-doo you,
 Never again will he hoo-doo you."
- Then along that river, a thousand miles,
 The vine-snared trees fell down in files.
 Pioneer angels cleared the way
 For a Congo paradise, for babes at play,
 For sacred capitals, for temples clean.
 Gone were the skull-faced witch-men lean.
 There, where the wild ghost-gods had wailed
 A million boats of the angels sailed
 With oars of silver, and prows of blue
 And silken pennants that the sun shone through.
 'Twas a land transfigured, 'twas a new creation.
 Oh, a singing wind swept the negro nation
 And on through the backwoods clearing flew:—
 "Mumbo-Jumbo is dead in the jungle.
 Never again will he hoo-doo you,
 Never again will he hoo-doo you."
- Redeemed were the forests, the beasts and the men,
 And only the vulture dared again
 By the far, lone mountains of the moon
 To cry, in the silence, the Congo tune: —
 "Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you,
 Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you.
 Mumbo . . . Jumbo . . . will . . . hoo-doo . . . you."
- Heavy bass.
 With a literal imitation of camp-meeting racket, and trance.*
- Exactly as in the first section.
 Begin with terror and power, end with joy.*
- Sung to the tune of "Hark, ten thousand harps
 and voices."*
- With growing deliberation and joy.*
- In a rather high key—as delicately as possible.*
- To the tune of
 "Hark, ten thousand harps
 and voices."*
- Dying down into a penetrating, terrified whisper.*

ABRAHAM LINCOLN WALKS AT MIDNIGHT

(IN SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS)

It is portentous, and a thing of state
That here at midnight, in our little town

A mourning figure walks, and will not
rest,
Near the old court-house pacing up and
down,

Or by his homestead, or in shadowed yards⁵
He lingers where his children used to
play,
Or through the market, on the well-worn stones
He stalks 'until the dawn-stars burn
away.

A bronzed, lank man! His suit of ancient black,
A famous high top-hat and plain worn shawl¹⁰
Make him the quaint great figure that men love,
The prairie-lawyer, master of us all.

He cannot sleep upon his hillside now.
He is among us:—as in times before!
And we who toss and lie awake for long¹⁵
Breathe deep, and start, to see him pass
the door.

His head is bowed. He thinks on men and kings.
Yea, when the sick world cries, how can he sleep?
Too many peasants fight, they know not why,
Too many homesteads in black terror weep.²⁰

The sins of all the war-lords burn his
heart.
He sees the dreadnaughts scouring
every main.
He carries on his shawl-wrapped shoulders now
The bitterness, the folly and the pain.

He cannot rest until a spirit-dawn²⁵ Shall come;—the shining hope of Europe free:

The league of sober folk, the Workers'
Earth,
Bringing long peace to Cornland, Alp and Sea.

It breaks his heart that kings must murder still,
That all his hours of travail here for men³⁰
Seem yet in vain. And who will bring white peace
That he may sleep upon his hill again?

EDGAR LEE MASTERS
(1868—)*From*THE SPOON RIVER ANTHOLOGY¹

KNOWLTON HOHEIMER

I was the first fruits of the battle of Missionary Ridge.
When I felt the bullet enter my heart
I wished I had staid at home and gone to jail
For stealing the hogs of Curl Trenary, Instead of running away and joining the army.⁵
Rather a thousand times the county jail
Than to lie under this marble figure with wings,
And this granite pedestal Bearing the words, "Pro Patria."
What do they mean, anyway?¹⁰

JACK MCGUIRE

They would have lynched me
Had I not been secretly hurried away
To the jail at Peoria.
And yet I was going peacefully home,
Carrying my jug, a little drunk,⁵
When Logan, the marshal, halted me, Called me a drunken hound and shook
me,
And, when I cursed him for it, struck
me

With that Prohibition loaded cane—
All this before I shot him. 10
They would have hanged me except for
this:

My lawyer, Kinsey Keene, was helping to land

Old Thomas Rhodes for wrecking the
bank,

And the judge was a friend of Rhodes
And wanted him to escape, 15

And Kinsey offered to quit on Rhodes
For fourteen years for me.

And the bargain was made. I served my time

And learned to read and write.

FIDDLER JONES

The earth keeps some vibration going
There in your heart, and that is you.
And if the people find you can fiddle,
Why, fiddle you must, for all your life.
What do you see, a harvest of clover? 5
Or a meadow to walk through to the river?

The wind's in the corn; you rub your hands

For beeves hereafter ready for market;

Or else you hear the rustle of skirts
Like the girls when dancing at Little Grove. 10

To Cooney Potter a pillar of dust
Or whirling leaves meant ruinous drouth;

They looked to me like Red-Head
Sammy

Stepping it off, to "Toor-a-Loor."
How could I till my forty acres 15

Not to speak of getting more,
With a medley of horns, bassoons, and piccolos

Stirred in my brain by crows and robins

And the creak of a wind-mill—only
these?

And I never started to plow in my life 20

That some one did not stop in the road
And take me away to a dance or picnic.

I ended up with forty acres;
I ended up with a broken fiddle—

And a broken laugh, and a thousand memories, 25
And not a single regret.

JOHN HANCOCK OTIS

As to democracy, fellow citizens,
Are you not prepared to admit That I, who inherited riches and was to the manner born,

Was second to none in Spoon River
In my devotion to the cause of Liberty?

While my contemporary, Anthony Findlay, 6

Born in a shanty and beginning life
As a water carrier to the section hands,
Then becoming a section hand when he was grown,

Afterwards foreman of the gang, until he rose 10

To the superintendency of the railroad,

Living in Chicago,
Was a veritable slave driver,

Grinding the faces of labor,
And a bitter enemy of democracy. 15

And I say to you, Spoon River,
And to you, O republic,

Beware of the man who rises to power
From one suspender.

WILLIAM H. HERNDON

There by the window in the old house
Perched on the bluff, overlooking miles of valley,

My days of labor closed, sitting out life's decline,

Day by day did I look in my memory,
As one who gazes in an enchantress' crystal globe, 5

And I saw the figures of the past,
As if in a pageant glass by a shining
dream,

Move through the incredible sphere of
time.

And I saw a man arise from the soil like a fabled giant

And throw himself over a deathless destiny, 10

Master of great armies, head of the republic,

Bringing together into a dithyramb of recreative song

The epic hopes of a people;
 At the same time Vulcan of sovereign
 fires,
 Where imperishable shields and swords were beaten out 15
 From spirits tempered in heaven.
 Look in the crystal! See how he hastens on
 To the place where his path comes up to the path
 Of a child of Plutarch and Shakespeare.
 O Lincoln, actor indeed, playing well your part, 20
 And Booth, who strode in a mimic play within the play,
 Often and often I saw you,
 As the cawing crows winged their way to the wood
 Over my housetop at solemn sunsets,
 There by my window, 25
 Alone.

LUCINDA MATLOCK

I went to the dances at Chandler-ville,
 And played snap-out at Winchester.
 One time we changed partners,

Driving home in the moonlight of middle June,
 And then I found Davis. 5
 We were married and lived together for seventy years,
 Enjoying, working, raising the twelve
 children,
 Eight of whom we lost
 Ere I had reached the age of sixty.
 I spun, I wove, I kept the house, I nursed the sick, 10
 I made the garden, and for holiday
 Rambled over the fields where sang the larks,
 And by Spoon River gathering many a
 shell,
 And many a flower and medicinal weed—Shouting to the wooded hills, singing to the green valleys. 15
 At ninety-six I had lived enough, that is all,
 And passed to a sweet repose.
 What is this I hear of sorrow and
 weariness,
 Anger, discontent and drooping hopes?
 Degenerate sons and daughters, 20
 Life is too strong for you—
 It takes life to love Life.

CHICAGO

Hog Butcher for the World,
 Tool Maker, Stacker of Wheat,
 Player with Railroads and the Nation's Freight Handler; Stormy, husky, brawling,
 City of the Big Shoulders: 5

They tell me you are wicked and I believe them, for I have seen your painted women under the gas lamps luring the farm boys.
 And they tell me you are crooked and I answer: Yes, it is true I have seen the gunman kill and go free to kill again.
 And they tell me you are brutal and my reply is: On the faces of women and children I have seen the marks of wanton hunger.
 And having answered so I turn once more to those who sneer at this my city, and I give them back the sneer and say to them:
 Come and show me another city with lifted head singing so proud to be alive and coarse and strong and cunning. 10
 Flinging magnetic curses amid the toil of piling job on job, here is a tall bold slugger set vivid against the little soft cities;

Fierce as a dog with tongue lapping for action, cunning as a savage pitted against the wilderness,

Bareheaded,

Shoveling,

Wrecking,

Planning,

Building, breaking, rebuilding,

Under the smoke, dust all over his mouth, laughing with white teeth,

Under the terrible burden of destiny laughing as a young man laughs,

Laughing even as an ignorant fighter laughs who has never lost a battle, 20

Bragging and laughing that under his wrist is the pulse, and under his ribs the heart of the people,

Laughing!

Laughing the stormy, husky, brawling laughter of Youth, half-naked, sweating, proud to be Hog Butcher, Tool Maker. Stacker of Wheat, Player with Railroads and Freight Handler to the Nation.

THE HARBOR

Passing through huddled and ugly walls

By doorways where women

Looked from their hunger-deep
eyes,

Haunted with shadows of hunger-
hands,

Out from the huddled and ugly
walls, 5

I came sudden, at the city's edge,

On a blue burst of lake,

Long lake waves breaking under the sun

On a spray-flung curve of shore;

And a fluttering storm of gulls, 10

Masses of great gray wings

And flying white bellies

Veering and wheeling free in the open.

MUCKERS

Twenty men stand watching the muckers.

Stabbing the sides of the ditch

Where clay gleams yellow,

Driving the blades of their shovels

Deeper and deeper for the new gas mains, 5

Wiping sweat off their faces

With red bandanas.

The muckers work on . . . pausing
. . . to pull

Their boots out of suckholes where they slosh.

Of the twenty looking on 10

Ten murmur, "Oh, it's a hell of a job,"

Ten others, "Jesus, I wish I had the job."

A FENCE

Now the stone house on the lake front is finished and the workmen are beginning the fence.

The palings are made of iron bars with steel points that can stab the life out of any man that falls on them.

As a fence, it is a masterpiece, and will shut off the rabble and all vagabonds and hungry men and all wandering children looking for a place to play.

Passing through the bars and over the steel points will go nothing except Death and the Rain and To-morrow.

MAMIE

Mamie beat her head against the bars of a little Indiana town and dreamed of romance and big things off somewhere the way the railroad trains all ran.

She could see the smoke of the engines get lost down where the streaks of steel flashed in the sun, and when the newspapers came in on the morning mail she knew there was a big Chicago far off, where all the trains ran.
 She got tired of the barber shop boys and the postoffice chatter and the church
 gossip and the old pieces the band played on the Fourth of July and Decoration Day
 And sobbed at her fate and beat her head against the bars and was going to kill herself
 When the thought came to her that if she was going to die she might as well die struggling for a clutch of romance among the streets of Chicago. 5
 She has a job now at six dollars a week in the basement of the Boston Store
 And even now she beats her head against the bars in the same old way and wonders if there is a bigger place the railroads run to from Chicago where maybe there is

romance
 and big things and real dreams that never go smash.

BUTTONS

I have been watching the war map slammed up for advertising in front of the newspaper office.
 Buttons—red and yellow buttons—blue and black buttons—are shoved back and forth across the map.

A laughing young man, sunny with freckles,
 Climbs a ladder, yells a joke to somebody in the crowd,
 And then fixes a yellow button one inch west
 And follows the yellow button with a black button one inch west. 5

(Ten thousand men and boys twist on their bodies in a red soak along a river
 edge,
 Gasping of wounds, calling for water, some rattling death in their throats.)
 Who would guess what it cost to move two buttons one inch on the war map here in front of the newspaper office where the freckle-faced young man is laughing to us?

ALAN SEEGER (1888-1916)

I HAVE A RENDEZVOUS WITH DEATH¹

I have a rendezvous with Death
 At some disputed barricade,
 When Spring comes back with rustling shade
 And apple-blossoms fill the air—
 I have a rendezvous with Death 5
 When Spring brings back blue days and fair.

It may be he shall take my hand
 And lead me into his dark land
 And close my eyes and quench my breath—

It may be I shall pass him still. 10
 I have a rendezvous with Death
 On some scarred slope of battered hill,
 When Spring comes round again this
 year
 And the first meadow-flowers appear.

God knows 'twere better to be deep 15
 Pillowed in silk and scented down,
 Where love throbs out in blissful
 sleep,

¹From Poems by Alan Seeger. Copyright, 1916, Charles Scribner's Sons.

Pulse nigh to pulse, and breath to
breath,
Where hushed awakenings are dear——
But I've a rendezvous with Death 20
At midnight in some flaming town,
When Spring trips north again this
year,
And I to my pledged word am true,
I shall not fail that rendezvous.

SARA TEASDALE¹ (1884-)

PITY

They never saw my lover's face,
They only knew our love was brief,
Wearing awhile a windy grace
And passing like an autumn leaf.

They wonder why I do not weep, 5
They think it strange that I can
sing;
They say, "Her love was scarcely deep Since it has left so slight a sting."

They never saw my love, nor knew
That in my heart's most secret place
I pity them as angels do 11
Men who have never seen God's face.

MEADOWLARKS

In the silver light after a storm, Under dripping boughs of bright new
green,
I take the low path to hear the meadowlarks Alone and high-hearted as if I were a queen.

What have I to fear in life or death 5
Who have known three things: the kiss in the night,
The white flying joy when a song is
born,
And meadowlarks whistling in silver light.

AUGUST MOONRISE

The sun was gone, and the moon was coming
Over the blue Connecticut hills;
The west was rosy, the east was flushed,
And over my head the swallows rushed
This way and that, with changeful wills. 5
I heard them twitter and watched them
dart

Now together and now apart
Like dark petals blown from a tree;
The maples stamped against the west
Were black and stately and full of
rest, 10

And the hazy orange moon grew up
And slowly changed to yellow gold While the hills were darkened, fold on fold

To a deeper blue than a flower could hold.

Down the hill I went, and then 15
I forgot the ways of men,
For night-scents, heady, and damp,
and cool,

Wakened ecstasy in me
On the brink of a shining pool.

O Beauty, out of many a cup 20
You have made me drunk and wild
Ever since I was a child,
But when have I been sure as now
That no bitterness can bend
And no sorrow wholly bow 25
One who loves you to the end?
And though I must give my breath
And my laughter all to death,
And my eyes through which joy
came,

And my heart, a wavering flame; 30
If all must leave me and go back
Along a blind and fearful track
So that you can make anew,
Fusing with intenser fire,
Something nearer your desire; 35
If my soul must go alone
Through a cold infinity,
Or even if it vanish, too,
Beauty, I have worshipped you.

Let this single hour atone 40
For the theft of all of me.

THE NET

I made you many and many a song,
 Yet never one told all you are—
 It was as though a net of words
 Were flung to catch a star;

It was as though I curved my hand 5
 And dipped sea-water eagerly,
 Only to find it lost the blue
 Dark splendor of the sea.

GOD'S WORLD¹

O world, I cannot hold thee close
 enough!
 Thy winds, thy wide grey skies!
 Thy mists that roll and rise!
 Thy woods, this autumn day, that ache
 and sag
 And all but cry with colour! That gaunt crag 5
 To crush! To lift the lean of that black bluff!
 World, World, I cannot get thee close
 enough!

Long have I known a glory in it all,
 But never knew I this;
 Here such a passion is 10
 As stretcheth me apart. Lord, I do fear Thou'st made the world too beautiful this year.
 My soul is all but out of me,—let fall
 No burning leaf; prithee, let no bird
 call.

ROBERT FROST (1875—)

THE DEATH OF THE HIRED
MAN²

Mary sat musing on the lamp-flame at the table
 Waiting for Warren. When she heard his step,

¹ From Renascence, published by Harper & Brothers. Copyright, 1917, by Edna St. Vincent Millay.

² From North of Boston, by Robert Frost. Copyright, 1914, Henry Holt and Company.

She ran on tip-toe down the darkened passage
 To meet him in the doorway with the news
 And put him on his guard. "Silas is back." 5
 She pushed him outward with her through the door
 And shut it after her. "Be kind," she
 said.
 She took the market things from Warren's arms
 And set them on the porch, then drew him down
 To sit beside her on the wooden steps. 10

"When was I ever anything but kind to him?
 But I'll not have the fellow back," he
 said.
 "I told him so last haying, didn't I?
 'If he left then,' I said, 'that ended it.'
 What good is he? Who else will harbour him 15
 At his age for the little he can do?
 What help he is there's no depending
 on.
 Off he goes always when I need him most.
 'He thinks he ought to earn a little pay,
 Enough at least to buy tobacco with, 20
 So he won't have to beg and be beholden.'
 'All right,' I say, 'I can't afford to pay
 Any fixed wages, though I wish I could.'
 'Someone else can.' 'Then someone else will have to.'
 I shouldn't mind his bettering himself 25
 If that was what it was. You can be certain,
 When he begins like that, there's someone at him
 Trying to coax him off with pocketmoney,—
 In haying time, when any help is scarce.
 In winter he comes back to us. I'm done." 30

"Sh! not so loud: he'll hear you," Mary
 said.

"I want him to: he'll have to soon or late."

"He's worn out. He's asleep beside the stove.

When I came up from Rowe's I found him here,

Huddled against the barn-door fast asleep, ³⁵

A miserable sight, and frightening, too—

You needn't smile—I didn't recognise him—

I wasn't looking for him—and he's changed.

Wait till you see."

"Where did you say he'd been?"

"He didn't say. I dragged him to the house, ⁴⁰

And gave him tea and tried to make him smoke.

I tried to make him talk about his travels.

Nothing would do: he just kept nodding off."

"What did he say? Did he say anything?"

"But little."

"Anything? Mary, confess ⁴⁵

He said he'd come to ditch the meadow for me."

"Warren!"

"But did he? I just want to know."

"Of course he did. What would you have him say?

Surely you wouldn't grudge the poor old man

Some humble way to save his self-respect. ⁵⁰

He added, if you really care to know, He meant to clear the upper pasture, too.

That sounds like something you have heard before?

Warren, I wish you could have heard the way

He jumbled everything. I stopped to look ⁵⁵

Two or three times—he made me feel so queer—

To see if he was talking in his sleep.

He ran on Harold Wilson—you remember—

The boy you had in haying four years since.

He's finished school, and teaching in his college. ⁶⁰

Silas declares you'll have to get him back.

He says they two will make a team for work:

Between them they will lay this farm as smooth!

The way he mixed that in with other things.

He thinks young Wilson a likely lad, though daft ⁶⁵

On education—you know how they fought

All through July under the blazing sun,

Silas up on the cart to build the load, Harold along beside to pitch it on."

"Yes, I took care to keep well out of earshot." ⁷⁰

"Well, those days trouble Silas like a dream.

You wouldn't think they would. How some things linger!

Harold's young college boy's assurance piqued him.

After so many years he still keeps finding

Good arguments he sees he might have used. ⁷⁵

I sympathise. I know just how it feels To think of the right thing to say too late.

Harold's associated in his mind with Latin.

He asked me what I thought of Harold's saying

He studied Latin like the violin ⁸⁰

Because he liked it—that an argument! He said he couldn't make the boy believe

He could find water with a hazel prong—

Which showed how much good school had ever done him.

He wanted to go over that. But most of all ⁸⁵

He thinks if he could have another chance
To teach him how to build a load of hay—"

"I know, that's Silas' one accomplishment.

He bundles every forkful in its place,
And tags and numbers it for future reference, 90

So he can find and easily dislodge it
In the unloading. Silas does that well.
He takes it out in bunches like big birds' nests.

You never see him standing on the hay
He's trying to lift, straining to lift himself." 95

"He thinks if he could teach him that,
he'd be
Some good perhaps to someone in the world.

He hates to see a boy the fool of books.
Poor Silas, so concerned for other folk,
And nothing to look backward to with pride, 100

And nothing to look forward to with hope,
So now and never any different."

Part of a moon was falling down the
west,
Dragging the whole sky with it to the hills.

Its light poured softly in her lap. She saw 105

And spread her apron to it. She put out her hand

Among the harp-like morning-glory strings,

Taut with the dew from garden bed to
eaves,

As if she played unheard the tenderness
That wrought on him beside her in the
night. 110

"Warren," she said, "he has come home
to die:

You needn't be afraid he'll leave you this time."

"Home," he mocked gently.

"Yes, what else but home?
It all depends on what you mean by home.

Of course he's nothing to us, any more

Than was the hound that came a stranger to us 116
Out of the woods, worn out upon the trail."

"Home is the place where, when you have to go there,
They have to take you in."

"I should have called it Something you somehow haven't to deserve." 120

Warren leaned out and took a step or two,
Picked up a little stick, and brought it back
And broke it in his hand and tossed it
by.

"Silas has better claim on us you think Than on his brother? Thirteen little miles 125

As the road winds would bring him to his door.

Silas has walked that far no doubt today.

Why didn't he go there? His brother's rich,

A somebody—director in the bank."

"He never told us that."

"We know it though."

"I think his brother ought to help, of course. 131

I'll see to that if there is need. He ought of right

To take him in, and might be willing
to—

He may be better than appearances.

But have some pity on Silas. Do you think 135

If he'd had any pride in claiming kin
Or anything he looked for from his brother,

He'd keep so still about him all this
time?"

"I wonder what's between them."

"I can tell you.
Silas is what he is—we wouldn't mind
him— 140

But just the kind that kinsfolk can't abide.

He never did a thing so very bad.
 He don't know why he isn't quite as good
 As anyone. He won't be made ashamed
 To please his brother, worthless though
 he is." 145

"I can't think Si ever hurt anyone."

"No, but he hurt my heart the way he
 lay
 And rolled his old head on that sharp-edged chair-back.
 He wouldn't let me put him on the lounge.
 You must go in and see what you can
 do. 150
 I made the bed up for him there to-
 night.
 You'll be surprised at him—how much he's broken.
 His working days are done; I'm sure of
 it."

"I'd not be in a hurry to say that."

"I haven't been. Go, look, see for yourself. 155
 But, Warren, please remember how it
 is:
 He's come to help you ditch the meadow.
 He has a plan. You mustn't laugh at
 him.
 He may not speak of it, and then he
 may.
 I'll sit and see if that small sailing
 cloud 160
 Will hit or miss the moon."

It hit the moon.
 Then there were three there, making a dim row,
 The moon, the little silver cloud, and she.

Warren returned—too soon, it seemed to her,
 Slipped to her side, caught up her hand and waited. 165

"Warren," she questioned.

"Dead," was all he answered.

THE MOUNTAIN¹

The mountain held the town as in a shadow,
 I saw so much before I slept there once:
 I noticed that I missed stars in the west,
 Where its black body cut into the sky.
 Near me it seemed: I felt it like a wall Behind which I was sheltered from a
 wind. 6
 And yet between the town and it I
 found,
 When I walked forth at dawn to see
 new things,
 Were fields, a river, and beyond, more fields.
 The river at the time was fallen away,
 And made a widespread brawl on cobble-stones; 11
 But the signs showed what it had done
 in spring;
 Good grass-land gullied out, and in the grass
 Ridges of sand, and driftwood stripped of bark.
 I crossed the river and swung round the mountain. 15
 And there I met a man who moved so
 slow
 With white-faced oxen in a heavy cart,
 It seemed no harm to stop him altogether.

"What town is this?" I asked.

"This? Lunenburg."

Then I was wrong: the town of my sojourn, 20
 Beyond the bridge, was not that of the mountain,
 But only felt at night its shadowy presence.
 "Where is your village? Very far from here?"

"There is no village—only scattered farms. 24
 We were but sixty voters last election.
 We can't in nature grow to many more;
 That thing takes all the room!" He moved his god.

 Copyright, 1914, Henry Holt and Company.

The mountain stood there to be pointed
at.

Pasture ran up the side a little way,
And then there was a wall of trees with trunks: 30

After that only tops of trees, and cliffs Imperfectly concealed among the leaves.

A dry ravine emerged from under boughs

Into the pasture.

"That looks like a path.

Is that the way to reach the top from
here?— 35

Not for this morning, but some other
time:

I must be getting back to breakfast
now."

"I don't advise your trying from this side.

There is no proper path, but those that have

Been up, I understand, have climbed from Ladd's. 40

That's five miles back. You can't mistake the place:

They logged it there last winter some way up.

I'd take you, but I'm bound the other
way."

"You've never climbed it?"

"I've been on the sides

Deer-hunting and trout-fishing. There's a brook 45

That starts up on it somewhere—I've heard say

Right on the top, tip-top—a curious thing.

But what would interest you about the brook,

It's always cold in summer, warm in winter.

One of the great sights going is to see 50
It steam in winter like an ox's breath,

Until the bushes all along its banks
Are inch-deep with the frosty spines and bristles—

You know the kind. Then let the sun shine on it!"

"There ought to be a view around the
world 55

From such a mountain—if it isn't wooded

Clear to the top." I saw through leafy screens

Great granite terraces in sun and
shadow,

Shelves one could rest a knee on getting up—

With depths behind him sheer a hundred feet; 60

Or turn and sit on and look out and
down,

With little ferns in crevices at his elbow.

"As to that I can't say. But there's the spring,

Right on the summit, almost like a fountain.

That ought to be worth seeing."

"If it's there. 65

You never saw it?"

"I guess there's no doubt

About its being there. I never saw it.

It may not be right on the very top:

It wouldn't have to be a long way down

To have some head of water from
above, 70

And a good distance down might not be noticed

By anyone who'd come a long way up.
One time I asked a fellow climbing it

To look and tell me later how it was."

"What did he say?"

"He said there was a lake 75

Somewhere in Ireland on a mountain top."

"But a lake's different. What about the spring?"

"He never got up high enough to see.
That's why I don't advise your trying this side.

He tried this side. I've always meant to go 80

And look myself, but you know how it
is:

It doesn't seem so much to climb a mountain

You've worked around the foot of all your life.

What would I do? Go in my overalls,

With a big stick, the same as when the cows 85

Haven't come down to the bars at milking time?

Or with a shotgun for a stray black
bear?

"Wouldn't seem real to climb for climbing it."

"I shouldn't climb it if I didn't want
to—

Not for the sake of climbing. What's its name?" 90

"We call it Hor: I don't know if that's right."

"Can one walk around it? Would it be too far?"

"You can drive round and keep in Lunenburg,

But it's as much as ever you can do,
The boundary lines keep in so close to
it. 95

Hor is the township, and the township's
Hor—

And a few houses sprinkled round the foot,

Like boulders broken off the upper cliff,

Rolled out a little farther than the rest."

"Warm in December, cold in June, you
say?" 100

"I don't suppose the water's changed at
all.

You and I know enough to know it's warm

Compared with cold, and cold compared with warm.

But all the fun's in how you say a thing."

"You've lived here all your life?"

"Ever since Hor 105
Was no bigger than a—" What, I did not hear.

He drew the oxen toward him with light touches

Of his slim goad on nose and offside
flank,

Gave them their marching orders and was moving.

MENDING WALL¹

Something there is that doesn't love a
wall,

That sends the frozen-ground-swell
under it,

And spills the upper boulders in the
sun;

And makes gaps even two can pass abreast.

The work of hunters is another thing: s
I have come after them and made repair

Where they have left not one stone on a stone,

But they would have the rabbit out of
hiding,

To please the yelping dogs. The gaps I mean,

No one has seen them made or heard them made, 10

But at spring mending-time we find them there.

I let my neighbor know beyond the hill;
And on a day we meet to walk the line

And set the wall between us once again.
We keep the wall between us as we go.

To each the boulders that have fallen to each. 16

And some are loaves and some so nearly balls

We have to use a spell to make them balance:

"Stay where you are until our backs are turned!"

We wear our fingers rough with handling them. 20

Oh, just another kind of outdoor game,
One on a side. It comes to little more;

There where it is we do not need the
wall:

Copyright, 1914, Henry Holt and Company.

He is all pine and I am apple-orchard.
My apple trees will never get across ²⁵
And eat the cones under his pines, I tell
him.

He only says, "Good fences make good neighbours."

Spring is the mischief in me, and I wonder

If I could put a notion in his head:

"Why do they make good neighbours?
Isn't it ³⁰

Where there are cows? But here there are no cows.

Before I built a wall I'd ask to know

What I was walling in or walling out,
And to whom I was like to give offence.
Something there is that doesn't love a wall, ³⁵

That wants it down." I could say
"Elves" to him,

But it's not elves exactly, and I'd rather

He said it for himself. I see him there Bringing a stone grasped firmly by the top

In each hand, like an old-stone savage armed. ⁴⁰

He moves in darkness as it seems to me,
Not of woods only and the shade of
trees.

He will not go behind his father's saying,

And he likes having thought of it so
well

He says again, "Good fences make good neighbours." ⁴⁵

BIRCHES ¹

When I see birches bend to left and right

Across the line of straighter darker
trees,

I like to think some boy's been swinging them.

But swinging doesn't bend them down to stay.

Ice-storms do that. Often you must have seen them ⁵

Loaded with ice a sunny winter morning

After a rain. They click upon themselves

As the breeze rises, and turn many-colored

As the stir cracks and crazes their enamel.

Soon the sun's warmth makes them shed crystal shells ¹⁰

Shattering and avalanching on the snow-crust

Such heaps of broken glass to sweep
away

You'd think the inner dome of heaven had fallen.

They are dragged to the withered bracken by the load,

And they seem not to break; though once they are bowed ¹⁵

So low for long, they never right themselves:

You may see their trunks arching in the woods

Years afterwards, trailing their leaves on the ground

Like girls on hands and knees that throw their hair

Before them over their heads to dry in the sun. ²⁰

But I was going to say when Truth broke in

With all her matter-of-fact about the ice-storm

(Now am I free to be poetical?)

I should prefer to have some boy bend
them

As he went out and in to fetch the cows— ²⁵

Some boy too far from town to learn baseball

Whose only play was what he found himself,

Summer or winter, and could play
alone.

One by one he subdued his father's trees

By riding them down over and over again ³⁰

Until he took the stiffness out of them,
And not one but hung limp, not one was left

For him to conquer. He learned all there was

To learn about not launching out too
soon

And so not carrying the tree away 35
 Clear to the ground. He always kept his poise
 To the top branches, climbing carefully
 With the same pains you use to fill a cup
 Up to the brim, and even above the brim.
 Then he flung outward, feet first, with a swish, 40
 Kicking his way down through the air to the ground.
 So was I once myself a swinger of birches.
 And so I dream of going back to be.
 It's when I'm weary of considerations,
 And life is too much like a pathless
 wood 45
 Where your face burns and tickles with the cobwebs
 Broken across it, and one eye is weeping
 From a twig's having lashed across it
 open.
 I'd like to get away from earth awhile
 And then come back to it and begin
 over. 50
 May no fate wilfully misunderstand
 me
 And half grant what I wish and snatch me away
 Not to return. Earth's the right place for love:
 I don't know where it's likely to go better.
 I'd like to go climbing a birch
 tree, 55
 And climb black branches up a snow-white trunk Toward heaven, till the tree could bear
 no more,
 But dipped its top and set me down
 again.
 That would be good both going and coming back.
 One could do worse than be a swinger of birches. 60

THE GUM-GATHERER¹

There overtook me and drew me in
 To his down-hill, early-morning stride,
 And set me five miles on my road
 Better than if he had had me ride,
 A man with a swinging bag for load 5
 And half the bag wound round his
 hand.
 We talked like barking above the din
 Of water we walked along beside.
 And for my telling him where I'd been
 And where I lived in mountain land 10
 To be coming home the way I was,
 He told me a little about himself.
 He came from higher up in the pass
 Where the grist of the new-beginning brooks
 Is blocks split off the mountain mass—
 And hopeless grist enough it looks 16
 Ever to grind to soil for grass.
 (The way it is will do for moss.)
 There he had built his stolen shack.
 It had to be a stolen shack 20
 Because of the fears of fire and loss
 That trouble the sleep of lumber folk:
 Visions of half the world burned black
 And the sun shrunk yellow in smoke.
 We know who when they come to town
 Bring berries under the wagon seat, 26
 Or a basket of eggs between their feet;
 What this man brought in a cotton sack
 Was gum, the gum of the mountain spruce.
 He showed me lumps of the scented
 stuff 30
 Like uncut jewels, dull and rough.
 It comes to market golden brown,
 But turns to pink between the teeth.

I told him this is a pleasant life 35
 To set your breast to the bark of trees
 That all your days are dim beneath,
 And reaching up with a little knife,
 To loose the resin and take it down
 And bring it to market when you please. 40

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL SUGGESTIONS

As aids to the study of American literature, a few general works are essential. The Cambridge History of American Literature, New York, 1917, 4 vols., and some standard history of the United States, should be available to every student. Good briefer histories of American literature are such works as Barrett Wendell's A Literary History of America, Boston, 1900; W. P. Trent's A History of American Literature, New York, 1903; Percy H. Boynton's A History of American Literature, Boston, 1919, and Walter C. Bronson's A Short History of American Literature, revised edition, Boston, 1919.

Certain works dealing with particular periods or phases of American letters are of such outstanding merit as to be almost indispensable. Moses Coit Tyler's A History of American Literature 1607-1676, New York, 1878, 2 vols., and the same author's A Literary History of the American Revolution, New York, 1897, 2 vols., are the best treatments of the early period. Fred Lewis Pattee's American Literature Since 1870, New York, 1915, is a most useful discussion of the entire field of recent literature. The same author's The Development of the American Short Story, New York, 1923, is one of many valuable discussions of this type. Carl Van Doren's two books on the American novel are listed in the note below. Norman Foerster's Nature in American Poetry, 1923, is a stimulating treatment of a significant theme. The Transcendental movement may best be approached through a study of the works listed at the beginning of the special bibliography on Emerson, p. 1155, below. R. L. Rusk's The Literature of the Middle Western Frontier, New York, 1925, 2 vols., and Lucy Lockwood Hazard's The Frontier in American Literature, New York, 1927, are studies of a hitherto somewhat neglected phase of American letters.

Three valuable reference manuals are S. J. Whitecomb's Chronological Outlines of American Literature, New York, 1894; W. T. Hastings' Syllabus of American Literature, Chicago, 1923; and Contemporary American Literature: Bibliographies and Study Outlines, Chicago, 1922, by John M. Manly and Edith Rickert.

THE STUDY OF THE AMERICAN DRAMA

The student interested in the American drama may well begin his reading with two chapters in the C.H.A.L.: "The Early Drama, 1756-1860," by Arthur H. Quinn, Vol. I, pp. 215 ff.; and "The Drama, 1860-1918," by Montrose J. Moses, Vol. III, pp. 266 ff. Each chapter is supplemented by an admirable bibliography. He may then proceed to Arthur Hornblow's History of the American Theatre, Philadelphia, 1919, 2 vols., and to Arthur E. Krows's Play Production in America, New York, 1916; further, to some work of broader scope like George P. Baker's Dramatic Technique, Boston, 1919, which deals with dramatic theory regardless of geographical or chronological limits.

Two collections of texts are of particular value: Montrose J. Moses's Representative Plays by American Dramatists, New York, 1917, 3 vols., and Arthur H. Quinn's Representative American Plays, New York, 1917. The best guides to further study will be found in the bibliographies of the C.H.A.L. No one interested in this phase of American literature will neglect the work of Clyde Fitch (1865-1909), William Vaughn Moody (1869-1910), Augustus Thomas (1859-), Percy MacKaye (1875-), and Eugene O'Neill (1888-). A special study of the one-act play, which should scarcely be limited to American authors, may be made through such convenient collections as: Fifty Contemporary One-Act Plays, edited by Frank Shay and Pierre Loving, New York, 1920; Representative One-Act Plays by American Authors, edited by Margaret Gardner Mayorga, Boston, 1919; and The Atlantic Book of Modern Plays, edited by S. A. Leonard, Boston, 1921.

THE STUDY OF THE AMERICAN NOVEL

For a study of the American novel two books by Carl Van Doren are invaluable: The American Novel, New York, 1921, and Contemporary American Novelists, New York, 1922. In addition, the student should make frequent reference to one or more of the standard works on prose fiction, which, though dealing with British as well as American novels, are indispensable for a study of the technique; probably the best of these is A Study of Prose Fiction, by Bliss Perry, Boston, 1902.

NOTES

JOHN SMITH (1580-1631)

Captain John Smith could probably qualify as the adventurer par excellence of the early seventeenth century. Born in the year 1580, he was not sixteen years old when his romantic career had fairly begun. For nine years he served as a professional soldier on the continent of Europe, attaching himself to various leaders, and ultimately finding himself a slave in Constantinople. The account of his escape from his brutal master, whom he killed with a flail, of his wanderings through the wilderness, of further adventures in Africa and on the Atlantic, and of his ultimate return to England in 1604, has the fascination of a mediæval romance, with the added virtue of substantial accuracy.

When the attempt to found an English Colony in Virginia was under way, Smith, scenting possibilities of excitement in a new part of the world, at once joined the movement, and was appointed to the council of the colony. From September 1608 to September 1609 he served as President. In America his genius for hairbreadth escapes did not forsake him, but despite the mishaps attendant upon a life such as his, he found time to do a considerable amount of literary and scientific work, and to administer the affairs of the colony in an able fashion.

The Jamestown colonists were for the most part "gentlemen" of broken fortune, indented laborers, and professional soldiers. It was a miscellaneous crew that Smith sought to lead: unskilled in manual labor, untutored in the ways of the wilderness, and ill provided with food, the colonists saw their numbers diminish—till after six months only thirty of the original one hundred and five were left alive. That the settlement was not entirely wiped out is due in large measure to Smith's ability and courage.

Smith returned to London in 1609, and in 1613 led an expedition which explored and surveyed the coasts of New England. He returned without the gold which his employers had ordered him to find, but with maps which were to prove of great value. It seems probable that the Separatists would have chosen him to lead the Mayflower expedition in 1620, had he been of their religious faith.

The latter years of his life Smith spent in England, writing the many works which attest his ability, energy, and resourcefulness. He died in 1631, leaving no descendants.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The best edition of Smith's works is that edited by A. G. Bradley, Edinburgh, 1910. His most important historical works are included in Original Narratives of Virginia, ed. L. G. Tyler, N. Y. 1907.

The life of Smith in the D.N.B. is succinct and authoritative; A. G. Bradley's Captain John Smith, London, 1905, is ampler, and more readable.

NOTES

A TRUE RELATION

1. This document, published in London in 1608, is the earliest extant printed account of the Jamestown colony.

THE GENERAL HISTORIE OF VIRGINIA

4. This is Smith's most pretentious historical work. It was first published in London, in 1624. Here for the first time appears the Pocahontas story, a fact which has led some persons to doubt its authenticity. But it seems probable that the omission of the incident from earlier works by Smith was merely an inadvertence, and that the account here given is substantially true.

"MOURT'S RELATION"

The document usually known by this title was published in London, in 1622, without any indication of authorship. It is known, however, to have been the work of Edward Winslow and William Bradford. As the earliest published account of the settlement at Plymouth, the book would possess a sentimental value even if it had no other. But since it is a vivid and accurate account, written by competent eye-witnesses, of the early days at Plymouth, and since it contains certain information otherwise unavailable, the document assumes a position of unique importance in early American literature.

The signature "G. Mourt," which appears at the close of the "Address to the Reader," has given rise to the commonly accepted title. The text in this volume is based on Henry M. Dexter's edition of the Relation, Boston, 1865, which is a good and readily available edition.

NOTES

6. a. 46. In the name of God, Amen. The following articles of agreement, generally known as "The Mayflower Compact," formed the fundamental law under which Plymouth governed itself for upwards of half a century.
6. b. 2. The Northerne parts of Virginia. In the seventeenth century the word "Virginia" denoted little more than that part of North America lying between the holdings of Spain in the south and of France in the north. The charter granted in 1606 to the Royal Virginia Company defined the territory as lying between the 34th and 44th parallels of latitude.

WILLIAM BRADFORD (1589-1657)

Bradford's position in American civilization is unique. To him, more surely than to any other one man, was due the success of the Pilgrim experiment at Plymouth. His energy, foresight, kindliness, firmness, and heroism saved the hundred and two Mayflower colonists from disaster. Without Bradford, the chronicle of English settlements in New England would have been a different story.

He was born in 1589, in Yorkshire, of a family which possessed some property, but no particular social standing. In 1606 he felt himself compelled by his conscience to join the Brownists, or Separatists, who were meeting at the home of William Brewster, in Scrooby, Nottinghamshire. Desiring a sort of religious liberty which was not to be had in England at the time, Bradford and his associates considered emigrating to Holland, and by 1609, after various difficulties, found themselves established at Leyden. Here, in 1613, Bradford married Dorothy May, who later accompanied him to New England, only to be tragically drowned in Provincetown harbor while her husband was absent on one of the preliminary exploring trips.

From 1613 to 1620 Bradford fades out of the picture of the Separatist colony in Holland. Others than he were chiefly responsible for organizing the Mayflower expedition. But when once the colonists reached New England, Bradford's influence and importance became immediately obvious. John Carver, who had been elected the first governor of the colony, died on April 21, 1621. Bradford was promptly chosen to fill his place, and from that time till his death in May of 1657 was in the governor's chair every year but five. His ability as an administrator was gratefully recognized by his contemporaries. It is almost as obvious to the student who three centuries later turns the pages of his historical work.

Bradford's importance as a man of letters is confined rather sharply to two books: the first half of the so-called Mourt's Relation, in which he chronicled events from September 6, 1620, to March 23, 1621; and the history to which he gave no title but Of Plimoth Plantation. The latter is one of the most important documents in our early literature, partly because it gives a connected account of the Separatist movement from its origin at the time of the English Reformation to the year 1646, and partly because it is so well written that even if it had no historical significance it would still be a monument in the history of American culture.

It is obvious that Bradford, despite his lack of formal education, was a man of learning and literary skill. He knew Latin, Greek, and Hebrew; he was well versed in philosophy and theology; and—naturally—was thoroughly familiar with the sonorous cadences of the Bible. When he himself came to write, his sentences shaped themselves more or less after the model of the Biblical form; his own dignity, integrity, and heroic unselfishness lent a character to the narrative which the work of a petty man, however learned, could never have possessed. The student who becomes familiar with Of Plimoth Plantation, will see at first hand the life of the Pilgrim colony; he will also become acquainted with one of the noblest of early American leaders.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. Bradford's History of Plymouth—to give it the usual title—is readily available. The earliest complete edition was that prepared by Charles Deane for the Massachusetts Historical Society, and published in 1856 in the Collections, Series 4, vol. 3. A more recent edition is that of W. T. Davis, N. Y. 1908, which makes one volume in the series of Original Narratives of Early American History, and contains valuable explanatory material. W. C. Ford's two-volume edition, Boston, 1912, is even more elaborate than Deane's in its editorial matter, and contains a biographical memoir.

BIOGRAPHIES. Biographical studies of Bradford are regrettably few. Shepard's Governor William Bradford and his Son, Major William Bradford, N. Y. 1900, is the most extensive. A considerable amount of biographical material may be found in the introduction to John A. Doyle's facsimile reproduction of the entire manuscript, London and Boston, 1896, and in Harold Paget's modernization of the History, N. Y. 1920.

NOTES

OF PLIMOTH PLANTATION

10. The volume which bears this title was written by Bradford between the years 1630 and 1648. From 1648 to 1767 the manuscript is known to have been in Massachusetts, where it was consulted by various historical writers. Then it disappeared, to be discovered in 1855 in the library of the Bishop of London, at Fulham. At once the Massachusetts Historical Society secured permission to make a copy, and in 1856 published Charles Deane's edition. In 1897 the Bishop of London returned the manuscript to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, where it now occupies a place of honor in the State Library.
10. a. 45. These troubles being blowne over. The reference is to the difficulties experienced by the ship Speedwell, which had accompanied the Mayflower on the first attempt to cross the Atlantic, but had leaked so seriously as to necessitate putting back to port, leaving some passengers behind, and transshipping the rest to the already crowded Mayflower.
11. a. 20. Were forced to hull. To run before the wind with the sails furled.
12. a. 8. The apostle and his shipwrecked company. See Acts xxxiii.
12. a. 26. Goe up to the tope of Pisgah. A mountain north-east of the Dead Sea, from one spur of which, Nebo, Moses obtained his view of the land of promise. See Deuteronomy xxxiv.

12. b. 15. How the case stood betweene them and the marchants. The Pilgrims, not having enough funds to finance their venture themselves, had been forced to bargain with the London "Merchants Adventurers," who transported them to New England. Payment was to be made after seven years, and was to consist of one half of all the "capitall and profits" of the colony at the end of the period.
12. b. 46. The departure of this ship. The ship Fortune, which arrived at Plymouth about the middle of November, 1621, with 35 settlers. Bradford notes, "The plantation was glad of this addition of strength, but could have wished that many of them had been of beter condition, and all of them beter (sic) furnished with provisions; but that could not now be helpte."
13. a. 10. The Narigansetts. These particular Indians were to prove troublesome neighbors.
13. b. 40. In the generell way as before. The articles of agreement between the Pilgrims and the Merchants Adventurers had provided that "all profits and benefits that are gott by trade, traffick, trucking, working, fishing, or other means . . . remain in the common stock." It proved impossible to administer affairs on this basis, and Bradford early came to the conclusion that so far as corn, at least, was concerned, each man must plant and cultivate his own.
14. b. 10. Captaine Wollastone. . . . Mr. Morton. For another side of this story, see Morton's account, p. 27 above. Hawthorne's tale, The Maypole of Merry-mount, is a modern re-telling of the incident here recorded.
14. b. 31. Selling their time. The "servants" whom Wollaston thus disposed of were indentured laborers, bound to serve for a term of years. He had the right to sell what remained unexpired of the indentured period.
15. a. 42. Sundry rimes and verses. See p. 27, this volume.
15. b. 2. Mr. John Indecott. John Endicott (?1588-1665) appears often in the chronicles of early Massachusetts. His most notorious exploit was the act of cutting the cross from the royal colors. See the selections from Winthrop's Journal, p. 23, above. Hawthorne's Endicott and the Red Cross is the best-known account of the incident.
16. a. 5. Scruplats to make scrupins. Screw-plates for making screw-pins. The screw-pin controlled the spring in the lock of an old-fashioned fire-arm.

17. b. 15. Mr. Roger Williams. This famous apostle of religious toleration appears often in the early records. See the selections from Williams's own works, p. 31, above.

VERSES DESCRIPTIVE OF NEW ENGLAND

18. "A Descriptive and Historical Account of New England in Verse" is the title prefixed to these lines by Bradford in the Collections of the Massachusetts Historical Society, First Series, vol. III, Boston, 1794, pp. 77 ff. The poem is much too long to be reprinted entire.

JOHN WINTHROP (1588-1649)

As Plymouth owed her existence to the notable ability of William Bradford, so Boston, or more properly the Province of Massachusetts Bay, was dependent in considerable measure upon the energy and administrative skill of John Winthrop.

He was born in 1588, in Suffolk, of a good family, and received his education at Trinity College, Cambridge. Marrying in 1605, before a degree had been granted him, he spent the next few years at the home of his wife in Essex. When she died in 1615 he had become a man of considerable property, of respected social position, and of markedly religious propensities. A second wife, whom he married in 1616, lived less than a year. In 1618 he married Margaret Tyndal, who was later to follow him on his great adventure to America.

How Winthrop spent the next few years is not altogether certain, but the study of law must have occupied some of his time, for in 1626 he seems to have been admitted to the Bar, and in 1628 he became a member of the Inner Temple—a fact which is quite properly interpreted as indicating that his emigration to New England was not then in contemplation.

In 1629, however, when Charles I dissolved Parliament, Winthrop began to have acute misgivings concerning the future. "I am verely persuaded God will bring some heavey affliction upon this lande, and that speedilye," he wrote to his wife; and again, "Evil times are coming, when the church must fly to the wilderness." In August of the same year he was one of twelve who signed an agreement to emigrate to New England, provided the government of the proposed colony could be legally established in America. On the 29th of March, 1630, bearing the Royal Charter made out in the name of "The Governor and the Company of the Massachusetts Bay in New England," and having been already elected first governor of the new colony, Winthrop boarded the Arbella, flagship of his squadron of six vessels, and began the voyage to the new land.

When Winthrop and his associates were finally established at Boston, the colony became at once the most important center of English civilization in America. Many of the emigrants were, like Winthrop, University men; some were men of considerable property. Stern and uncompromising in their Calvinistic Puritanism, admitting no one to the suffrage who was not a church-member, and becoming in some ways as intolerant as the Stuart monarch whose tyranny they hoped to escape, these leaders of the colony were nevertheless able administrators, skilful business men, and farsighted, constructive statesmen. They established a system of popular education from which the entire American public school system has descended; within six years of landing at Boston they founded Harvard College; they laid the foundations for representative government; they enforced the laws, and promoted the worship of that Creator under whose special guidance they felt themselves to be.

The obvious faults of Winthrop and his associates—intolerance, narrowness of spiritual outlook, cruelty in their dealings with Indians and Quakers, superstition—these were faults which it was inevitable that time should ameliorate or remove. Their virtues were of the primary sort without which early American society would have disintegrated and disappeared.

For nearly nineteen years Winthrop lived at Boston, and was intimately connected with the government during the entire time. As Governor, Deputy-Governor, or member of the Council, he was one of the small group in whose keeping rested the future of the colony. His death in 1649 removed from Massachusetts her foremost citizen.

Winthrop's Journal, which constitutes his chief claim to inclusion in a volume like the present, is a simple record of events, beginning with the embarkation at Cowes, in March, 1630, and ending with an entry for January 11, 1649, only two and one half months before Winthrop's death. The work lacks the coherence of Bradford's history of Plymouth; stylistically, it is far inferior to that document. But as a first-hand account of the early years at Boston, as a self-portrait of one of America's great men, and as an intimate revelation of the soul of the Puritan, the Journal can hardly be said to have a peer.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. The first complete edition of the Journal was that of James Savage, Boston, 1825-26, revised and reprinted in 1853. Savage had access to the three original notebooks in Winthrop's own hand. The second of these was burned shortly after Savage made his copy. Consequently the best recent edition, that edited by J. K. Hosmer, N. Y.

1908, is based on the Savage of 1853. Inasmuch as Savage modernized the spelling, and expanded Winthrop's abbreviations, the selections in the present volume differ markedly as regards language from those, say, by Bradford, who was writing at the same time.

BIOGRAPHIES. The best sources of biographical information, aside from the Journal itself, are R. C. Winthrop's Life and Letters of John Winthrop, Boston, 1863, and J. H. Twichell's John Winthrop, First Governor of Massachusetts, N. Y. 1892. Some Old Puritan Love-Letters, ed. J. H. Twichell, N. Y. 1893, shows a side of Winthrop's character that does not appear in his more formal work. Volumes 6 and 7, Series IV, Massachusetts Historical Society's Collections, contain a large number of letters by Winthrop and his contemporaries.

NOTES

THE JOURNAL

20. a. 28. Thomas Morton. Another reference to the notorious trouble-maker at Merrymount. See Bradford's references to him, p. 14, above, and his own account, p. 27, above.
21. a. 38. To come to a killock. To anchor, using a heavy rock instead of an anchor.
22. a. 45. Snake-weed. A plant, still known in some places by this name, which was supposed to be a specific for the bite of venomous snakes.
23. b. 27. The ensign at Salem was defaced. John Endicott's most famous exploit—the act of cutting the cross from the royal colors—occasioned his contemporaries much alarm. They sympathized with his anti-papal prejudices, but did not wish the colonists to appear as rebels against the crown. See Hawthorne's story, Endicott and the Red Cross, p. 367, above.
24. a. 5. Being criminally accused. The record of Winthrop's trial on the charge of having exceeded his legal powers, and of acting in a tyrannical and oppressive manner, is one of the most significant entries in the Journal. Here is clear indication of the growth of a democratic spirit with which the Puritan establishment was out of sympathy. To be sure, the verdict of the court, which acquitted Winthrop, and fined his principal accusers, shows that the protestors were still powerless to effect any real change in the social or legal order; the fact that they dared protest, and summon a man of Winthrop's position to trial, is indicative of the unrest that later was to modify the entire order of things in America.

THOMAS MORTON (?-1646)

When Thomas Morton published his New English Canaan (Amsterdam, 1637), he not only set forth his side of a famous quarrel, but also gave evidence of being a man of some wit and humor. He was an English lawyer, of dubious reputation, who first visited New England in 1622, and returned three years later as a member of Wollaston's adventurous company. Settling at what is now Braintree, Massachusetts, Wollaston soon left for Virginia (see Bradford's remarks, p. 14, above), and Morton became the leader of the new community. Both his character and conduct were offensive to his neighbors at Plymouth; the erection of a May-pole, in the spring of 1627, was a direct challenge to them. Much more serious than this, however, was the fact that Morton was suspected of furnishing the Indians with powder and muskets.

This last offence was more than the Pilgrim temper could endure. An expedition was fitted out under the leadership of Miles Standish, and after a sort of opera-bouffe skirmish, Morton was led away in chains, and the main dwelling house of the settlement destroyed. The May-pole was later cut down by John Endicott. Hawthorne's account, in The May-pole of Merrymount, makes the whole matter sufficiently vivid, though the details are more inaccurate than is usual with Hawthorne.

During the remainder of Morton's life his career was that of an unprincipled adventurer and trouble-maker, and is uninteresting so far as American literature is concerned. He died in destitution in 1646.

NOTES

THE NEW ENGLISH CANAAN

26. b. 25. Non nobis solum nati sunt, etc. Not for ourselves alone are we born; but the fatherland, our parents, and our friends severally claim us.
28. b. 32. To give them a slip instead of a tester. There is a pun here. "To give them a slip" means, in this context, to escape from them. Slip also means a bedspread, and tester means a canopy covering a high "four-poster" bed.

THE "BAY PSALM BOOK"

The first book printed in America, entitled The Whole Booke of Psalmes, Faithfully Translated into English Metre, appeared in Boston in 1640. It was the work of a committee of ministers, of whom Richard Mather, John Eliot, and Thomas Welde were the most influential. The immediate occasion of the publication was the desire, on the part of the Puritan churches, for a metrical translation of the Psalms, adapted for singing, and more literal than that currently in use. It shortly became known by the title commonly given it to-day, and remained the most popular hymn-book in America till the Psalms and Hymns of Isaac Watts supplanted it a century later.

Though the versification often appears crude and harsh, there is a dignity about the work which redeems it from commonplaceness; and occasionally, as in the version of the 121st Psalm, the translation rises to heights not often surpassed in early American religious verse.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Copies of the original edition of the Whole Booke of Psalmes are today exceedingly rare. Fortunately a facsimile reprint, edited by Wilberforce Eames, N. Y. 1903, for the New England Society, is available in most large libraries.

ROGER WILLIAMS (?1604-1683)

The name of Roger Williams inevitably calls to mind the most outspoken attempt made during the early years of Puritan civilization in America to mellow the sternness of the dominant régime, and especially to popularize a more tolerant attitude towards persons who differed from the majority on matters of conscience. Bradford makes note of Williams in his History, and Winthrop records the vote of banishment passed against him. Neither man, however, understood the significance of Williams's protest, or anticipated the fame that would come to him as a result of his opposition to the Puritan régime.

He was born in London, just when is uncertain, but between 1599 and 1604. Educated at the Charterhouse School and Cambridge University, he took orders, and in 1629 was holding a chaplaincy in Essex. In February of 1631, however, he landed at Boston, and soon was established as "Teacher" of the church at Salem. A short residence at Plymouth followed before he returned to Salem, where he soon found himself in disfavor with the authorities because of his opposition to their methods of dealing with the Indians, and his outspoken arguments in favor of religious toleration. Banished from the colony in 1635, he fled to what is now Rhode Island, where he established a new settlement, which he hoped would be a "shelter for persons distressed for conscience."

It was in part at least due to his influence that when the Pequot War broke out in 1636 the Narragansett Indians remained friendly to the whites and gave them valuable aid. Of his many activities in promoting the welfare of the Rhode Island settlement, this is not the place to speak. Suffice it to say that he stood in much the same relation to it that Bradford and Winthrop assumed towards Plymouth and Boston. His fame, however, is due neither to his administrative ability nor to his work among the Indians, whose friendship he won, and for whose language he prepared a dictionary. He lives rather on account of his "liberalism," his opposition to that intolerance which was the most unlovely element in the older Puritanism. His death took place early in 1684.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The only collected edition of Williams's work is that published by The Narragansett Club, Providence, 1866-1874. Biographical and critical studies are numerous. J. R. Lowell's "New England Two Centuries Ago," in Among my Books, is a vivid reconstruction of the age in which Williams lived. More formal in their treatment are R. A. Gould's Roger Williams, Freeman of Massachusetts, Worcester, 1888; Oscar Strauss's Roger Williams, the Pioneer of Religious Liberty, N. Y. 1894, and E. J. Carpenter's Roger Williams, N. Y. 1909. The last is the most complete biography available today.

NOTES

THE BLOODY TENENT OF PERSECUTION

31. This most famous of Williams's controversial writings appeared in 1644. Its origin can be traced to a "Letter" written by a prisoner in Newgate, of which John Cotton, the leading Puritan minister in Boston, had received a copy. This letter Williams summarizes in his Preface to The Bloody Tenent. Cotton's reply to the letter is also summarized under the title, "The Reply of Mr. John Cotton." Then follows the main body of Williams's work, cast in the form of a dialogue between Truth and Peace. Enough is given here to shown the general drift of the whole.

NATHANIEL WARD (1578-1652)

The author of The Simple Cobler of Agawam was one of the few persons of influence who, after some years of life in Massachusetts, returned to England. He first came to America in 1634, when he was fifty-six years old. He had graduated from Cambridge University, studied law and theology, and served as a priest of the English church, but had come into conflict with Archbishop Laud on account of his Puritanical opinions.

For a short time after reaching Massachusetts, till his failing health compelled him to resign, he was minister of the church at Ipswich; after giving up this position in 1636 he remained in the new colony till 1646, and became a person of considerable influence with the governing minority. He had a large hand in framing the Body of Liberties adopted by the General Court in 1641, and served on the committee that revised all the laws of the colony in 1645. In 1646 he returned to England, where he served in the church till his death in 1652. His best-known work, The Simple Cöbler of Aggawam (London, 1647), is primarily one of the counter-blasts to the attacks which were already being made upon the Puritan régime in America.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The best available edition of the Cöbler is that published at Salem, Massachusetts, in 1906, by the Ipswich Historical Society. J. W. Dean's A Memoir of the Rev. Nathaniel Ward, Albany, 1868, is the best biography, though unfortunately rare.

ANNE BRADSTREET (1612-1672)

Among the passengers in the Arbella, flagship of the squadron which in 1630 brought "The Governor and Company of the Massachusetts Bay" to Boston, were Thomas Dudley, Simon Bradstreet, and the latter's eighteen-year-old bride, Anne Dudley Bradstreet. Thomas Dudley, the father of the poetess, later became Governor of the colony; so did her husband. It is obvious, then, that Mistress Anne Bradstreet represented the best of the early New England stock.

From 1638 till her death in 1672 Mrs. Bradstreet was a prolific writer of verse, some of which, after having long circulated in manuscript, was published in 1650, in London, as the work of "The Tenth Muse, lately sprung up in America." A second edition, appearing in 1678, contained several additional poems. The nature of her poetical work appears from the selections here reprinted. A certain fluent accuracy, an occasional suggestion that she had the poet's vision and a modest share of the poet's imagination, a sincerity which her affectation of learning does not wholly conceal—these are her best qualities. That she had great ability, no one would contend. But she took her art seriously—perhaps too seriously—and did better work than any one of her day in America.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Two modern editions of Mrs. Bradstreet's works are The Works of Anne Bradstreet in Prose and Verse, ed. J. H. Ellis, Charlestown, 1867, and The Poems of Mrs. Anne Bradstreet, with an introduction by C. E. Norton, Boston, 1897. The best biographical study is Helen Campbell's Anne Bradstreet and her Time, Boston, 1891.

MICHAEL WIGGLESWORTH (1631-1705)

When Wigglesworth's parents brought him to New England in 1638, a lad of seven years, they could hardly have dreamed that he was to become the most popular American poet of the century, and one of the most influential theologians. They had in mind sending him to Harvard College, and fitting him for the practice of medicine—an art of which the new colony stood in great need. He did indeed study medicine, but the years following his graduation from Harvard in 1651 saw him more concerned with theology than with surgery, and in 1656 he was installed as minister of the church at Malden, where he lived and labored till his death in 1705. He never abandoned his interest in medicine, however, and ultimately became well known as a physician. His epigraph, probably written by Cotton Mather, makes no reference to his pastoral work, but refers particularly to the fact that

Once his rare skill did all diseases heal;
And he does nothing now uneasy feel.

It was his work as poet, however, that made him known up and down the length of Puritan America, and even brought him some fame in England. In 1662 he published The Day of Doom, or, a Poetical Description of the Last Judgment. The nature of the work is adequately represented by the selections in the present volume; its length—two hundred and twenty-four eight-line stanzas—is as astonishing as its popularity.

To account for the undoubted popularity which the poem attained, it is necessary to keep two things clearly in mind. In the first place, The Day of Doom was exactly in tune with the Calvinistic theology of the day and place for which it was written. Here was the essence of the grim faith of Winthrop and the Mathers; here was a vivid exposition of the doctrines of Original Sin and Election, the corner-stones of the Calvinistic edifice; here too was a lurid, concrete picturing of that day of judgment to which the Puritan looked forward with mingled terror and joy. In the second place, it was written in fluent, readable, easily remembered verse, in a measure made familiar by the Whole Booke of Psalmes, and indeed, popularized long before that work by the stirring ballads which were part of the traditional literature of the English race. Even in Puritan New England poetry had not wholly lost its appeal. The result of Wigglesworth's timely combination of poetry and theology was to give him a fame and influence beyond that of any American versifier of his generation.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The Day of Doom is perhaps most easily available in W. H. Burr's modernized reprinting of the 1662 edition, N. Y. 1867. This contains Wigglesworth's own autobiographical sketch, and a brief but adequate memoir. J. W. Dean's Memoir of Reverend Michael Wigglesworth, Albany, 1871, is more detailed, but very rare, as only fifty copies were printed.

MARY ROWLANDSON

Many accounts of the hardships endured by early settlers who fell into the hands of their Indian foes are available today, but none is more graphic than that written by the wife of the minister of the church at Lancaster, Massachusetts, who was taken prisoner in February, 1676, in a raid that was part of the general uprising known as King Philip's War. As an actual first-hand record the chronicle is invaluable; it is almost as significant as an indication of one phase of the Puritan temper, and of the way a devout woman found in her sufferings only added proofs of God's goodness. The title of the second edition is significant in this latter respect: The Sovereignty and Goodness of God, Together with the Faithfulness of His Promises Displayed; Being a Narrative of the Captivity and Restauration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson. The date of the first edition of this journal is uncertain, as are the dates of Mrs. Rowlandson's birth and death.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The Narrative was reprinted many times between 1770 and 1830, and some of these editions are to be found in most large libraries. The best available text today is the facsimile of the 1682 edition, published in 1903 at Lancaster, and edited by H. S. Nourse and J. E. Thayer. No adequate biographical treatment of Mrs. Rowlandson is in existence.

INCREASE MATHER (1639-1723)

Mather was the first American leader of distinction to be born in the new country; he was the first American scholar to go abroad, after graduating from Harvard, for further study in the Old World; twice he was President of Harvard; he was the first American to be entrusted with an important diplomatic mission at a European court; he was a preacher of great ability and influence; he was the father of Cotton Mather. Taken all in all, his work marked him as "the most powerful man in all that part of the world"—to quote Tyler's characterization of him.

He was born in Dorchester, in June, 1639, the son of Richard Mather, whose fame as a preacher was augmented by the acclaim that came to him as chief compiler of the Bay Psalm Book. Graduating from Harvard in 1656, he soon went to Trinity College, Dublin, where he received his Master of Arts degree in 1658. Three years later he was back in Massachusetts, and in 1664 began what was to prove a life-long pastorate in the Second Church of Boston. He early made himself one of the leaders in the colony, and throughout the political disputes that kept Massachusetts as well as England in turmoil and trepidation, Mather's influence was as great as that of any single person. When in 1683 the king tried to recover the charter of Massachusetts, Mather urged the colonists not to submit. In 1688 he went to London to represent the colony at court. Several times he had audiences with James II, but was unable to prevent the abrogation of the charter. When William and Mary came to the throne, Mather presented the cause of Massachusetts directly to William himself, and in 1691, largely on account of Mather's representations, a new charter was granted, by which Plymouth and Massachusetts Bay were united into one virtually self-governing colony. This great accomplishment effected, Mather returned to Boston in May of 1692.

At once he became embroiled in the witchcraft affair that made 1692 and 1693 so dolorously memorable. When the trouble had passed, and the great jail delivery had released the prisoners, Mather found himself losing power. The forces of liberalism were steadily growing in strength, and Mather was compelled to watch the gradual encroachments of a new order. With his brilliant son Cotton, he was pushed to one side, and, saddened by a change that he was powerless to prevent, he spent his last years in preaching. He died in August, 1723.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. Aside from the many printed sermons and addresses, which evidence Mather's contemporary fame, his chief work as a man of letters is to be found in the so-called History of King Philip's War (1676), available in S. G. Drake's London reprint (1862), and in the Essay for the Recording of Illustrious Providences, published in 1684, and available in 1856 and 1890 London reprints, from which a representative selection appears in this volume. The Further Account of the Tryals of the New England Witches, only a part of which seems to have been written by Mather, is included in the 1862 London edition of Cotton Mather's Wonders of the Invisible World. The Massachusetts Historical Society has published a volume of Mather's letters, Collections, fourth series, vol. 8.

BIOGRAPHIES. The only biographical and critical treatment of Mather that is in any way adequate is Kenneth B. Murdock's Increase Mather, Cambridge, 1925. This is an admirable study not only of Mather himself, but of the times in which he lived, and should be read by any one interested in the history of early New England. The "Modernist" may find it too sympathetic with a point of view which it is today fashionable—in some quarters—to ridicule; but the scholar will delight in the exactness of its information and the amplitude of its range.

SAMUEL SEWALL (1652-1730)

Sewall's position in America is much like that of his contemporary Pepys in England. Both were busy men of affairs, keenly observant of all that was happening around them, and placed by their fellows in positions of responsibility, where they discharged their obligations with great credit to themselves and profit to their countries. But both would have been forgotten, save by particular students, had they not written voluminous diaries, which have proved to be among the most readable documents in the "personal" literature of their race.

Sewall was born at Horton, England, in 1652, and was taken to America in 1661. A few years later he entered Harvard College, from which he graduated in 1671. He then began the study of theology, was elected to a resident fellowship at Harvard, and in 1674 became the college librarian. Leaving academic life soon thereafter, he turned his energies to business, and before long established himself as one of the leading traders and merchants of the growing colony. At the same time his abilities were so generally recognized that he was forced into public office, first as member of the Board of Assistants (1684-1686), and from 1692 to 1728 as judge of the Supreme Court of the colony. During the last ten years of this term he was Chief Justice, and from 1715 to 1728 was also Probate Judge for Suffolk County.

Sewall's most notorious connection with the Massachusetts Bar came during the troublesome year 1693, when he was appointed a member of the Special Court of Oyer and Terminer, organized to try persons accused of witchcraft. He concurred in sentencing nineteen persons to be hanged, and at the time was convinced of the entire rectitude of all the proceedings. Later, however, he had serious misgivings, and in December, 1696, did public penance for his error (see entry in his diary, "Copy of the Bill," etc. p. 64, this volume).

Though Sewall wrote but little that was intended for publication, his pamphlet, The Selling of Joseph, a Memorial, (1700) deserves mention as one of the earliest anti-slavery documents in America. His fame, however, rests on the Diary, which, when finally printed, proved far more interesting than most of the ostensible "literature" of the period. He died in Boston on January 1, 1730, respected and beloved by the entire colony.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Both Sewall's Diary and Letter-Book have been published by the Massachusetts Historical Society, the former in the Collections, Series V, vols. 5, 6, 7, Boston, 1877-1882; the latter in the Collections, Series VI, vols. 5, 6, Boston, 1886. There is no good life of Sewall in existence, but from the Letter-Book and Diary the student can glean most of the important facts concerning him. On the general condition of New England during Sewall's life, see Kenneth Murdock's Increase Mather, Cambridge, 1925.

NOTES

THE LETTER-BOOK

60. As indicative of Sewall's varied interests, as well as of the condition of the colony at the time, these selections from Sewall's Letter-Book seem well worthy of reproduction.

Sailing Orders

This is a characteristic Sewall document: a mingling of good business sense and sincere piety.

Letter to Ezekiel Cheever

Addressed to Cheever and Nathaniel Williams, well-known schoolmasters of Boston.

Letter to Henry Flint

Probably the Flint who was tutor at Harvard from 1699-1754. See Sewall's Diary for August 26, 1708, p. 65 above.

Letter to Samuel Storke

61. Sewall's daughter Judith was about to be married. In this letter, with the accompanying "memoranda," her father orders that part of her trousseau which it was apparently impossible to secure in Boston.

Letter to Samuel Mather

This letter to one of Increase Mather's sons, who had settled as Presbyterian minister at Witney, Oxfordshire, shows the author in his most genial mood. Sewall had gone to England in 1688, when Increase Mather was trying to secure a new charter for the colony. There he had met Samuel; and now, forty years later, he still has in mind the pleasant incidents of that visit. "The Reverend Mr. Samuel Mather of Windsor," referred to in a. 30, p. 62, was the Congregational minister at Windsor, Connecticut. He and Sewall had been classmates at Harvard, both graduating in 1671.

THE DIARY

- C2. The selections here reprinted are based upon the Massachusetts Historical Society's edition, referred to above. It is obviously impossible in this place to explain all of Sewall's references to persons and events. The student who wishes to check up on all the facts will turn to the notes and other explanatory matter in the complete Diary, where he will find but little left unanswered.
- b. 9. A female Quaker. Such an entry suggests that the Massachusetts authorities had some provocation for the stern measures they adopted towards the Quakers.

63. b. 11. George Burrough. This record of the most famous of the witchcraft executions is interesting in view of Sewall's own part in the matter.
- b. 27. Giles Corey. Corey, after having pleaded "not guilty," "refused to put himself upon his trial," and was executed in the barbarous fashion provided by English common law for such persons as "stood mute." His wife Martha was hanged as a witch at the same time.
64. a. 44. Josiah Willard . . . put on a wigg. A casual reference to one of Sewall's particular aversions.
65. a. 13. Mr. Henry Flint. See Sewall's letter to Flint, p. 60, above.
- b. 25. I went to Madam Winthrop's. Sewall's account of his courtship of Madame Winthrop is the most remarkable feature in the entire Diary.
69. b. 49. This . . . daughter of musick. For many years Sewall was precentor in the church at Boston.
70. b. 17. I had moved to be published. Had requested permission to publish the banns of marriage.

COTTON MATHER (1663-1728)

The story of Cotton Mather's life has virtually no parallel among the biographies of American leaders. It is a story of devotion to a cause which Time and Fate had destined to be a losing cause; a story of unceasing and unselfish labor; of enormous productivity in that field of letters in which Mather was interested; of widespread interest in civic and scientific as well as in religious affairs; a story of a life made happy by great accomplishments, and saddened by bitter disappointment and tragic loss.

He was born in Boston, on February 12, 1663, the grandson of two of the colony's most distinguished ministers, John Cotton and Richard Mather, and the son of Increase Mather, to whom Massachusetts was to owe as much as to any of her early citizens. The records of his boyhood show him to have been a lad precocious beyond even the normal precocity of his family. He graduated from Harvard in 1678, and three years later took his master's degree, having chosen to write his thesis on the subject, "The Hebrew vowels are of divine origin." (See the selections from his Diary printed in this volume.)

The close of the same year saw him installed as assistant to his father, the minister of the Second Church of Boston, which was already the largest and most influential church in the colony. Seven years later, when his father went to England, the younger man became the active head of the parish, in which capacity he served till his death in 1728.

The intensity of the young man's spiritual life is attested by the many records of fasts, of trances, of ecstatic moments of vision and supernatural communion, which make his Diary more than an ordinary record of events. It is not surprising, therefore, to find Mather convinced that the witchcraft outbreak of 1692 was a direct visitation of Satan's malign power. Believing this, it was inevitable that he should turn all his ability to the task of defeating the onslaught of the arch-enemy. He was by this time probably the most influential person in Massachusetts. The special court appointed to deal with witchcraft sought his advice, and it is clear that he advocated a policy of root and branch extirpation, though he says in his Diary that he was not in favor of conviction upon "spectral representation." His notable work, Wonders of the Invisible World, published in 1693, at a time when the colony was doubting the sanity of further prosecutions, was essentially an attempt to justify his actions in the premises, and to show how clear was the evidence for diabolical persecution through the agency of witches.

When the trouble died away, Mather found himself opposed by the more liberal among the Puritans of Boston. He was twice passed by in favor of less orthodox candidates for the Presidency of Harvard, and though he had been chosen a Fellow of the college as early as 1690, he never realized his ambition of succeeding his father in the President's chair. In 1697 he completed his largest single work, the Magnalia Christi Americana, an attempt to justify the old order which was passing, and to convince his readers of the necessity of maintaining the Puritan theocracy unmodified. When, about the turn of the century, Harvard passed definitely into the control of the liberals, Mather began the planning which was to result a little later in the establishment of Yale College.

Mather's work as minister and writer occupied his best energies during his entire life. He found time, nevertheless, for much medical and scientific investigation, with the result that in 1713 he received notice of his impending election as Fellow of the Royal Society of England. In 1721 he vigorously urged the desirability of inoculation against smallpox—with results which entries in the Diary make clear were not entirely favorable to himself. He was an old man by this time; but despite his advancing years, and despite the heavier burdens laid upon him by the death of his wife Abigail in 1702, the insanity of the wife whom he married in 1715, after a second had followed the first to the grave, and the deaths of thirteen of his fifteen children, he kept himself steadily at work till the end in 1728.

Mather's enemies and critics—and there have been many of them—have not failed to point out that he was tyrannical and intolerant, vain, pedantic, and superstitious.

They have—with some justice—represented him as an opponent of that spiritual enfranchisement which Massachusetts was destined to enjoy despite all attempts at resistance. But when the final balance is cast these shortcomings of Mather's pale beside his many and varied accomplishments. He was a faithful, beloved, and successful minister of a large church; he was a learned and indefatigable writer and student; he was an early advocate of temperance, of missionary activity, and of popular education. Above all he was a sturdy warrior in the old conflict between the forces of light and the many powers that make for darkness. That he erred, as Jonathan Edwards was to err half a century later, in trying to maintain a theocracy when the people no longer would tolerate a theocracy, detracts only slightly from the magnificence of his unselfish attempt.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Of the nearly five hundred published works credited to Cotton Mather, only three will concern the average student. The Wonders of the Invisible World is best available in the 1862 London edition, published by J. R. Smith as one item in the Library of Old Authors. The Magnalia Christi Americana, first published in London in 1702, has not been reprinted since a two volume edition appeared at Hartford, Connecticut, 1853-1855, with editorial and biographical material by T. Robbins, L. F. Robinson, and others. The Diary has been edited by Worthington C. Ford, for the Massachusetts Historical Society, and published as volumes 7 and 8, seventh series, of the Society's Collections. In connection with a study of the Diary, Charles Deane's "The light shed upon Cotton Mather's Magnalia by his Diary," Proceedings, Mass. Hist. Soc., VI, 404-414, is interesting. Further, Kenneth B. Murdock's Selections from the Works of Cotton Mather, N. Y. 1925, the only recent edition of Mather's most significant prose, should be available to every student of the period. The reader who finds himself desirous of learning more about the witchcraft disturbance, will consult C. W. Upham's Salem Witchcraft, 2 vols, Boston, 1867; W. F. Poole's "Cotton Mather and Salem Witchcraft," No. Amer. Rev., cviii, 337-397; and the Narratives of the Witchcraft Cases, ed. G. L. Burr, N. Y. 1914.

The only good life of Mather is Barrett Wendell's Cotton Mather, the Puritan Priest, N. Y. 1891, 1925.

NOTES

THE DIARY

The selections here printed are based on Ford's edition, referred to above. The student who would understand the Puritan temper, or the spiritual condition of early Massachusetts, or Mather himself, will find the entire work a treasure-trove of information.

71. a. 45. The Divels, in a most preternatural manner. In view of Mather's later connection with the witchcraft agitation, this entry in his Diary is of unusual interest.

b. 2. The visions of the afflicted . . . spectral representation. One of the moot points in witchcraft cases was whether a person should be condemned upon "spectral evidence," i.e., upon the statement of a sufferer that his torments were caused by the spectre, or shape, of the witch on trial. It was common for persons to testify that "the shape of so-and-so afflicted me," or that "the spectre of so-and-so flew in at my window." Though Mather says that he "ever testified against" accepting spectral evidence, the plain fact is that much of the evidence presented in witchcraft cases was of this nature, and was admitted as valid by the court.

72. a. 11. A very likely Slave. This casual entry indicates that slavery was not only a legal but a perfectly respectable institution.

a. 18. Isaac Watts. Isaac Watts (1674-1748) is best known as the author of a large number of church hymns still in very general use. His Hymns appeared in 1701, and his Psalms of David in 1719.

a. 32. The author of the Spectator. The reference, of course, is to the English journal, and Joseph Addison. Such an entry has its value as showing both the extent of Addison's influence and the wideness of Mather's own interests.

a. 48. A Fellow of the Royal Society. Mather's actual election did not take place till April 11, 1723.

73. a. 8. Inoculation. The devastating nature of the early smallpox epidemics is known to all readers of colonial records. Mather, who was a student of medicine as well as of theology, was strongly in favor of inoculation, an old-world anticipation of vaccination. Some such practice had been successful in Africa and in parts of Europe; Mather did his best to popularize it in America, and performed the operation, successfully, upon several persons. But the bulk of public opinion was against him.

THE WONDERS OF THE INVISIBLE WORLD

This work is a compound of fact, imagination, superstition, and bigotry—in just what proportions it is now impossible to determine. Before dismissing it all as nonsense, however, the student should read the essay, "Were the Salem witches guiltless?" in Barrett Wendell's volume, Stelligeri and other Essays.

b. 45. The shape of the prisoner. A characteristic piece of "spectral evidence."

MAGNALIA CHRISTI AMERICANA

77. The first edition of Mather's largest single work came out in London, in 1702. It had been in process of preparation since 1693, and had been virtually completed in 1697. Superficially, it is an historical treatise, and as such, it possesses a considerable value. But Mather wrote it with a propagandist's as well as an historian's enthusiasm. Fundamentally, the book was Mather's great attempt to justify the Puritan theocracy in New England. Fully to appreciate the way in which he labored to effect this justification, one must examine a copy of the work at first hand. The excerpts here reprinted are based on the American edition of 1855, published at Hartford by Silas Andrus and Company, and edited by various persons.

The Bostonian Ebenezer

This early pamphlet on temperance is part of section 5 of the Appendix to Book I of the Magnalia.

The Life of Mr. Thomas Hooker

78. This selection forms part of the Appendix to the first part of Book III. Thomas Hooker (1586-1647) was one of the ablest of the early colonial ministers. At the time of his death he was minister of the church at Hartford.

The Life of Mr. Ralph Partridge

79. This constitutes Chapter 11 of Book III. It is reprinted entire, and shows Mather's fondness for puns as well as for more solid matter. Partridge was minister at Duxbury.

The Life of Mr. John Eliot

80. So important was Eliot's work, that Mather gave the entire third section of Book III to an account of his life and accomplishment. Part III of this exhaustive account is entitled "Eliot as Evangelist." John Eliot (1604-1690), the "Apostle to the Indians," came to New England in 1631, and settled as minister of the church at Roxbury. He was one of the compilers of the Bay Psalm Book, but his chief work was the translation of the entire Bible into the language of the Massachusetts Indians. Completed in 1658, the translation was not entirely in print till 1685.

THE NEW ENGLAND PRIMER

No selection of early American Literature would be complete without excerpts from the most famous school-book issued in the new world, the New England Primer. Published first ca. 1690, the Primer remained a general favorite till 1830, by which time probably six million copies had been brought out. As one edition after another appeared, it was inevitable that minor alterations should be made; but during the entire hundred and forty years the essential nature of the book remained the same. To call these crude verses and A-B-C rimes poetry, would be to overstate the case lamentably. Yet as a document in the history of American culture the Primer has far more importance than many a work which possessed greater intrinsic merit.

For bibliographical information the student should consult Charles F. Heartman's The New England Primers issued prior to 1830, N. Y. 1922. The selections in this volume are from an undated copy which was probably issued shortly after the Revolutionary War. The frontispiece is a crude wood-cut of Washington.

SARAH KEMBLE KNIGHT (1666-1727)

Had Mrs. Sarah Kemble Knight not written her Journal, her claim to the gratitude of posterity would have rested largely upon the fact that she served as school-mistress to Samuel Mather and Benjamin Franklin, both of whom, as lads in Boston, learned the three R's before her desk. But the publication of her account of a trip from Boston to New York, and back to Boston, a trip she made late in 1704 and early in 1705, took her out of the catalogue of school ma'ams, and put her very definitely in the relatively brief list of persons who in old New England both knew how to write and found obvious pleasure in practising the art.

She was born in Boston, in 1666, the daughter of Captain Thomas Kemble, a mariner who once at least felt the sting of Puritan discipline when he was confined for two hours in the stocks, fit punishment for the "lewd and unseemly" act of kissing his wife in public after returning from a three years' cruise at sea. She married Richard Knight, also a Bostonian, who may—or may not—have been dead when she made her adventurous trip to Manhattan Island. That she was a widow shortly thereafter is sure. When she returned from New York she opened a school in Boston; not long afterwards she was mistress of an inn in New London, Connecticut. Here she died in 1727. Her humour, geniality, and pleasantly objective way of taking what fate sent without seeking to find the hand of God in every incident, strike a new note in Puritan New England—even the New England of 1725.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The Journal was first published in 1825, by T. Dwight, who had access to the original manuscript. It has been twice reprinted since then, in 1865 at Albany, and in 1901 at Norwich, Connecticut. No adequate biographical treatment of Mrs. Knight has yet appeared.

JONATHAN EDWARDS (1703-1758)

Edwards' claim to distinction is at least three-fold: He was a master of English prose, able to write in such a vigorous, clear, and moving fashion, that in comparison with him most other early American writers seem turgid and inept; he was one of the greatest preachers who have ever spoken the English tongue; he was one of the few Americans who have made any significant contribution to the philosophical thinking of the modern world. On any one of these three counts he would be entitled to a high place among the writers included in the present volume.

The bare facts of his life are easily stated. Born in 1703, in East Windsor, Connecticut, he had the good fortune to come of a family already distinguished for its probity of life and intellectual attainments. The son and grandson of New England ministers, he early decided upon the same career for himself, and at an age when most boys are busy only about the recreations of youth, Edwards was studying philosophy and theology. When he graduated from Yale College in 1720 he had already been recognized as a man of brilliant promise; after two years of further study, and a brief pastorate in New York, he was called back to Yale as a tutor, where he remained till 1727.

This last year saw the beginning of Edwards' significant work in the pulpit. His grandfather, Solomon Stoddard, was minister of the church at Northampton, one of the most influential churches in New England outside of Boston. An old man, and wishing to retire, he secured the election of Edwards as associate pastor; two years later the young man found himself in sole charge of a large and growing parish. Here he was to win his great fame as a preacher; here too he suffered the defeat which cast a shadow over the latter years of his life.

Sternly consistent in his Calvinistic theology, Edwards made it his first task to preach what he called the "pleasant, bright, and sweet" doctrine of damnation. Holding up before his congregation prospects of an eternity in hell fire such as the selections in this volume make amply vivid, he had the satisfaction of seeing the congregation grow in numbers as well as in ardor of devotion. He was sought after as visiting preacher by many churches; wherever he went the people who crowded to hear him shuddered, and wept, and besought him to speak again. To be sure, his acceptance of the doctrine of "Election" made it incumbent on him to temper his presentation of hell with an occasional picturing of the chance of salvation; the sermon, "Great Guilt no Obstacle to Pardon," is an illustration of this phase of Edwards' preaching. On the whole, however, he spent more time convincing people of the wrath of God than in holding out hope of His mercy.

By 1738-39 the foremost ministers of America were acting jointly in a sort of nationwide revival, and Edwards was the most influential of the group involved. When in 1739 Whitefield came from England to assist in the work, it was Edwards, in large measure, who organized his tour of the country. The resulting increases in conversions, and in church memberships, were so memorable that the movement has been known ever since as "The Great Awakening."

But after some years of such intense religious fervor a reaction was bound to set in. Edwards himself found the young people of his own church no longer under his own control; a relatively unimportant question of church policy widened the gap between the minister and his parishioners; the situation became more and more unpleasant till in June of 1750, after much debate, and the calling of a church council to advise in the matter, Edwards was dismissed from his pastorate: turned adrift, broken and discredited. New England, which had discarded the leadership of Cotton Mather half a century before, was still more weary of the theocracy which Edwards represented. An age of relative liberalism was about to dawn.

Following 1750 came several years during which Edwards owed his support partly to gifts from friends in Scotland, where his Calvinism had not yet begun to seem wearisome; partly to the industry of his wife and children, who earned what they could in countless small ways; and partly to an insignificant stipend paid him for serving as missionary to the Indians near Stockbridge. Since his duties in this last capacity were light, he had leisure to take up once more, and carry to completion, his life-long study centering around the relationship between God's omniscience and omnipotence, and man's free will. The resulting Treatise on the Freedom of the Will, published in 1754, shows him at the height of his power as a logician, and as uncompromising as ever in following his premises to their logical conclusions. "As God designedly orders his own conduct, and its connected consequences, it must necessarily be that he designedly orders all things," he concludes. In other words, granted the premise of a God who foresees all things—and no other conception of God would have been tolerable to Edwards or many of his contemporaries—it follows that man is not free to choose between good and evil; God himself becomes the author of evil, and man is helpless in the grip of circumstances which he can not control. To escape from such a conclusion one of two things is necessary: either to deny Edwards' premise, or to solve the problem in Johnsonian manner, and say, "Sir, we know we are free, and there's an end on't."

The publication of the Treatise brought new fame to Edwards, and in 1757 he was elected President of the College of New Jersey, since known as Princeton University. Here he served for less than a year, dying in 1758 of smallpox, contracted probably through inoculation, which his friends had urged him to submit to lest he fall a victim to the prevailing epidemic.

The popular conception of Edwards as a preacher of hell-fire, as an old-school thinker planting himself solidly in the path of progress, and resisting the modernizing, the liberalizing, tendencies which even in the middle of the eighteenth century were apparent enough—this conception of him is probably as fair as such a popular estimate can ever be. But unless one has turned from his sermons to his own private writings, and has been touched by the sweetness of his nature, the kindness of his manner, the absolute unselfishness of his whole life, the otherworldly but stalwart idealism of his every act—unless one has done this, one has but an imperfect picture of the last of the great "Puritan Priests." And when one has turned the pages of these less well-known works of Edwards, one will realize that in addition to his other qualities he possessed the ability to write prose such as America had not yet had the good fortune to produce. He alone, among the persons so far included in this collection, is entitled to stand in the relatively small group of unquestioned masters of the English language.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS—Edwards' collected works have been published many times, and there are consequently many editions available today. The best is perhaps The Works of President Edwards, N. Y. 1881, 4 vols.

BIOGRAPHIES—Biographical and critical discussions of Edwards have been numerous. A. V. G. Allen's Jonathan Edwards, Boston, 1889, 1896, is the best life that has yet appeared. Oliver Wendell Holmes's essay, included in his Pages from an Old Volume of Life, and W. H. Ward's in the Independent, October 1, 1903, are worthy of mention. The special Edwards number of The Congregationalist and Christian World, October 3, 1903, published in commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of Edwards' birth, is the most interesting recent addition to the great mass of Edwards literature.

NOTES

SARAH PIERREPONT

85. Written in 1723, when Sarah Pierrepont, whom Edwards was to marry in 1727, was thirteen years old.

A PERSONAL NARRATIVE

Written during Edwards' pastorate at Northampton, probably about 1743.

THE FUTURE PUNISHMENT OF THE WICKED

89. In general, Edwards' sermons followed this plan: 1, the Text; 2, the Exposition of the Text; 3, the Doctrine (deduced from the Text); 4, the Proof of the Doctrine; 5, the Application, or Use. It was in the last section, the Application of the Doctrine to the audience in front of him, that Edwards became most eloquent.

SINNERS IN THE HANDS OF AN ANGRY GOD

92. First preached at Enfield, Massachusetts, in 1741. This is probably Edwards' most famous sermon.

JOHN WOOLMAN (1720-1772)

Woolman's relationship to the Quaker civilization of Pennsylvania is much like that of Cotton Mather to the Puritan civilization of Massachusetts. Neither could by any stretching of the imagination be called typical of his particular group, but each might well be considered as the ideal development of that form of culture which he represented. To know Mather is to know the Calvinism of early Massachusetts in its most uncompromising manifestation; to know Woolman is to know the sweeter faith of the Quaker in its most kindly, most loving, and most appealing aspect.

Born in 1720, at Northampton, New Jersey, the son of a Quaker farmer, Woolman received a good elementary education, worked as clerk in a general store, taught school, and finally became a tailor and merchant. His success in this last occupation occasioned him some distress lest he become too much involved in "outward cumbers." Consequently he reduced his business, discharged his journeymen, and lived as simply as was possible. About 1743 he began his work in the ministry, never having a regular stipend or location, but journeying on horseback up and down the coast, wherever Friends' meetings were held, and making trips into the back country to preach to the Indians. In 1772 he visited England as delegate from the Friends in Pennsylvania to those in the north of England. When he reached York, he found a smallpox epidemic raging and on the seventh of October, 1772, he died of the disease.

Woolman's literary fame is due solely to his Journal, which he began in 1756, and kept till shortly before his death. To say that this Journal is of interest because it pictures the sweet nature of Woolman himself, is to state the most obvious of facts. But it does more than this. It shows Woolman to have been an early—and efficient—opponent of negro slavery, a persistent advocate of temperance, a faithful and far-sighted friend of the Indians, and—what is most unusual in Colonial times—a man highly skilled in the art of writing English prose.

Furthermore, to turn the leaves of Woolman's one volume, is to realize what Charles Lamb meant when he said, "When the spirit is sore fretted, even tired to sickness of the janglings and nonsense noises of the world, what a balm and solace it is to go and seat yourself, for a quiet half hour, upon some undisputed corner of a bench, among the gentle Quakers."

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Many editions of Woolman's Journal have appeared from time to time, but the only one of value to the scholar or serious student is Amelia Mott Gummere's The Journals and Essays of John Woolman, Philadelphia, 1922. From this admirable edition the selections in the present volume have been taken, with the permission of The Macmillan Company, owners of the copyright. The life of Woolman included in this edition is the best in existence.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN (1706-1790)

As Edwards may fairly be called the last great representative of American Puritanism, and of the New England theocracy which inevitably had to give way before the fresh and vigorous spirit of revolutionary America, so Franklin stands as the embodiment of the new spirit, the spirit of enlightenment and liberty and progress. In these two figures, that of the Puritan priest fighting to preserve the old order, and of the Philadelphia printer, postmaster, scientist, and statesman, preaching his gospel of industry and frugality, of progress and of toleration, one sees the incarnation of the two opposing forces in eighteenth century American life and thought.

The mere biographies of the two men—both born within the first decade of the century—show such contrasts that it is hard to believe that the country which produced the one could have produced the other. Edwards lived the life of a theologian and scholar, a life of intense, at times almost morbid, introspection, caring but little for the concerns of every-day existence, but vitally engrossed with the more compelling problems of the hereafter. Franklin, materialist and utilitarian, early came to the conclusion that he could trust the hereafter in the hands of that Being who had provided so generously for him in this world, and devoted his boundless energies to making the world in which he was living more comfortable for himself and his neighbors. In other words, Edwards was the ideal Puritan; Franklin, in Carlyle's phrase, was "the father of all the Yankees."

The account of how Franklin succeeded in his career sounds like a fairy story. Born in Boston, in 1706, the son of a tallow chandler, and having nothing to look forward to save a life of hard work at some humble trade, he died eighty-four years later one of the best known, most widely honored, and most trusted men in the civilized world. One has to turn to the stories of Lincoln or Mark Twain to find anything approximating a parallel in the chronicles of America.

He came of good stock, but of a family that for generations had been laborers, farmers, or small tradesmen, and that had no pretensions to the desirable estate of "gentlemen." His father, Josiah, saw to it that his many children learned to read and write, and taught them trades as early in life as possible. Benjamin, the eleventh child in the family, went to school till he was ten, but never thereafter; his education, however, was in no sense dependent upon formal training, but was constantly in progress till the day of his death.

He was an eager, inquisitive youngster, reading what books he could get hold of, teaching himself to write lucidly, and constantly adding to his store of wisdom by picking up any scraps of information that lay in his path. As apprentice in his brother's printing house he soon found himself both type-setter and journalist, and experienced the pleasure of seeing what he had written, printed in the news-sheets which his brother published. By 1723, however, he had made up his mind that life in Boston, under the circumstances in which he had been placed, could not be endured. As a result he went to Philadelphia, and for the rest of his life was a citizen of that city.

No sooner had Franklin found his first position as type-setter in a Philadelphia printing house than the horizon of his life and interests widened appreciably. He became known for ability, industry, and honesty. In 1724 he went to London, bearing what turned out to be worthless letters of introduction from Governor Keith of Pennsylvania. Foiled in his plan to secure type and presses of his own, on the credit of Keith's letters, he went to work in a London printing establishment, and there followed his trade for something over twelve months. The year 1726 saw him again in Philadelphia, where before long he was in business for himself as printer and publisher.

In the thirty years that followed, Franklin made himself Philadelphia's first citizen. He bettered the condition of the city by improving its streets, by organizing a fire company, by founding a library and a hospital, and by lending his aid to any project which could make for the improvement of the community. Never neglectful of his printing business, he made money enough so that before many years he could retire from active participation in it, and give his energies to civic matters and to the scientific experimentation which had long been his chief delight. He held most of the offices which Philadelphia could bestow on him, and by 1753 his fame as an administrator had crossed the ocean and he was appointed Postmaster General for the colonies. He was the first man ever to return any profits from this office to the British treasury.

The year 1757 saw another widening of Franklin's horizon when he went to London to represent Pennsylvania in her attempt to secure better governmental conditions. By this time his scientific work had become known throughout Europe; the English universities vied with one another in conferring honorary degrees upon him; his friends were Priestly, Burke, Chatham, Adam Smith, Lord Kames, and others of their stamp.

Franklin's sojourn in England continued, with one or two interruptions, till the spring of 1775. The last ten years before his return were troublous ones. Despite Franklin's protests, the Stamp Act had been passed in the summer of 1765; and, although it was soon repealed, the temper of the colonies had been roused to such an extent that Franklin's problem became acute. When Georgia, New Jersey, and finally Massachusetts, joined with Pennsylvania in designating him as their agent, his position assumed almost ministerial responsibility; and certainly few accredited representatives have ever worked harder than he in the interests of their countries.

It should be remembered that during these years Franklin was a loyal subject of King George. He asked no rights for his colonial friends that were not the prerogatives of all British subjects. Indeed, so moderate was he, so firmly did he oppose all talk of separation, that hot-headed patriots in America denounced him as a traitor, and once, at least, were on the point of mobbing his Philadelphia residence.

By 1775 however, it was no longer possible for him to remain in England, and even his loyalty to the Crown gave way before the persistently irritating conduct of the ministry. He was dismissed from his postmaster-generalship and grilled before the Privy Council. Feeling that Lord North was bent on driving the colonies into open rebellion, he returned to America, arriving not long after the opening of hostilities at Lexington and Concord. The spirit in which these events left him is indicated by a letter to his old friend Sir William Strahan, M. P., written in July of that year:

"You and I were long friends. You are now my enemy, and I am

Yours,

B. FRANKLIN."

After serving in the Continental Congress, resuming his duties as Postmaster General, and aiding in drafting the Declaration of Independence, he was once more sent abroad, this time to France, where he represented the new Republic at the court of Louis XVI. Here his first task was to negotiate a treaty that should bring French aid to Washington. After Burgoyne's surrender in 1777, the French were willing to recognize and aid America, and Franklin found his initial problem solved. At the same time he was busy with the larger task of financing the Revolution: that of selling the Liberty Bonds of 1776. Again he succeeded, partly because it was to the French interest to take every advantage of her traditional enemy's perplexity, and partly because of the confidence which French court and populace felt in the "American Philosopher."

When the war ended, Franklin was not allowed to leave his post till he had signed the treaty of peace with England in 1785. By this time he was nearly eighty years old, worn with care and physical suffering. Yet on his arrival in Philadelphia he was forced once more into public service, elected President of Pennsylvania, sent to the Constitutional Convention, and permitted to retire only when his death was imminent. The story ended on April 17, 1790.

An adequate account of the significance of this long life, in American history and civilization, is impossible here, perhaps impossible anywhere. Something, however, must be said concerning three phases of Franklin's accomplishment: his work as scientist, as man of letters, and as statesman.

To the student of modern physics, Franklin's experiments in 1750 may seem little more than the potterings of a tinker in his shop. Yet the world of 1750 recognized Franklin as one of the foremost "natural philosophers," and honored him primarily because of his scientific work. To recount the well-known facts that, in the course of this work, he made a host of practical inventions, such as bi-focal glasses, lightning rods, Franklin stoves, that he mapped the Gulf Stream, that he made large contributions to the world's understanding of electricity, is to tell but a fraction of the tale. For Franklin had the mental endowment of an investigator of a high order. Intellectually honest as well as inquisitive, ingenious in his experimentation, with a profound respect for facts as well as great skill in assembling them, he had the more unusual ability to see the significance of the facts with which he was dealing; to make the "guess of genius." This ability which his contemporaries recognized in him, brought him his early fame.

That Franklin is today considered a man of letters as well as a scientist, is more or less of an accident. Much that he wrote may well be used as a model for informal exposition; his "Autobiography" is surely one of the world's classics. But Franklin never seems to have had the artist's desire to write for the joy of the writing; he schooled himself to write well because he wished to influence other men, not because his aesthetic happiness depended upon his writing well. Most of his published work—which occupies nine large volumes—is of the nature of scientific, political, and economic pamphleteering and letter writing. To be sure, the Autobiography, and a few "bagatelles," as he called them, dating from his Parisian days, are not of this purely utilitarian sort; yet it is to be questioned whether Franklin had any idea that these would ever find a place in the library of American literature. That they have done so is due largely to their stylistic qualities—qualities that were in part imitated from Addison and Goldsmith, and in part the reflex of his own personality and environment. Clear, humorous, flexible, never burdened with verbiage—his favorite precept was "use no unnecessary words"—but always rich with ideas, running at will the gamut from the pithy wisdom of "Poor Richard" or the playful banter of the Dialogue with the Gout to the Swiftian irony of the Rules by which a Great Empire may be Reduced to a Small One, Franklin's prose is worthy to stand beside the best that England was producing during the same years.

Franklin's power and significance as a civic leader and statesman can hardly be understood by anyone who thinks in terms of the political life of 1926. That any one man should have wielded the influence which was his, seems incomprehensible. But something may be done towards a realization of his true position by recalling once more the fact that he was the only American commissioned by his fellows to draw up and sign the four documents which transformed thirteen rebellious colonies into the United States of America: the Declaration of Independence, the Treaty of Amity and Defence with France, the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain, and the Constitution of the United States. Had he done nothing else, he would still be one of the most notable figures in our history.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. The collected edition of Franklin's works which the student will find most useful is The Writings of Benjamin Franklin, with Life and Introduction; by Albert Henry Smyth, N. Y., 1905, 10 vols. Reprints of the Autobiography are available by the score.

BIOGRAPHIES—Among the hundreds of biographical and critical studies a few may well be recommended to the student who wishes either an intelligent estimate of Franklin or a point of departure for further study. J. B. McMaster's Benjamin Franklin, N. Y. 1887, in the A. M. L. series, is an excellent survey of his entire career. W. C. Bruce's Benjamin Franklin Self-Revealed, N. Y. 1918, 2 vols., is more heavily documented than McMaster's life, and is written from a different point of view. P. L. Ford's The Many-Sided Franklin, N. Y. 1899, is not a formal biography, but an interesting attempt at characterization. The introduction to Carl Van Doren's volume of selections, Benjamin Franklin and Jonathan Edwards, N. Y. 1920, adds somewhat to one's understanding of Franklin by placing him beside that one of his contemporaries with whom he contrasts most sharply.

NOTES

ADVICE TO A YOUNG TRADESMAN

105. b. 11. Industry and frugality. As has been many times pointed out, this phrase occurs so often in Franklin's writings that it might fairly be called his own personal "motto."

THE WAY TO WEALTH

106. First published in 1757, as part of Poor Richard's Almanac for 1758.
109. a. 6. Felix quem faciunt, etc. Happy is the man whom the mistakes of others make cautious.

PARABLE AGAINST PERSECUTION

111. Written in 1763. On November 2, 1789, Franklin wrote thus: "I never published that chapter, and never claimed more credit for it, than what related to the style, and the addition of the concluding threatening and promise. The publishing of it by Lord Kames, without my consent, deprived me of a good deal of amusement, which I used to take in reading it by heart out of my Bible, and obtaining the remarks of the Scripturians upon it, which were sometimes very diverting." (Smyth X, 53).

PROPOSED NEW VERSION OF THE BIBLE

This example of Franklin's irony, which Matthew Arnold completely misunderstood, was written in 1779.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY

112. Franklin began the Autobiography during the summer of 1771, while visiting the Bishop of St. Asaph, in Hampshire, England. The events leading up to the American Revolution prevented Franklin from finishing the work at this time. Twice afterwards he took up the task anew; but in November, 1789, he wrote "I doubt whether I shall be able to finish my Memoirs." His conjecture proved correct, for the Autobiography breaks off abruptly during the account of the year 1757.

For the story of the first publication of the work, see Smyth, I, 23 ff. It is interesting to note that no American edition appeared till after it had been published in England, France, and Germany.

112. a. 53. You may remember. The "you" is William Franklin, the writer's son. The Autobiography took the form of a letter to him.
113. a. 35. In the town. Boston.
114. a. 50. My journey. In October of 1723 Franklin made his famous first journey from Boston to Philadelphia.
115. a. 21. My first admission into the printing-house. The London experience was the result of a quite unpardonable practical joke, of which William Keith, governor of Pennsylvania, was the author, and Franklin the victim. Keith persuaded Franklin to make the trip to London, promising to send him letters of credit which would enable him to buy the presses and type necessary for setting up an establishment of his own in Philadelphia. But when Franklin reached London in December, 1742, he soon discovered that Keith had deceived him. Thrown upon his own resources, he promptly got a position as printer, and worked at his trade till July, 1726, when he sailed for Philadelphia.
116. a. 8. A St. Monday. "Holy Monday." Printer's slang for a Monday holiday.
116. a. 19. I now opened a small stationer's shop. On his return from London Franklin had first worked for Keimer, but in 1728 went into business for himself.
120. a. 5. The harangue of a wise old man. See The Way to Wealth, above, p. 106.
120. b. 14. The Reverend Mr. Whitefield. George Whitefield (1714-1770) was one of the "Oxford Methodists," and except only Wesley himself, perhaps the most influential of the entire group. He delivered his first sermon in 1736, and from that time till his death was known as one of the most eloquent of English preachers. In August of 1739 he sailed for America, where he remained for slightly more than two years.
123. a. 29. This general. Major-General Edward Braddock (1695-1755) owed his appointment as Commander-in-Chief of all British forces in America to his friendship with William, Duke of Cumberland. Franklin's account is the best contemporary record of his ill-starred expedition.
124. b. 12. Our French friends in 1781. The French troops which had come to the aid of Washington's colonial army.

RULES BY WHICH A GREAT EMPIRE

First published in the Gentleman's Magazine, September, 1773.

DIALOGUE BETWEEN FRANKLIN AND THE GOUT

126. Enclosed in a letter to Mme. Brillon. First published by W. T. Franklin in 1818.

LETTER TO MISS MARY STEVENSON

130. The "Dear Polly" of this letter, later the wife of Dr. Thomas Hewson, was the daughter of Mrs. Margaret Stevenson, in whose house at 7 Craven Street, Strand, Franklin took lodgings in 1757. His friendship with the Stevensons endured till the day of his death.

LETTER TO MME. BRILLON

133. Madame Brillon, the wife of a French official, is the best known of Franklin's French friends, as she seems to have been the one whose company he enjoyed the most. During his stay in Paris as Minister it was his custom to visit the Brillons at their home on every Wednesday and Saturday. The intervals between were brightened by a constant interchange of letters. The so-called Fable of the Ephemera was written in 1778.

LETTER TO SAMUEL MATHER

135. The recipient was the son of Cotton Mather, and pastor of his father's and grandfather's church in Boston.

LETTER TO GEORGE WASHINGTON

136. See Washington's reply, p. 196, below.

LETTER TO EZRA STILES

One of Franklin's intimate friends was the Reverend Ezra Stiles (1727-1795), who in addition to serving as President of Yale College, found time to do a considerable amount of scientific work.

JOHN DICKINSON (1732-1808)

Dickinson's unofficial title, "The Penman of the American Revolution," is suggestive of his importance in American history and literature. From 1767 to the end of 1775 he was not merely the leading American writer on political themes; he was the only one—save Franklin—whose words were listened to on both sides of the Atlantic. After 1775, when more fiery leaders forced Dickinson to one side, his influence waned. Today, however, it is clear that he was at once the most influential prose writer of the troublous years that led up to the actual break with England, and that the disrepute which was his lot later on, was the inevitable result of his conscientious adherence to legal and constitutional principles at a time when bayonets and bullets were of more significance than historical precedents.

He was born in Maryland in 1732, and in 1750 began reading law in Philadelphia. Three years later he entered the Middle Temple, London, for further study of his profession. In 1757 he began the practice of law in Philadelphia. From 1774 to 1776 he was a member of the Continental Congress, and again from 1779 to 1780. He also served in the army; and when his enemies, who could not forgive him for having refused assent to the Declaration of Independence, forced him to resign his commission as Brigadier General, he at once volunteered as a private. He was Governor of Pennsylvania from 1782 to 1785, a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1787, and was extremely influential in securing the ratification of the Constitution by Pennsylvania and Maryland. During his later years, though he continued the practice of law, he found time to interest himself in education, and to assist materially in the founding of Dickinson College. He died in Delaware in 1808.

A list of Dickinson's writings during the period of his greatest literary activity includes—among other items—the "Declaration of Rights" and "Petition to the King" adopted by the Stamp Act Congress, the two "Petitions to the King" of 1774 and 1775, and the first draft of the "Articles of Confederation" under which the colonies governed themselves till 1788. But it was the Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania that made Dickinson known to his contemporaries, and that seem today the best representatives of his intellectual power and literary skill.

These letters began to appear in December, 1767, in a Philadelphia newspaper, and ran till February, 1768, when the twelfth and final number was published. As fast as they came out they were reprinted in virtually every important newspaper in the colonies. were issued in pamphlet form on completion of the series, and were republished in England, France, and Holland. They made Dickinson known and honored throughout the entire English-reading world.

Essentially, the letters are the argument of a constitutionalist, pleading, on legal and historical grounds, for justice for America. Dickinson felt that the colonists could secure their rights without breaking with Great Britain. When, eight years later, the Declaration of Independence had been voted, he alone of the members of Congress refused to sign it. It thus became inevitable that to some he should appear cowardly or treacherous, and that the importance of his earlier work should be overlooked. But with the end of the war his reputation was in large part re-established, and today he seems without question to have been the chief of the early Revolutionary writers.

NOTES

LETTERS FROM A FARMER IN PENNSYLVANIA

139. b. 8. Mr. Hampden's ship-money cause. When John Hampden (1594-1643) protested against Charles the First's attempt to collect a ship-tax, revived without authority of Parliament, the case was tried before the Court of Exchequer. Hampden lost the suit, but in 1641 the House of Lords set the verdict aside.
142. a. 28. The Cleons and Clodiuses. Cleon was an Athenian demagogue; Clodius, a Roman.

THE LIBERTY SONG

One of the most popular of the American Revolutionary ballads. First published in 1768.

FRANCIS HOPKINSON (1737-1791)

Though Hopkinson was by turns jurist, scientist, musician, artist, essayist, and poet, he is remembered chiefly because of his contribution to the satirical literature of the Revolution. In his capacity as writer, his task was to ridicule his country's foes, and to destroy the traditional respect which attached to the Crown and Sceptre. That he accomplished this task with skill, was admitted by both his friends and enemies.

He was born in Philadelphia, in 1737, and after graduating from the newly established College of Philadelphia, was admitted to the Bar in 1761. Thirteen years later, following a long residence in England, where he won the friendship of Lord North, he was sent as a delegate to the Continental Congress. He helped Dickinson draft the Articles of Confederation, and signed the Declaration of Independence. During the war his pen was constantly busy with either prose or verse, and almost always he wrote with satiric intent. To be sure, Hopkinson composed a handful of graceful lyrics which show him to have had more than one string to his bow. It is clear, however, that his most significant work was done in the field of political satire, in which his only contemporary American rivals were Trumbull and Freneau. The latter years of his life Hopkinson served as a Judge, first in the Admiralty Court at Philadelphia, and finally in the United States District Court at the same place. He died in 1791.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Hopkinson's varied and interesting work is available in its entirety only in the original collected edition, Miscellaneous Essays and Occasional Writings, Philadelphia, 1792, 3 vols. A Pretty Story, and the better known poems, have been many times reprinted, however, and may be found in virtually any anthology of Revolutionary literature.

NOTES

A PRETTY STORY

143. This political allegory was published in September, 1774, in Philadelphia, just at the time when the first Continental Congress was assembling in that city. The pamphlet was, in effect, an account of the events which had led up to and necessitated that Congress. The allegory is clearly intelligible throughout; consequently only a few of the less obvious allusions are explained in the notes.
- b. 2.* A certain nobleman. Great Britain.
144. a. 12. His wife. Parliament.
- a. 53.* The great paper. Magna Charta.
- b. 43.* Wild, uncultivated country. America.
146. a. 19. Sent over several of his servants. Military aid furnished the colonies.
- a. 51.* The tailors of his family were greatly injured. The stupidity of the British colonial policy appeared in the laws forbidding the erection of iron mills or foundries in America, limiting the number of apprentices a craftsman might employ, and forbidding him to export his manufactured goods by any means whatsoever.
- b. 15.* A particular kind of cyder. Jamaica rum.
- b. 45.* The head of one of the families. The legislature of New York complied with the royal decree, concerning provisioning the troops, in all major matters; but out of principle refused to furnish salt, pepper, or vinegar. As a result of these omissions the legislature was dissolved and forbidden to meet.
147. a. 9. His steward. The Prime Minister; or, possibly, the entire ministry.
- a. 37.* An edict. The Stamp Act, passed in 1765.
148. a. 13. To reverse the order. The Stamp Act was repealed in 1766.
- a. 19.* A right to mark all their furniture. The "Declaratory Resolution," or

- "Dependency Act," passed when the Stamp Act was repealed, asserted that Parliament had the right, "to bind the colonies in all cases whatsoever."
- b. 51. Another decree. The act of 1767, which laid duties on paper, glass, tea, and a few other articles.
149. a. 47. The tax upon water-gruel. In 1770 all the taxes laid in 1767 were repealed except the tax on tea.
- a. 51. An exclusive right of selling water-gruel. The reference is to the East India Company, which suffered greatly through the colonial boycott of tea.
150. a. 20. Jack. Boston; or, possibly, Massachusetts. The following reference is, of course, to the "Boston Tea Party."
150. b. 11. A very large padlock. The Boston Port Bill, passed in 1774 as an act of reprisal, closed the port to navigation.
- b. 33. Dragged to the gallows. Transported to England for trial.
151. a. 9. An overseer. General Gage, with four regiments of regulars, arrived in Boston in May, 1774.
- a. 49. Advised with their brethren. Consulted the other colonies.
- b. 53. Cetera desunt. The rest is lacking. Hopkinson carries the story to the point when the "Inhabitants of the new farm" sent delegates to the Congress of 1774. A row of thirteen stars brings the Pretty Story to a close.

THE BATTLE OF THE KEGS

152. One of the best-known of the Revolutionary ballads. The slight foundation of fact on which Hopkinson rested his poem is this: Early in the winter of 1778 the Americans, under the leadership of David Bushnell, prepared certain "infernal machines," loaded with powder, and supplied with detonating devices, which were floated down the river at Philadelphia with the intent of destroying the British shipping by fire and explosion. When the British discovered what was taking place, they opened a furious cannonade upon everything visible on the surface of the water, though at no time do their vessels appear to have been in much danger. The ballad was published in 1788, immediately after the event it celebrates.
152. 33. Sir William. After defeating the Americans at Brandywine and Germantown, Sir William Howe had retired to Philadelphia, to spend the winter in comfort and security.

PATRICK HENRY (1736-1799)

Patrick Henry is everywhere remembered as the greatest orator of the American Revolution. A Virginian, eminent in the practice of law, he had been elected a member of the House of Burgesses in 1765, when only twenty-nine years old, and had at once assumed the leadership of the radical group by introducing the so-called "Virginia Resolves," setting forth the doctrine that only the Virginia Burgesses and Governor had the right to tax the colony. In support of his resolution he made one of the many brilliant speeches that were to mark his career. Ten years later, as a member of the Virginia Provincial Convention, he introduced a resolution putting the colony in a state of armed defense, and supported it with the speech printed in this volume. The exact words Henry used on this occasion will probably never be known, for no adequate records were kept at the time. But the text here given, for which Wirt's Sketches of the Life and Character of Patrick Henry, Philadelphia, 1817, is immediately responsible, is the traditional version, and is almost as much a part of American literature as if an attested copy were in existence. Furthermore, as Tyler puts it, "It is probably far more accurate and authentic than are most of the famous speeches attributed to public characters before reporters' galleries were opened, and before the art of reporting was brought to its present perfection." (Patrick Henry, Boston, 1887.)

In July of 1775 Henry was made commander of all the Virginia troops; several times he was elected Governor of Virginia, and more than once—so great were his executive abilities—the Legislature to all intents and purposes made him a military dictator. He died in June of 1799, having established a secure reputation as one of Virginia's foremost patriots, as well as the most distinguished public speaker in the entire thirteen colonies.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Two admirable biographies of Henry are readily available: Moses Coit Tyler's Patrick Henry, Boston, 1887 and 1898, and W. W. Henry's Patrick Henry: Life, Correspondence, and Speeches; N. Y. 1891, 3 vols. The latter is the best source to which to turn for the texts of Henry's addresses.

JOHN ADAMS (1735-1826)

John Adams was one of the comparatively small group of able and fearless men to whom the United States owes its existence. He was born in Quincy, Massachusetts, in October, 1735; graduated from Harvard in 1755; studied law, and was admitted to the Bar in 1758. During the agitation over the Stamp Act (1765) he became prominent as one of the leading Whigs, and from that time till his retirement from the Presidency was constantly engaged in politics. Though second to none in his opposition to the policies of the North ministry, he showed his courage and devotion to justice by successfully defending the British soldiers charged with murder after the "Boston Massacre." From 1774 to 1778 he was a member of the Continental Congress. In 1782, after serving the colonies in various capacities at home and abroad, he was appointed one of the commissioners to negotiate a peace with Great Britain. In 1785 he had the honor of being the first Minister of the United States to the Court of St. James's. Four years later he became Vice-President, retaining the office till Washington's retirement in 1797, when Adams himself became President. His four years in the chief magistracy added little to his fame, and when he left the Presidency in 1801 he retired to private life. He died on the same day as Thomas Jefferson: July 4, 1826.

The letters by which Adams and his gifted wife are represented in this volume are among the most readable products of the Revolution. Terse, vivid, dramatic, they form an admirable contrast to the more formal political prose of the period, and round out the picture in a way which is historically significant as well as pleasing.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The best collected edition of Adams's work is that by Charles Francis Adams, Boston, 1850-1856, 10 vols. The letters are available in The Familiar Letters of John Adams to his Wife Abigail Adams, by the same editor, Boston, 1875 and 1896. John Adams, by J. T. Morse, Jr., Boston 1884 and 1898, is a good brief biography.

NOTES

154. b. 38. While the Congress is assembling. The first Continental Congress.
155. a. 22. Rumor of the cannonade of Boston. The rumor was groundless.
- a. 42. Sortes Biblicae. Literally, Biblical lots. The reference is to the belief that questions may be answered, and a line of conduct determined upon, by opening the Bible at random and being guided by the first verse that catches the reader's eye.
156. a. 7. The arrival of Dr. Franklin. Franklin had just returned from France.
- a. 47. Suspicious entertained of designs of independency. At the time Adams was writing thus, only the most hot-headed Whigs ever mentioned actual independence from England. The colonists were united in demanding their rights, but rarely went beyond asking for the rights to which all British subjects were entitled.
- b. 35. Dunmore. John Murray, Earl of Dunmore (1732-1809), royal governor of Virginia from 1771 till the end of the war.

b. 45. Do you not want to see Boston? The city had been only recently evacuated by the British, who withdrew to Halifax.

157. b. 31. The second day of July, 1776. On the relation between the second of July and the fourth, see the note on the Declaration of Independence, p. 1128, this volume.

THOMAS PAINE (1737-1809)

To Thomas Paine, an English emigrant who landed in America in 1774, leaving a rather bad reputation behind him, and having as his only visible asset a guardedly written letter of introduction from Franklin—to this unpromising bankrupt and fugitive belongs the honor of having written what Tyler calls "the first open and unqualified argument in championship of the doctrine of American Independence."

His record in England, before his emigration, gave no indication of the talent which was to develop when once he found himself absorbed in the problem of America's future. Born in 1737, the son of a corset-maker, he had worked—off and on—at his father's trade; had been twice appointed to the Excise, and twice dismissed for inefficiency and neglect of duty; had been sold out by the Sheriff as a bankrupt; and had come to America with no prospect save the very vague one of getting on in the world somehow. He possessed, however, a clever journalist's ability to write prose which plain people could understand; he had the journalist's instinct for timely topics. When once he had familiarized himself with the American situation, he became a passionate advocate of independence—and this at a time when the majority of Colonial leaders were still protesting that no thought of independence would ever enter their heads.

The pamphlet in which he urged this new and treasonable doctrine appeared in January, 1776, bearing the appropriate title, Common Sense. Discarding such conservative and constitutional arguments as Dickinson had made the framework for his Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania, Paine argued that things had now gone so far as to make all thoughts of union with Great Britain ridiculous, and that the only rational program for America was immediate and complete separation from the oppressing monarchy.

The pamphlet was republished up and down the land; it found its way at once across the Atlantic, and was reprinted in France, Germany, and England. So clear was the style, so lucid the argumentation, that the document—published anonymously—was generally attributed to either John Adams or Benjamin Franklin. It was as popular, in the hot-tempered days of 1776, as Dickinson's Letters had been in 1768.

That the rapid change in American public opinion which took place between January and July of 1776 was due in considerable measure to Common Sense, seems established beyond reasonable doubt. It appeared at a time when the leaders of the American cause were decrying any discussion of separation from England; but within six months the Declaration of Independence had been issued.

Only once again, in America at least, did Paine write so effectively, and this was in the series of sixteen papers entitled The Crisis, which appeared at various times between December, 1776, and December, 1783. The circumstances of the publication of the first number are well known. Washington's army was retreating before the British in New Jersey; the victory at Trenton had not yet been won; American hopes seemed doomed to an early blight. It was then that Paine wrote his appeal, beginning with the words that have not yet lost their thrill: "These are the times that try men's souls." The impression made by this paper is evidenced by the fact that Washington ordered it read at the head of every regiment in his army.

During the next few years Paine was serving in many capacities, part of the time with the army, part of the time as Secretary to Congress, and, as occasion demanded, issuing new numbers of The Crisis to enhearten his countrymen. In 1781 he went to France with Laurens to solicit a loan from Louis XVI, to return with two and a half million livres in silver, as well as a ship-load of military supplies. When peace was restored Paine found himself more or less without an occupation, and in 1787 he sailed for Europe, where he at once plunged into the political battle then raging.

When the French Revolution broke out, and Burke, in 1790, published his Reflections, Paine replied with The Rights of Man (1791), an essay which won for him a reputation in France equal to that which Common Sense had gained for him in America. He was considered a dangerous revolutionist by the British, among whom he was living at the time the work appeared, and in May of 1792 was indicted for treason. He at once fled to France, where he had already been elected a member of the Assembly. In 1793 he urged moderation towards the King, and soon found himself imprisoned by Robespierre, and under sentence of death. Through the efforts of the American consul he escaped the guillotine, and remained in France till 1802, when he returned to America. He died in 1809, on a farm which many years before had been given him by the State of New York.

It is impossible in the space here available to give a satisfactory estimate of Paine's superb journalistic skill, or of his invaluable contribution to the American cause. Enough has been said, however, to indicate the main facts, and to suggest Paine's significance as the most trenchant and effective prose writer of the days from 1776 to 1781.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Both The Crisis and Common Sense have been so many times reprinted that copies are available in any large library. The best biography is M. D. Conway's Life of Thomas Paine, N. Y. 1892, 2 vols. Conway's The Works of Thomas Paine, N. Y. 1894, is a good edition of Paine's writings.

NOTES

COMMON SENSE

158. b. 13. Prior to the nineteenth of April. I.e., prior to the outbreak of actual hostilities at Lexington and Concord.
160. a. 41. Boston, that seat of wretchedness. When Common Sense appeared, in January, 1776, Boston was occupied by the British, and Washington was besieging it. Two months later the British were forced to evacuate it.
161. a. 23. As Milton wisely expresses it. Paradise Lost IV, 98, ff.
- a. 43. The repeal of the Stamp Act. In 1766.
- b. 2. To be always running, etc. It is in such statements as this, and in the paragraph which follows, that Paine's "common sense" method of argumentation appears most vividly.
- b. 46. Masaniello. A fisherman of Naples, who in July of 1647 organized, and led to success, a revolt of the "common people."
162. a. 52. The social compact. Such a casual phrase as this indicates—what is sufficiently clear on other grounds—that Paine drew much of his political theory from Rousseau.

THE CRISIS

162. b. 44. "To bind us in all cases whatsoever." Quoted from the "Dependency Act," which Parliament insisted on passing at the time the Stamp Act was repealed.
163. a. 8. Howe. General Sir William Howe, British Commander-in-Chief in America from 1775 to February, 1776, when he was succeeded by his brother, Vice-Admiral Earl Howe.
- b. 16. I was with the troops at Fort Lee. Paine was attached to General Lee's force, and took part in the hurried evacuation of Fort Lee in November, 1776. It was at Newark, during the retreat from the abandoned post, that he began the composition of the first number of The Crisis.

REVOLUTIONARY SONGS AND BALLADS

Such poems as those here reprinted have a greater collective value than might appear at first blush. No one of them, taken alone, would deserve much praise; indeed, the purely literary merit is hard to find, even in the best. But as specimens of a popular type of verse, written, read, or sung, by "the man in the street," hawked about as broadsides, or published and republished in contemporary newspapers, they possess a very real historical significance.

For one thing, they link one phase of American literature closely to the great English ballad tradition. Such songs as these, the English had known for centuries; particularly during the long struggle between Parliament and the Stuarts the output of street songs and ballads had been enormous. It was but natural, then, that Englishmen living in America in 1776, and finding another civil war in progress, should adopt the customs of their forefathers and write songs such as these—songs intended to enhearten their friends and cast derision on their foes.

But even if the Revolutionary songs and ballads did not possess this historical significance, they would still be of value to any student of American civilization. For many of them were in a very real sense popular; they were to the struggle of 1775-1781 what Tipperary and Over There were to the Great War: songs which, though devoid of poetical merit, and often of unknown authorship, were actually popular with the men who did the fighting. Such songs as these, more certainly than the literary productions of Trumbull and Freneau, give an indication of the poetical taste of the common man, the man in whose interests the war was being fought, and who was himself fighting the war. Incidentally, even so small a collection of songs as the present one, makes it quite clear that American sentiment during the war was by no means unanimous. The Tories had their versifiers as well as the Patriots.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The student who finds himself interested in reading more of these ballads will consult Frank Moore's Songs and Ballads of the American Revolution, N. Y. 1856, or the same author's more pretentious but incomplete Illustrated Ballad History of the American Revolution, N. Y. 1876. Winthrop Sargent's Loyalist Poetry of the Revolution, Philadelphia, 1857, is the best source for material on the Tory side of the question.

NOTES

A PARODY OF "THE LIBERTY SONG"

165. See the original by John Dickinson, p. 142, above.

VIRGINIA BANISHING TEA

166. Supposed to have been written by a young lady of Virginia.
 7. North. Lord North, British prime-minister.
 15. Gage. General Gage, British commander-in-chief in America during the first months of the war.

THE YANKEE'S RETURN FROM CAMP

167. This is in some respects the most famous of Revolutionary songs. It is interesting to note, therefore, that not only is its authorship uncertain, but that the very words of the song are still a matter of dispute. It exists in many versions, no one of which can be called authentic.

NATHAN HALE

169. Another anonymous composition. Hale was hanged on September 22, 1776.

BOLD HATHORNE

170. The vessel whose exploits are here commemorated was the Fair American, commanded by Daniel Hathorne, grandfather of Nathaniel Hawthorne, 41. We hauled up our courses. Furlled the lowest sail on each of the masts.

THE CONGRESS

171. A fair specimen of the loyalist satire of the period.
 172. 49. Montgomery. Richard Montgomery (1736-1775), killed on December 31, 1775, while leading the ill-starred attack on Quebec.
 66. Carleton. . . Dunmore. British commanders.

THE OLD YEAR AND THE NEW

Jonathan Odell (1737-1818), who was probably the author of this song, was the ablest of the loyalist satirists. An Episcopal clergyman in Burlington, N. J., he fled to New York early in the war, and began the output of a large amount of unrelenting, vitriolic, anti-American verse. When peace was declared he went, with many other irreconcilables, to Nova Scotia, where he died. The American Times was his most severe indictment of the American cause and its leaders.

SONG: "I'VE HEARD IN OLD TIMES"

173. Joseph Stansbury (1750-1809) wrote as much loyalist verse as did Odell; his most characteristic productions, however, were not satiric but lyric.

TIMOTHY DWIGHT (1752-1817)

The Reverend Timothy Dwight, Yale 1769, chaplain in the Revolutionary army, founder and headmaster of a famous school at Greenfield, Connecticut, and President of Yale from 1795 till his death in 1817, was also a voluminous writer who probably expected his long poems The Conquest of Canaan (1785) and Greenfield Hill (1794) to keep his memory fresh in the hearts of Americans. These works, however, have been allowed to slip into the waste-basket of oblivion. The sturdy warrior-preacher-poet is remembered today for Columbia, a patriotic song written during the Revolution, for a few hymns, the best of which is here reprinted, and—above all—for his very considerable contribution to the cause of American education. In this last field he was as distinguished as he vainly aspired to be in poetry; he was one of the pioneers to whom American secondary schools and colleges are still under a heavy debt.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

There is no modern edition of Dwight's works. The best biographical and critical discussion is that by Moses Coit Tyler, in his Three American Men of Letters, N. Y. 1895.

PHILIP FRENEAU (1752-1832)

As Joseph Odell was the most bitter of the loyalist poets, so Freneau exceeded everyone else on the American side of the struggle in producing powerful and mordant satire. Nature, to be sure, had not limited him to this particular field. He could write graceful verse in which the note of satire never appears, and—long before the Lyrical Ballads—he published not a few lines in the spirit of that new poetry which literary history calls "romantic." But as the conflict between Britain and the colonies grew intense, Freneau deliberately abandoned the pleasant career of a writer of pleasant verse, and—like Whittier seventy years later—gave himself and all his energies to the battle, fighting with his pen as persistently, as unrelentingly, and as successfully, as any warrior in the armed forces.

He was born in New York, in 1752, of Huguenot ancestry. After securing his preliminary education at home, he entered the College of New Jersey (now Princeton University), where he graduated in 1771. He was a facile versifier at the time he received his degree, and had already learned the trick of writing satire. His career after leaving college was that of a man by nature a rover, unwilling to fetter himself to any profession. By turns a teacher, a lawyer, a journalist, and a mariner, Freneau finally gratified his love of adventure and hatred of England by fitting out a privateer, only to be captured in 1780, and imprisoned in the hulks in New York harbor. The experience of this captivity provoked his most bitter poem, The British Prison Ship, which he published in 1782.

When the war ended, the temper of Freneau's verse became less caustic, and occasionally, as in The Indian Burying Ground, he showed how genuine was his talent for non-satiric poetry. Indeed, had he written no political verse at all, Freneau's other work would have entitled him to grateful remembrance. It shows him to have been a keen observer of nature, and an interested student of American tradition. This later verse, moreover, establishes the fact that both in his thinking and in his poetic technique Freneau was sturdily independent. He was the first American poet of whom it can be surely said that his work is significant in the history of American national literature, and at the same time of some genuine merit as art. With Freneau, American poetry begins.

During the last forty years of his life Freneau was less active, poetically, than he had been during the earlier years. The War of 1812 brought from him a few verses that were in the strain of those of 1776, but that added little to his fame. He died in December, 1832, at Monmouth, New Jersey.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bibliographical entries concerning Freneau might well be limited to one entry: The Poems of Philip Freneau, edited by Fred L. Pattee, Princeton, 1902-1907, 3 vols. Here one has all of Freneau's work that deserves reprinting admirably edited, together with Professor Pattee's life of the author, and an adequate bibliography. Mary S. Austin's Philip Freneau, the Poet of the Revolution, N. Y. 1901, is a sympathetic biographical study.

NOTES

LIBERA NOS, DOMINE

175. First published in 1775. The mock-litany had long been a favorite form with English satirists.
5. St. James's. The Palace of St. James, the official residence of the king.
11. Wallace, Graves, etc. "Captains and ships in the British navy, then employed on the American coast." (Freneau's note.)
21. Tryon the mighty. William Tryon (1729-1788), royal governor of North Carolina from 1765 to 1770, and of New York from 1771 to 1780. In October, 1775, he fled from New York city, and took refuge on a British man-of-war in the harbor, where he remained till the British captured the city in the autumn of 1776. In 1779 he commanded a force which ravaged a part of Connecticut.

TO THE MEMORY OF THE BRAVE AMERICANS

Written shortly after the battle.

176. 20. They took the spear—but left the shield. It has been often pointed out that Sir Walter Scott appropriated the line for the Introduction to Canto iii of Marmion:

When Prussia hurried to the field,
And snatch'd the spear, but left the shield.

THE BRITISH PRISON SHIP

This poem, which records Freneau's actual experiences, is good evidence concerning conditions about which Washington more than once protested in the name of humanity.

24. My Orestes. A legendary Greek character, son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, who was pursued by the Furies.
178. 128. David Sproat. "Commissary of prisoners in New York." (Freneau's note.)
141. St. Kilda. An island of the Outer Hebrides group, off the north-western coast of Scotland.
179. 177. That juice destructive. Rum.

A PROPHECY

Published in 1782.

180. 8. Whose name rimes to cage. Gage.
11. When B and C. Burgoyne and Cornwallis.
22. The Stars and the Lily. The American and French flags. When the poem was written, the Fleur-de-lis still appeared in the French royal ensign.

THE INDIAN BURYING GROUND

First published in 1788.

181. 36. The hunter and the deer—a shade. Thomas Campbell made use of this line in his poem O'Connor's Child:

Now on the grass-green turf he sits,
His tasseled horn beside him laid;
Now o'er the hills in chase he flits—
The hunter and the deer—a shade.

ON THE DEATH OF DR. BENJAMIN FRANKLIN

17. Who seized from kings, etc. Freneau's English for the Latin hexameter ascribed to Turgot: Eripuit caelo fulmen, sceptrumque tyrannis.

TO MY BOOK

First published in 1792.

6. Shylock's canker'd hoof. Freneau habitually designated one of his critics as Shylock.

ODE

182. An echo of the French Revolution. The poem is of uncertain date, but was certainly written by June of 1793, and possibly by November of 1791. It was sung at a dinner given in honor of the French Minister Genet, in Philadelphia, June 1, 1793.

JOHN TRUMBULL (1750-1831)

Born in Waterbury, Connecticut, in 1750, the son of the local clergyman, Trumbull developed into one of the most precocious of youths. He learned the classical languages at an age when the average youngster is still puzzled by his A-B-C's, and passed the entrance examinations to Yale College when he was but seven years old. He did not enter college for six years, however, but employed the intervening time in further reading of those classics for which he had developed so astonishing an aptitude. Graduating A.B. in 1767, he took his master's degree in 1770, began his career as essayist and poet, studied law in John Adams's office in Boston, was admitted to the Bar in 1773, and for the rest of his long life was intimately connected with the legal profession either as attorney or judge. He died in Detroit, where he had gone when an old man, in the year 1831.

As a man of letters, Trumbull is chiefly remembered for his poetic satires, though his essays, patterned after 18th century English models, were popular in his own day. First of the satires to win any considerable amount of applause was The Progress of Dulness (1772), the work of a clever young man just out of college, who turned the shafts of his ridicule against those portions of society's armor which were most vulnerable to his attacks. M'Fingal, which came out in its first form in January, 1776, and in the complete four-canto version in 1782, is political rather than social satire, and because of its cleverness, humor, vigor, and timeliness, became at once one of the most popular of American poems. Though Trumbull wrote much after this, and was for a long time a member of the group of literary men known as "The Hartford wits," he never published anything which added materially to the fame these first two works had brought him.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The only edition of Trumbull's work approaching completeness is that published at Hartford in 1820, in two volumes. M'Fingal has been reprinted a dozen times or more since the 1782 edition, most recently with editorial matter by B. J. Lossing, N. Y. 1881. For a pleasant discussion of Trumbull and his associates see H. A. Beers's The Connecticut Wits and Other Essays, N. Y. 1920.

NOTES

M'FINGAL

183. Trumbull's most popular poem appeared first (one canto only) in January of 1776. The complete poem in four cantos was not published till 1782. The scene of the poem is laid in a small Massachusetts village where, shortly after the events of April, 1775, the Tory squire M'Fingal finds himself in conflict with the patriotic sentiment of the village. He is a blustering, oratorical champion of Great Britain, and urges submission in every particular. Opposed to him is Honorius, whom Trumbull seems to have patterned after John Adams. In the canto here reprinted M'Fingal argues matters with his neighbors, and ends by being tarred and feathered.

HECTOR ST. JOHN DE CRÉVECŒUR (1731-1813)

Like Tom Paine, Crèvecoeur was a foreigner who came to America, found it congenial, and became one of the most popular writers of the Revolutionary period. Born in Normandy in 1731, he went to England when he was sixteen years old, and seven years later, after he had learned English, landed in America. Here he married, and settled on a farm in New York. During the Revolution he was suspected by the British of being a spy, and was finally arrested, imprisoned for some months in New York, and in 1780 sent as a prisoner to England. Not long afterwards he was exchanged, and allowed to return to France. The Letters from an American Farmer, which had been in large part written before the war, were published in London in 1782, and found a most favorable reception. In 1783 he once more came to the United States, this time as French consul at New York. Here he remained till 1793, when he returned to France to remain till his death in 1813.

The Letters, on which his literary fame depends, were for the most part descriptive of the physical and economic condition of the colonies. The latter part of the book included four letters of a more miscellaneous nature. From one of these is taken the selection printed in this volume. The work as a whole, published as by "Hector St. John," attained an immediate and widespread popularity, both in Europe and America. The grace of his style, the charm of his description, the plaintive and at times sentimental note running through much of the book, the idealization of simple American life—these caught the fancy of European readers, as they pleased the Americans who enjoyed seeing themselves so attractively pictured.

The volume was at once translated into French, German, and Dutch, and did much to stimulate interest in the romantic phases of life in the new republic. It is some indication of Crèvecoeur's reputation that the town of St. Johnsbury, Vermont, was named for him by its founder.

GEORGE WASHINGTON (1732-1799)

Washington occupies a place in American civilization so uniquely significant, and touches the chronicle of our history at so many points, that in a work of the present nature it would be impossible if not undesirable to do more than outline the main events of his many-sided career, and point out one or two reasons for thinking him entitled to a position in American literature as well as history. Any attempt to state the real importance of his contribution to the life of the nation would involve a consideration of the political, military, and economic history of the country during the entire half century that closed with his death in 1799. Consequently the student who finds himself wishing to learn more of the actual accomplishments of the man must seek for information in one of the works listed in the bibliography, any of which will serve as points of departure for a study that may be made as extensive as the time at one's disposal will permit.

The main facts of his life are known to everybody. Born in Virginia on February 22, 1732, he never had the advantage of a college education, but grew up as a member of a family that enjoyed plantation life on the banks of the Potomac river, and showed little inclination to intellectual pursuits. His formal schooling was over by the time he was fifteen; a year later he had taken up the business of surveyor, and soon was serving in that capacity, most of the time near the western frontier of the colony. In 1755, after some military experience gained against the French and Indians, he accompanied General Braddock in his disastrous campaign, and after the rout at Fort Duquesne, succeeded in saving a fraction of the army from annihilation. On his return he was made commander of all the Virginia forces, and for two years was engaged in repelling attacks along the western boundary of the colony. When the war was ended he resigned his commission, and in 1759, after marrying Mrs. Martha Custis, he began fifteen years of quiet and happy life on his estate at Mount Vernon. By this time he was one of the wealthiest men in America, greatly interested, as his Diary shows, in all the problems of his large estate, and not actively concerned with political affairs.

By 1765, however, when the Stamp Act agitation was at its height, Washington was one of the group that most strenuously opposed the bullying tactics of the British Governor, Lord Dunmore. For nine years he had a share in every attempt to bring about a more tolerable condition of affairs in Virginia, and when at last it appeared that the colonies must act together if they wished to preserve any semblance of their rights, it was inevitable that Washington should be one of Virginia's delegates to the first Continental Congress. Again in 1775 he was a member of the second Congress, where in June he was unanimously chosen commander of the army that was already in conflict with the British around Boston. His first campaign ended in March, 1776, with the evacuation of Boston by the British. Following this important initial success, he attempted, unsuccessfully, to prevent the British occupation of New York. When he was driven from Manhattan Island he crossed the Hudson into New Jersey, there to conduct what Frederick the Great called the most brilliant campaign of the century, albeit he was most of the time in retreat or on the defensive.

The year 1777 saw Washington enduring the hardships of Valley Forge, while at the same time discontented elements in Congress and in the army were plotting to have him removed in favor of Gates. The arrival of French aid in 1778 made his position more secure, and when in the early autumn of 1781 Cornwallis went into camp at Yorktown, to rest after his victorious southern campaign, it was Washington who marched the combined French and American army from West Point to Virginia, surrounded his opponent, and forced the surrender which practically ended the war. Two years later he resigned his commission as General, and once more retired to Mount Vernon.

In 1787 the Federal Convention assembled in Philadelphia to draw up a new Constitution. Washington, one of the delegates from Virginia, was at once chosen President of the Convention, and when the first election was held under the new plan of government, he was unanimously elected the first President of the United States. Four years later he again received the vote of every elector, and though his second term was embittered by broils and disputes, he would have been re-elected again for a third term had he not refused to be a candidate. On March 4, 1797, he relinquished the Presidency to John Adams, and withdrew to Mount Vernon, where he died on December 14, 1799.

It is hardly possible to think of Washington as a man of letters, even in the sense in which the term may be applied to men like Franklin and Hamilton. His written work consists largely of official correspondence and private letters, and though it is never without interest, it is lacking in the stylistic merit which other similar documents of the time possessed. His most famous single utterance, the Farewell Address, was written for him by Hamilton. At the same time the breadth of Washington's interests was so great, and the significance of much of his work so clear, that the matter warrants his inclusion in a volume of American literature, albeit the manner is sometimes open to criticism. And even in this last respect Washington's prose is entitled to more praise than is sometimes given it. The letters possess a solid and substantial dignity which comports well with the character of their author, and are of obvious value to the person who would understand either Washington the man, or the age in which he lived, or would learn at first hand how a plantation owner in old Virginia thought and wrote.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. Washington's letters and papers were first published in collected form by Jared Sparks, Boston, 1837, 12 vols. This edition, which is available in most libraries, has been superseded by The Writings of George Washington, edited by Worthington C. Ford, N. Y. 1889-1893, 14 vols.

BIOGRAPHIES. Among the many biographies Washington Irving's Life, N. Y. 1855-1859, 5 vols., still holds its place as one of the ablest. Henry Cabot Lodge's George Washington, Boston, 1889 and 1898, 2 vols., is a valuable modern study. The most notorious biography—interesting solely as a document in the history of the "Washington legend,"—is that by M. L. Weems, published in its first form in 1800, and later (1806) expanded and embellished with many apocryphal incidents, including that of the cherry tree. This has been republished many times, and is available in an 1892 reprint by the J. B. Lippincott Company. For details concerning Washington's private life, one must consult the invaluable Diary of George Washington, Boston, 1925, 4 vols.

NOTES

LETTER TO THE PRESIDENT OF CONGRESS

194. This typical letter gives a graphic picture of the difficulties Washington was constantly forced to overcome. To turn the pages of his correspondence during the war is to realize that his chief problem was not that of defeating the British army. The hardest task which he had to accomplish was the dual one of stirring a weak and vacillating Congress to action, and of overcoming a Tory sentiment which in many parts of the country made it far easier for the British to gain information of Washington than for him to learn of the movements of his foes. At the time he wrote this letter he was also harassed by the disaffected elements which were planning to depose him in favor of Gates, who was high in popular favor on account of the victory over Burgoyne at Saratoga.

THOMAS JEFFERSON (1743-1826)

When Jefferson wrote, "I have sworn upon the altar of God, eternal hostility against any form of tyranny over the mind of man," he gave utterance to the guiding principle of his whole life. It was in this spirit that he fought for the political independence of the colonies. It was with the same high purpose that he helped destroy the almost feudal caste system of Virginia, and secured the passage of the Virginia statute for religious liberty. The same passion for liberty inspired his last great act, the establishment of the University of Virginia. "The institution," wrote Jefferson in 1820, "will be based on the illimitable freedom of the human mind. For here we are not afraid to follow the truth wherever it may lead, nor to tolerate any error, so long as reason is left free to combat it."

It has been Jefferson's fate to be represented as almost the patron saint of a political party, as the founder of that tradition which the Democratic party of today claims as its historical birthright. It would be more fair to him, and more in accord with his own wishes, to think of him as one of the chief emancipators of the American mind; as a man who brought not only political but intellectual independence to the country he loved and served.

To record only the more outstanding facts of Jefferson's life is to indicate how significant and many-sided was his career. He was born in Virginia, in April, 1743, of a well-established family. Educated under private tutors, and at William and Mary College, he was admitted to the Bar in 1767, but after 1774 rarely practised. His experiences as a legislator began in 1769, when he entered the Virginia House of Burgesses. In 1775 he represented his state in the Continental Congress, and from that time till his final retirement from the Presidency in March, 1809, he was constantly in the inner political councils of the nation. His Summary View of the Rights of America (1774) established his position among the chief political writers of the time. When the question of independence finally came before Congress, his reputation was such that it was natural for him to be appointed on the committee to frame a declaration, and for the committee to entrust to him virtually the entire composition of the document.

Immediately after the Declaration of Independence had been adopted, Jefferson left Congress and returned to the Virginia legislature. Here he worked arduously—and successfully—for the enactment of laws which should make impossible either a landed aristocracy or an established church. He early began his life-long struggle against slavery, and succeeded in putting his state on record as opposed to any further importation of negroes. From 1779 to 1781 he was Governor of Virginia; from 1784 to 1789 he represented the United States at the Court of Louis XVI. So sincere was his affection for France, and so great was the respect in which he was held by the French, that in July of 1789 he was asked to advise with the committee appointed to draw up the new French Constitution—a request which he felt bound to decline, on account of his status as diplomatic representative.

From 1789 to 1794 Jefferson was Secretary of State in Washington's first cabinet, where he and Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, soon found themselves holding sharply divergent theories of government. Hamilton was the Federalist, constantly urging more and more power for the central government; Jefferson was the Republican, distrusting Hamilton's schemes because they seemed destined to lead back to a monarchy, and feeling confident that the best happiness of the nation was to be attained only by preserving to the individual states as many as possible of the attributes of sovereignty. Hamilton's views seemed in a majority of cases to be those of Washington, and in 1793 Jefferson resigned his portfolio and retired to his home at Monticello.

But for him to remain long out of public affairs was impossible. He had been too many years in harness to enjoy the leisure of plantation life, and in 1796 he was the candidate of the Republican party for the Presidency. John Adams, a Federalist, was elected; but Jefferson, who received the second largest number of electoral votes, became Vice-President. As presiding officer of the Senate he had little power, but he made an admirable party leader, and four years later, after the long-drawn-out contest between Burr and Jefferson in the House of Representatives, Jefferson became President. So successful was his first administration that in 1804 he was enthusiastically re-elected, and might conceivably have had a third term had he not followed Washington's example by refusing to be a candidate. His friend and political disciple, James Madison, followed him in the Presidency, and continued the "Jeffersonian tradition," as, indeed, did Monroe, who succeeded Madison.

During the latter years of his life Jefferson gave his energies whole-heartedly to the establishment of the University of Virginia, but found time to write much, and to exercise an important if unofficial influence upon American political thought. He died on July 4, 1826, just half a century after the adoption of the Declaration he had worded, and at the same hour that saw the death of his life-long rival and friend, John Adams.

Near the close of his life Jefferson composed the epitaph which he wished to appear on his tombstone. It singles out three achievements which he thought most memorable, and which posterity would agree were perhaps his chief contributions to American civilization: "Here was buried Thomas Jefferson, Author of the Declaration of Independence, the Statute of Virginia for Religious Freedom, and Father of the University of Virginia."

As a man of letters, Jefferson belongs in a sense with Franklin: he wrote for utilitarian purposes, usually political or economic; but like Franklin, he wrote so well that the best of his work seems sure to endure. His store of information was encyclopædic; his logical processes were usually good. He was inspired by a great and passionate enthusiasm for the causes he espoused. And—most important of all, in some ways—he possessed that gift of style without which no person can create literature. Hence it is that Jefferson, though significant primarily in the political history of America, has his assured place in literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. Two admirable editions of Jefferson are available in any large library. The first is that by Paul Leicester Ford, The Writings of Thomas Jefferson, N. Y. 1892-1898, 10 vols. The second, edited by A. A. Lipscomb and others, and published by the Thomas Jefferson Memorial Association of the United States, appeared in 1905, in 10 volumes, with the title, The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. One phase of Jefferson's activity not represented in either of these collections, his work as a draftsman and architect, is fully exemplified by text and numerous illustrations in Fiske Kimball's Thomas Jefferson, Architect, Boston, 1916. Here may be found reproductions of his sketches and plans for the University of Virginia and other public buildings.

BIOGRAPHIES. Five biographical and critical works should be mentioned in any list: Thomas Jefferson, by John T. Morse, Jr., Boston, 1887; William E. Dodd's Statesmen of the Old South, N. Y. 1911; David S. Muzzey's Thomas Jefferson, N. Y. 1918; Allen Johnson's Jefferson and his Colleagues, New Haven, 1921; and Claude G. Bowers's Jefferson and Hamilton, Boston, 1925.

NOTES

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

204. The motion which immediately prepared the way for the Declaration was introduced in the Continental Congress on June 1, 1776, by Richard Henry Lee, and stated that "these united Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States, that they are absolved of all allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved." John Adams at once seconded this motion, but it did not come to a vote till July 2, when it was passed.

On June 10 a committee consisting of Jefferson, Franklin, John Adams, Roger Sherman, and R. R. Livingston had been appointed to frame a formal declaration embodying the sense of Lee's motion. This declaration, in turn, was ratified by Congress on July 4, twelve colonies voting "aye," with New York not voting because her delegates had not been authorized to act on the matter. John Hancock, President of the Congress, may have signed the Declaration on July 4. Five days later the New York delegates added their affirmative to the vote of the other colonies, and on August 2, after the Declaration had been properly engrossed on parchment, it was signed by the fifty-three members of Congress then present. Three others signed later, only one, John Dickinson, of Pennsylvania, refusing his assent to the resolution.

The Declaration as a whole was the work of Jefferson, whom the committee of five entrusted with its composition. The original copy shows some marginal and interlinear corrections in the hand of Franklin.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY

206. Jefferson's Autobiography, like Franklin's, is incomplete. He carried it from 1741 to March 21, 1790, and in the fragmentary and at times regrettable Anas, continued the story to 1809. Both documents show their author intimately, with all his fine enthusiasms and unfortunate prejudices undimmed and unblunted.
206. b. 40. The fundamental defect of the Confederation. Compare Hamilton's remarks on the same matter, The Federalist, pp. 212 ff. above.
207. a. 54. In circumstances peculiarly favorable. Jefferson was American Minister to France when the Revolution began.
- b. 15. Mr. Jay. John Jay (1745-1829) was Secretary for Foreign Affairs during the last years of the Confederation. He helped Hamilton write The Federalist, and was selected by Washington to be the first Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court.
- b. 27. The metamorphosis. The change from the government under the Confederation to that under the Constitution.

b. 34. This great and good country. Jefferson's devotion to France here receives its finest expression.

NOTES ON THE STATE OF VIRGINIA

208. The volume bearing this title is Jefferson's most pretentious single work, and illustrates admirably the many-sidedness of his learning, as well as his literary skill. The book furnishes the one example in the history of civilization in which a questionnaire has been productive of good, for it was prepared as a reply to a series of queries sent out by the French legation in 1781, for the purpose of getting information to transmit to the Ministry at Versailles. The Notes were first printed—but not published—in 1784, in Paris, where Jefferson was then residing. The outspoken nature of some of his comments, and doubt as to how the book would be received in America, constrained him to circulate it only in private. By 1787, however, a French translation had been surreptitiously issued, as a result of which Jefferson made a few alterations, and then published the work over his own name. It has been often reprinted, and is entitled to be called one of the most popular American books of the late eighteenth century.

FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS

209. The moderateness of Jefferson's inaugural was a disappointment to some of his Republican supporters, who hoped that he would assume a less conciliatory attitude towards the defeated Federalists. The people as a whole, however, approved of his attitude, which the events of the next four years entirely justified.
- b. 6. We are all Republicans, etc. Compare Lincoln's first inaugural, pp. 780 ff., above.
210. a. 39. Entangling alliances. The phrase Jefferson here coins is commonly thought of as being found in Washington's Farewell Address. Though Washington voiced the same general ideas, he did not use quite these words, nor any others so succinctly expressive.

LETTER TO JAMES MADISON

211. a. 40. The late troubles in the eastern states. Shay's Rebellion. See note on The Federalist, p. 1131, this volume.
- b. 40. A little rebellion now and then is a good thing. Such a statement as this indicates how genuine was Jefferson's devotion to "the illimitable freedom of the human mind."

ALEXANDER HAMILTON (1757-1804)

Hamilton belongs to the group of interesting and influential persons who were men of letters almost by accident. Like Burke and Lincoln, he made statecraft his primary concern. When he wrote, it was to influence political action, not to experience the artist's joy in creation. But despite this practical purpose which sanctioned all his published work, he wrote in such a masterly fashion that to deny him an honorable position in the catalogue of literature would be as unthinkable as to rule out his great English contemporary, or his even greater American successor. In the history of "belles lettres" Hamilton's name does not appear; in the history of the larger and more significant literature of the nation that he helped to establish, the literature which is itself the most enduring record of that nation's life—in this chronicle Hamilton's name is writ large. For he was one of the few masters of political prose whom America has produced.

He was born in January, 1757, on the island of Nevis, British West Indies. For fifteen years he lived on one or another of the islands; when he was old enough, he occupied himself in an uncle's business, and developed an extraordinary talent as a letter writer. It was the promise of literary skill, indeed, that persuaded friends—after he had been left an orphan—to send him in 1772 to Elizabethtown, New Jersey, where he completed his preliminary education. Two years later he enrolled in King's College, New York (now Columbia University), only to have his studies soon interrupted by the war.

During the Revolution Hamilton served in several military capacities, and for four years was Washington's confidential aide and secretary. He thus had an opportunity to view what he later called "the defects of the present constitution" from a position behind the scenes, as well as to come in close and intimate contact with the man whom he was afterwards to assist in elevating to the Presidency.

When the Federal Convention met in Philadelphia in 1787, Hamilton was one of the delegates from his state. In the convention his energies were centered upon securing the adoption of a constitution which should create a strong federal government, and should end once and for all the troubles resulting from the very loose union established by the soon outworn Articles of Confederation. When such a document was finally signed by the delegates, though it was not in all ways what Hamilton desired, he gave himself enthusiastically to the more difficult task of securing its ratification by the requisite number of states. In New York the opposition was particularly strong. It was feared that the state would suffer if it entered any union in which small states like Delaware and Rhode Island had as much voice in the Senate as New York or Virginia. Hamilton undertook to overcome this local opposition. To give currency to his ideas, he began in October of 1787 the series of Federalist papers. He had the aid of Madison and Jay in part of the work; but the underlying theory of government, the general plan, and more than half of the actual writing, were entirely his own.

In speaking of the importance of the Federalist one is tempted to use the sort of superlatives which as a rule have no place in thoughtful writing. But in this case it is hard to do without them, for all the evidence of a century and a half goes to show that the Federalist was the most important single influence in securing the ratification of the Constitution. Without it, the new nation might never have been born.

To the reader of today, the qualities that stand out most markedly in the Federalist are, perhaps, the absolute clarity of statement, the steady and convincing development of an informing thesis, the wealth of historical allusion and illustration, and the irrefutable quality of the logic. When to these one adds the fiery intensity and passion of Hamilton himself, who was as brilliant and magnetic in debate as he was convincing in argumentation, one realizes with what force the Federal theory of government must have been driven home upon the New York convention. Almost against its will, that body succumbed to Hamilton's appeals, and ratified the Constitution in 1788.

Of Hamilton's subsequent career little can here be said. His service as Secretary of the Treasury in Washington's cabinet, his opposition to Jefferson and Adams, his life-long hostility towards Aaron Burr, whom he early suspected of being a dangerous person, and whose ambitions he thwarted once and again, his enduring significance as sponsor of the theory of government that puts the Federal power above that of any individual state—all these are matters of common knowledge. Even better known is the story of his final quarrel with Burr, and of his death following the duel of July 11, 1804. His work as a statesman seemed to be but beginning when Burr's bullet wrote a swift finis to the story. His work as a man of letters, however, had been completed when on August 15, 1788, he published the eighty-fifth number of the Federalist. By the time that final number was off the press Hamilton had written what Blackwood's Magazine called "the Bible of republicanism," a document which—to quote from the Edinburgh Review—exhibited "an extent and precision of information, a profundity of research, and an acuteness of understanding which would have done honor to the most illustrious statesman of ancient or modern times."

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The best edition of Hamilton's work is The Works of Alexander Hamilton, edited by H. C. Lodge, N. Y. 1885, 10 vols. The Federalist papers have been many times reprinted, and are easily available. H. C. Lodge's Alexander Hamilton, Boston, 1882 and 1898, is an excellent brief biography. Gertrude Atherton's novel, The Conqueror, is a substantially accurate chronicle of Hamilton's career. Mention has already been made of Claude G. Bowers' Jefferson and Hamilton, Boston, 1925.

NOTES

THE FEDERALIST

212. a. 25. Total want of a sanction to its laws. Under the Articles of Confederation Congress could recommend action to the State legislatures, but could not compel obedience to its acts. This was the chief "defect of the present constitution."
- b. 48. The tempestuous situation. The reference is to "Shays's Rebellion," which was occasioned by discontent resulting from economic distress following the war, and was finally quelled early in 1788. At the time Hamilton wrote this paper the trouble was still brewing, though the worst crises had been passed.
215. a. 9. Publius. The signature appended to each of the papers.
218. b. 22. The United Provinces. The Netherlands.

JOEL BARLOW (1754-1812)

To represent Barlow's poetical work by The Hasty Pudding, and to pass over what he considered his chief accomplishment without reprinting a line of it, is to treat him in a way which he and some of his contemporaries would have considered unfair. But it is clear by this time that his estimate of his own work was inaccurate, and that his chief claim to be remembered rests not upon The Columbiad, an epic of great size published in 1807, but rather upon the mock-epic which is here reproduced entire. The Columbiad, as Barrett Wendell once put it, is "among the most impressive books, to look at in the world." The Hasty Pudding, on the other hand, is clever, readable, humorous, and sincerely American in subject matter—a poem that can still be enjoyed even by a reader who does not share Barlow's enthusiasm for cornmeal mush.

Born in Redding, Connecticut, in 1754,

Barlow graduated from Yale in 1778, serving at the time as class poet. During the latter part of the war he was chaplain in an infantry regiment. Later in life he settled at Hartford, Connecticut, where he made one of the group still referred to as the "Hartford wits." From 1788 to 1805, however, he lived abroad, and it was while in Europe that he one day in 1792 found himself eating a dish of well-made hasty pudding. The result of this unexpected blessing was the poem here reprinted. Nothing that he did between this date and his death in 1812 is of sufficient importance to merit recording here.

Barlow's more pretentious works are available only in the original editions. The Hasty Pudding was reprinted by D. J. Brown, N. Y. 1847. For a biography of Barlow see C. B. Todd's Life and Letters of Joel Barlow, N. Y. 1886, or Moses Coit Tyler's Three Men of Letters, N. Y. 1895.

THE HASTY PUDDING

220. First published in 1796, though written some time before.

EARLY LYRISTS

None of the authors included under the general heading Early Lyrists was a great poet, yet each of them wrote at least one song which has become a permanent part of our literature. Sentimentalism was still rife in America in the early nineteenth century, and much of the poetry of the day made its appeal through a mild form of melancholy that verged on the maudlin. Nevertheless, these particular lyrics, which have held their place with the public for the better part of a century, stand out from the rest by the genuineness of their feeling. The three patriotic songs at the beginning of the collection have much poetic fervor; and The Star-Spangled Banner in particular, despite the fact that it concerns one special aspect of an almost forgotten battle, and despite the difficulty of its tune as compared to those of other popular favorites, has easily established itself as our National Anthem.

Joseph Hopkinson (1770-1842), a graduate and trustee of the University of Pennsylvania, and a distinguished Philadelphia jurist, was a son of Francis Hopkinson, author of The Battle of the Kegs; his one well-known song, Hail, Columbia, was written in 1798 at the request of a friend. Francis Scott Key (1780-1843), a graduate of St. John's College, Annapolis, practised law and became district attorney in Washington. His poetic fame rests chiefly on The Star-Spangled Banner. Samuel Francis Smith, D. D. (1808-1895), was a clergyman, editor of various religious publications, and author of many hymns, of which the most famous is America. (For a tribute by his distinguished classmate Holmes, see the Harvard reunion poem, The Boys, p. 703, above.) Samuel Woodworth (1785-1842) was an author and journalist of moderate ability, best known for The Old Oaken Bucket and The Forest Rose (a play), and for his part in founding the New York Mirror. John Howard Payne (1792-1852), actor and playwright, carried on his dramatic work chiefly in England, and after retiring from the stage became American consul at Tunis. George Pope Morris (1802-1864) was one of the founders of the New York Mirror, which he edited for twenty years. He was among the ablest early American journalists, and financially the most successful songwriter of his day.

NOTES

HAIL COLUMBIA

227. Written in 1798, when Congress had put Washington in command of the army, and it was generally thought that the United States would have to take one side or the other in the war between England and France.

THE STAR-SPANGLED BANNER

During the War of 1812, Key, with a flag of truce, went aboard one of the British vessels to arrange for the exchange of prisoners. While still aboard the enemy ship, he witnessed the prolonged but unsuccessful bombardment of one of the defenses of Baltimore, Fort McHenry, which the British Admiral had boasted he would carry in a few hours.

AMERICA

228. Written and published in 1832.

HOME, SWEET HOME

229. First sung in Payne's opera, Clari, the Maid of Milan, at Covent Garden, London, in 1823.

WOODMAN, SPARE THAT TREE

230. One of Morris's friends had such pleasant childhood associations with an old tree near Bloomingdale, N. Y., that he paid ten dollars to have it preserved from the woodman's axe. Morris happened to be present when the contract was made, and this poem is the result.

CHARLES BROCKDEN BROWN
(1771-1810)

The literary reputation of Charles Brockden Brown rests principally on the fact that he was the first American to make authorship his sole profession, and the first to write a series of novels that met with some appreciable success. He was eager to prove that an American could write fiction, with strictly American backgrounds, in a style sufficiently elegant to enable his work to compete with the great novels produced in England during the eighteenth century. Seldom has a novelist taken himself so seriously, or aimed with such naïve assurance at a mark so hopelessly beyond his reach. Taking William Godwin's story of criminal oppression, Caleb Williams, as his model, and imitating in his general plan the horror-piled-on-horror method of the "Gothic" romances, he chanced by ill luck to adopt a style so pedantic and Latinized that his works survive today partly as literary curiosities. Yet despite the crudities of style, and, in some parts, of construction, his best book, Wieland, continues to be read for its vigorous depicting of terror as a force in human life. Brown had a power which breaks through the barrier of literary immaturity and gives life to a kind of writing that in most particulars was out of date when he wrote it.

During his seven most productive years (1798-1804) Brown published six novels: Wieland, which was written in a single month, Ormond, Arthur Mervyn, Edgar Huntly, Clara Howard, and Jane Talbot. Almost without exception the atmosphere of these tales is gloomy and morbid, suffused with the miasma of yellow fever, madness, or murder. Towards the latter part of his brief life, his literary efforts took a more wholesome turn, and he became the editor of various magazines, but his health gave way and he died of consumption in 1810. It is a commonplace of literary criticism that his talent was admirably suited for writing the short story, but he missed the opportunity, which was promptly seized by Poe and Hawthorne.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The best edition of Brown's novels is that published by David Mackay, Philadelphia, 1887, 6 vols. John Erskine's chapter on Brown, in his Leading American Novelists, N. Y. 1910, is a good biographical and critical sketch.

NOTES

WIELAND

230. The story is told in the first person by Wieland's sister Clara, who has lived happily in a secluded part of Pennsylvania with her brother and his family, and who is about to marry, when Carwin, the malignant man of mystery, comes upon the scene. Chapter VI, the selection included in this volume, describes the peculiar personality of this villain, and gives an instance of his uncanny influence. Towards the end of the book it is made clear that the horrors and tragedies recounted are all caused by Carwin's amazing power as a ventriloquist, which enables him to play upon the credulity of his victims until he drives Wieland into a homicidal mania and forever separates the innocent sister from her betrothed.

JAMES FENIMORE COOPER (1789-1851)

James Fenimore Cooper was born in Burlington, N. J., in 1789, but the family moved when he was only one year old to the beautiful wilderness of lakes and mountains in what is now called Cooperstown, N. Y. Here the boy came to know the forest trails and the primeval forest itself in a way that stood him in good stead later, when he was writing his Leatherstocking Tales. For a time he seemed likely to go through the commonplace experiences of school and college, but a peremptory dismissal from Yale forced him into scenes of greater interest. In a word, his father, Judge Cooper, thought the discipline of the Navy desirable for one who could not accommodate himself to college rules; as a preliminary step the youth shipped on a merchantman, the Sterling, and for a year sailed the Atlantic, gathering, all unknowingly, material for the sea stories that were destined to be almost as famous as his tales of the Indians. After many exciting adventures, including saving a comrade from drowning and being chased by pirates, he enlisted in the Navy, where he acquitted himself creditably as a midshipman. His marriage in 1811 to Miss DeLancey, a woman of pronounced Tory leanings, made it undesirable for him to fight against England in the War of 1812, and on resigning his commission he settled down to the life of a country gentleman, his active career apparently over.

After several years there came the trifling incident which changed the course of his life: he expressed the opinion that he could write a better novel than one he happened to be reading; and, challenged by his wife, attempted to do so. The result, Precaution (1820), scarcely justified his boast; but with the appearance of The Spy in 1821 he established himself as an author of note. Within the next three years he wrote The Pioneers, creating Natty Bumppo, and The Pilot—the latter a frank attempt to better the seamanship displayed by Sir Walter Scott in The Pirate. In these two volumes he showed his skill at two distinct types of story, on which he rang the changes with marked success for over twenty-five years.

Both in New York City and on his extensive travels in Europe he was a popular favorite, but at times his published criticisms of both American and European ways of life involved him in unnecessary and fruitless controversy. His declining years, like his early childhood, were spent in happiness among the lakes which play so large a part in his novels.

He died at Cooperstown, in 1850, having requested his family to authorize no biography, for he felt that he had been misunderstood by his contemporaries, and would inevitably be misrepresented in whatever might be written. Two volumes of his correspondence, however, recently (1922) edited by his grandson, provide an excellent source for a study of his later years.

The advance in fiction as one turns from the first American novelist of importance, Charles Brockden Brown, to the second, Cooper, is so great as scarcely to permit a comparison of their worth. As has already been pointed out (p. 1132), Brown's priority is his chief claim to recognition; Cooper, on the other hand, wrote thirty-two romances, of which half a dozen are still popular throughout western Europe and the United States, while a dozen more were widely read during the author's lifetime. Books which weather the literary storms of a century show some promise of permanence, and there is reason to believe that Cooper may be among the immortals. He created a new type—the romance of the sea, with which Defoe, Smollett, and Scott had toyed without recognizing its latent possibilities; moreover, he created the novel of frontier life dealing principally with the American Indians. And in creating these two types he wrote with such freshness and vigor that his sea stories have been surpassed only seldom, and his Indian stories never.

On the other hand, there is not one of Cooper's many books which can be praised without reservation: at times the dialogue is tedious, the moralizing is painful, and the style is atrocious. Suspense is frequently prolonged to the point of fatigue, and the more exciting incidents frankly tax the reader's credulity. (See Mark Twain's incisive criticism in "Fenimore Cooper's Literary Offenses," an essay in the volume entitled How to Tell a Story and other Essays.) On the whole, Cooper's romances are unique in their absurd mixture of literary faults and merits.

Cooper has often been called "the American Scott," but the comparison throws very little light on the secret of his amazing power as a story-teller. A contrast of Cooper with Hawthorne is far more illuminating. Hawthorne's work is not popular on the Continent because the act of translation, by blurring the delicacy of his literary etchings, spoils his chief glory. Cooper's style, on the other hand, is so clumsy that it loses nothing by any reasonable translation—nay, it often gains; and his works have gripped French and German readers just as forcibly as they have English and American. If we set down several essential elements of fiction and arrange them according to the abundance in which Cooper possessed them, we find something like this: first, stirring action; second, interesting settings accurately described; third, character portrayal; and fourth, style. If we reverse the order, making greatest what was least in Cooper, and so on, the result is surprisingly close to an analysis of Hawthorne's peculiar literary equipment.

In the larger phases of authorship, then, Cooper had an unusual talent—in selecting a story worth telling, devising a plot or plan, and in portraying acts of physical prowess set off against a background of ocean or forest. He is at his best when his hero stands at the helm of a storm-tossed vessel, steering among uncharted shoals along some secret channel known only to him, while the waves dash over the bow and the crew cower in fear of death; or when a helpless maiden (somewhat unromantically called a "female") is being carried off by Indians to some forest fastness whence her lover can rescue her only with the aid of the ubiquitous guide, Natty Bumppo. For the minute details of technique, in dealing with which Hawthorne had no peer, Cooper had no flair; but his vitality has proved sufficient to make his work survive. And one of his characters, Natty Bumppo, variously known as Deerslayer, Hawkeye, or Pathfinder, seems already to have attained immortality.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. The first collected edition of Cooper's works—though far from complete—appeared in New York, in 1854, in 33 volumes. A good modern one is that published by Putnam's, 32 vols.

BIOGRAPHIES. The standard biography is T. R. Lounsbury's James Fenimore Cooper, N. Y. 1883. To supplement this the student should consult The Correspondence of James Fenimore Cooper, edited by his grandson, James Fenimore Cooper, New Haven, 1922, 2 vols.

Of critical articles the following—representing many different points of view and methods of approach—are all significant: Balzac's Fenimore Cooper et Walter Scott, in La Revue Parisienne, 25 July, 1840; Mark Twain's Fenimore Cooper's Literary Offenses, first published in the North American Review, July, 1895; Parkman's James Fenimore Cooper, North American Review, January, 1852; W. C. Brownell's Cooper, in his American Prose Masters, N. Y. 1909. Preston A. Barba's Cooper in Germany, Bloomington, Indiana, 1914, contains much information on one phase of Cooper's European vogue.

NOTES

THE PILOT

236. The Pilot (1824) was written in an attempt to surpass, at least in nautical accuracy, Scott's Pirate. Several of the exploits of the hero, Gray, are modelled after those of the American naval commander, John Paul Jones, whom Gray was intended to represent.

To readers not familiar with the complicated problem of handling an old-fashioned ship, it may be briefly explained that a square-rigged vessel cannot "point up" within forty-five degrees of the wind, and that her drift sideways is so great that she does not actually go in the direction she is headed; progress against the wind is thus made by a series of diagonals, with the complicated manœuver of either "tacking ship" or "wearing ship" at each turn. "Tacking ship," or coming about, involves changing the position of all sails set, and getting them to draw on the other side; and if the vessel loses her momentum during the turn, she becomes unmanageable. In the passage here reproduced, Cooper has shown how a ship should be "tacked" through a narrow and tortuous channel, between unmarked shoals, with strong tidal currents, in a gale of wind. Under such conditions if too little sail be carried, there is not speed enough to make the vessel steer properly; if too much sail be carried, the masts break and a wreck is inevitable; under some conditions it is well-nigh impossible to find the happy medium.

237. a. 33. To be taken aback. To be caught without momentum, the vessel heading into the wind, and the sails drawing backwards.
238. b. 11. See all clear for stays. Everything ready for tacking.

THE DEERSLAYER

243. Cooper's Leatherstocking Tales set forth different periods in the life of an American woodsman who was constantly in contact with Indians, both friendly and hostile. The chronological order of the stories with reference to the life of the hero is: The Deerslayer (1841), The Last of the Mohicans (1826), The Pathfinder (1840), The Pioneers (1823), and The Prairie (1827)—a fact easily remembered because (as pointed out in Bronson's American Literature, p. 132) the titles run in alphabetical order.

In the first of these volumes the hero is called Deerslayer. Though of pure white blood, he lives as companion of Chingachgook, chief of the friendly Delaware Indians. With his famous long rifle, Killdeer, Deerslayer helps defend both the Delawares and the white settlers from raids by the savage Hurons. The situation in Chapter XXIX is that Deerslayer, having been captured by the Hurons, refuses to marry the squaw Sumach, whose husband and brother he has killed. He is accordingly condemned to death by torture.

245. b. 19. He had not been made woman. The Delaware Indians had been conquered by the Iroquois, disarmed, and forced to adopt the sobriquet of "women."
246. a. 11. Gesler's apple. In Schiller's play Wilhelm Tell, Tell is obliged by Gesler to show his skill with the crossbow by shooting an apple from his own son's head.

WASHINGTON IRVING (1783-1859)

To say that Irving was the first American essayist who wrote with charm and urbanity, the first American biographer and historian who presented the results of scholarly investigation in a thoroughly readable fashion, and the first American who won any large audience by the exercise of his native humor, is to put the case for him bluntly but truthfully. To add to this the statement that he was the first American who was an artist in prose and not merely a maker of books, who was in reality a man of letters, not by accident, but because his life-long ambition was to be a writer of good prose, is to make the picture less incomplete. With him American prose literature came into its majority.

He was born in New York City in April, 1783. His Scottish father and English mother felt no hesitation over naming one of their five sons for that American who had just driven the British from New York, and Irving never tired of telling how General Washington, at the time of his first inauguration as President, patted his head and told him to be a good boy. Interestingly enough, this man for whom he was named, and whose accolade he was proud to have received, was the subject of Irving's last work and greatest biography, completed in the year of Irving's own death.

As a child Irving felt somewhat repressed in the atmosphere of his Presbyterian home; more baneful than this, so it seemed at the time, was the fact that he was never strong, and that at the time he might otherwise have been going to college, he was wandering north in the Hudson River country, trying to check the tuberculosis that had already fastened itself upon him. In 1804 he went abroad, and for two years found the utmost delight in his contacts with picturesque parts of Europe, and in the gradual return of his health.

In 1806 he was admitted to the New York Bar, and for the rest of his life—like Sir Walter Scott, one of his English friends—was nominally an attorney. Like Scott, however, he found literature more pleasing than law, and was a barrister only in name.

His first venture into the world of letters came in 1807, when, in collaboration with James K. Paulding, he issued a series of sketches or essays known today as The Salmagundi Papers. Two years later these locally amusing skits were entirely forgotten in the applause that followed the publication of the Knickerbocker History of New York.

After the War of 1812 had ended, Irving once more went abroad, this time as English representative of an importing firm in which he and his brothers were partners. Disliking the work heartily, but enjoying to the full his experiences in England, he seems almost to have welcomed bankruptcy in 1818; for the failure of the business left him free to give all his time to literature. In 1819-1820 the publication of The Sketch-Book showed that his time had been well spent.

At once he found himself famous—the friend of Scott, Southey, and their contemporaries. Bracebridge Hall, another collection of essays, followed in 1822; in 1828 he entered a different field with the Life of Columbus. To fit himself for this biographical work Irving had begun his studies of Spanish history; the fascination of the field proved so great that in 1829 he published The Conquest of Granada, and in 1832 The Legends of the Alhambra. By this time he was known as historian and scholar as well as essayist; his fame was as great in Europe as in America.

Returning to New York in 1832, with the Oxford doctorate and medal of the Royal Society of Literature as testimonials of his prestige abroad, he lived for ten years in quiet happiness, somewhat reluctantly going abroad again in 1842 as Minister to Spain. His Life of Goldsmith had been published in 1840, and had been at once received as the best biography of that Englishman whom Irving has so often been said to resemble.

Returning from Spain in 1846, he spent the remaining thirteen years of his life at "Sunnyside," Tarrytown. His last work, The Life of George Washington, was published in 1859; shortly afterwards his own life ended.

No one reads The Sketch-Book or Bracebridge Hall without realizing that in the difficult rôle of familiar essayist, Irving ranks close to the masters of the type. Learning much from Addison and Goldsmith, and finding much of his inspiration from the English country life which they had known a century before, he never lost his enjoyment of the Hudson River scenery and stories—one is almost tempted to say folk-lore—with which he had come in contact during his early wanderings in search of health, and in treating which he wrote his best-known essays. English though he may be by virtue of his literary ancestry, and often by virtue of his subject matter, he is never quite so effective as in Rip Van Winkle and The Legend of Sleepy Hollow, where the material owes nothing to foreign influence. (It is interesting to note that at the very time Irving was bringing out these early essays, Bryant was publishing his first volume of what may be called native American poetry, a forty-four page booklet issued in 1821. It is also interesting to remember that had neither man published anything after this date, his fame would have been secure.)

Irving's historical work came after his most popular essays had been published, and added much to his contemporary reputation. Nor have these longer, more pretentious volumes ceased, with the passing of time, to exert the charm which the first readers found in them. The Columbus, the Goldsmith, and the Washington, are still vivid, colorful biographies, biographies which no "mere essayist" could have written, but which demanded the patience and learning of the scholar as well as the literary skill of the trained craftsman. And whoever would delight once more in the romance and legends of old Spain, must still turn to the Alhambra and Conquest of Granada, books which Irving wrote with all the enthusiasm of his American youth, albeit in an approximation to the idiom of his English masters.

Yet when all is said and done one wonders whether Irving's claim to our gratitude does not rest more firmly upon the Knickerbocker History than upon anything else. Pure burlesque at first, almost a parody, as was Joseph Andrews in its opening chapters, the book rapidly outgrew its original purpose of laughing at a ponderous historical treatise, and became that most difficult but admirable thing, a work of art done in the spirit of broad comedy. Here one sees announced, sixty years in advance, the humor which Mark Twain was to tag as "American," and to send over all the world. Here is the mingling of the serious and the comic, of actual fact and stark impossibility, here the colossal exaggeration, the fabulous yarn told with the gravest of faces, that, rightly or wrongly, are considered parts of America's distinctive literary privilege. To be sure, the satire in the book offended some of the Dutch families living along the lower Hudson; but Sir Walter Scott liked it all immensely, and eagerly sought out the young author to thank him for having written a great and enjoyable book. The verdict of a hundred years coincides with Scott's.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. An admirable collected edition of Irving's work is the Knickerbocker, Putnam's N. Y. 1897, 40 vols. Reprints of individual titles are so numerous as not to be worth listing.

BIOGRAPHIES. C. D. Warner's Washington Irving (A. M. L. series), Boston, revised edition 1894, and H. W. Boynton's Washington Irving, Boston, 1901, are good biographical and critical studies. More detailed information may be found in P. M. Irving's The Life and Letters of Washington Irving, N. Y. 1862-64, 4 vols., revised edition 1883. The Journals of Washington Irving, ed. W. P. Trent and G. S. Hellman, Boston, 1919, 3 vols., make available a mass of material that throws much new light on Irving's literary methods.

CRITICAL ARTICLES. An attempt to list American articles dealing with Irving would be futile; but because of his long and intimate connection with England the following British criticisms are of particular interest: Hazlitt's essay, Elia, and Geoffrey Crayon, in The Spirit of the Age; two most complimentary reviews by Francis Jeffrey in the Edinburgh Review, vol. 34, Aug. 1820, and vol. 37, Nov. 1822; a briefer discussion—probably by Lockhart—in Blackwood's, vol. 6, Feb. 1820; and Thackeray's notice of Irving's death entitled Nisi Nisi Bonum, first printed in the Cornhill Magazine, vol. 1, 1860, and now included in Roundabout Papers.

NOTES

A HISTORY OF NEW YORK

250. Wouter Van Twiller, the subject of this chapter, was the fifth of the Dutch Governors of New York, and held office from 1633-1637.

THE AUTHOR'S ACCOUNT OF HIMSELF

253. From The Sketch-Book. This somewhat autobiographical description at once suggests Addison's description of the Spectator.

RIP VAN WINKLE

255. From The Sketch-Book. The source of the story, as the author's note suggests, was the German tradition concerning the Emperor Frederick the Red-Beard. Students interested in the development of the short story will find an interesting contrast in mood and method between the leisurely manner of Irving, as illustrated here and in The Moor's Legacy (above, p. 270), and the tense emotionalism of Poe.

THE MUTABILITY OF LITERATURE

264. From The Sketch-Book. The subject of this essay—the changes in literary styles—came to affect Irving in an unpleasant way. In 1846 his publishers informed him that there was no need for a new edition of his works because during his long stay in Europe public taste had changed.

- b. 22. Drummond of Hawthornden. A Scottish poet (1585-1649).
 b. 49. Doomsday Book. Two volumes containing the records of the "Grand Survey" of England, made in 1086 by direction of William the Conqueror.
 266. b. 24. Giraldus Cambrensis. Like most of the other writers mentioned in this paragraph, an Anglo-Latin chronicler of the twelfth century.
 267. a. 3. Wynkyn de Worde. An English printer, successor to Caxton. He died about 1535.
 a. 24. Robert of Gloucester. A writer of the late thirteenth century. The poetic merit of his chronicles is so slight as to justify the phrase "Rhymes of mongrel Saxon."
 a. 27. Spenser. Edmund Spenser (1552-1599) paid this tribute to Chaucer. The expression, which Irving has slightly misquoted, comes from The Faerie Queene, IV, 2, 32: "Dan Chaucer, well of English undefyled."
 268. b. 44. Little of Latin. The now proverbial expression "small Latin and less Greek" is from Ben Jonson's poem To the Memory of . . . William Shakespeare.

THE LEGEND OF THE MOOR'S LEGACY

270. From The Alhambra.
 a. 4. The fortress of the Alhambra. A palace and citadel dating from the time of the Moorish occupation of Granada. The buildings which made up the large group were the work of many rulers, and were in process of erection during the hundred years following 1240.
 272. b. 29. The famous Barber of Seville. Figaro, the clever busybody who thrives on intrigue, in Beaumarchais' comedies Le Barbier de Seville and Le Mariage de Figaro, and in the operas derived from these plays.

JOSEPH RODMAN DRAKE (1795-1820)

Joseph Rodman Drake, physician and poet, collaborated with Halleck in the witty Croaker verses, and wrote enough poetry of his own to give evidence of excellent taste and unusual talent. His Culprit Fay, a fanciful thing obviously influenced by Coleridge, was written in two days to prove that he could compose a narrative poem in which human beings played no part. The American Flag won immediate popularity because of its vigorous patriotism, and is still more readable than most similar work of a hundred years ago. Had Drake lived longer, he might have achieved something notable; as it is, his poetry marks a distinct advance over that of his predecessors in America.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Some fifteen editions of Drake's work have appeared since 1835, but no one is of outstanding merit. J. G. Wilson's Joseph Rodman Drake, in Harper's Monthly, June, 1874, is a competent estimate of the man and his work. Poe's comments on Drake (and Halleck) may be found in an essay originally published in the Southern Literary Messenger, vol. 2, and now included in the Virginia Edition of Poe, VIII, 275.

FITZ-GREENE HALLECK (1790-1867)

Halleck's life was too closely confined to the accountant's desk, at which he spent his best years, to allow him to develop much originality as a poet. Yet having a facile pen and literary taste amounting almost to talent, he managed to become a leading minor poet whose verses pleased a public not overcritical in its demands. Except for a few poems by Bryant, Poe, and Pinkney, the early years of the nineteenth century were singularly lean; contrasted with the mid-century period when Longfellow, Lowell, Holmes, Whittier, and Whitman were in their prime, they present a sorry spectacle. Halleck's verses, imitated from Byron and other giants of the English romantic movement, would scarcely have been noticed but for the lack of American competition. His long satiric poem Fanny is Byron without the Byronic spice; his Marco Bozzaris shows an interest in the Greek struggle for liberty that is again Byronic—but somewhat diluted. His society verse is undoubtedly clever, but where the majority of Byron's metrical lapses are both deliberate and amusing, Halleck's are commonly only clumsy and annoying. Accordingly it seems worth while to include in this volume only a few samples of his work and one elegy by which he will always be remembered—the tribute to Joseph Rodman Drake.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The best edition of Halleck's work is The Poetical Writings of Fitz-Greene Halleck, with Extracts from those of Joseph Rodman Drake, ed. J. G. Wilson, N. Y. 1869, 1885. Wilson's The Life and Letters of Fitz-Greene Halleck, N. Y. 1869, is still the best biography.

NOTES

ON THE DEATH OF JOSEPH RODMAN DRAKE

289. The verses of this elegy not only commemorate the friendship between Drake and Halleck, but also mark the high-water level of Halleck's poetic accomplishment.

MARCO BOZZARIS

290. "Marco Bozzaris, one of the best and bravest of the modern Greek chieftains. He fell in a night attack upon the Turkish camp at Laspi, the site of the ancient Platæa, August 20, 1822, and expired in the moment of victory." (Halleck's note.) The poem is probably the best-known example of Halleck's work.
18. Platæa. At the battle of Platæa, 479 B. C., the Greeks overcame the Persians in a crucial engagement.

THE IRON GRAYS

291. Halleck was a member of this New York infantry organization during the War of 1812.

EDWARD COOTE PINKNEY (1802-1828)

Edward Coote Pinkney—the correct spelling of his middle name has just been established by Messrs. Mabbott and Pleadwell in their definitive edition of his works—the son of William Pinkney of Maryland, was born in 1802 and died in 1828. During his short and adventurous life he was by turns an officer in the navy, a lawyer, a journalist, and a poet of more promise and ability than any American of his times, save only Bryant and Poe. His total output was small, yet among his collected works are to be found half a dozen lyrics that surpass in beauty anything that America had produced at that time, and that one still reads with pleasure. Poe admired his work, the best of which had appeared before Poe began to write, and imitated it. It would be hard to find a more certain indication of his merit.

The first two of the poems here reprinted were included in Pinkney's 1825 volume. The last was first published in 1926.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Pinkney's work is now available in The Life and Works of Edward Coote Pinkney, ed. T. O. Mabbott and F. L. Pleadwell, N. Y., 1926. In this edition one finds an admirable biography, as well as the entire body of Pinkney's literary work, including thirty poems or prose items hitherto unpublished.

WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT (1794-1878)

Before commenting on Bryant's poetry, which is his most tangible gift to posterity, it will be well to consider briefly the facts of his life and the scope of his editorial work, which was of great importance to his contemporaries. He was born in 1794, in Cummington, Massachusetts, and in that state he spent the first thirty years of his life.

His father, a physician and member of the legislature, was able to give him a good schooling in preparation for college, but the natural beauties of the Berkshire hills seem to have exerted a greater influence on his poetry than did any formal education. The family life was wholesome and happy, yet the modest sum paid the tutor Hallock for tuition and board—one dollar a week—suggests a financial stringency. It was in part lack of funds that led the poet to skip the freshman year at Williams, and that subsequently made it impossible for him to transfer to Yale, the college of his choice. After seven months at Williams he obtained an honorable dismissal and took up the study of law, but from this career his ability as a writer of both prose and verse soon turned him. The violent satire of 1808, The Embargo, had been a mere boyish tirade in verse; but the brooding on nature and death which culminated in Thanatopsis was soon supplemented by other signs of literary power: critical articles from his pen appeared in the North American Review; he delivered the Phi Beta Kappa poem (The Ages) at Harvard in 1821; and in the same year he published the slender volume of his Poems which, though it contained but forty-four pages, was destined to rank as the first really distinguished collection of poetry by any American.

By 1825 Bryant was married and established in New York City on the staff of the Evening Post. Three years later he was editor and chief owner of the same journal, and was beginning a half century of work which was to demonstrate that a metropolitan newspaper could be dignified, interesting, and profitable, without sacrificing its independence or the ideals of its editor. Long before Horace Greeley built up the New York Tribune, Bryant had made the Evening Post the foremost newspaper of the country, and had established a new code of journalistic ethics for the English-speaking world.

It is a matter of common knowledge that as time passed Bryant became New York's leading citizen, and went about the streets of the city with a quiet, austere dignity which suggested, as George William Curtis pointed out in his funeral address on Bryant, the personality of a Spartan lawgiver. The reputation which had come to him from his poetry and from his editorial success, made him much sought after as a speaker at public meetings of special importance. To this fact we owe the series of brilliant addresses on Cooper, Irving, Halleck, and various other contemporaries. Yet arduous as were his duties as editor and orator, he was able to complete and publish blank verse translations of the Iliad (1870) and the Odyssey (1871). On the whole Bryant's life was an example to his countrymen, and indeed to the world, of the wholesome influence in public affairs which can be wielded by an independent man of letters. He died in June, 1873, a few hours after having made the chief address at the unveiling of a statue to Mazzini.

In considering Bryant's poetry one passage in his brief autobiography is peculiarly significant: "In my ninth year I began to make verses, some of which were utter nonsense. My father ridiculed them, and endeavored to teach me to write only when I had something to say." Here are suggested several points which, if space permitted, might be enlarged on—Bryant's precocity at verse-making, the value of his father's literary guidance, and the doctrine that having "something to say" is essential to writing good poetry. Four years later his first considerable poem, The Embargo, showed the results of this precocity and of his father's teaching. And still four years later, Thanatopsis illustrated on a heroic scale the same points of interest. Here is a precocity so astounding that Dana's remark has become famous: "Ah! Phillips, you have been imposed upon; no one on this side of the Atlantic is capable of writing such verses." Here again appears the kindly influence of his father, by whose interest the poem was brought to light; and finally one notes the mark which characterizes every poem that Bryant gave to the public—he "had something to say." Thanatopsis is not only incredibly mature for a youth of seventeen, but its fundamental message is still of value, for "it takes the idea of Death out of its theological aspects and sophistications, and the perversions of conscience with which they are connected, and restores it to its proper place in the scheme of things." (From Parke Godwin's Life of Bryant, I, p. 100.)

Bryant's love of nature is probably the quality which has chiefly endeared him to us as a poet. There is an intimacy amounting almost to personal affection in his feeling for the yellow violet, the fringed gentian, and the bobolink; the poems in which he sings their praises are not copied from Burns, Wordsworth, or any other poet of nature. They are the self-sufficient expressions of his own personality—too measured and restrained to be spontaneous, and thus lacking one of Burns's chief merits, yet gaining something by this very calmness. In no sense such a mystic as was Wordsworth, Bryant felt, nevertheless, the presence of God in nature; his Forest Hymn—not to mention the richness of its blank verse—shows that to him every object in nature was est Hymn is to many readers his most notable treatment of nature.

Bryant was not a great poet, in the sense in which the adjective may be applied to some of his English contemporaries. He was neither a profound thinker nor an unfailing master of the technique of verse. His themes were few, and of the sort that tend to become monotonous: the beauty of Nature, the inevitableness of death. But in its simplicity, its dignity, its concrete picturing of nature, and its pervading "high seriousness," his best work presents a combination of qualities which made him worthy to be—what in fact he was—the first of the major poets of America.

EDITIONS. Parke Godwin's Life and Works of William Cullen Bryant, N. Y. 1883-1889, 6 vols., is the most valuable single contribution to our knowledge of the poet, and contains well edited texts of both his poetical and prose works. The best one-volume edition of the poems is the Roslyn, edited by H. C. Sturges and R. H. Stoddard, Appleton, N. Y. 1903, 1910. The text of the present selections is taken, by permission of the publishers, from this edition.

BIOGRAPHIES. In addition to Godwin's life, W. A. Bradley's William Cullen Bryant, N. Y. 1905 (E. M. L.), is a valuable study. G. W. Curtis's The Life, Character and Writings of William Cullen Bryant, N. Y. 1879, is of particular interest because of the fact that Bryant and Curtis were personal friends. J. G. Wilson's Bryant and his Friends, N. Y. 1886, is useful on account of its treatment of men like Drake and Halleck.

Poe discussed Bryant's work several times, most effectively in an article published in Godey's Lady's Book, April, 1846, and now included in vol. 6 of the Stedman-Woodberry edition of Poe, p. 105.

NOTES

THANATOPSIS

292. Bryant wrote the main portion of this poem when he was only seventeen years old, after reading Blair's Grave, Porteus's Death, Cowper's Task, and various poems by Southey and Henry Kirke White. Some years later the unpublished manuscript was discovered by Bryant's father, and sent, without the author's permission, to the North American Review, where it appeared in September, 1817. Bryant subsequently added lines 1-16 and 66-81, thereby altering considerably the philosophical significance of the poem. For an interesting study of the history of the poem, see an article by Carl Van Doren in The Nation, October 7, 1915.

An emanation of the indwelling Life,
A visible token of the upholding Love,
That are the soul of this great Universe.

The same religious significance of nature is suggested, though less clearly, in several other poems, especially in the introductory lines of Monument Mountain; but the For-

A WINTER PIECE

294. First published in the 1821 volume.

TO A WATERFOWL

296. Written on the evening of December 15, 1815. Bryant had been walking alone, feeling somewhat disconsolate concerning his uncertain future. The appearance of the waterfowl seemed to him a sort of vision sent to teach the lesson of divine guidance, which he set forth in the last stanza of the poem. Matthew Arnold's enthusiastic praise of the poem ("the most perfect brief poem in the language") is well known.

MONUMENT MOUNTAIN

297. The mountain is near Great Barrington, Massachusetts. Bryant heard the tradition from a friend, who had it from one of the Indians.

A FOREST HYMN

301. 101-18. This is the sort of passage that has caused some people to call Bryant "the American Wordsworth." See, for instance, Lowell's remarks in A Fable for Critics, p. 624, above.

"O FAIREST OF THE RURAL MAIDS"

301. From among the many poems that Bryant wrote to Frances Fairchild, whom he married in 1821, this only was authorized for publication.

THE PAST

302. Bryant is said to have considered this his best poem, ranking it above even Thanatopsis.

THE PRAIRIES

304. In 1832 Bryant made a trip to Illinois, and spent a week with his brothers there. On November 2, 1833, he wrote to Dana: "I have a little piece by me in blank verse entitled The Prairies, for which I have directed room to be left. It is not yet quite finished; the conclusion gives me some perplexity."

SONG OF MARION'S MEN

306. "The exploits of General Francis Marion, the famous partisan warrior of South Carolina, form an interesting chapter in the annals of the American Revolution. The British troops were so harassed by the irregular and successful warfare which he kept up at the head of a few daring followers, that they sent an officer to remonstrate with him for not coming into the open field and fighting 'like a gentleman and a Christian.'" (Bryant's note.)

ROBERT OF LINCOLN

307. Bird-lovers enjoy this poem for its accuracy of detail, and especially for the success with which the refrain imitates the song of the male bobolink.

JONES VERY (1813-1880)

Jones Very, poet, teacher of Greek at Harvard, and Unitarian minister, was one of the most spiritual among the many friends of Emerson. Despite the esteem in which he was held by other Transcendentalists, there was something futile about his life in the busy world: although licensed as a minister, he never had charge of a church; his influence as a teacher was negligible; his friends were frequently called on to testify as to his sanity; and his first published volume of poems (1839) was the only one that appeared during his lifetime. On the other hand, these early poems, and those which he contributed to various magazines, are remarkable not only for their perfection of expression but also for occasional glimpses into the author's moods of mysticism and religious exaltation.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The best edition of Very's work is that edited by William P. Andrews, Boston, 1883. The introductory memoir gives an adequate account of Very's life. All the selections in the present volume are taken from Very's Poems and Essays, Boston, 1839.

EDGAR ALLAN POE (1809-1849)

Although some of the details of Poe's life are still obscure, the chief facts are well known. He was born in Boston, on January 19, 1809, the son of David Poe and Elizabeth Arnold Poe. His parents, who at the time of his birth were itinerant actors of considerable ability, were both dead by 1811, and Edgar—the second of their three children—was adopted by John Allan, of Richmond, whose name he thereafter bore. Allan, and more particularly, perhaps, his wife, felt an interest in the helpless ward, and as he grew to boyhood gave him the best education Virginia afforded, supplemented by five years (1815-1820) in school at Stoke Newington, England. By 1826 the boy was ready for college, and entered the newly established University of Virginia. Here the freedom from discipline proved a misfortune, for in a year Poe accumulated large gambling debts, and became somewhat notorious for his fondness for alcohol. At the end of a year Allan removed him from the University, refused to pay his debts of honor, and acquiesced, after a quarrel, when Poe went to Boston and on May 26, 1827, enlisted in the United States Army.

For two years he served in the coast artillery, and made an admirable record. The discipline under which he found himself was a steadying influence; his own intelligence and ability made it inevitable that he should rise in the service. It is not to be wondered at that within two years he had become regimental sergeant-major, the highest grade to which an enlisted man could attain, or that his officers should unite in recommending him for a cadetship at West Point, to which place he was transferred in 1829.

His enlistment in the army in 1827 had been almost coincident with the appearance of his first publication, Tamerlane and Other Poems, which was announced as "By a Bostonian." He continued to write after entering West Point, and in 1829 and 1831 published two more volumes of poems, over his own name. In the last of these "the real Poe" may be said to have appeared for the first time. At the same time, however, he was court-martialed and dismissed from the military academy, having deliberately set about to accumulate demerits, and thus win his freedom, when he learned that Allan proposed to make no addition to the salary on which he would be expected to support himself when he should receive his commission as second lieutenant.

During the rest of his career Poe was writing for a living, often in absolute want, and never free from the fear of poverty. In 1836 he publicly married his cousin, Virginia Clemm, thirteen years of age, whom he had probably privately married the year before. Although his personal habits made it difficult for him to continue long in a position of any responsibility, he had at times editorial connections of importance with several magazines and newspapers, including the Southern Literary Messenger, Burton's Gentleman's Magazine, Graham's Magazine, The Evening Mirror, and The Broadway Journal. The publication of The Raven, in 1845, made him internationally famous, but added only ten dollars to his bank account. After the death of his wife in 1847, Poe suffered a complete collapse, and was for a time supported by his friends. His recovery was sufficient to permit his doing a little further literary work, both writing and lecturing, but his body was so weakened and his spirit so broken that his life came to a tragic close on October 7, 1849, in a Baltimore hospital.

A valuable clue to an understanding of Poe's genius lies in the fact that he was one of the few authors to attempt a somewhat scientific solution of the problems of literary art. The same methods that enabled him to solve cryptograms with amazing speed and accuracy, also enabled him to excel at "the rhythmical creation of beauty" in poems, and at the creation of original and astonishing effects in his short stories. What these methods were may be inferred partly from a study of The Poetic Principle, The Philosophy of Composition, and of a single paragraph in the criticism of Hawthorne's Twice-Told Tales—the one beginning: "A skilful literary artist has constructed a tale." In more detail they may be grasped by a study of his most brilliant productions. Had such methods been applied with mechanical rigidity, the poems would doubtless be puerile, and the stories immature. But Poe had just the flexibility necessary to escape—at least on occasion—from science into art, and to let his own intense personality give both life and color to his output. Indeed, in the field of criticism the personal elements of friendship and jealousy were at times too strong to allow him to write impartially of his contemporaries. His genius thus manifested itself clearly in poems, tales, and critical essays dealing with literary theory.

To Poe the first essential of great poetry was an approach to beauty through some emotional appeal heightened by all the devices of a skilled versifier; any appeal to the intellect or to the moral sense was subordinate to this, which he carefully defined as "the rhythmical creation of beauty." His temperament and circumstances were such that grief was the emotion he could most easily arouse, and accordingly the prevailing atmosphere of his poetry is one of brooding melancholy. In some cases the music and the attempted emotional appeal are so devoid of human interest that the result is little more than a glorified jingle; in other cases the verse is so melodious and the mood so compelling that the reader is, at least for the moment, enthralled. In a number of poems, of which The Raven and The Bells are outstanding representatives, there is a mechanical perfection of technique which astounds one on first reading, but which gains little with increasing familiarity. In others, of which To One in Paradise and To Helen are fair examples, the metrical effects, though less dazzling, are of the subtle sort that gain from re-reading, and the imagery is far more suggestive. The lines To Helen are themselves rich with "the glory that was Greece." The Conqueror Worm abounds with effective symbolism and sounds a note of gloom far deeper than that of The Raven; Annabel Lee and Lenore likewise are perfect examples of their own type—a type which creates through beauty and sorrow the peculiar exaltation of feeling of which Poe was master. It is past debate that Poe's poetry has but a limited range; much of life that stirred Whitman, much that inspired Browning, was far beyond Poe's ken. Nevertheless, within the scope to which he confined his poetic efforts, he has not been surpassed; and in this very limited field one may say of him, as Matthew Arnold said of Keats, "He is with Shakespeare."

Poe's tales—published in a score of contemporary magazines—are too well known to require a detailed enumeration; they have fascinated readers the world over. Their range is astonishing, covering, in addition to several smaller classes, large groups of analytical tales (including detective stories), tales of mystery and the supernatural, and tales of horror. In the opinion of many critics, the modern short story reached the height of its technique under Poe, Hawthorne, de Maupassant, and Stevenson, leaving to later writers the difficult task of introducing novel changes into a form already developed to perfection. At the lowest estimate, Poe was one of the early masters of the form, and in many particulars his work has not been excelled. An outstanding feature of his method is the pruning away of all that is unessential, and making every sentence of the story contribute to the cumulative effect of the climax. (The exact manner in which Poe may have written Ligeia is set forth in Professor Clayton Hamilton's Manual of the Art of Fiction, pp. 194 ff.) There is also evident a genius for descriptive touches which create both atmosphere and mood and at the same time increase the reader's interest in the outcome of the narrative. Of characterization there is little, but enough to differentiate the various personalities and make them vital. This weakness in character portrayal, were it in a novel, would be serious; but in tales so short and so compelling as Poe's, it is overlooked among the abundance of riches. Poe's experience of life and his personal habits rendered him, as he doubtless recognized, peculiarly unfit for writing a novel. In the short story, on the other hand, he could isolate some special phase of life in which he was interested, apply to it his tremendous powers of intellect, and produce a masterpiece, flawless in structure, and as perfect in its tonal unity as a Beethoven sonata.

Poe's literary criticism is of value largely because of his keen analytical powers, his fearlessness, and—it should be frankly admitted—his fortune in living at a time when serious criticism was still something of a novelty in this country. He was, indeed, the first American critic of importance, and his estimates of the early work of Hawthorne, Tennyson, and Elizabeth Barrett (Browning) are notable. Like other newspaper writers of his day he was sometimes partial to his friends and unduly hard on his rivals, but in the majority of his judgments he was fair-minded and incisive. He was prone to put too great an emphasis on minutiae; a resemblance of one piece to another he habitually branded as plagiarism; a line where the rhythm was free, he almost invariably condemned. He wrote hundreds of reviews (many of which have been reprinted under the general title Marginalia), in which petty caviling is curiously blended with sound criticism. His best critical work is undoubtedly that in which he sets forth, constructively, his own theories of composition. Here he was able to rise above his personal prejudices, and to do work which was not only of value and significance when it appeared, but which still commands the attention of every serious student of literature.

Finally, whether writing poetry, criticism, or fiction, Poe was always and undeniably an artist. On virtually everything he touched he left the impress of his genius. One may call him morbid, hypersensitive, egotistical, and what not, but one can not call him unskilled in the use of his chosen medium, words. The same words which in the hands of other writers remain dull and inert, take life and form under the magic of his touch, and glow with the dusky colors of passion. The same vowels and consonants which most persons find it difficult to combine into euphonious patterns, shape themselves at Poe's command into melodious rhythms, and cadences of haunting beauty. One may find that what he thus wrote has little significance so far as the fundamental problems of existence are concerned. One does not go to Poe for a "criticism of life." But he was the foremost master of words that America has produced; a great and original genius, and the supreme artist in American letters.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. The bibliography of Poe is so large that only the most outstanding items can be mentioned here. Among collected editions three are notable: The Works of the Late Edgar Allan Poe, with a Memoir of his life, by Rufus W. Griswold, N. Y., 1850-1856, 4 vols. This, the earliest of all, has been many times reprinted, and is still of value, since it contains more of Poe's criticism than can be found outside the Virginia Edition, which is out of print. Griswold's biographical sketch is notorious for its unfairness, and should not be considered authoritative. More scholarly in all ways than Griswold's edition is The Works of Edgar Allan Poe, edited by E. C. Stedman and G. E. Woodberry, Chicago, 1894, New York, 1914, 10 vols. This is still in print, and is the best readily available modern edition. J. A. Harrison's The Complete Works of Edgar Allan Poe (Virginia Edition), N. Y. 1902, 17 vols., is the best edition that has yet appeared, but is unfortunately out of print.

The best edition of Poe's verse—and one so good that but little remains to be done on this score—is Killis Campbell's The Poems of Edgar Allan Poe, Boston, 1917.

BIOGRAPHIES. The best biography has been G. E. Woodberry's The Life of Edgar Allan Poe, Boston, 1909, 2 vols. This entirely supersedes Woodberry's earlier study, which forms one item in the A. M. L. series. Now, however, Israfel, by Harvey Allen, N. Y. 1926, 2 vols., bids fair to be held definitive.

CRITICAL ARTICLES. Two significant pieces of contemporary criticism, written by men who knew Poe personally, are G. R. Graham's The Genius and Characteristics of the Late Edgar Allan Poe, printed in Graham's Magazine for February, 1854, and Griswold's Memoir, referred to above. For other items, see the C. H. A. L.

NOTES

THE FALL OF THE HOUSE OF USHER

309. This tale, regarded by many as Poe's masterpiece, is at once an admirable narrative, and a perfect exemplification of Poe's critical and artistic theories, so far as the field of the prose tale is concerned. It was first published in Burton's Gentleman's Magazine, September, 1839.
314. b. 23. The Haunted Palace. Poe wrote Griswold that the title implied "a mind haunted by phantoms—a disordered brain." It is obviously in point at this place as illustrating the condition of Usher's mind, and might seem to have been composed for this particular purpose. It had, however, been printed in the Baltimore Museum in April, 1839.
315. b. 38. Vigiliæ Mortuorum, etc. Vigils for the dead according to the choir of the church at Mayence.
317. b. 48. The Mad Trist. Both title and author seem to have been created by Poe. Professor T. O. Mabbott informs the editors that he has identified all but one of the books referred to in this tale, and will shortly publish a note establishing the fact.

THE PURLOINED LETTER

320. First published in The Gift, 1845. The story is one of the most famous of Poe's analytical tales, and, together with The Murders in the Rue Morgue and The Gold Bug, has done much to set the style in detective stories.
- a. 40. Au troisième.* On the third floor above the ground floor.
326. b. 38. Non distributio medii. "Undistributed middle term": a form of logical fallacy.
327. a. 7. Il y a à parier, etc. "It is a safe bet that every common notion, every accepted convention, is a piece of stupidity, for it has found favor with the multitude."
- a. 24. Ambitus, religio, homines honesti.* Each of these words, as used in Latin, has a variety of meanings, and some of these meanings do actually overlap those indicated by Poe; this is especially the case with honesti. Ambitus, however, may be accurately translated as "canvassing for political office," and religio as referring to a bargain struck between a man and a god.
330. b. 36. Un dessein si funeste, etc. "A plan so baleful is worthy of Thyestes, if not of Atreus."

THE CASK OF AMONTILLADO

The tale was first published in Godey's Lady's Book, November, 1846. For other examples of tales of horror, see The Pit and the Pendulum, or The Black Cat.

A DREAM WITHIN A DREAM

334. First published in 1827, under the title Imitation. The final version of 1849 contains no line of the original unchanged by revision.

ROMANCE

First published in 1829, as was the Sonet—to Science.

TO HELEN

335. There is some evidence that Poe may have written this poem at the age of fourteen, though it was not published till 1831. The Helen was Mrs. Jane Stith Stannard, mother of one of his friends.
9. The earliest printed version of these, the most famous lines among all Poe's verse, reads thus:

To the glory of fair Greece
And the grandeur of old Rome.

The improvement effected by the revision is obvious.

ISRAFAEL

First published in 1831. To the quotation from the Koran Poe added the clause, "whose heartstrings are a lute."

THE CITY IN THE SEA

336. First published in 1831, as The Doomed City. Poe said that the city was intended to represent Sodom or Gomorrah. He used the theme at the beginning of Part II of Al Aaraaf.

LENORE

This poem is perhaps the best single illustration of Poe's fondness for revising his own work. The earliest printed version (1831) consists of 44 regular lines, arranged thus:

How shall the burial rite be read?
The solemn song be sung
The requiem for the loveliest dead,
That ever died so young?

The version printed in this volume is Poe's 1843 arrangement, which is generally conceded to be the most effective. In 1845 he again re-arranged it, making 26 long couplets with much internal rhyme, thus:

Ah! broken is the golden bowl, the spirit flown forever!
Let the bell toll!—a saintly soul floats
on the Stygian river;

Col. T. W. Higginson's opinion has been widely quoted: "Never in American literature, I think, was such a fountain of melody flung into the air as when Lenore first appeared in The Pioneer; and never did fountain so drop downward as when Poe re-arranged it in its present form. The irregular measure had a beauty as original as that of Christabel; and the lines had an ever-varying cadence of their own, until their author himself took them and cramped them into couplets."

1. Broken is the golden bowl. A quotation from Ecclesiastes, xii, 6.

TO ONE IN PARADISE

337. First published as part of the tale The Assignation, in Godey's Lady's Book, January 1834. The poem has no specific autobiographical significance.

THE CONQUEROR WORM

First published in Graham's Magazine, January, 1843. Poe later inserted the poem in the prose tale Ligeia.

THE RAVEN

338. First published in The New York Evening Mirror, January 29, 1845. Poe's own account of every step in the composition of the poem may be found in his essay The Philosophy of Composition, p. 347, above. It is doubtful whether Poe actually wrote the poem in the manner described; that he might have thus written it, is almost certainly true, but see the discussion in Hervey Allen's Israfel, II, pp. 608 ff. Woodberry's statement (Life of Poe, II, 110), that "no brief poem ever established itself so immediately, so widely, and so imperishably, in men's minds," is probably correct. In addition to numberless imitations and parodies, it occasioned one poem of surpassing beauty so unlike it that the relationship is often forgotten. Dante Gabriel Rossetti said that The Blessed Damosel owed its existence to The Raven, and added: "I saw that Poe had done the utmost it was possible to do with the grief of the lover on earth, and I determined to reverse the conditions, and give utterance to the yearning of the loved one in heaven."

ULALUME

340. First published in the American Whig Review, December, 1847. Poe's wife Virginia had died on January 30, 1847, and it is probable that the poem was written after that date. There is some evidence, however, that it had been at least begun in the summer of 1846.
37. Astarte. The Phoenician goddess of the planet Venus.
46. Lethean. Pertaining to Lethe, the mythological river of forgetfulness.

THE BELLS

341. As originally written the poem consisted of but eighteen lines, descriptive of wedding and funeral bells. Poe gradually added to it until it now stands as the most considerable example of onomatopoeic verse in American literature. First published in the Union Magazine, November, 1849.

FOR ANNIE

342. First published in 1849; see Killis Campbell's note, Poems of Edgar Allan Poe, p. 287, for an informing account of the poem's history. "Annie" was Mrs. Annie Richmond, of Lowell.

ANNABEL LEE

343. First published as an insert in Griswold's article on Poe, which appeared in the New York Tribune, October 9, 1849, two days after Poe's death. Despite various claims to the contrary, it is probable that the poem is a tribute to Poe's deceased wife.

ELDORADO

344. First published in the Flag of Our Union, April 21, 1849. The poem was in a sense occasioned by the gold-rush of 1849, but in a larger way was symbolic of Poe's own lifelong quest for a happiness that constantly eluded him.

REVIEW OF TWICE-TOLD TALES

This essay, first printed in Graham's Magazine for May, 1842, is much more than a mere review. It is Poe's public acclamation of Hawthorne, whose genius he was among the very first to recognize. It is of further significance as embodying Poe's own views on the short story, or, as he called it, "the tale." For Poe's other comments on Hawthorne's work, see the references in the Index, vol. XVI, Virginia Edition of Poe.

345. b. 38. De Béranger. Jean Pierre de Béranger (1780-1857), a French lyric poet.
347. a. 8. John Neal. An American prose writer (1793-1870), now chiefly remembered for the feat of writing four long novels in seven months.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF COMPOSITION

347. First published in Graham's Magazine, April, 1846. This notable essay—one of the most memorable pieces of American critical writing—illustrates in detail how Poe's theory of poetic art was—or could have been—applied to the specific problem of writing The Raven. Whether Poe actually composed the poem as he here says he did is of less moment than the fact that his best poems appear, from internal evidence, to have been written in general accord with the theory here expounded and illustrated.

THE POETIC PRINCIPLE

354. First published in Sartain's Union Magazine, October, 1850. This selection is excerpted from the long essay because it sets forth with the utmost possible brevity the extreme theory of poetry (derived in part from Coleridge) by which Poe guided himself in his own poetic composition, and by which he tested the work of others. If generally accepted it would narrow the range of poetry immeasurably; it is, however, a wholesome antidote to the looseness of structure and general disregard of technique which have recently developed through careless imitation of Whitman, who stands at the opposite pole from Poe so far as theory is concerned. Poe's essay, Longfellow's Ballads, contains a further development and application of the principles set forth here.

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE (1804-1864)

Hawthorne was a great writer in an age of great writers. A contemporary of Thackeray, Dickens, George Eliot, and Poe—to mention only four persons whose works appeared during his mature years—he had the fortune to live at a time when the English novel was at perhaps the highest point of its development, and when America was producing, in the tales of Poe, one of her relatively few contributions to world literature. Both as novelist and as short story writer Hawthorne stands comparison with any of the persons mentioned; in certain respects he excels them all. No English novel comes nearer to technical perfection than The Scarlet Letter; none of Poe's tales are at once so appealingly human and so flawless in structure as the best of Hawthorne's. He made himself our greatest novelist, and shared with Poe the distinction of being a short story writer whose work seems to have found its place in the world's library of great fiction.

Born in Salem on July 4, 1804, he came of a family which for generations had been settled in the old Puritan town, and in which the Puritan tradition had become firmly imbedded. His grandfather had followed the sea, and had won distinction as the Master of The Fair American, a Revolutionary privateer whose exploits are celebrated in a contemporary ballad (see p. 170, above). His father, master of one of the vessels which during the early part of the nineteenth century carried the American flag into every port on the salt water, died when Nathaniel was four years old; the widowed mother at once shut herself off from the world in a seclusion which her children were forced to share. "We do not even live at our house," the young lad once told a playmate. Save for the four years at Bowdoin College, the boy grew into manhood known to relatively few persons, and too reserved to break through the inherited reticence which his own temperament accentuated.

When he was seventeen years old he entered Bowdoin, where he found—among others—Longfellow, Franklin Pierce, and Horatio Bridge as fellow students. To the friendship of these men he owed much. Indeed, it is hardly an exaggeration to say that without the aid of his college mates, who secured positions for him, and in times of stress supplied him with money, Hawthorne could never have accomplished the work which ultimately stood to his credit.

When he graduated from Bowdoin in 1825 he had only one ambition—to make himself a writer of fiction. It is characteristic of him that the path to this goal seemed to lie not in the stimulating contacts with life which Dickens and Thackeray found in journalism, but rather in the seclusion of his room in the Salem house—his "chamber under the eaves," where for a dozen years he lived again in the seclusion which by this time had become part of the Hawthorne tradition. Commenting later on some of the tales produced during this period, he said: "They have the pale tint of flowers that blossomed in too retired a shade." He seems to have been aware of the limitations that his solitary life entailed; only in such an existence, however, could he find the leisure to give to his work the finish which his exacting artistic conscience required him to impart to whatever he published.

In 1839 Hawthorne entered the Revenue Service as "Weigher and Gauger" in the Boston Custom House, receiving the appointment through the influence of college friends. The regular work—and income—seemed at first a blessing; gradually, however, the monotony of the life grew appalling, and he almost welcomed his discharge in 1841 when the administration changed. The next year saw him a member of the famous Brook Farm community. What his reactions were to this attempt to establish an ideal communistic group, the selections from his American Note Books printed in this volume make clear. He soon found that happiness was not to be his lot if he remained at the Farm; consequently he promptly withdrew, relinquishing the thousand dollars which had been his pecuniary investment. Engaged by this time to Sophia Peabody, of Boston, and married in 1842, he spent the years 1842-46 in the "Old Manse" at Concord. Here he was at first happy in his new-found love and freedom, but soon became discouraged by his growing indebtedness, and inability to win any substantial number of readers.

In 1846 his friends again came to his aid, and secured his appointment as Surveyor of the Port of Salem—an office that brought a salary of $1200, and entailed relatively few duties. Discharged in 1849, again a victim of the spoils system, he left Salem embittered at his native town, and ready to give utterance to his feeling in the famous introductory chapter of The Scarlet Letter, which was soon to appear. How the novel came to be published is graphically told in James T. Fields's Yesterdays with Authors; the fame which it brought to Hawthorne is a matter of common knowledge.

The publication of this first great work in 1850 was followed in 1851 by that of The House of the Seven Gables; it in turn was succeeded in 1852 by The Blithedale Romance. Thus within the compass of three years Hawthorne had produced enough to ensure his position among the great novelists.

The year 1853 saw him again a government employee. His college friend Franklin Pierce had just been elected to the Presidency, and one of his first acts was to appoint Hawthorne to the most lucrative position in his gift, the consulship at Liverpool. Resigning this office in 1857, when Buchanan succeeded Pierce, Hawthorne spent three years in England and Italy, published his last complete novel, The Marble Faun, in 1860, and after four years of life in and around Boston, died at Plymouth, N. H., in the spring of 1864, while on a walking trip with Pierce.

Hawthorne's fame rests primarily upon his short stories, or tales, and his four best-known novels. To be sure, The Wonder-Book (1851) and Tanglewood Tales (1852) brought him the friendship and admiration of children who delighted in his retelling of classic myths; various other works seemed when they were published to be of considerable significance. But to all intents and purposes Hawthorne's major accomplishment is to be found in three collections of short stories: Twice-Told Tales (1837; 1842); Mosses from an Old Manse (1846); The Snow Image (1851); and in four novels: The Scarlet Letter (1850); The House of the Seven Gables (1851); The Blithedale Romance (1852); and The Marble Faun (1860).

The title of his first collection, Twice-Told Tales, gives a clue to the nature of the contents. During the twelve years of his apprenticeship Hawthorne published many tales, sending them to magazines, and one or another of the "Annuals" then so popular. In 1837 he collected what seemed to him the best, and reprinted them in a single volume. Five years later a second edition in two volumes contained approximately twice as many titles. That the two editions sold but slowly, and that Hawthorne was discouraged by his lack of popularity, are well-known facts. Nevertheless Twice-Told Tales, and the similar sketches which compose the Mosses and Snow Image, have for the student of today a double interest which the reader of 1842 could not have suspected.

In part the significance of these tales is historical. In them that form of brief prose fiction which we today call the short story moved one step nearer its culmination. Irving's genial sketches may fairly be said to furnish the starting point of the American short story; after Irving it was Hawthorne who saw the possibilities of the type, and gave us a score of examples which were to provoke the admiration of Poe, even if they did not greatly stir the general reader. Young Goodman Brown, Endicott and the Red Cross, The Minister's Black Veil—these and the others which different readers might select as their favorites, are sure signs of the development of the genre which has of late become so formidably popular.

A greater significance than this, however, attaches to the best of Hawthorne's tales. Above all, they are works of art, enduring in their appeal because of the literary skill with which Hawthorne has expressed his ideas concerning significant matters. In them one finds the truth and the beauty which great art must possess. Choosing as theme some incident from New England history, some tendency of human character, some vague yearning of the soul, Hawthorne lets his imagination play round the figures of the tale till they take shape in his own mind, and ultimately—so great is his creative power—start to life before the reader on the printed page. It is true that some of his early tales are relatively crude and insignificant. The best, however, are of the sort that defy criticism: perfect in phrasing as in structure, rich in the concrete detail, the physical symbol, that shows how closely akin was Hawthorne's imagination to that of the poet, and hauntingly interwoven with suggestions of a mysterious, supernatural world, which never is allowed to obtrude itself unpleasantly upon the reader.

When one turns from the tales to the novels one finds the same beauty of rhythm and cadence in the phrasing, the same fondness for the physical symbol, the same sure technique, and a more powerful understanding of the fundamental problems and facts of life. The obvious truth has often been pointed out that in both tales and novels Hawthorne is concerned with the fact of sin in human life. Over the significance of this fact he brooded not precisely as his Puritan ancestors must have done, but puzzlingly, inquiringly, somewhat in the spirit of the psychological investigator of today. As Woodberry pointed out in his life of Hawthorne, the four great novels seem to have been written in a definite attempt to illustrate, in a series of related studies, Hawthorne's ideas concerning the effect of sin upon the human soul. The Scarlet Letter pictures the breakdown of two individual souls, each overcome by his own sin. The House of the Seven Gables shows the effect of sin—in this case avarice—upon a family, a sin that finds its symbolic counterpart in an inherited tendency to apoplexy. The Blithedale Romance, not an accurate transcript of Hawthorne's life at Brook Farm, but none the less reflecting some phases of that experience, shows the author studying neither an individual nor a family but a community, and pointing out how the appearance of sin in that community caused disaster and tragedy. In The Marble Faun the novelist delves still deeper, and attacks the age-old problem of the reason for sin and suffering in what we believe to be a divinely ordered universe. His solution—never stated in so many words, but implied and suggested in the development of the story—is not the least satisfactory of the many explanations that from time to time have been put forward to account for the disturbing fact. Only out of suffering, says Hawthorne, can come happiness; without the shadow, there would be no possibility of joy in the sunlight; without the possibility, the actuality, of sin, there would be no such thing as good. Hence it is only through the fact of his own sin and attendant suffering that Donatello, the Faun, can arrive at the happiness of finding a soul developing within him.

Both as novelist and as writer of short stories Hawthorne made generous use of what one may call the supernatural, or in his case, more accurately, perhaps, the supernormal. In this particular respect he made himself the supreme artist among writers of English fiction. From the frank but childish use of the supernatural by Horace Walpole, "Monk" Lewis, and other writers of the "Gothic" romances, to the labored explanations of Charles Brockden Brown, and on through the artistic but frankly impossible supernaturalism of Poe, there had been persistent but not altogether successful attempts to utilize the supernatural as material for prose fiction. It remained for Hawthorne to suggest the existence of the supernatural without taxing his reader's credulity, to hint at an explanation without obtruding it, and to enrich his picturing of life in old New England by including in the picture much that the realist would have omitted, and that a romancer like Mrs. Radcliffe would have made puerile and unconvincing.

In still one more respect Hawthorne may seem of greater interest to the reader of today than he did to his contemporaries. Born and bred in the old Puritan tradition, seeing the facts of life in New England as few of his critics have ever done, sympathetic with what it is popular today to call the superstitions of the age he pictured, he had nevertheless won for himself an intellectual, a spiritual, freedom which permitted him to view the spectacle of Puritan civilization in America objectively, with the detachment which the artist finds needful. He saw the beauty as well as the grimness in that Puritan life, and he pictured it as no one else has ever done. Hence it is hardly an over statement to say—in Johnsonian phrase—that whoever would understand the America of 1620-1700 must "give his days and nights to the study of" Hawthorne.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. Many editions of Hawthorne's collected works are available today, but the student who owns either the Little Classics edition, Boston, 1875-76, 23 vols., or the Riverside, Boston, 1883, 12 vols. (both by Houghton Mifflin), will be well equipped with texts. The Lenox Edition, N. Y. 1902, Crowell, 14 vols., lacks certain items like the Note-Books, but has valuable introductions by Katharine Lee Bates. Reprints of individual romances and collections of tales are so numerous as not to be worth listing here.

BIOGRAPHIES. The best approach to a study of Hawthorne's life is through George E. Woodberry's Nathaniel Hawthorne, Boston, 1902 (A. M. L. series). Henry James's Hawthorne, London, 1879 (E. M. L. series), is particularly interesting as being the comment of one novelist upon another. Nathaniel Hawthorne and his Wife, by the novelist's son, Julian Hawthorne, Boston, 1885, 2 vols., contains a more intimate picture of Hawthorne's home life than is available elsewhere. Horatio Bridge's Personal Recollections of Nathaniel Hawthorne, N. Y. 1893, and James T. Fields's chapter "Hawthorne," in his Yesterdays with Authors, Boston, 1875, are both valuable as showing Hawthorne through the eyes of intimate personal friends.

CRITICAL ARTICLES. Of contemporary criticism three items should be mentioned: Poe's review of Twice-Told Tales, in Graham's Magazine, April, May, 1842; Lowell's review of The Marble Faun, Atlantic Monthly, April, 1860; and Rufus Griswold's Nathaniel Hawthorne, in the International Magazine, November, 1851.

Of more recent critical and appreciative articles the number is so great, and the field covered so extensive, that any attempt even to select the half-dozen most significant would be futile.

NOTES

PREFACE TO TWICE-TOLD TALES

355. The Preface is reprinted partly because of its autobiographical value, and partly because of the accuracy with which Hawthorne here comments on his own tales.

THE GRAY CHAMPION

357. From Twice-Told Tales. Hawthorne doubtless got a hint for the story from an incident in the Indian attack on Hadley, Mass., in 1675, when a mysterious warrior appeared, rallied the faltering colonists, led them to victory, and then disappeared. So completely was his identity hidden that tradition soon had it that Hadley had been succored by an angel. In reality the champion was Colonel Goffe, one of the fugitive regicides.

358. a. 19. Another encounter. The so-called "Boston massacre," March 5, 1770.
b. 16. A Smithfield fire. At Smithfield, England, John Rogers, first of the martyrs in the reign of Queen Mary, was burned at the stake in 1555.
b. 30. A new St. Bartholomew. Thousands of the Protestant Huguenots of France were mercilessly butchered on St. Bartholomew's Day (August 24), 1572.

DR. HEIDEGGER'S EXPERIMENT

361. From Twice-Told Tales. Concerning Hawthorne's use of this theme, the abolition of old age and death, see the note, below, on his American Note-Books.

ENDICOTT AND THE RED CROSS

367. From Twice-Told Tales. The source of the tale is an actual historical incident. See Winthrop's Journal, above, p. 23.
368. b. 26. The letter A. Here appears, for the first time in Hawthorne's work, the physical symbol which was the germ of The Scarlet Letter. At the time he first published this tale (1838), Hawthorne had probably read an old statute (1658) of the Plymouth colony, which provided that a person found guilty of adultery should be whipped twice, and also should "were two Capitall letters viz: AD cut out in cloth and sewed on their uppermost garments."

THE OLD MANSE

371. The first chapter in Mosses from an Old Manse.

YOUNG GOODMAN BROWN

377. From Mosses from an Old Manse. The story is typical of Hawthorne at his best. Here, as in The Scarlet Letter and The Marble Faun, his amazing interest in the problem of evil is that of the artist and psychologist rather than that of a conscious moralist.

384. a. 54. Had Goodman Brown fallen asleep? As usual, Hawthorne neither insists upon a supernatural interpretation of the story, nor does he deny it. See the end of the first paragraph of the Preface to The House of the Seven Gables, above, p. 385, for the author's own statement on this matter.

PREFACE TO THE HOUSE OF THE SEVEN GABLES

An unusually interesting essay, setting forth Hawthorne's ideas on the distinction between a romance and a novel, on the use of the marvellous in fiction, and on morals in fiction.

THE AMERICAN NOTE-BOOKS

386. These note-books, written chiefly for Hawthorne's own use, and not published till after his death, contain material of two sorts: hints to be developed into future stories, and journal-like records of his life. The suggestions for stories are as unusual as they are characteristic of Hawthorne. Some of them he subsequently utilized, as the notes here show; but the entire collection—of which only a fragment is here printed—contains material enough for much more work than he was destined to accomplish. The genial letters from Brook Farm speak for themselves.

SUGGESTIONS FOR STORIES

387. a. 15. Curious to imagine. The idea of the abolition of death was one which fascinated Hawthorne. Dr. Heidegger's Experiment deals with this theme; there are many scattered references to it throughout his works; it is the theme of the unfinished Septimius Felton, or, The Elixir of Life (published posthumously); it appears as well in The Dolliver Romance.
a. 21. Gratified revenge. For Hawthorne's best study of the debasing effect of this passion for revenge, see the character of Roger Chillingworth in The Scarlet Letter.
b. 10. The semblance of a human face. See Hawthorne's story, The Great Stone Face.
b. 21. A scarecrow. See Feathertop, in the Mosses; also Percy MacKaye's dramatization of it, The Scarecrow.

LETTERS FROM BROOK FARM

For the literary and social significance of the Brook Farm experiment, see Lind-say Swift's Brook Farm, its Members, Scholars, and Visitors, Boston, 1900. Hawthorne's own experiences are reflected in The Blithedale Romance.

388. a. 7. Margaret Fuller. Sarah Margaret Fuller Ossoli (1810-1850), one of the most prominent transcendentalists, the first editor of The Dial, and an intimate friend of Thoreau and Emerson.

ENGLISH NOTE-BOOKS

390. Like the American, the English Note-Books were published posthumously. They are a private journal kept during the years he was consul at Liverpool, and reveal his opinions of English life more intimately than do the somewhat guarded comments which he himself published under the title Our Old Home.

392. a. 10. Lord Palmerston. Henry John Temple, Viscount Palmerston (1784-1865), became Prime Minister on February 5, 1855, and held the office, with only one brief interruption, until his death ten years later.

b. 10. Abbotsford. The mood of petulant criticism here manifest suggests that Hawthorne may have been subconsciously jealous of Scott's popularity. On the other hand, the tone may be due to nothing more than a natural disappointment at finding how much the magnificence of Abbotsford—Scott's country estate—had been exaggerated.

b. 38. Strawberry Hill. The fantastic country home of Horace Walpole (1717-1797), the author of The Castle of Otranto, and well-known patron of art and literature.

393. a. 24. Archbishop Sharpe. James Sharp, Archbishop of St. Andrews, was murdered in 1679 by a band of Covenanters. In Old Mortality Scott had confused John Balfour of Kinloch (a Covenanter) with John, Lord Balfour of Burley. Hawthorne here repeats the error.

394. b. 13. Rob Roy's gun. Rob Roy Macgregor (1671-1734) was a Scottish freebooter who plays an important part in Scott's novel of his name.

b. 15. Claverhouse. John Graham of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee (1649-1689), was a vigorous persecutor of the Covenanters, and a loyal supporter of the Stuart monarchs. See Scott's song, Bonny Dundee, in The Doom of Devorgoil.

b. 16. The sword of Montrose. James Graham, Marquis of Montrose (1612-1650), was a Scottish royalist, and the most successful supporter of the Stuarts during their dark years.

395. a. 25. Reading all his novels. On Hawthorne's return to America, he did read all of Scott's novels aloud to his family.
a. 32. Mr. Milnes. Richard Monckton Milnes (1809-1895), later raised to the peerage as Baron Houghton; an English politician and man of letters.

a. 54. Moore. Thomas Moore, the Irish poet and wit, died in 1852, the year before Hawthorne went to England.
b. 4. Mr. Ticknor. George Ticknor (1791-1871), Longfellow's predecessor as professor of modern languages at Harvard, and author of A History of Spanish Literature.

b. 6. Mrs. Browning. Elizabeth Barrett Browning, wife of Robert Browning. Hawthorne was to meet the Brownings again in Italy. See his Italian Note-Books, Riverside Edition, p. 293.

396. a. 2. Miss Bacon. A student of Shakespeare whose mind had become unbalanced. Hawthorne gives a full and sympathetic account of her work in Our Old Home, Riverside Edition, p. 129.

a. 10. Margaret Fuller. See above, note on letters from Brook Farm.

RICHARD HENRY DANA, JR. (1815-1882)

It was only the accident of poor health and weak eyesight that caused Dana to take a two years' vacation before completing his studies at Harvard College, and to ship as an ordinary seaman "before the mast" on the brig Pilgrim, bound from Boston to California. In the forecabin of this vessel he experienced at first hand the perils and hardships of the life of the common sailor, and accumulated the material for the book which he published in 1840 under the title, Two Years Before the Mast.

When he withdrew from Harvard in 1834, in order to recover his health at sea, he had shown no indications of genius, or of more than the ordinary educated young man's interest in letters. His father, Richard Henry Dana, was a critic and journalist of both ability and influence; but the son was apparently on the point of settling down into a humdrum career of no particular distinction when he began the voyage which both figuratively and literally "made a man out of him." When he returned from the sea twenty-five months later he was physically vigorous, and his youthful dilettantism had given place to an energetic ambition. He completed his undergraduate course at Harvard, studied law, and for the rest of his life was a distinguished member of the Massachusetts bar. But so far as American literature was concerned, his work was accomplished with the publication of Two Years Before the Mast.

A surprisingly small proportion of the sea stories that have been published will bear analysis by even a nautical amateur; and if only on account of the accuracy of its seamanship Dana's book would be unusual. He was, however, more than accurate. He had a knack not only of being exact in his seamanship, but also of making things comprehensible to the landsman,—and this, too, without seeming to condescend or explain unnecessarily. Accordingly, whoever turns the pages of the book, whether he be versed in the ways of the sea or not, will enjoy Dana's account of his two years' adventure. Much interest attaches to the various members of the crew, whose different personalities become increasingly real as the narrative proceeds. In a sense, too, the narrative is ideally autobiographical; the author, without aiming to focus attention on his own personality, nevertheless does unconsciously reveal it bit by bit; consequently the reader does not make the voyage alone. He makes it in the company of Dana himself, whose companionship grows more delightful the more one reads.

But it is perhaps the fundamental veracity of the book that most certainly guarantees its enduring popularity. "Did you ever read Two Years Before the Mast?" the Keeper of a United States Coast Guard station once asked the writer of this sketch. "Did you? You did? Say—that's the truest book ever written; there isn't a lie in it, not one." When that sort of praise is bestowed on a book by a man who for over half a century has been a follower of the sea, and when whoever reads the volume finds not only truth of subject matter but charm of style, then one may be reasonably sure that the book under discussion is entitled to be called one of the classics of American Literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Two Years Before the Mast has been many times reprinted, and is easily accessible: in the Everyman edition, for instance. For biographical information consult Charles Francis Adams's Richard Henry Dana, Boston, 1891, 2 vols. The essay Dana's Magical Chance, in Bliss Perry's The Praise of Folly, Boston, 1923, is an informing and sympathetic discussion of Dana's work.

NOTES

TWO YEARS BEFORE THE MAST

397. Rounding Cape Horn in a sailing vessel of moderate size was (and still is) virtually the most dangerous passage that could be undertaken by mariners.
- b. 9. Royals. The highest of the sails usually carried on any square-rigged vessel. Above them skysails were occasionally set.
- b. 10. Studding-sails. On long runs in light weather, extra yards were lashed to the ends of the regular ones, and on these were set extra sails. These studding-sails always had to be taken in before the vessel could be put through any complicated manœuvre.
- b. 25. Brig. A vessel with two masts, both of them "square-rigged."

b. 44. Hove her to. "Heaving to" was the process of bringing the vessel's bow close to the wind and setting just enough sail to keep her lying in that relatively safe position; she then took the waves bow-on, but made little or no progress.

399. a. 23. All Starboardlines. All members of the starboard watch.
401. a. 25. Sent down his topgallant masts. An extra precaution sometimes taken on entering stormy seas.

HERMAN MELVILLE (1819-1891)

The adventures of Melville's early life furnished both incidents and settings for his best romances. Born in New York City, in 1819, he went to sea before he was twenty years old, and in 1841 shipped from New Bedford on a whaling voyage to the Pacific. His sufferings under the brutal master of the vessel, the Acushnet, and his escape to an island inhabited by cannibals, who held him a captive for several months, gave him material for his first two books. These he wrote upon his return to civilization in 1844, under the titles Typee and Omoo. Both portray the island civilization which he had come to know so intimately. The books made something of a stir in England and America, partly because of their obvious merit as chronicles of adventure, and partly because of the controversy—still unsettled—as to the proportion in which fact is blended with fiction. For many subsequent years Melville continued, with varying success, to write stories of the sea. Among them White Jacket, or, The World in a Man-of-War, is specially famous for its vivid picturing of the brutalities of naval discipline, and was largely influential in causing the abolition of flogging in the United States service.

Melville's masterpiece, as every one knows, is Moby Dick (1851). This may not be the best sea-story ever written, but it certainly is among the best. It was written after Melville had mastered the art of expression, yet before he had exhausted his creative power. Its style—as highly individual as that of Whitman or Carlyle—its penetrating humor, its powerful symbolism, and its vivid descriptions, combine to make it original to the point of being unique. Without conceding to it the perfection of Treasure Island or the special autobiographical charm of Two Years Before the Mast, one may well agree with the verdict of Carl Van Doren that "it belongs with the greatest sea romances in the whole literature of the world."

During the forty years of life left to him after publishing Moby Dick, Melville did nothing that added to his literary fame. Like Hawthorne, his friend and contemporary, he supported himself by working in the Revenue Service. He continued to write, but produced nothing comparable with his earlier publications, and at the time of his death (1891) he had been virtually forgotten. Since that time, however, and especially during the past few years (1918-1927) there has been a decided revival of interest in him and his best work.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. There is no collected edition of Melville's complete work, but the sea tales may be had in four volumes, edited by A. Stedman, Boston, 1900. Everything of any significance that Melville wrote is included in the best available edition, The Works of Herman Melville, Standard Edition, London, Constable, 1922-24, 16 vols.

BIOGRAPHIES. R. M. Weaver's Herman Melville, Mariner and Mystic, N. Y. 1921, and John Freeman's Herman Melville, E. M. L. series, N. Y. 1926, are especially valuable. Further biographical information may be found in Meade Minnegorode's Some Personal Letters of Herman Melville, N. Y. 1922. This last contains an admirable bibliography.

CRITICAL ARTICLES. From among the many essays dealing with Melville the student might limit himself to one: Alexander MacMechan's "The Greatest Sea Story in the World," in his Life in a Little College, Boston, 1913.

NOTES

MOBY DICK

404. The dangers and excitement of whaling as set forth in these selections can be understood if the reader will bear in mind that the actual harpooning and killing had to be done from small boats, lowered from the large vessel. The whole book, however, is more than an account of whaling; it is a unique narrative pervaded with an increasingly uncanny feeling of terror as the reader gradually comes to realize that Captain Ahab, master of the Pequod, is mentally unbalanced; that he regards Moby Dick, the White Whale, as the incarnation of the spirit of evil; and that, in addition to the usual whaling, he is pursuing Moby Dick with all the fervor of religious fanaticism. To aid him in this maniacal quest he has smuggled aboard an extra boat's crew of savages, who make their initial appearance at this first lowering.
405. a. 28. Starbuck, Stubb, Flask. Seamen in command of three other boats.
410. b. 23. Morning of the third day. The third after Moby Dick had been sighted.
413. b. 44. The Parsee. A sailor who had been lost overboard earlier in the chase.
417. b. 10. Ixion. A character in Greek mythology condemned to eternal punishment on a wheel.

FITZ-JAMES O'BRIEN (1828-1862)

O'Brien was born in County Limerick, Ireland, in 1828. After attending Dublin University and squandering in London his patrimony of £8,000 he came to America to retrieve his fortune by his pen. From 1852 to 1862 he lived a Bohemian life, chiefly in New York, and attracted such favorable notice by his poems and stories that he came into considerable literary and social prominence. From what might have been a brilliant and influential literary career he was cut off by the Civil War, for he volunteered for active service and was killed in one of the earliest skirmishes.

In The Diamond Lens (p. 417) we see him carrying on the Poe tradition but combining into a single story elements from which Poe would probably have made four: an experience of clairvoyance, a murder, an invention of the scientific, or pseudo-scientific, sort in which Poe delighted, and a tragedy of love and beauty. Others of O'Brien's tales, which serve as a transition between the early work of Irving, Poe, and Hawthorne, and the later work of Aldrich, Bret Harte, Henry James, and others, are The Wondersmith, The Golden Ingot, Mother of Pearl, and What Was It? In some of these his realistic descriptions foreshadow the manner of more famous story-tellers who succeeded him.

O'Brien's work is available in his Poems and Stories, edited, with a sketch of the author, by William Winter, Boston, 1881; also in The Diamond Lens with Other Stories, edited, with a sketch of the author, by William Winter, New Edition, 1885.

STEPHEN COLLINS FOSTER (1826-1864)

Foster was more of a musician than a poet. In all, he seems to have written over a hundred and twenty songs, for which he composed both words and music. Probably none of them would have survived had he not developed the knack of fitting mediocre jingles to melodies of more than common merit. The two that are reprinted in this volume would have been forgotten without the tunes, which are so well known as to have a national popularity. As has been often pointed out, these two songs are not negro folk-songs in origin, in language, or in spirit. They are, rather, the white man's sentimental notion of what a negro song ought to be. But they are extremely good songs, easy to remember, easy to sing, and endowed with a pleasant though somewhat languid lyric appeal which is of a distinctly higher order than that of the general run of such productions. Both were written between 1850 and 1855.

HENRY TIMROD (1829-1867)

Timrod was primarily a poet of the South. Unlike the ephemeral war-poets who succeeded in fitting a few sentimental lines to a catchy popular tune, Timrod expressed in his impassioned lyrics the highest aspirations of the Confederacy as well as some of her less lofty ambitions. Before the outbreak of the Civil War, Timrod, Hayne, and a few others were succeeding in making Charleston, S. C., something of a literary center; Timrod's first volume of poems (1860) showed him to be a disciple of Keats and Tennyson, too imitative to assure him a permanent place among our poets. The war (in which he could take no important part as a soldier on account of his frail health) provided the necessary stimulus to vigorous, original work as a poet, but it also ruined his fortune and hastened the time of his death. His poems were subsequently collected and edited by his friend Hayne. Their persistent though moderate popularity—there have been five editions since his death—is an indication of their worth. Intensely local and partisan though he was, his best work has won the admiration of Southerners and Northerners alike.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

An admirable edition of Timrod's poetry is the Memorial, Richmond, Va., 1901. The best biographical study is G. A. Wauchope's Henry Timrod; Man and Poet, Columbia, S. C., 1915. W. P. Trent's William Gilmore Simms, N. Y. 1892, gives an interesting picture of the South as Timrod knew it.

NOTES

ETHNOGENESIS

433. This poem, celebrating, as the title indicates, the birth of a nation, is one of the most optimistic outbursts with which the founding of the Confederacy was hailed. The spiritual aspiration here expressed has given the poem a permanent place in our literature, despite the inaccuracy of its prophecies.

41. The mighty ghosts of Moultrie and of Eutaw. The ghosts of Southern colonial soldiers who fought during the Revolution, and won fame at the memorable defense of Fort Moultrie, and at the crucial battle of Eutaw Springs (Sept. 8, 1781). The reference cannot be to General William Moultrie, since there was no similar leader named Eutaw.

THE COTTON BOLL

435. The poem is a tribute to the greatness of the South, and a prophecy of her development. The poet sees in the cotton boll a symbol of future prosperity, and of commercial intercourse with all the world.

61. The curious ointment of the Arabian Tale. "The Story of the Blind Man, Baba Abdallah," in The Arabian Nights, tells of a magic ointment which, when applied to the left eye, gave a view of treasure no matter where hidden; when applied to the right eye, it caused blindness.

436. 98. The Poet of "The Woodlands." William Gilmore Simms (1806-1870), who lived on an estate called "Woodlands."

437. 167. The Port which ruled the Western seas. New York.

CHARLES FARRAR BROWNE

(1834-1867)

("ARTEMUS WARD")

Browne was born and brought up in Waterford, Maine, and learned the trade of printer in another country town of the same state—Skowhegan. The backwoods Yankee dialect, which might have been a handicap, he capitalized as one of his chief assets; and when he added to it his ridiculous spellings and his own talent for incisive witticisms, he quickly won his way to a high place among contemporary humorists.

Always of a roving disposition, he served as printer and reporter—or more exactly as a "column-writer"—on various papers from Maine to Ohio, until in The Cleveland Plain Dealer he found an almost national medium of expression for Artemus Ward and his imaginary "show." In 1861 he began a protracted series of lecture tours which carried him, with ever-increasing popularity, as far west as the Pacific coast and as far east as London. In these lectures he exhibited powers of friendly caricaturing and of humorous moralizing which won him the admiration and personal friendship of even the leading English men of letters. In 1866, with the success of the letters to Punch and of the London lectures, he reached the height of his fame—only to be suddenly cut off by consumption.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. The most inclusive edition of Browne's work is Artemus Ward Complete, London, 1890 and 1910. Individual works, earliest of which was Artemus Ward, His Book, N. Y. 1862, are not difficult to obtain.

BIOGRAPHIES. E. P. Hingston's The Genial Showman, London, 1870, is a good source of biographical information.

HENRY WHEELER SHAW (1818-1885)
("JOSH BILLINGS")

During the first forty years of Shaw's life, he was anything but a man of letters. Lured from Hamilton College by tales of the adventurous west, he gave himself up to an active and varied career as boatman, farmer, and auctioneer. By 1858, however, he had returned to the east, and had settled at Poughkeepsie, where he began to write. He first attracted the attention of the public when he revised the spelling of his Essay on the Mule (1859) so that it appeared as An Essa on the Muel. His annual burlesque, The Farmer's Allminax, appeared from 1860 to 1870, and sold over a hundred thousand copies a year. Gradually his awkward but vigorous and original type of humor won him an increasingly large audience, and he soon came to be as well known as his contemporary Artemus Ward. Josh Billings, his Sayings (1866), Josh Billings on Ice (1875), and Every Boddy's Friend (1876), were followed by his Complete Works in 1876. The student who turns the pages of this last book will find in it more of proverbial wisdom and amusing irony than has often come from the pen of a single writer.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The Complete Works, N. Y. 1876, is not complete, but contains a large and adequate selection of Shaw's sayings. No good biography has yet appeared, though Francis S. Smith's Life and Adventures of Josh Billings, N. Y. 1883, is reasonably accurate.

REMARKS

RALPH WALDO EMERSON (1803-1882)

When Matthew Arnold was lecturing in America, during the winter of 1883-84, Emerson had been dead less than two years. Many of the people who composed Arnold's audiences had listened to Emerson; all of them were more or less familiar with his reputation and general achievement. Consequently, Arnold's attempt to estimate the significance of Emerson in American life and thought proved of more than ordinary interest to his auditors. The resulting summary was not in all ways flattering. Emerson was not a great poet, said Arnold, because his verse lacked that inevitableness which one finds in the highest sort of poetry; he was not a great prose writer, because he had not the sure sense of style that distinguishes the work of men like Swift and Voltaire; he was not a great philosopher, because his thinking was unsystematic. But—and here Arnold put the case so well that his phrasing has not yet been improved upon—he was "the friend and aider of those who would live in the spirit." Harsh though the first part of Arnold's summary may appear to some persons, the concluding tribute to Emerson's tonic quality, to his potency as a spiritual energizer, seems after the lapse of forty years as close an approximation as has yet been made to a concise statement of Emerson's particular contribution to American culture.

Had Emerson been born a hundred years earlier, before the Puritan leadership had begun to falter, or seventy years later, when the spiritual unrest of the post-Revolutionary period had given place to a somewhat lethargic materialism, it is inconceivable that he should have become the Emerson whom the world knows. Despite his cosmopolitanism and his almost dateless paganism, he was definitely a product of America at the turn of the century; of New England, center of Puritan dominance, at the time the Puritan was finding himself mellowed and humanized by the inexplicable but very powerful forces that we associate with what it is difficult to call anything except the Romantic revolt. He was a product of this second Renaissance, of this age of expansion; he was himself influential in carrying the revolt to high issues. At the same time he never lost touch with the sturdy Puritanism which was his spiritual heritage, and against the background of which all his subsequent development was to take place.

But no such deterministic attempt to "account for" Emerson in terms of race, time, and place, can ever be satisfactory. He would have been great in any age. He bore the marks of genius. However much he owed to his world, he gave away more than he borrowed. More and more he is coming to seem the chief figure among American men of letters.

The important facts concerning his life and personality have now become so well known as to be part of American tradition. Especially since the publication of his Journals, it has been possible to follow him in some detail during the most interesting period of his life, and to gain a new conception of the workings of his mind, and his methods of literary composition.

Born in Boston on May 25, 1803, he was a descendant of a long line of Puritan pioneers and ministers. His father, William Emerson, pastor of the first Unitarian Church of Boston, was a man of local distinction and intellectual ambition, and though liberal in his theology, was firm in his adherence to the Puritan tradition of morality and idealism. He died when his son Ralph was ten years old, at a time when the boy's ambition was limited to following his father and grandfather in the ministry, and to writing a little verse. Entering Harvard College in 1817, Emerson had in considerable measure to "work his way through." In his first year he served as "President's freshman," or messenger; in his second year he acted as a waiter in the Junior dining hall. The activities of his Junior and Senior years are recorded in some detail in the first published volume of his Journals. That he was an unusual youngster, different from the general run of college students then or now, is obvious; at the same time such selections as are printed in this book show him to have taken a genuine interest in college friendships and college fun. During his undergraduate years he won prizes for declamation and essay writing; at the end of his course his fellows elected him Class Poet—an honor which pleased him greatly, despite the fact that seven other men had declined the position before it was offered to him. He graduated in 1821, near the middle of his class, and promptly went home to teach school in order that a younger brother might take his turn at Harvard. Three years later, after a rather distasteful experience as school-master, he returned to Cambridge to study for the ministry. In 1826 he was licensed to preach; in 1829 he was installed as Assistant Pastor, and shortly afterwards as Pastor of the Second Church (Unitarian) of Boston.

Thus by the time he was twenty-six years old he had achieved the first part of his boyish ambition, and had become comfortably established in what he supposed would be his life work. Already, however, his thinking had progressed far from even the liberal creed of his denomination; by 1832 he considered it impossible conscientiously to remain in the ministry. Finding himself "no longer interested" in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, he proposed to his church that the service be discontinued. When the church declined to take this step, he at once resigned. A memorable trip to Europe, in which he met Wordsworth, Coleridge, and—more important from the point of view of subsequent friendship and influence on his work—Carlyle, occupied the next few months; by 1834 he was settled in Concord, where he was to live till his death in 1882.

What he accomplished in this half century of quiet residence in a country village, the world knows. He continued to serve as a preacher, but instead of a pulpit, he used the lecture platform for his rostrum. Boston early accepted him as the most popular lecturer of the day; gradually the circle of his influence widened till by the time of the Civil War he was known and welcomed from Massachusetts Bay to the Mississippi. A master of the sort of public address which the Lyceum course demanded, with a manner which forced people to listen, albeit they were not always certain of the significance of what they were hearing, Emerson spent his best energies in preaching his gospel to audiences that crowded the halls in which he spoke, and became a spiritual tonic to a great portion of the United States. He died on April 27, 1882.

The years in which, Emerson was best known as a lecturer were naturally the years in which he did most of his publishing. Much of his work appeared first in magazine form, to be republished later under various titles. Nature (1836) might well be called his inaugural address; it was an announcement of his gospel, and an indication that a new voice was making itself heard in the land. In 1841 and 1844 came two collections of Essays; in 1847 a collected volume of Poems, and in 1849, Nature, Addresses and Lectures. Representative Men, frankly modeled on his friend Carlyle's Heroes and Hero-Worship, appeared in 1850; in 1856 English Traits gave expression to the pleasant impressions gained on two visits to England. The Conduct of Life (1860) might well have been called Essays, Third Series. Though there are other titles in the Emerson bibliography, the student who owns the nine here listed, and adds to them the Journals (1909-1914), will possess all that is best in Emerson's work.

In the total of Emerson's publications the poetry occupies a relatively small space. Yet it is hardly an exaggeration to say that the ideas which lie at the center of all his thinking may all be found, stated or implied, in his verse. In reading this verse the student should remember that Emerson's chief concern was to give expression to what seemed a significant idea. "It is not metres," he wrote in his essay The Poet, "but a metre-making argument, that makes a poem." For technical niceties and poetical conventions he cared relatively little; he was eager, as he puts it in Merlin, to Climb to Heaven by the stairway of surprise.

He was not averse to putting a sermon into poetry which a school-boy could understand, nor did he avoid the other extreme, the poem in which the central idea is never clearly expressed, but merely suggested, hinted at, throughout a series of figures and images.

It is obvious that he possessed in rich measure the essential qualifications of a poet: he could state an abstract idea, or paint a picture, or give expression to a mood, in language which is at once rhythmically effective, and rich with concrete, sensuous, imagery. Every poem he wrote, as well as much of his prose, attests this fact. Occasionally, as even Arnold admitted, he struck off those "inevitable" lines or quatrains which passed at once into the literature of the race. Rarely, however, is he as effective in large units as in small. For the fact seems clear that when Emerson wrote, he was—one might almost say—thinking aloud; he was passing on to his reader ideas which came to him out of the blue, and which sometimes followed one another without apparent connection. Consequently, the student who would read Emerson's verse with intelligent appreciation must be content to go slowly, to disregard superficial breaks in the thought, to do without the formal structure which Emerson did not consider needful, and above all, to think. If he will do these things, he will find in Emerson's verse a poetic beauty which is never unrelated to some stimulating idea.

Much the same things, mutatis mutandis, are true of the various collections of essays. It is platitudinous to repeat the statement that Emerson's essays were first lectures, and that his lectures were collections of sentences bearing some relation to the announced topic, but never fused into the unified whole that Pater, for instance, would have demanded.

Hence it is almost impossible to "outline" one of the essays; rarely is there a "first," a "second," or a "third." But the student who reads with a pencil in his hand will seldom find better use for it than when turning the pages of Emerson's prose. He will use it not to indicate the formal divisions of the thought, for these do not appear, but rather to underscore those pithy, stimulating utterances, each of which may contain more value than will appear in a page of other writers. "God will not make himself manifest to eowards"; "Prayer is the contemplation of the facts of life from the highest point of view"; "Hitch your wagon to a star"; "Nothing is at last sacred but the integrity of your own mind"; "Trust thyself: every heart vibrates to that iron string"; "If a single man plant himself indomitably on his instincts, and there abide, the huge world will come round to him"; "See [a thing] to be a lie, and you have already dealt it its mortal blow"; "Beauty is the mark God sets upon virtue"; "In God, every end is converted into a new means": in such pregnant sentences as these one finds an explanation of the influence Emerson exerted upon his auditors, and may exert upon his readers. It is in such utterances that Emerson the lecturer and essayist became Emerson the prophet, setting forth ideas which had proved of compelling significance in his own life, and which were to stir unnumbered hearers to higher thinking and more generous living. He who could thus phrase his precepts could well trust to the sympathetic reader the task of divining the informing unity—intuitional, and not structural—which bound together the apparently disconnected fragments.

That there was such a unity, not of form or structure, but of idea, of attitude, becomes apparent when one realizes that each of the poems and essays centers around some one of the concepts which, taken together, compose Emerson's philosophy. To call him a Transcendentalist, is to place him among those who were in revolt against Locke's empiricism, and to align him with the thinkers who hold that man's most important ideas and beliefs are not based on experience, but "transcend" it: are in part innate, and in part derived by intuition. It is clear that he was the most influential of American Transcendentalists; it is as clear that he owed much to kindred minds, from Plato and Confucius to Carlyle. Yet as philosopher he developed no systematic cosmogony, nor did he face some of the central problems that have given pause to thinkers of all ages. He was content to announce his gospel in his own way, and to leave "systems" to other hands.

What the ideas are which compose that gospel, and of which his poems and essays are fragmentary developments, it is not difficult to state: The spiritual nature of reality; the primary importance of self-reliance; the existence of a unifying "Over-Soul" which harmonizes and explains all the diverse phenomena of life; the supreme significance of character; the obligation of optimism, of hope—these are some of the truths which Emerson preached to his countrymen. That he never forced—or permitted—himself to develop systematically any one of his central themes, as Edwards had done in The Freedom of the Will; that his phraseology is at times baffling and obscure; that his conception of an "Over-Soul" seemed to some people an unsatisfactory substitute for God; that his revolt against authority went so far as to alienate still others among his contemporaries—these matters are of less significance than that the world in which he lived caught gleams of inspiration from his personality as well as from his philosophy, and accepted him as "the friend and aider of those who would live in the spirit." He may well serve in the same capacity today.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The bibliography of Emerson is so extensive that only the most important sources of information and guides to further study can be indicated in this volume.

The student of Emerson might well begin his reading with Harold C. Goddard's Studies in New England Transcendentalism, N. Y. 1908, which is an admirable survey of the philosophical and religious background against which Emerson's figure appears. To make the picture more complete one should add such works as Lindsay Swift's Brook Farm; its Members, Scholars, and Visitors, N. Y. 1900; Bronson Alcott's Concord Days, Boston, 1872; F. B. Sanborn and W. T. Harris's A. Bronson Alcott, Boston, 1893, 2 vols.; Charles T. Brooks's William Ellery Channing, Boston, 1880; Thomas Wentworth Higginson's Margaret Fuller Ossoli (A. M. L. series) Boston, 1884; and O. B. Frothingham's George Ripley (A. M. L. series), Boston, 1882.

EDITIONS. Of Emerson's own works, the Centenary, edited with biographical introduction and notes by E. W. Emerson, Boston, 1903, 12 vols., is the best readily available collected edition. To this should of course be added the Journals, edited by E. W. Emerson and W. E. Forbes, Boston, 1909-14, 10 vols.; for excellent selections see The Heart of Emerson's Journals by Bliss Perry, Boston, 1926. There are several collections of Emerson's letters, though no one is inclusive. Perhaps the most significant is The Correspondence of Thomas Carlyle and Ralph Waldo Emerson, revised edition, Boston, 1888, 2 vols. There are countless reprints of the earlier volumes of essays.

BIOGRAPHIES. The standard biography is J. E. Cabot's A Memoir of Ralph Waldo Emerson, Boston, 1887, 2 vols. Oliver Wendell Holmes's Ralph Waldo Emerson (A. M. L. series), Boston, 1885, is a sympathetic study by a personal friend. Edward Waldo Emerson's Emerson in Concord, Boston, 1888, is the most detailed treatment of Emerson's home life. George E. Woodberry's Ralph Waldo Emerson (E. M. L. series) N. Y. 1907, is an admirable brief biography. O. W. Firkins's Ralph Waldo Emerson, Boston, 1915, presents an adequate account of Emerson's life, and a searching, stimulating, commentary on Emerson as prose writer, as poet, and as philosopher. If one had to limit one's reading to a single biographical work, this last would probably be the one to choose.

CRITICAL ARTICLES. Matthew Arnold's essay Emerson, in his Discourses in America, should be read by every student. Bliss Perry's two essays on Emerson, in his The Praise of Folly, Boston, 1923, add much to our understanding of Emerson. As both have appeared since the C. H. A. L., they should be listed here. For other suggestions, see the C. H. A. L.

NOTES

THE JOURNALS

445. The greater part of Emerson's Journals is made up of random jottings on philosophy, literature, and politics, rather than of personal memoirs. From these jottings, as Emerson wrote his essays, he took sentence after sentence until by the end of his life he had skimmed most of the cream from the Journals. Much of the remainder is now available in the Houghton Mifflin edition prepared by E. W. Emerson and W. E. Forbes. For an admirable review of the Journals see Bliss Perry's essay Emerson's Savings Bank, in The Praise of Folly and other Papers, Boston, 1923. The passages here reprinted are from the first volume, and are significant only as they throw a somewhat new light upon Emerson the college student.

THE AMERICAN SCHOLAR

447. From the volume Nature, Addresses, and Lectures (1849). The address, often referred to as "America's intellectual Declaration of Independence," was delivered before the Harvard chapter of Phi Beta Kappa on August 31, 1837. For the best account of the occasion see Bliss Perry's Emerson's Most Famous Speech, in The Praise of Folly. Holmes, in commenting on it, said, "The young men went from it as if a prophet had been proclaiming to them, 'Thus saith the Lord.' No listener ever forgot that address, and among all the noble utterances of the speaker it may be questioned if one ever contained more truth in language more like that of immediate inspiration." (Emerson, p. 88.)

453. a. 44. Flamsteed and Herschel. John Flamsteed (1646-1719), the first Astronomer Royal; Sir William Herschel (1738-1822) and his son John were both famous astronomers.

457. a. 15. Emanuel Swedenborg. A Swedish mystic and theologian (1688-1772), founder of "The New Church." Emerson makes him the subject of one of the chapters in his Representative Men.

a. 46. Pestalozzi. Johann Heinrich Pestalozzi (1746-1827), a Swiss educator and writer.

SELF-RELIANCE

458. Self-Reliance was published in Essays, First Series (1841). Perhaps the best short comment on the controversy which it aroused and on the proper interpretation of Emerson's thought is to be found in the following passage from Emerson in Concord by Ralph Waldo Emerson, p. 250: "Hence his essay on Self-Reliance, which has been called the lowest note in his philosophy; rightly read, is the highest note. He explains it, after his manner, elsewhere [in the Anti-Slavery Address of March 7, 1854], and says that one comes at last to learn 'That self-reliance, the height and perfection of man, is reliance on God.'"

a. 18. Ne te quæsis extra. Seek not outside thyself.

460. a. 19. Barbadoes. In the British West Indies. Slavery was abolished there in 1834.
461. b. 1. Foolish face of praise. Quoted from Pope's satire on Addison in the Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot.
462. a. 9. Joseph. The story may be found in Genesis XXXIX.
463. b. 13. That popular fable. For Shakespeare's use of the story, see the Induction of The Taming of the Shrew.
- b. 35. Alfred, etc. Alfred the Great, King of England from 871 to 901; Scanderbeg (George Castriota) (1403-1468), an Albanian patriot; Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden from 1611 to 1632.
468. a. 12. The word made flesh. See John I, 14.
- b. 4. The god Audate. An unimportant blunder. The Celtic deity to whom Emerson refers was the goddess Andate (or Andraste), and the quotation from Bonduca actually begins "Her hidden meaning."
- b. 49. Locke, etc. John Locke (1632-1704), English philosopher, and author of the Essay Concerning the Human Understanding; Antoine Laurent Lavoisier (1743-1794), a famous French chemist; Charles Hutton (1737-1823), English mathematician (Emerson may have referred to James Hutton [1726-1797], Scottish geologist); Jeremy Bentham (1748-1832), English philosopher and economist.
471. a. 6. Phocion, etc. An Athenian statesman; Socrates, Anaxagoras, and Diogenes, Emerson uses as types of Greek philosophers.
- a. 16. Hudson. The older navigators, Henry Hudson and Vitus Behring, are contrasted with Sir William Edward Parry and Sir John Franklin, both of whom were still living when Emerson wrote.

COMPENSATION

472. This essay is the third in the collection entitled Essays, First Series (1841), coming between Self-Reliance and Spiritual Laws.
474. a. 48. Become a byword and a hissing. Emerson was himself hissed on two occasions; at one of his attempts to address an Anti-Slavery Society the mob "roared and hissed" until he was forced to withdraw.
- a. 52. Res nolunt diu male administrari. Translated in the preceding sentence.
475. a. 18. Οἱ κύβοι Διὸς δει εὐπρόσποιοι Translated in the following sentence.
476. a. 48. Prometheus knows one secret. See the Prometheus of Æschylus and the Prometheus Unbound of Shelley.
- b. 11. Tithonus. Compare Tennyson's poem Tithonus.

477. a. 10. Phidias. The most famous sculptor of ancient Greece, who flourished in the fifth century B. C.
478. a. 29. The emerald of Polycrates. Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, was so prosperous that, fearing the jealousy of the gods, he threw a valuable ring into the sea. It was found in a fish and returned to him; shortly afterwards he was enticed to the mainland and murdered. The story is told by Herodotus.
479. b. 18. The royal armies sent against Napoleon. The incident referred to took place early in 1815, shortly after Napoleon's escape from Elba.
480. a. 25. Every evil to which we do not succumb is a benefactor. With the ideas expressed in the whole essay, and of this sentence in particular, the student may compare parts of Browning's Rabbi Ben Ezra.
481. b. 21. St. Bernard. A French monk (1091-1153), famous for founding a monastery at Clairvaux, and for preaching the Second Crusade.
482. b. 34. The banian of the forest. A wide-spreading tropical tree; usually spelled banyan.

NATURE

- From Essays, Second Series (1844). In this essay Emerson summarizes and restates some of the ideas concerning Nature which had appeared throughout his earlier works, and which had received more extensive but perhaps not more lucid treatment in the 1836 booklet, Nature. This earlier publication—somewhat revised—was reprinted in 1849 in Nature, Addresses, and Lectures, and the student who finds himself seriously interested in Emerson's ideas will consult that longer work. The essay here printed, however, is sufficient to show the main trend of Emerson's thinking, when that thinking was directed towards the phenomena of the natural world.
484. b. 7. Versailles, or Paphos, or Ctesiphon. Places famous for wealth and luxury in France, Cyprus, and Turkey respectively.
- b. 54. Makes Edens and Tempes. Tempe, a beautiful valley of Thessaly, so famous that the name is often used, as here, for any valley of great beauty.
485. a. 54. They fall into euphuism. Used here to mean "ornate style"; literally, the particular style popularized in Elizabethan literature by John Lyly's Euphues.
487. a. 51. Dalton, Davy, and Black. John Dalton (1766-1844), an English chemist and natural philosopher; Sir Humphry Davy (1778-1829), an English chemist; Joseph Black (1728-1799), a Scottish chemist and anatomist.

488. b. 20. Jacob Behmen and George Fox. Jakob Böhme (1575-1624), a German mystic and visionary, whose writings influenced Emerson, and whose name he habitually spells Behmen, following the regular English tradition. George Fox (1624-1691), founder of the Society of Friends (Quakers).
- b. 23. James Naylor.* A fanatical English Quaker (?1617-1660), who was mercilessly punished by Parliament for "blasphemy."
490. b. 7. An Œdipus arrives. According to Greek tradition it was Œdipus who solved the riddle of the Sphinx.

GOOD-BYE

491. Written at the age of nineteen; when Emerson was teaching in Boston. "The sylvan home" refers to his mother's residence in Roxbury, whither he went when his work at school was over. First published in 1839.

THE RHODORA

In Nature (1836), chapter 3, Emerson had written: "The world thus exists to the soul to satisfy the desire of Beauty. This element I call an ultimate end. No reason can be asked or given why the soul seeks Beauty. Beauty . . . is one expression for the universe. God is the all-fair." First published in 1839.

EACH AND ALL

492. It was a favorite idea of Emerson's that "nothing is fair or good alone." "I remember when I was a boy going upon the beach and being charmed with the colors and forms of the shells. I picked up many and put them in my pocket. When I got home I could find nothing that I had gathered—nothing but some dry, ugly, mussel and snail shells. Thence I learned that Composition was more important than the beauty of individual forms." Journals, May 16, 1834.

THE PROBLEM

Emerson here sets forth what had been his own problem—whether to be a clergyman, when that way of life was in many ways repugnant to him. The poem was written in November, 1839. A little more than a year before he had made this entry in his Journal (Aug. 28, 1838): "It is very grateful to my feelings to go into a Roman Cathedral, yet I look as my countrymen do at the Roman priesthood. It is very grateful to me to go into an English church and hear the liturgy read, yet nothing would induce me to be an English priest."

493. 10. Phidias. Greatest of Greek sculptors (fl. 480 B. C.).

65. Chrysostom. John of Antioch (?347-407), Bishop of Constantinople.

Augustine. Saint Augustine (354-430), most eminent of the Church Fathers, and author of the Confessions (397).

68. Taylor. Jeremy Taylor (1613-1667), an English churchman, best known as the author of Holy Living and Holy Dying.

THE SPHINX

The idea of relating one thing to another, applied to the phenomena of Nature in Each and All, is here extended. In his 1859 Note-Book (quoted in the Centenary Edition of his poems) Emerson said: "I have often been asked the meaning of the Sphinx. It is this,—The perception of identity unites all things and explains one by another, and the most rare and strange is equally facile as the most common. But if the mind live only in particulars, and see only the differences (wanting the power to see the whole—all in each), then the world addresses to this mind a question it cannot answer, and each new fact tears it in pieces, and it is vanquished by the distracting variety." In this prose comment Emerson is stating what is virtually the central theme in his philosophy, the doctrine of Identity in Difference. Compare The Over-Soul, in Essays, First Series, for a more extended development of the same theme.

HAMATREYA

495. "This poem is a free rendering of a passage in the Vishnu Parana, Book IV, an everlasting theme which, by changing the imagery to that which surrounded them, Mr. Emerson made striking to his Concord neighbors." (Centenary Edition of the Poems, p. 416.)
1. Bulkeley, Hunt, etc. Early Concord settlers. Peter Bulkeley was one of Emerson's own forbears.

WOODNOTES

496. First published in 1840, in The Dial, and subsequently much revised.
31. A forest seer. The following description has often been considered Emerson's portrait of his friend and neighbor Thoreau. He said, however, that he had written this part of the poem before he knew Thoreau intimately.

FORBEARANCE

498. First published in 1842. It is quite possible that Emerson had Thoreau in mind as he wrote. See the Centenary Edition of the Poems, p. 430.

THE APOLOGY

Compare Wordsworth's ideas as expressed in The Tables Turned:

One impulse from a vernal wood
May teach you more of man,
Of moral evil and of good
Than all the sages can.

MERLIN

499. 27. Despite the dislike of conventional verse-forms suggested in lines 27-38, Emerson rarely showed as much metrical originality as in this poem.
49. Sybarites. Inhabitants of Sybaris were proverbially notorious for luxurious living.
80. Balance-loving Nature. In Part II the poet treats in some detail one of his favorite themes: the operation throughout all nature of the principle of compensation.

CONCORD HYMN

500. "Of all Emerson's poems," wrote Holmes (Emerson, p. 332), "the Concord Hymn is the most nearly complete and faultless,—but it is not distinctively Emersonian. . . . Its one conspicuous line,

And fired the shot heard round the world, must not take to itself all the praise deserved by this perfect little poem, a model of all its kind. Compact, expressive, serene, solemn, musical, in four brief stanzas it tells the story of the past, records the commemorative act of the passing day, and invokes the higher Power that governs the future to protect the Memorial-stone sacred to Freedom and her martyrs."

BRAHMA

Published in the first number of the Atlantic Monthly, November, 1857. "Mr. Emerson, much amused when people found Brahma puzzling, said to his daughter, 'If you will tell them to say Jehovah instead of Brahma, they will not feel any perplexity.'" (Centenary Edition of Poems, p. 467. The student should read the entire note.)

TERMINUS

This poem, written in 1866, may be considered Emerson's renunciation of the active life he had so far enjoyed. Edward W. Emerson, commenting on it in the Centenary Edition, p. 489, wrote: "In the last days of 1866 . . . I met my father in New York. . . . We spent the night together at the St. Denis Hotel, and as we sat by the fire he read me two or three of his poems . . . among them Terminus. It almost startled me. No thought of his ageing had ever come to me, and there he sat, with no apparent abatement of bodily vigor, and young in spirit, recognizing with serene acquiescence his failing power; I think he smiled as he read. He recognized, as none of us did, that his working days were nearly done."

HENRY DAVID THOREAU (1817-1862)

When Thoreau died, on May 2, 1862, his Concord neighbors honored him with a public funeral, and selected Emerson to make the address. There was no other person who could have performed the task so well. For over twenty years Thoreau's relations to Emerson had been those of intimate companion and disciple; Emerson knew at first hand all Thoreau's peculiarities and substantial virtues, and was in a position to do more than pronounce a formal eulogy on his dead friend. The resulting essay—for the address soon appeared in print—is perhaps as good a starting point as the average reader can find for a study of one of America's most unusual men of letters.

In his sympathetic but never uncritical estimate Emerson records the more important facts of Thoreau's life. Born in Concord in 1817, educated at the village school, graduated from Harvard in 1837, he taught school for a year or two, found the profession irksome, and soon settled down to the quiet, local existence which readers of his books can reconstruct at will. His somewhat cryptic statement, "I have travelled a good deal, in Concord," seems to imply that he rarely wandered far from his native village, and also suggests the more important consideration that his mental journeyings were constant and extensive. Thoreau shared with Blake the power to Hold the world in a grain of sand,

And see Eternity in an hour.

His mind was never hedged in by the boundaries of Concord township.

His characteristic attitude towards society as a whole became apparent early in life. A rebel against the existing order of things, he decided not to go to church, not to pay taxes to a government which permitted slavery, not to become involved in any formal association with a social organization of which he disapproved, and especially not to concern himself unnecessarily over the problem of earning a living. On this last matter he had formed a definite opinion even during his college years, and had suggested, in his commencement speech, that "the order of things should be somewhat reversed; the seventh should be man's day of toil, wherein to earn his living by the sweat of his brow; the other six his Sabbath of the affections and the soul—in which to range this widespread garden, and drink in the soft influences and sublime revelations of Nature."

Curiously enough, Thoreau did more than preach his gospel of simplification, of a passive, contemplative life—he lived it. A skillful surveyor and mathematician, a good farmer, an adept in his father's trade of pencil-making, Thoreau was qualified to "get on in the world" had he cared to. "I have as many trades as I have fingers," he wrote in Walden. But happiness would never have come to him as a result of any sort of worldly "success." Instead of using his very real abilities as most people would have expected him to use them, he made it his practice to limit his labor to just enough to support him in virtually monastic simplicity, and to save the best part of each year free for what seemed to him of vastly more importance than making money: walking in the woods, studying the wild life around Concord River and Walden Pond, reading the classics, writing for the Dial, recording his observations and ideas in a voluminous journal, and sitting quiet in that condition of "wise passiveness" in which he found the mystic's intense satisfaction.

The books which he wrote from time to time are all of a piece, though only one has proved its claim to be considered an American classic. Of the entire list four may be mentioned here. A Week on the Concord and Merrimac Rivers (1849) is ostensibly an account of a trip in a flat boat. The narrative element, however, is slight; there is much Transcendentalism in the volume, much sermonizing, not a little mediocre poetry, and much preaching of Thoreau's anti-social individualism. It is over the passages of description that the reader lingers gladly, descriptions that attest Thoreau's accurate observation of the life of the river, and his rare skill in reproducing what he had seen.

Walden, or Life in the Woods, came out in 1854, and made its author known throughout the English-speaking world. It is because of Walden that Thoreau still lives, and will live. The book is an account of Thoreau's two years' life in his cabin by the shore of Walden Pond. Here, in a one-roomed hut which he had built himself, Thoreau lived from the spring of 1841 to that of 1843, and tried his great experiment of reducing existence to its simplest terms. At the end of the two years he was satisfied with his accomplishments, and returned to his more normal life in Concord village. The detailed record of this adventure, written ten years afterwards, has the fascination of such romantic tales as Robinson Crusoe or Two Years before the Mast, albeit the events chronicled are the minutiae of a circumscribed existence, and the volume itself is somewhat overburdened with the social diatribes and philosophizing characteristic of all Thoreau's prose. Such passages as are reproduced in this book are fair samples of the whole, and show not only that Thoreau possessed a vigorous and charming style, but also that he might easily have made himself a renowned naturalist. The Maine Woods (1864) and Cape Cod (1865) appeared after the author's death. Neither added anything to the fame that Walden had brought him, though both are welcome additions to any library of the out-of-doors.

As Emerson's essay indicates, Thoreau's friends early recognized him as an able, interesting, but abnormally queer person,—a crank, whose habit of uncompromising truth-telling made him somewhat feared, but who might be extremely useful—if he were so inclined at the moment—when houses were to be "cleaned," gardens weeded, or fields surveyed. They respected his sincerity, though they felt bound to lodge him in the Concord lock-up for persistently refusing to pay his poll-tax. They regretted—some of them—that a man of his ability should have been content to live the insulated and restricted life that he chose for himself. "Instead of engineering for all America, he was the captain of a huckleberry party," said Emerson. At the same time they were generous in praise of his kindness and sincerity, and his uncompromising opposition to whatever he considered unlovely.

The student who turns the pages of Thoreau's books today, seventy years after his death, will delight in the whimsical but powerful personality which those pages reveal, will enjoy the romance of the Walden experiment, will be amused and not infrequently disquieted by his observations on society, and will realize that Thoreau's name belongs in the relatively short list of American masters of prose.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. The best readily available editions of Thoreau's collected works are the Riverside, Boston, 1894, 11 vols., and the Walden, Boston, 1906, 20 vols. The latter contains Thoreau's Journal, edited by Bradford Torrey. Walden is available in a score of inexpensive reprints.

BIOGRAPHIES. William E. Channing's Thoreau, the Poet-Naturalist, is hopelessly inaccurate in some ways, but is interesting because it is the work of one of Thoreau's intimate friends. It is best read in F. B. Sanborn's revision, Boston, 1902. The best formal biography is also Sanborn's: Thoreau, Boston, 1897 (A. M. L. series), which in most ways is more useful than the same author's later study, The Life of Henry David Thoreau, Boston, 1917. Léon Bazalgette's Henry Thoreau, Bachelor of Nature, translated by Van Wyck Brooks, N. Y. 1924, is the most stimulating single avenue of approach to the many fascinating problems presented by Thoreau's life and character.

CRITICAL ARTICLES. At least three critical articles may well be read by any student: John Burroughs's Henry Thoreau, Century Magazine, July, 1882; Emerson's remarks at Thoreau's funeral, published in the Atlantic for August, 1862; Lowell's rather unsympathetic essay, first published in 1865, and now included as Thoreau, in vol. 1 of the Riverside Edition of Lowell's prose works. Two more recent studies, the chapter on Thoreau in Norman Foerster's Nature in American Literature, and P. E. More's Thoreau's Journal, in Shelburne Essays, Fifth Series, are well worthy of attention by the serious student.

WALDEN

Thoreau did not believe that a life of solitude was of any particular advantage from the standpoint of economics. He did believe that the independence of solitude was valuable enough to justify the inconvenience involved, and was eager to prove that the economic difficulties were not insuperable. Hence the experiment of which all the world is aware, and which is described, in part, in the selections here reprinted.

WILLIAM HICKLING PRESCOTT
(1796-1859)

William Hickling Prescott was born in Salem, May 4, 1796, of an old and honorable New England family. In due time he entered Harvard College, from which he graduated in 1814, handicapped for life by the fact that he had been almost blinded by the carelessness of a fellow student. Unable to study law, as he had hoped to do, and forced to guard most scrupulously what eyesight remained to him, he gradually took up the serious study of history, and decided upon the career of a man of letters. Accordingly he devoted a year to improving his own style by a study of the English classics—including Johnson's Dictionary and Hugh Blair's Rhetoric. His progress was, happily, accelerated by his comfortable financial situation, which enabled him to employ readers and secretaries to assist him. Still undecided as to the precise field of his future labors, he slowly mastered, year by year, the literature of Europe; and in the case of French, Italian, and Spanish, acquired a thorough knowledge of the languages.

Not until 1825, eleven years after his graduation, did he decide to focus his attention on Spanish history at the time of Ferdinand and Isabella. And not until eleven years later did his first important work appear—A History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella the Catholic. So great was the success of this undertaking that Prescott, definitely established as a historian of international fame, devoted the remaining years of his life to further research and writing. As a result, he gave the world three other great works: The Conquest of Mexico (1843), The Conquest of Peru (1846), and Philip II (1859). With the publication of these four works, Prescott's notable contribution to history and literature came to a close. His last work, Philip II, was incomplete when in February, 1858, he suffered a slight apoplectic stroke. Characteristically, he kept at his task with what energy was left to him; but his death in January, 1859, found the work still unfinished.

It is doubtless true that Prescott's historical writing is open to the charge of inaccuracy in details. Though no one ever wrote with a more scrupulous regard for truth than he, the sources on which he depended for information were at best unreliable, and at worst hopelessly mendacious. In all large ways, however, Prescott's work is reliable. He misrepresented nothing of serious moment. And he wrote so well, with such a feeling for the dramatic value of the incidents he was portraying, with such a sure sense of proportion, that his work has the rare merit of being of literary as well as historical significance. He had a sense of values which enabled him to disregard minutiae and fix the reader's attention on what is at once significant and interesting. The characters whom he portrays are not mere figures of the past; they become, under his touch, living personages of heroic size who conquer great kingdoms as the knights of ancient legends overcame dragons. Sweeping fearlessly on through a maze of conflicting evidence, Prescott felt for himself, and conveyed to his public, the true romance of the olden times. Thus it comes about that he made for himself a position in American literature as well as in the chronicles of historical scholarship.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. The best collected edition of Prescott's work is the Montezuma, ed. W. H. Munro, Philadelphia, 1904. The individual works have been many times reprinted.

BIOGRAPHIES. Either Rollo Ogden's William Hickling Prescott (A. M. L. series), Boston, 1905, or H. T. Peck's William Hickling Prescott (E. M. L. series), N. Y. 1905, is an excellent starting point for the study of Prescott. The Correspondence of William Hickling Prescott, ed. Roger Wolcott, Boston, 1925, 2 vols., makes available a considerable amount of new material.

NOTES

THE CONQUEST OF PERU

519. This passage narrates the climactic incident in the conquest of Peru by that amazing military leader and religious fanatic, Francisco Pizarro (?1471-1541). Of ignoble birth, Pizarro suffered from neglect during his youth, but later achieved military and political success by his ability as a rigid disciplinarian and brilliant leadership in various expeditions to the New World. In January, 1530, he left Spain in command of an expedition sponsored by Charles V, and two years later boldly led his force of less than 200 men into the interior of South America, and made the difficult passage of the Andes. By entering the city of Caxamalca, in November, 1532, Pizarro brought his troops into contact with those of the Inca, Atahualpa, which numbered between 30,000 and 50,000. Having thus deliberately come into a position of extreme danger, Pizarro extricated himself by "one of the most atrocious acts of perfidy on the record of history," described in the chapters here printed. Nine years later, after a varied political career, he was assassinated, his last act being symbolic of his whole life—to dip his finger into a pool of his own blood, trace a cross on the floor, and kiss the cross.

JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY (1814-1877)

John Lothrop Motley, historian and diplomat, was born in 1814 and died in 1877; by a curious coincidence the city of his birth was Dorchester, Mass., and that of his death was Dorchester, England. After graduating from Harvard, he studied abroad, wrote two unsuccessful novels, and played a small part in Massachusetts politics. Finally taking up the study of history as his life work, he spent nearly ten years in preparing the three volumes of The Rise of the Dutch Republic, and even then was obliged to publish them at his own expense. The success of the book, however, was so great that immediately after its appearance in 1855 he began work on the sequel, The United Netherlands. The publication of this second contribution to scholarship and literature assured the author a distinguished place among the great writers of his day. Having lived in many of the principal cities of Europe while gathering material for his books, and having won for himself an international reputation, Motley was appointed Minister to Austria, and subsequently to England. In these positions he served his country well, yet he lacked the political shrewdness to care for his own interests with the authorities at Washington, and in both cases was virtually forced out of the service. His last important work, John of Barneveldt, served to distract his thoughts from the disappointments he had suffered; it, too, is a notable book, though it has never received the high praise given to its two predecessors.

Motley was indefatigable in his zeal for research and was praised for his conscientious accuracy by the greatest historians of his day. Like Carlyle, he was a biographer quite as much as an historian, portraying character with unusual power. Yet even these excellent qualities might not have enabled him to write history that should be at the same time great literature. Fortunately he had, in addition, a strong sense of the dramatic. It is this all-pervading dramatic feeling that has given his books their unusual hold on the public and has caused one of them in particular—familiarily known as "Motley's Dutch Republic"—to be universally recognized as an American classic.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. The only collected edition of Motley's writings is the Netherlands, N. Y. 1900, 17 vols. This contains three volumes of correspondence edited by G. W. Curtis. The individual historical works have been many times reprinted, and are easily accessible.

BIOGRAPHIES. The best biography is O. W. Holmes's John Lothrop Motley, Boston, revised edition 1898. For further information one should consult John Lothrop Motley and His Family, by his daughter and Herbert St. John Mildmay, N. Y. 1910.

NOTES

THE RISE OF THE DUTCH REPUBLIC

527. The selection given in this volume is from the very end of the book—a passage in which Motley not only describes the death of his hero but also sums up in brief retrospect what has been narrated at full length in the preceding chapters.
529. a. 50. Ecce homo. "Behold the man!" The phrase used by Pontius Pilate (John XIX, 5) in presenting Christ to the Jews.

FRANCIS PARKMAN (1823-1893)

Parkman belongs in any list of the world's foremost historians. He was at once enthusiast, scholar, philosopher, and skilled literary artist; and the series of works which he left behind him bids fair to outlast anything of the sort that has yet been produced in America. When one remembers that he was an invalid most of his life, and like Prescott forced to work under the shadow of threatened blindness, one's admiration for the man becomes as unqualified as one's praise of his accomplishment.

He was born in Boston on September 16, 1823, the son of a distinguished Unitarian clergyman. In 1844 he graduated from Harvard, winning election to Phi Beta Kappa, and then took up the study of law, though he was never to practise. On the contrary, he had already decided to give his life to historical writing, and had chosen as his subject the romantic spectacle of the rise and fall of French influence in North America.

In the execution of this task he did everything that was humanly possible to ensure accuracy and thoroughness: sooner or later he made seven trips to Europe, searching the libraries of the Old World for documents and manuscripts on which to base his chronicles; he visited in person all the sections of North America which had been the scenes of important conflicts between France and England; he lived on terms of intimacy with Indian tribes whose ancestors had sided with one or another of the two contestants; he was indefatigable in reading and mastering whatever had already been published that bore on his subject.

His first important publication was The Oregon Trail (1847), an account of his experiences while living with a tribe of Dakota Sioux. Four years later came The Conspiracy of Pontiac, a brilliant character study of the ablest Indian leader known to history, and a work which was in a sense a preliminary survey of the ground he was later to cover more thoroughly, and in a sense a sequel to his subsequent publications.

It was while writing the Pontiac that Parkman suffered the physical breakdown from which he never entirely recovered. His nerves were shattered to such an extent that half an hour of mental effort exhausted him; his eyesight became so weak that only by closing his eyes could he safely venture to write even his own name. Fortunately he had the means to employ readers and secretaries, and he persevered in his task, though when the Pontiac had been seen through the press, fourteen years were to elapse before another volume was ready.

By 1864 Parkman had made himself better known as a horticulturist and breeder of roses than as a historian. But in 1865 the appearance of Pioneers of France in the New World signalized Parkman's return to the field in which he was most happy, and gave a new start to the work for which he had been steadily preparing himself. The Pioneers was the initial volume in the large series known under the collective title of France and England in the New World. Once the series had fairly begun, the work progressed rapidly. The Jesuits in North America (1867); La Salle and the Discovery of the Great West (1869); The Old Régime in Canada (1874); Count Frontenac and New France under Louis XIV (1877); Montcalm and Wolfe (1884), generally accounted his masterpiece; and finally A Half-Century of Conflict (1892): these were the individual items in the large and inclusive study. Just a year from the time the concluding work appeared, Parkman died at his home in Jamaica Plain, having to his credit an accomplishment greater than that of any other American historian, and one which it is not easy to parallel in any tongue.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. There is no collected edition of Parkman's complete works, but the historical writings are available in the Champlain Edition, Boston, 1897, 20 vols., or the New Library Edition, Boston, 1902, 12 vols. The earlier works, especially The Oregon Trail, may be had in many inexpensive reprints.

BIOGRAPHIES. Two good biographies are C. H. Farnham's A Life of Francis Parkman, Boston, 1905, and Henry D. Sedgwick's Francis Parkman, Boston, 1904. O. B. Frothingham contributed a brief but authoritative memoir of Parkman to the Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society, second series, vol. VIII, where may also be found an autobiographical fragment in which Parkman recounted the main facts concerning his life-long struggle against disease.

NOTES

THE CONSPIRACY OF PONTIAC

534. Chapter IV is here printed entire, as illustrating various phases of Parkman's literary skill. It is, moreover, of special interest as containing his short account of the capture of Quebec, an incident narrated at greater length in Montcalm and Wolfe. The other passage—The Illinois—shows the author's power of imaginative description at its best.

Chapter XXVIII

552. a. 9. Laocoön writhings. The reference is to the well-known group of statuary, in which Laocoön and his two sons are shown writhing in the coils of enormous serpents.
b. 4. La Salle. Parkman's own work, La Salle and the Great West, is the best study of this adventurous spirit.

BAYARD TAYLOR (1825-1878)

(James) Bayard Taylor—translator, poet, traveler, diplomat, and prose writer—was a typically versatile American who, despite his hard-earned success in many important fields of activity, has left behind him no original literary work of the highest order. His translation of Goethe's Faust is perhaps the best in English, but his own prose is more remarkable for its quantity than its quality, and his poetry lacks the touch of genius.

Taylor was born in 1825 in Kennett Square, Pennsylvania. His father's family were chiefly Quakers of English descent, and though his grandfather had been forced out of that sect for "marrying out of Meeting," the Quaker traditions and ideals were preserved in the family life. Bayard was intended by his father to be a farmer; but a phrenologist who scrutinized the boy's head remarked, "That boy will ramble around the world, and furthermore he has all the marks of a poet." In the fulfillment of that prophecy most of Taylor's story is told.

After the publication in 1844 of a little sheaf of poems entitled Ximena, Taylor went abroad and tramped over Europe, capitalizing his experiences in Views Afoot (1846). In the following years he extended his travels to California on the west and Japan on the east, including a two-thousand mile jaunt across India and fairly extended tours of Greece, Egypt, Lapland, and nearly all of the intervening countries! By virtue of his essays and lectures on his travels, Taylor made a comfortable income, and in addition to building a substantial house at Kennett Square enjoyed leisure for literary work of a less commercial sort. His novels, Hannah Thurston (1863), John Godfrey's Fortunes (1864), The Story of Kennett (1866), and Joseph and his Friend (1870), written at a terrific speed, enjoyed only an ephemeral popularity; but his poems, with which he took the utmost pains, are still read. The appearance of his Faust in 1870 gave Taylor the sort of distinction which fitted him for the diplomatic service, and as a final recognition of the value of his many-sided career he was appointed Minister to Germany in 1878. He had hardly entered upon his duties in Berlin, however, when he was taken ill. He died on December 19, 1878, respected as a man of international distinction and as the author of nearly fifty books.

Taylor's brilliant little volume of parodies in verse, The Echo Club (1872), gives a clue to both his strength and his weakness as a poet: he not only had great skill in the technique of verse but was also a superb imitator, a fact which made his conscious parodies brilliantly successful, but served as a serious handicap when he unconsciously allowed his original work to become distinctively imitative. Even his best known poem, The Bedouin Song (above, p. 554), bears a marked resemblance to Shelley's Indian Serenade. There is, however, a group of simple, realistic studies of rural characters on which his fame may ultimately rest when his more pretentious treatments of exotic subjects have been forgotten: The Quaker Widow (above, p. 555), Jane Reed, John Reed, and The Old Pennsylvania Farmer. Despite the difference in versification, there are many similarities between the artistic mood of these four poems and that of Robert Frost's sketches in North of Boston. It is one of the delightful ironies of life that the poet who traveled the whole world over in search of literary material should do his best work describing the rustic characters of his native village.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Such of Taylor's works as he considered worthy of republication are included in the Household Edition, Boston, 1870, 14 vols. His poems are available in the Household Edition, Boston, 1885, 6 vols. This latter contains the best biography of Taylor, The Life and Letters of Bayard Taylor, by Marie H. Taylor and Horace Scudder, Boston, 1884, 2 vols. His many separate publications are listed in the C. H. A. L.

NOTES

BEDOUIN SONG

554. This poem shows Taylor's most successful "Oriental" vein. It was published in 1854.

THE QUAKER WIDOW

555. Published 1863.
23. A deep concern. A matter requiring religious meditation and action.
28. Benjamin was Hicksite. The two branches of Quakers, Orthodox and Hicksite, were bitter rivals for many years after the separation in 1827-28.
30. Her husband's of the world. He is a non-Quaker.

31. A hireling priest. Orthodox Friends do not approve of paying a salary to ministers. Ruth had apparently been forced out of the Society of Friends for "marrying out of meeting" like Taylor's own grandfather, or had withdrawn voluntarily.

HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW (1807-1882)

One of the most significant facts in the life of Longfellow is that he, like Irving, succeeded in absorbing the best of European culture without giving up his birthright as an American. That birthright he received from his mother, who was a descendant of John Alden; from his father, who was a prominent lawyer of Portland, Maine, and a trustee of Bowdoin College; and from the homely but wholesome associations of life in Northern New England. He was born and brought up in Portland, "the beautiful town that is seated by the sea"—a town small enough and leisurely enough to promote friendliness, yet large enough to possess something of a cosmopolitan outlook. To this he added by his three years at Bowdoin, where among his fellow-students were Hawthorne and Franklin Pierce. His first intimate contact with the culture of Europe came shortly after his graduation in 1825, when, to prepare himself to occupy at his alma mater a professorship of modern languages patterned after that held by Professor George Ticknor at Harvard, he received six hundred dollars a year from the college authorities for three years of study abroad.

Returning from Europe in 1829 with a reading knowledge of German, French, Spanish, and Italian, he taught at Bowdoin with such success that after six years Ticknor recommended him as his successor at Harvard. Accepting this call, Longfellow spent another year in Europe, a year chiefly devoted to study of the literature of the northern peoples. Despite his grief at the illness and death in 1835 of his wife, Mary Storer Potter, whom he had married in 1831, he persisted with his studies, and in 1836 he began his eighteen years of teaching at Harvard. After a third trip to Europe, he married in 1843 Frances Elizabeth Appleton, the woman who was to bear him six children and to make the Craigie House one of the happiest homes in Cambridge. By 1854 his reputation and his income from writing were sufficient to justify him in resigning his chair at Harvard and devoting all his energy to creative work. But in thinking of Longfellow's work as a whole, it must always be borne in mind that for nearly a quarter of a century he taught foreign languages, with such conscientious attention to detail and such strong influence over his students that he shares with Ticknor the honor of having popularized in this country the study of what is today called comparative literature.

It is a pleasure to trace the course by which this much-loved man had come, before he was fifty, to the position of the most popular American poet. His juvenile attempts at verse were followed by the prose sketches of Outre-Mer: a Pilgrimage beyond the Sea (1835) and Hyperion, a sentimental romance also in prose (1839), both of which attracted some little notice. In the latter year there also appeared Voices of the Night, a slender collection of short poems showing the first unmistakable evidence of poetic power. Ballads and other Poems (1841), containing such popular favorites as The Village Blacksmith, The Wreck of the Hesperus, and Excelsior, did more to enhance his reputation than the Poems on Slavery (1842), which lack the vigor of Whittier's similar productions. There followed in rapid succession The Spanish Student (1843), popular at the time notwithstanding its want of dramatic power; The Belfry of Bruges and other Poems (1845), including some of Longfellow's best lyrics; and Evangeline (1847), his narrative masterpiece. The story of Hawthorne's kindness in allowing his classmate to use the literary material out of which Evangeline was built, is well known; but it is worth pausing a moment to reflect on the disastrous results to Longfellow's fame if he had written in prose and made a failure, as he did two years later of Kavanagh: A Tale. The faults of Kavanagh, however, were soon forgotten with the appearance of three more volumes of poetry: The Seaside and the Fireside (1850), best known for The Building of the Ship; The Golden Legend (1851), greatly admired by students of mediæval life; and Hiawatha (1855).

By the time he was fifty, Longfellow was famous all over the United States and western Europe. No longer hampered by the college work which he likened to "a great hand laid on all the strings of my lyre, stopping their vibration," he found time to enjoy more fully the pleasures of Boston society, and of his own home life, without any diminution of poetic energy. Ten thousand copies of The Courtship of Miles Standish (1858) were sold in London alone on the day of its publication; in Boston, five thousand before noon of the first day. The richness of his own life had clearly served to lend a mellowness and a touch of friendly humor to Standish which had not been noticeable in the earlier work, and still greater maturity is evident in his next undertaking, Tales of a Wayside Inn. These excellent short narratives were in large part completed before the shock of his wife's death by fire in 1861, but their publication in book form was delayed until late in 1863.

During the last twenty years of his life Longfellow added two other long pieces to The Golden Legend and published the three together as Christus: A Mystery; he completed his translation of Dante's Divine Comedy, added to the Tales of a Wayside Inn, and was frequently engaged in giving poetical expression to the thoughts of his old age. He did not, however, succeed after the death of his wife in writing, except in a few sonnets, with enough uniform, sustained excellence, to add materially to his reputation. After a fourth and last trip to Europe in 1868-69, when he received academic honors and other tokens of public esteem such as have been accorded to few Americans, he returned to Cambridge. Still loved as a man, still honored for his past work as a teacher, still respected as the leading poet of America, he enjoyed to the full the declining years of his life, and died, after a brief illness, in 1882. He was buried in Mount Auburn, but his bust was placed in Westminster Abbey, and the Longfellow House in Portland has become a Mecca for lovers of poetry.

A few years after Longfellow's death, there set in a reaction against his poetry, a reaction as amazing as had been its early popularity. In part this change was due to an international movement, the swing of the pendulum from subjective sentimentalism across to cold objectivity and cynicism, influencing readers of both verse and prose; lovers of Thomas Hardy were not, by nature, lovers of Longfellow. In part, too, the reaction was a more personal one, affecting Longfellow and Tennyson, who, despite their obvious points of difference, appealed to much the same class of readers. Some of these readers, without being either cold or cynical, turned to Browning, whose vogue increased steadily after his death in 1889; others, to Kipling. Browning's hammer sent out, even from his smoke-obscured smithy, sparks of thought such as Longfellow never produced; while Kipling, with his realistic Tommies and his romantic three-deckers sailing to the Islands of the Blest, showed a vitality which Longfellow, and to some extent Tennyson, had lacked.

But in still larger measure the reaction was against Longfellow's own type of poetry, which was condemned (and with some justice) as unoriginal, didactic, ill-versed, and shallow. The twentieth century lost interest in the Psalm of Life, and found Excelsior less inspiring than A Grammarian's Funeral or, according to taste, Gunga Din. The naïve, lucid style of Hiawatha was discovered to be the result of a constant repetition tiresome to adult readers; and the fact that this style was in keeping with the simplicity of the Indian legends only emphasized the occasional lapses which sometimes make the matter of Hiawatha as tiresome as its manner. The pathos of Evangeline, so these new critics said, was sustained and emphasized by the time-worn devices of the eighteenth-century sentimentalists, and the metrical structure appeared on close analysis to be faulty.

Sophisticated persons discovered that one hasty reading of a short poem enabled them to sound the full depth of its thought, and that the more pretentious poems of Longfellow's later years were scarcely worth reading. So numerous were those who tried to exhibit their own astuteness by picking flaws in his work, that twenty years after his death he had come to be called, in a sense very different from that in which the phrase was originally applied to him, "the Children's Poet."

Longfellow has now been dead not quite fifty years, and the time may not yet be ripe for an exact appraisal of his poetic achievement. But where there has been so much special pleading on both sides, it seems only reasonable to attempt an impartial survey. For a preliminary statement as to what are the poems on which his fame principally rests, no criterion is safer than Dr. Johnson's: "... I rejoice to concur with the common reader; for by the common sense of readers uncorrupted with literary prejudices, after all the refinements of subtlety and the dogmatism of learning, must be finally decided all claim to poetical honors." Applying this test to Longfellow, we find it is generally agreed that the best of the longer poems are Evangeline and Hiawatha. The Courtship of Miles Standish has also enjoyed a considerable popularity, but The Divine Tragedy, The Golden Legend, The New England Tragedies, Judas Maccabæus, and Michael Angelo are practically unknown to "the common reader." Had Longfellow written nothing but Hiawatha, Evangeline, and a few of the short pieces included in this volume, he would have done enough to show America some of the literary methods of Europe, and to show Europe the poetry of America.

The question of originality, in the case of a poet so prolific and so studious of foreign literature, must be considered with impartiality. The day has passed when we can take seriously such an article as Poe's, entitled Longfellow and other Plagiarists. We must bear in mind that, despite his indebtedness to foreign models, Longfellow avoided servile imitation as carefully as he shunned the straining at eccentric originality which has marked the efforts of many more recent poets. If we point out that the metre of Hiawatha is taken from the Kalevala, we must also point out that the Finnish epic would never have been heard of, popularly, in America but for Longfellow's use of it. If we say that The Wreck of the Hesperus is immediately suggestive of Sir Patrick Spens, we must also say it is one of the few successful modern imitations of the old popular ballads. If we seek for the influence of Goethe in Evangeline, and of Leigh Hunt in King Robert of Sicily, we find evidence which, however interesting, only shows that in using the work of other men Longfellow followed the tradition established by Chaucer and Shakespeare.

Longfellow's didacticism is too patent to allow any argument as to the fact of its existence. The question resolves itself into one of individual taste and preference, with the observation that, for a hundred years and more, obvious preaching in verse has been growing less popular. Directly connected with this question, however, is another of perhaps more importance—that of the poet's habitual moral tone. And here there can be no question as to the attitude which Longfellow took. Keeping his simple, undogmatic religion with him day by day, he infused into his poetry a spirit of reverence, of patriotism, of chivalry towards women, and of affection for children, which many other poets of similar Anglo-Saxon stock have failed to express. His poetry suggests a view of life less limited than that of Wordsworth or Bryant; less erotic than that of Burns, Byron, Shelley, and the later "fleshy school of poetry"; less self-obtrusive than that of Whitman. Longfellow's view of life as expressed and implied in the best of his poems is neither very startling nor very profound, but it is so sensible and at times so spiritual that "the common reader" has found it an essential part of his "claim to poetical honors."

From the charge of intellectual shallowness so often brought against Longfellow, it would be futile to attempt to vindicate him completely. The poems do not lure the thoughtful reader back to a third and fourth reading with the certainty that a new search will reveal deeper wells of thought; in appealing to the intellect, they rank higher than those of Poe, but lower than those of Emerson and Browning. On the other hand it would appear that sometimes Longfellow's habitual perspicuity of style has been mistaken for shallowness, as Browning's occasional obscurity of expression has been confused with his depth of thought. Suffice it to say that Longfellow habitually composed the type of poem which is suited to reading to a group, and which contains enough food for thought to satisfy those who hear it for the first time.

It seems unlikely that Longfellow will ever again command quite the attention that he did during his own lifetime. On the other hand, when the history of nineteenth-century literature in America comes to be written from the perspective of some two hundred years, when personal friendships are no longer an influence in its criticism and time has winnowed the chaff from the wheat, it will probably appear that Longfellow did more good work than Lowell, Whittier, or Holmes; that his representative poems are more uniformly excellent than those of Whitman; nearer to the true poetic ideal than the emotional music of Poe. If so, he will again be regarded, as he was in his own day, as the leader among the poets of the period which has come to be called "the Age of Longfellow."

BIBLIOGRAPHY

As is the case with other American writers of importance, the Longfellow bibliography is of such astonishing size that little can be done here except to indicate the most important sources of further information. The special student will consult the C. H. A. L. selective bibliography for detailed suggestions.

EDITIONS. The best relatively inexpensive collected edition of Longfellow is the Riverside, Boston, 1886, 11 vols. This includes his poetry, his prose, and his translation of the Divine Comedy. The best one-volume edition of the poems is the Cambridge, ed. Horace Scudder, Boston, 1893. Longfellow's Boyhood Poems, ed. R. W. Pettengill, Saratoga Springs, 1925, makes accessible a considerable number of poems not included in the collected editions.

BIOGRAPHIES. The most complete biography is Samuel Longfellow's Life of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Boston, 1891, 3 vols. T. W. Higginson's Henry Wadsworth Longfellow (A. M. L. series), Boston, 1902, is the best brief biography.

CRITICAL ARTICLES. Poe's review entitled Longfellow's Ballads, originally printed in Graham's Magazine for March and April 1842, and now included in the Stedman-Hutchinson edition of Poe, vol. 6, p. 120, should be read for the light it throws upon Longfellow's early reputation as well as upon Poe himself. F. L. Pattee's essay, The Shadow of Longfellow, in his Side-Lights on American Literature, 1922, discusses particularly the interesting questions of Longfellow's relations to certain German writers. Bliss Perry's The Centenary of Longfellow, in Park Street Papers, Boston, 1908, and Alfred Noyes's Longfellow and Modern Critics, in Some Aspects of Modern Poetry, N. Y. 1924, are unusually illuminating.

NOTES

HYMN TO THE NIGHT

556. First published in Voices of the Night (1839).
 557. 21. Orestes-like. In Æschylus' drama The Eumenides, Orestes prays for peace and respite from the pursuing furies.

A PSALM OF LIFE

Longfellow kept the poem in manuscript for some time before making it public because it was "a voice from my innermost heart at a time when I was rallying from depression." First published in Voices of the Night.

THE WRECK OF THE HESPERUS

The schooner Hesperus was actually wrecked on the reef of Norman's Woe, near Gloucester. Longfellow noted the fact in his diary for Dec. 17, 1839, and added, "I must write a ballad upon this." Before the month was out he had done so, the actual time of composition being only three hours. It is one of the best of the modern poems written in the manner of traditional ballads such as Sir Patrick Spens. First published in Ballads and Other Poems (1841).

THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH

558. The idea of the poem, which Longfellow called "a new Psalm of Life," came from a scene near his own home in Cambridge. The character of the smith is in part a sketch of the first Stephen Longfellow of Newbury. First published in Ballads and Other Poems.

THE SKELETON IN ARMOR

559. Both the ancient tower at Newport, R. I., and the skeleton in armor discovered near Fall River, Mass., were thought for some time to be Norse. On this slender historical basis Longfellow built his poem. From Ballads and Other Poems.

EXCELSIOR

561. Longfellow's intention in writing the poem was "to display, in a series of pictures, the life of a man of genius, resisting all temptations, laying aside all fears, heedless of all warnings, and pressing right on to accomplish his purpose. His motto is Excelsior—'higher.' He passes through . . . the rough, cold paths of the world; . . . disregards the happiness of domestic peace and sees the glaciers—his fate—before him. He disregards the warning of the old man's wisdom and the fascinations of woman's love. He answers to all, 'Higher yet!' The monks of St. Bernard are the representatives of religious forms and ceremonies, and with their oft-repeated prayer mingles the sound of his voice, telling them there is something higher than forms and ceremonies. Filled with these aspirations, he perishes; without having reached the perfection he longed for; and the voice heard in the air is the promise of immortality and progress ever upward." (From Longfellow's letter to Mr. C. K. Tuckerman.) First printed in Ballads and Other Poems.

SERENADE

From The Spanish Student, I, 3.

THE BELFREY OF BRUGES

In Longfellow's diary for May 30 and 31, 1842, he tells of his delight in hearing the chimes of Bruges, and describes in some detail the carillon—a set of forty-eight bells "with keys like a musical instrument for the carillonneur." This poem stands first in his 1845 volume, The Belfry of Bruges and Other Poems.

THE ARSENAL AT SPRINGFIELD

562. When Longfellow visited the Arsenal at Springfield, Mass., in 1843, in company with his wife, she pointed out that the rows of shining gun-barrels resembled an organ, and urged him to write a poem on peace. The poem was completed some months later, and published in The Belfry of Bruges and Other Poems.

THE DAY IS DONE

563. First published in 1844 as poem to a collection of poems, edited by Longfellow, called The Waif. The verse-form, because of the poet's repeated use of it, has come to be called the "Longfellow stanza."

THE BRIDGE

564. The bridge connected Cambridge and Boston, which are separated by the Charles River. First published in The Belfry of Bruges.

EVANGELINE

Longfellow's first hint of the Evangeline story seems to have come from the Rev. H. L. Conolly, who told Hawthorne of a young Acadian couple separated on their marriage-day by the deportation. The bride searched all over New England for her lover, but found him only on his death-bed. Subsequently Mr. Conolly urged on Hawthorne the value of the story as material for a romance, and repeated it in the presence of Longfellow. Assured that Hawthorne did not wish to make use of the material, Longfellow asked permission to use it himself.

In developing the story, Longfellow greatly extended the geographical range of Evangeline's wanderings, thereby varying the setting. He did not himself visit either Nova Scotia or Louisiana, but described the scenery at second hand from books. The poet had, however, seen and admired the Pennsylvania Hospital, and accordingly laid the closing scene in a Philadelphia almshouse pictured after his memory of the Hospital, but utterly unlike anything that Philadelphia knew at the time of the yellow fever epidemic of 1793.

The historical background of the poem involves the long struggle between France and England for possession of Nova Scotia, which was finally ceded to England in 1713 by the Treaty of Utrecht. The poet has omitted, for obvious reasons, the prolonged bickerings over the reluctance of the French inhabitants to swear allegiance to the British crown, and has given no indication of the moderation of the British government in dealing with its unruly and unwilling subjects. Things went from bad to worse in the colony, till finally the condition was almost that of guerilla warfare. To put an end to this, the Governor, in 1755, deported some 6000 French inhabitants, many of whom necessarily suffered for crimes and misdeeds not their own.

"Of the longer poems of our chief singer," said Holmes, "I should not hesitate to select Evangeline as the masterpiece, and I think the general verdict of opinion would confirm my choice."

The text here reprinted is the first edition, with punctuation somewhat modernized.

Part I

567. 125. "Sunshine of St. Eulalie." Popular superstition held that sunshine on St. Eulalie's Day, Feb. 12, promised a plentiful supply of apples.
569. 243. Filled the barn with hay. The young men of an Acadian village made it a custom to build a house for a newly married couple and to supply them with the necessities of life for a year.
570. 287. "Once in an ancient city." Florence.

Part II

578. 48. To braid St. Catherine's tresses. The occupation, according to a popular French saying, of a girl who did not marry.
585. 368. A silent Carthusian. This order of monks (founded by St. Bruno in 1086) made silence a part of the rigid discipline imposed on its members.
379. "Upharsin." The handwriting on the wall, seen by King Nebuchadnezzar, was MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN. The incident is told in the fifth chapter of Daniel.
588. 561. Nepenthe. A drug or drink causing forgetfulness of sorrow.
590. 633. A pestilence fell on the city. Philadelphia suffered a plague of yellow fever in 1793.

THE SONG OF HIAWATHA

592. One of Longfellow's own notes serves as the best brief introduction:—"This Indian Edda—if I may so call it—is founded on a tradition, prevalent among the North American Indians, of a personage of miraculous birth, who was sent among them to clear their rivers, forests, and fishing-grounds, and to teach them the arts of peace. He was known among different tribes by the several names of Michabou, Chiabo, Manabozo, Tarenyawagon and Hiawatha. Mr. Schoolcraft gives an account of him in his Algic Researches, vol. I, p. 134; and in his History, Condition, and Prospects of the Indian Tribes of the United States, Part III, p. 314, may be found the Iroquois form of the tradition, derived from the verbal narration of an Onondaga chief.

"Into this old tradition I have woven other curious Indian legends, drawn chiefly from the various and valuable writings of Mr. Schoolcraft, to whom the literary world is greatly indebted for his indefatigable zeal in rescuing from oblivion so much of the legendary lore of the Indians.

"The scene of the poem is among the Ojibways on the southern shore of Lake Superior, in the region between the Pictured Rocks and the Grand Sable." (—Cambridge Edition, p. 664.)

Longfellow made no secret of the fact that the metrical form of the poem was suggested to him by reading the Finnish epic Kalevala. His indebtedness to various authors was, in fact, so obvious that charges of plagiarism were brought against him; but his original contribution was relatively so great that the poem is now regarded as one of his most considerable achievements. Longfellow accordingly shares with Cooper the honor of having successfully brought the American Indian into literature.

The poem was first published in 1855.

MY LOST YOUTH

600. The poem, written in Cambridge at the end of March, 1855, is accurately reminiscent of Longfellow's early life in Portland, where he lived until he entered Bowdoin College.
601. 37. The sea-fight. In 1813 the American brig Enterprise, after an engagement of forty-five minutes, captured and towed into Portland Harbor the English brig Boxer. Both captains were killed, and their bodies were buried ashore, side by side.

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR

11. Grave Alice. Longfellow here uses the actual names of his daughters.
602. 28. Mouse-Tower. Tradition relates that Archbishop Hatto, in the tenth century, burned alive in a barn a number of peasants caught stealing grain in time of famine. As a punishment, it is said that he was pursued by mice and that he built the tower near Bingen in a vain attempt to escape being eaten by them. Southey has put the story into verse in his poem God's Judgement on a Wicked Bishop.

PAUL REVERE'S RIDE

This is the Landlord's Tale, the first of several stories connected somewhat in the general manner of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, and together making up the Tales of a Wayside Inn. The "Wayside Inn" was the old Red-Horse Inn at Sudbury, Mass., and the story-tellers, including the Landlord, Mr. Howe, were the poet's personal friends. (See the Cambridge Edition, p. 204.) The first group of tales was published in 1863; others were added in 1872 and 1873.

31. The tower of Old North Church. Longfellow himself climbed the tower, as recorded in his diary for April 3, 1860. There is, however, some doubt as to which church was used for the signals.

KING ROBERT OF SICILY

604. This is The Sicilian's Tale from the first group of Tales of a Wayside Inn. Although the story has been told many times and in many languages, it is probable that Longfellow's source was Leigh Hunt's prose Legend of King Robert in his Jar of Honey from Mount Hybla.
606. 110. Enceladus. A mythical hundred-armed giant killed by Zeus and buried under Mt. Etna.

WEARINESS

607. First published in 1863.

DIVINA COMMEDIA

608. During the dark years after the death of his wife, by fire, in 1861, Longfellow sought refuge from his grief in translating Dante's Divine Comedy—a prolonged task for which his ability as linguist and poet admirably fitted him. The first and second of these sonnets prefaced his translation of the Inferno; the third and fourth, that of the Purgatorio; and the fifth and sixth, that of the Paradiso. Taken together, they form a brief sonnet sequence, of which the principal ideas are these: I. The Divine Comedy likened to a cathedral where Longfellow rests and prays. (The figure is maintained throughout Sonnets I-V.) II. The marvelous variety in the Divine Comedy, and the varied emotions with which Dante must have written it. III. The benediction that comes to Longfellow as he follows Dante (by translating the Divine Comedy). IV. Beatrice and her benignant influence on Dante. V. The triumph of Dante's achievement likened to the celebration of the Mass. VI. The Greatness of Dante as a "bringer of the light" to all the world.

Clearly this suffering Longfellow, "stretched upon the cross," had greater poetic power than the facile and sometimes superficial Longfellow of earlier days.

IV

2. She stands. Beatrice.
609. 12. Lethe and Eunoë. The rivers of Forgetfulness and of Knowledge.

V

4. The Great Rose. The circular or rose window at the end of the nave.
14. The elevation of the Host. The climax in the celebration of the Mass.

CHAUCEUR

Written 1873.

THE CROSS OF SNOW

610. Written 1879. The death of Mrs. Longfellow occasioned the poem.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL (1819-1891)

James Russell Lowell, the son of a Unitarian minister, was born in 1819, at Elmwood, the ancestral home in Cambridge, where he was to spend most of his life. (See Aldrich's poem, Elmwood, p. 1020, above.) He was descended from a line of distinguished Massachusetts ancestors, the first of whom had come to America in 1639. He grew up in the atmosphere of a home where books were plentiful, and made his father's study, with its four thousand volumes lining the shelves, both his playroom and his schoolroom. When he entered Harvard College with the class of 1838, Lowell found himself in a group of students whose special interest was poetry; they read Keats, Shelley, and Byron with enthusiasm, and were among the first Americans to recognize merit in the early work of Tennyson and Browning. Lowell's own ability as poet developed while he was an undergraduate, and his contributions to the college magazines met with such favor that in his senior year he was elected Class Poet.

Just before the close of the senior year Lowell was "rusticated" by the college authorities—a fact which gains a certain humorous piquancy when one considers the eminence he was subsequently to attain as poet, essayist, editor, diplomat, and teacher. The young man who was suspended from Harvard "on account of continued neglect of college duties," and thereby prevented from reading his class poem, had not developed the moral stamina and intellectual energy which later in life were to dominate his poetry, to make him scrupulously conscientious as teacher and editor, and to enable him to solve questions of political ethics which perplexed the diplomats of Europe. And it is highly improbable that the youth who spent the last weeks of his college course in disgraceful rustication in Concord, had any idea that before long he would be recalled to Harvard as Smith Professor of Belles Lettres.

The years from 1838 to 1844 began with a critical conflict in his life between law and letters, with the degree of LL.B. from Harvard in 1840 indicating an apparent victory for the law. But the young attorney soon found that his own taste, as well as the influence of his friends, was all towards poetry; and with his engagement in 1840 to Maria White, a brilliant young woman who was herself a poet, he inclined more and more towards making literature his profession rather than his avocation. During these years of vacillation he published two volumes of verse—A Year's Life (1840), and Poems (1844),—the second of which may fairly be called significant. He also undertook to edit, with Robert Carter, a magazine called The Pioneer; and though the venture was short-lived, it brought Lowell into contact with such contributors as Hawthorne, Poe, and Whittier. Thus by the time of his marriage in 1844, he had completed his literary apprenticeship, and was ready to earn a living by his pen.

The agitation which preceded and accompanied the Mexican War found Lowell vigorous in opposition to slavery, and to those politicians who were fomenting the war for the purpose of bringing new slave territory into the Union. The first series of Biglow Papers (1846) was the immediate result of his anger at the way the nation was being led into hostilities, and won for Lowell a nation-wide audience. From this time on his productivity was astonishing. So far as poetry is concerned, his annus mirabilis was 1848, when he collected in book form the first series of Biglow Papers, and published in addition his Poems, Second Series, A Fable for Critics, and The Vision of Sir Launfal,—all this besides a considerable amount of prose. He thus showed, before he was thirty, a poetic skill which he was later to surpass only in the Commemoration Ode, and a breadth of range as astonishing as it is characteristic. While men like Poe, Whitman, or Bryant, had each his own easily recognizable style, Lowell fitted from literary satire to political satire and on to narrative and lyric with a variety of treatment which makes generalization difficult.

From 1848 to the end of his long life, he continued to write poetry of a high order; and once, when the death of Lincoln and the emotions incident to the conclusion of the Civil War stirred him deeply, he rose to greater heights than have often been attained in America.

Although it has been stated that Lowell reached virtually his full stature as poet by 1848, the years from 1851 to 1857 mark a new period of development in general maturity, and particularly in critical power. Two long European trips, devoted chiefly to study, immensely broadened his knowledge of world literature; the series of lectures on literary topics which he delivered at the Lowell Institute in 1855 further prepared the way for years of success as a writer of essays in criticism. Whether it was the death of his wife in 1853, or some other cause, that turned him more and more to study, the fact remains that from then on he was increasingly prolific as a writer of prose. Beginning modestly enough by assisting Professor Child with an edition of the British Poets, he continued year by year to write biographical and critical essays which, despite the quantity of new information available to succeeding scholars, are still read with delight.

At the time of his second marriage, to Frances Dunlap, in 1857, Lowell entered upon two decades during which he was perhaps the most influential man of letters in America. His reputation as poet was secure, and he and his wife gathered around them at Elmwood a circle of friends on whom his direct influence was considerable. But there were other outlets for his literary talent. In 1855 he had been chosen to succeed Longfellow as Smith Professor at Harvard, and spent two years in European study in preparation for the work. In 1857 he began teaching, and at the same time undertook the editorship of the new Atlantic Monthly. Two years later he left the Atlantic and joined Charles Eliot Norton in editing the North American Review, and continued that connection for ten years. There seems to have been virtually no limit to his energy or ability. He published many volumes of critical essays and poetry, at the same time that his varied activities brought him an international reputation which made possible his subsequent successful career as a diplomat.

Of the later years of his life, when he was Minister to Spain (1877-1880), and then to England (1880-1885), space permits one to say only that he was loved and honored abroad as he had been at home, and to record Queen Victoria's statement that "During my reign no ambassador or minister has created so much interest or won so much regard." His address entitled Democracy (above, p. 646) was only one of many successful attempts to interpret to the old world the ideals of the new. Such an address—or that on Lincoln—gives the last bit of evidence necessary to establish his position as the most versatile among the greater American men of letters. After retiring from the diplomatic service, Lowell traveled extensively, and then returned to Elmwood, where he died in 1891.

It is perhaps unfortunate that to most people Lowell is known chiefly through his poetry, which, despite its admirable qualities, reveals only one side of his genius. All that is best in men like Burns and Byron and Shelley is revealed by their poetry; further study brings to light little that is valuable. But with Lowell the case is different. He was brilliantly successful as teacher and editor, and his prose work demands as much praise as the best of his verse. Finally, he was himself one of the few international Americans, a man at home in the libraries as well as the courts of the old world, but firmly rooted in the soil of the western continent, and as fine a representative of that new civilization as either Lincoln or Emerson.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. Shortly before Lowell's death, Houghton Mifflin brought out the Riverside Edition of his collected works, in ten volumes. In 1904 the same publishers issued the somewhat more inclusive Elmwood Edition, 16 vols., which contains four volumes of letters. The most useful one-volume edition of the poems is the Cambridge, ed. Horace Scudder, Boston, 1897.

BIOGRAPHIES. The standard life is still Horace Scudder's James Russell Lowell, Boston, 1901, 2 vols. Ferris Greenslet's James Russell Lowell: His Life and Work, Boston, 1905, is the best of the briefer biographies.

CRITICAL ARTICLES. Of the many critical articles the following will be of interest to any student of Lowell: Poe's Poems by James Russell Lowell, first published in Graham's Magazine for March, 1844, and his caustic review of the Fable for Critics, published in the Southern Literary Messenger, February, 1849, and included in the Stedman-Woodberry edition of Poe, vol. VI, p. 240; Henry James's essay in the Atlantic, January, 1892; Charles Eliot Norton's in Harper's Magazine, May, 1893; and two articles, interesting because of their British point of view, in the Edinburgh Review for October, 1891, and January, 1900.

NOTES

SONG

610. This lyric was one of many poems which Lowell wrote during the five years of his betrothal to Maria White, whom he met Dec. 1, 1839, and married Dec. 26, 1844.

SONNET: WENDELL PHILLIPS

Published in 1843, when Phillips (1811-1884) was the greatest orator among the abolitionists.

RHÆCUS

The poem—published in 1843—should be compared with Walter Savage Landor's Hamadryad, a rendering of of the same fable, which was published three years after Rhæcus. Landor gives the story for its own sake without the moral.

COLUMBUS

613. Written in 1844, two years after the appearance of Tennyson's Ulysses, by which Lowell was doubtless influenced. Compare Joaquin Miller's Columbus, p. 1032, above.
615. 110. Pharos. The site of a world-famous lighthouse in Egypt.
616. 158. Laocoön. The metaphor of the snake is inevitable in view of the popularity of the Laocoön group of statuary.
185. The Tuscan. Dante.
189. The wise Athenian. Plato tells of the lost continent of Atlantis.
190. Bjorne. Bjarni Herjulfson (variously spelled), who is traditionally credited with the discovery of Vinland, some fifteen years before the voyage of Leif Ericsson.
193. Nero's tutor-victim. Lucius Seneca (3 B. C.-65 A. D.), a Roman statesman, philosopher, and writer. When Nero was eleven years old Seneca was appointed his tutor; seventeen years later his former pupil, then Emperor, forced him to commit suicide.
203. Simeon. St. Simeon Stylites, a Syrian ascetic of the fifth century, who lived on top of a pillar.

TO THE DANDELION

617. First published in 1845.
618. 26. Sybaris. Lowell probably refers to the ancient city of southern Italy, famous for its luxury, rather than to the fountain or river of the same name.

THE BIGLOW PAPERS

The publication of the Biglow Papers, of which the first series appeared in the Boston Courier, 1846-1848, and the second in the Atlantic Monthly, 1862-1866, was an important episode in the life of Lowell, in the history of American literature, and in the struggle against slavery. These racy satirical comments on politics brought the poet his first wide popularity; they have endured as poetry because of their cleverness, and because of the glowing intensity with which they express Lowell's hatred of injustice and oppression. Though Lowell's opposition to the Mexican War—an opposition which is obvious in the entire first series—was futile, the first series was influential in strengthening the determination of the North to resist any further extension of slavery; the second did much to unite the North in opposition to secession.

Number I

A cruetin Sarjunt. A recruiting sergeant, enlisting volunteers for the Mexican War. Hosea's reaction to the situation is, of course, Lowell's.

619. 33. Ez fer war, I call it murder. Lowell's categorical statement should be interpreted in the light of his own conduct. He believed that war in the abstract was unjustifiable. When, however, the situation in 1861 made it necessary to engage in war, Lowell was quite willing to lay aside his theoretical objections and face the existing situation. No more staunch supporter of the Union cause could have been found than this man who fifteen years before had branded war as "murder."

Number III

621. 1. Guvener B. George N. Briggs, Governor of Massachusetts from 1844-1851, defeated "Gineral C" (General Caleb Cushing) in the campaign, despite the fact that John P. Robinson, an influential Whig, went over to the Democrats.

SHE CAME AND WENT

622. First published 1849.

A FABLE FOR CRITICS

622. Numerous forerunners of the Fable could be mentioned, among the most prominent being Pope's Dunciad and Byron's English Bards and Scotch Reviewers. An admirable recent imitation is Miss Amy Lowell's A Critical Fable (1923), in which she discussed contemporary poets as Lowell had commented on those of his own day.

To the Reader. As an illustration of his whimsical statement that his own style "is neither good verse nor bad prose," Lowell has printed this Preface as prose, though it has a vigorous poetic rhythm and an easily detectable rime-scheme.

623. 553. Plotinus. An Egyptian philosopher of the third century. Montaigne. A French philosopher and essayist (1553-1592).

558. Never a doorway to get in a god. Not an altogether fair statement, yet touching one of Emerson's recognized peculiarities.

624. 818. Griswold says so. Rufus W. Griswold (1815-1857), an influential critic and editor. For several years he was connected with Graham's Magazine. His Poets and Poetry of America (1842) was the work to which Lowell probably had reference.

625. 830. Ices. A pun on Isis, a goddess of the Egyptians.

873. Hesiod. An early Greek poet, whose Works and Days abounds with proverbial wisdom. The specific reference is to a rather cryptic passage (140): "Fools! They know not by how much the half is greater than the whole."

898. Like old what's-his-name. Taillefer, a minstrel, is said to have chanted the Norman army to victory at the battle of Hastings (1066). He sang "of Charlemagne, and of Roland, and of Oliver, and of the knights who died at Ronceval."

626. 904. Anne haec, etc. Is this indeed the dress of thy son?

905. Leather-clad Fox. George Fox (1624-1691), the founder of the Society of Friends. Popular report credited him with making for himself a suit of leathern clothes, in order to be freed from concern about dress. See Carlyle's chapter, Incident in Modern History, in Sartor Resartus.

1008. Fouqué. Friedrich Heinrich Karl Fouqué (1777-1843), a German poet and novelist. Tieck. Ludwig Tieck (1773-1853), a German novelist.

1021. Cooper. The reference is to Cooper's controversial works, especially, his accounts of his European travels, and such a novel as Home as Found.

1036. Natty Bumppo. The hero of the Leatherstocking Tales.

627. 1037. Long Toms. Long Tom Coffin is a character in The Pilot.

1060. Adams; Primrose. Parson Adams is one of the characters in Fielding's Joseph Andrews; Primrose is the central figure in Goldsmith's The Vicar of Wakefield.

1305. You musn't fling mud-balls at Longfellow so. A reference to Poe's ill-considered article, Longfellow and Other Plagiarists.

1318. Greek metres in English. Lowell's opinion of Evangeline is now generally accepted: that the poem is successful in spite of the meter.

628. 1331. Theocritus. The earliest of the Greek pastoral poets. He wrote ca. 260 B. C.

1581. There's Lowell. Lowell's self-criticism is severe but in general accord with the facts. His early work especially suffers from excessive "preaching."

THE FIRST SNOW-FALL

In March, 1847, Lowell was saddened by the death of his daughter Blanche, aged fourteen months; but in September of the same year the birth of another daughter, Mabel, brought him some consolation. This poem was written in 1849.

THE WASHERS OF THE SHROUD

629. The poem was begun Oct. 7, 1861, and printed in the November Atlantic

Monthly. At that time Fort Sumter had surrendered, and the Northern troops had been defeated at Bull Run and elsewhere. Lowell's own nephews were at the front. The atmosphere of grim foreboding is excellently created by the use of Teutonic mythology: Odin is the ruler of the gods, and Thor is the god of thunder; but the destiny of men lies chiefly in the hands of the three sisters, Udur, Verdandi, and Skuld. (Cf. the Witches in Macbeth and Gray's Fatal Sisters, and see Professor F. E. Farley's Scandinavian Influences in the English Romantic Movement.) The "mystic Tree" is the Tree Igrasil. These grim sisters wove a web of fate, but Lowell has slightly popularized the mythology by references to the better known corresponding divinities of Greece—the three Fates who spun, measured, and cut the thread of life.

630. 50. Hesper. The evening star, which always appears in the west. Here it signifies the United States.

631. 107. Dear ones by Potomac's side. The poet's "passionate pain" was destined to grow more tragic; three of his nephews (Charles Russell Lowell, James Jackson Lowell, and William Lowell Putnam) were killed during the Civil War.

THE BIGLOW PAPERS

SECOND SERIES

The general facts about the Biglow Papers are given in the notes to the First Series, above, p. 1172. This second series was occasioned by the Civil War, as the first had been by the Mexican.

The Courtin'

This little romance in the vernacular, a sort of interlude between discussions of politics, proved to be one of Lowell's most popular poems. It originally appeared, in a shorter form, in the First Series, but was later expanded and included in the Second.

632. 95. They was cried. The marriage banns were published.

Jonathan to John

Early in 1862 Lowell voiced this protest against the British policy during the war. The feeling on both sides had been rendered tense by the Mason and Slidell episode, by the conceding of belligerent rights to the Confederacy, and by the moral support given the South by English cotton interests. This support, Lowell said, was worth an army of two hundred thousand men.

25. Vattel. A Swiss statesman and jurist (1714-1767), best known for his Droit des Gens (1758).

633. 64. We give the critters back. Mason and Slidell, Confederate agents, had been removed from a British vessel by a United States man-of-war. The British protest against this violation of their sovereignty resulted in the release of the two men.

Sunthin in the Pastoral Line

634. No. VI of the second series of Biglow Papers, published 1862.

COMMEMORATION ODE

639. When Harvard University planned a commemoration service in honor of her sons killed in the war, Lowell was asked to write a poem for the occasion. He accepted the commission, but found it far more difficult to execute than he had anticipated. After a long period of hesitation, he finally composed the Ode in the two days preceding the exercises, but found himself exhausted by the ordeal. Witnesses testify to the fact that his reading, before the great audience, was effective; it is clear, however, that much of it must inevitably have been perplexing to any audience which was listening to it for the first time. Fully to appreciate it, one must make it the object of careful study. For detailed information concerning both the occasion and the poem, see Scudder's life of Lowell, II, 63f.

640. 37. The Veritas. The Harvard motto, "Truth."

641. 150. Our martyr chief. The stanza on Lincoln was not part of the original poem, but was added immediately afterwards.

643. 246. Dear ones. His three nephews (see note on line 107 of The Washers of the Shroud) and several other relatives were among the dead.

253. The grapes of Canaan. Carrying out the reference of line 232 to "the Promised Land," according to the Biblical story told in Numbers, XIII, 17-26.

644. 329. Who now shall sneer? In connection with this whole strophe, Lowell wrote: "I confess I have never got over the feeling of wrath with which (just after the death of my nephew Willie) I read in an English paper that nothing was to be hoped of an army officered by tailors' apprentices and butcher boys."

645. 383. Banners adance. The obvious meaning is "dancing with triumph," but many texts have incorrectly printed advance.

AFTER THE BURIAL

646. Six stanzas of this poem were written in 1850, after the death of Lowell's daughter Rose. It was completed in 1868, when his first wife and three of their four children were dead.

DEMOCRACY

This, the best known of Lowell's English addresses, was delivered on October 6, 1884, at his inauguration as president of the Birmingham and Midland Institute. Despite the limitations imposed by his official position as American Minister—perhaps because of them—he discussed the broad principles of democratic government with an incisive wisdom that has not been surpassed. The first two paragraphs are of no lasting significance, but the personal note in such an introduction was doubtless useful in catching the attention of the audience.

648. b. 30. Forgetting Purke's admonition. In his Speech on Conciliation with the American Colonies.
649. b. 2. A Father of the Church. St. Ambrose (?340-397), Bishop of Milan.
- b. 4. Proudhon.* Pierre Joseph Proudhon (1809-1865) made famous the doctrine that "property is theft." See the first paragraph of his essay What is Property?
- b. 36. The sores of Lazarus.* The story of the rich man and Lazarus is to be found in Luke, XVI, 19-31.
650. a. 29. Polonius. See Hamlet, II, 2.
- a. 37. The wicked and the weak.* Slightly misquoted from Coleridge's France: an Ode; stanza 5:

The sensual and the dark rebel in vain,
Slaves by their own compulsion.

- b. 43. The Thane of Cawdor.* See Macbeth, II, 2.
651. a. 10. Ichabod. A common term of regret, from the Biblical use in connection with the loss of the ark. See I Samuel, IV, 21.
- a. 40. Priestley.* Joseph Priestley (1733-1804), an English scientist and prominent Unitarian. Because he sympathized with the French Revolution, his house was wrecked by a Birmingham mob. Later he came to the United States.
652. a. 21. Jellaladeen. Jelâl-ed-dîn, a Persian poet of the middle of the thirteenth century.
- b. 44. The Rights of Man.* A political treatise by Thomas Paine. See the note on Paine, p. 1120, above.
654. b. 6. That white-haired king of Brownings. The quotation is from one of the songs in Pippa Passes.
655. b. 9. Those who have the divine right to govern. Such a sentence as this shows how close Lowell was, in some respects, to Carlyle's position half a century before. On many matters, however, the two men would have been in sharp disagreement.

656. a. 38. Hudson, the railway king. The statue was not erected because Hudson's dishonorable business methods were brought to light. The facts were well known to Lowell's audience.
657. b. 3. A very sagacious person. Dogberry, the rustic constable in Much Ado about Nothing. See Act III, 5.
- b. 11. Mr. George. Henry George* (1839-1897), best known for his Progress and Poverty.

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER
(1807-1892)

The three periods into which Whittier's life naturally falls have much in common, respectively, with certain phases in the lives of Burns, Milton, and Longfellow. During his youth he struggled against the hardships of living on a Massachusetts farm, hampered by poverty and frail health, much as Burns had struggled in Scotland, yet finding time, like him, for occasional bursts of song. Throughout the second part of his life he put his able pen at the service of the cause of abolition, and, like Milton in support of the Puritan movement, sacrificed art to duty. After the fight against slavery had been won, he entered, like Longfellow, upon a peaceful old age devoted to the pursuit of literature and to the enjoyment of those honors which sometimes come towards the close of life to a great and good man.

Descended from a long line of Massachusetts Quakers, Whittier was born at Haverhill in 1807. The farm on which he spent his early years was so isolated that no other dwelling was in sight, and the drive to the Friends' Meeting at Amesbury, which the Whittiers attended twice each week, was eight miles. The books that he read in his own home were the Bible and some thirty other volumes—chiefly Quaker journals. The suffering from cold, from poverty, and from overwork, which was the common lot of the whole family, is reflected in the pages of Snow-Bound; but the mist of years had softened the harsh tones of the picture for the poet, much as it had done for Burns when he wrote The Cotter's Saturday Night. There was much of farming, much of Quaker discipline, little of schooling and little of pleasure; yet these early years prepared the way for a long life of unusual spirituality and self-sacrifice. At the age of fourteen Whittier came for the first time to know the songs of the Scottish poet to whom he has so often been compared, and within a few years his own youthful verses, obviously imitated from Burns and Byron, were being published by William Lloyd Garrison in the Newburyport Free Press. How he divided his time for the next few years among shoe-making, studying, farming, teaching, and editing, is well known. The friendship of Garrison was a constant stimulus to his literary efforts, but still more of an influence in making him an active abolitionist. By the age of twenty-five he had shown some promise as a poet, but had published nothing of great merit.

Despite his two youthful ambitions, to be a successful poet and a successful politician, Whittier was so thoroughgoing a Quaker that he followed the "inner light" along paths which made the middle period of his life one of singular difficulty. A consistent pacifist, he was bound to find some of his views unpopular, as the issues between North and South became increasingly clear. By deliberately choosing the rôle of an abolitionist of the non-militant type he cut himself off from all hope of a successful political career, and at the same time brought into his life elements of discord which were almost incompatible with the writing of poetry. In spite of this handicap, however, he produced between 1833 and 1865 several of his best narrative poems and a quantity of anti-slavery verse, of which some has permanent value; but during these years he was for the most part one

Who, with a mission to fulfil,
Had left the Muses' haunts to turn
The crank of an opinion-mill.

His varied and consistently unselfish political activities throughout this period of his life moulded and deepened his character much as the character of Milton was affected by the turmoil of the Civil War in England. His persistence in attending anti-slavery conventions despite the mob-violence suffered at Philadelphia and Concord, N. H., and his ceaseless editorial efforts to spread abolitionist propaganda, can only be suggested in so brief a survey as this; yet in taking account of his influence on the thought of his country, they must not be forgotten. By 1857 he had come to occupy a position of such respect as thinker and writer that he became one of the contributors to the new Atlantic Monthly, where he had for the first time a worthy medium of publicity. With the ratification of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery in 1865, he published his triumphant hymn of praise, Laus Deo, and thus brought to a close the period of dedication to national service which had begun more than thirty years before with his public tribute To William Lloyd Garrison.

At the close of the Civil War Whittier found himself at length free to turn from propaganda to poetry, and, like Longfellow, he lived to enjoy to the full "the last of life, for which the first was made." Despite the depth of his grief at the death of his sister, Elizabeth, who, as Whittier never married, had been a singularly close companion, he was serene in his peaceful happiness. Almost immediately he took a high place among the poets of America by writing, before the end of 1868, five of his masterpieces: The Eternal Goodness, Snow-Bound, Our Master, The Tent on the Beach, and Among the Hills. The profits from the sale of Snow-Bound were enough to make him financially independent, and the degree of LL.D., conferred upon him by Harvard in 1866, was only a formal recognition of the esteem in which he had already come to be held throughout New England. Though he did not mingle in metropolitan society to the extent that Longfellow did, he counted among his friends many of the leading writers of the time—among others, Longfellow, Lowell, Holmes, Stedman, and Bayard Taylor. From his own home in Amesbury, he made frequent visits to relatives in other parts of New England, and in summer he enjoyed to the full the peace of the hills of New Hampshire and of the coast between Portsmouth and Newburyport. Wherever he went he was loved, and was honored quite as much for the dignity and spirituality of his life as for the poetic ability which each new volume of poetry made manifest. These later volumes contain, happily, much of his autobiography and of his personality. They have served—from Snow-Bound to the last, privately-printed collection, At Sundown—as a revelation of character so intimate as to be the best record of his life. His death, in 1892, was an experience for which he was prepared, and which he anticipated in a mood perfectly expressed in one of his last poems, Burning Drift-Wood:

I know the solemn monotone
Of waters calling unto me;
I know from whence the airs have blown
That whisper of the Eternal Sea.

As low my fires of drift-wood burn,
I hear the sea's deep sounds increase,
And, fair in sunset light, discern
Its mirage-lifted Isles of Peace.

Before attempting a criticism of Whittier's poetry, it is well to clarify a certain vagueness in the popular conception of his views on war and on religion. Although Snow-Bound and the historical ballads speak for themselves, the religious poems and those against slavery require a sympathetic understanding. It must always be borne in mind that Whittier was a pacifist of the best Quaker type; if his blood sometimes ran warm (as it unquestionably did) at a story of military prowess, he nevertheless felt about war much as the rest of the world has already come to feel about duelling—that of all methods of trying to decide questions of right and wrong, the use of weapons is the worst. He was not, however, one to let such questions go undecided. On the contrary, he felt it a matter of conscience to be a strong controversialist and to make the better reason triumph over the worse. This spirit of intellectual militancy, so evident in his abolitionist writings, is also to be found in many of his most deeply religious poems. The spirit is hardly compatible with the popular conception of pacifism, but it is entirely so with the type of pacifism which Whittier avowed. It must also be understood that Whittier followed what Quakers call "the inner light"—a direct guidance of man by God, of a mystical sort which finds the intervention of a priest and the tenets of an inflexible creed equally distasteful.

With these considerations in mind one can better understand the poems themselves. Of those written in opposition to slavery, the majority have at least one poetic quality: a glowing intensity. When to this intensity is joined the dignity of expression of which Whittier was capable, and when the subject is one of more than local interest, then the resulting production has real value as poetry. All the fervor of a Hebrew prophet pulses in Massachusetts to Virginia. Something of greatness, too, pervades the more kindly lines of Brown of Ossawatimie. In Ichabod, Whittier's burning indignation at what he considered Webster's apostasy lifts the verse far above the level of personal invective. At the lowest estimate, the poems just mentioned, together with the address to Garrison, Laus Deo, and a few others, suffice to show that Whittier could achieve distinction in a sort of verse at which Longfellow, for instance, had tried his hand and virtually failed.

In the field of brief narrative poems, Whittier had an unqualified success. The vigor of Skipper Ireson's Ride, Barbara Frietchie, and The Pipes at Lucknow, is no less effective than the quiet charm of his descriptive and reflective poems. Indeed, it is hard to find any American poet who has written better ballads than Whittier's.

If, however, Whittier's fame were to rest on a single poem, the universal choice would undoubtedly be Snow-Bound. As the explanatory notes in this volume show, the poem is largely autobiographical; in this connection it inevitably brings to mind The Deserted Village and The Cotter's Saturday Night. From memories of his own childhood, Goldsmith constructed a series of artistic sketches, of which those of the Parson and the Schoolmaster will always be remembered. Burns, with minute fidelity, gave an idealized picture of a single evening in the home of a Scottish peasant. Whittier enlarged the scope of his poem to include more than a whole day, and thus brought together a considerable number of pictures reminiscent of his own early life. That Snow-Bound is somewhat diffuse, and that its different parts are of unequal merit, will probably be admitted by its warmest admirers. Yet the poem gains more than it loses by its length;

it makes us so intimately acquainted with the Whittier household, and creates so perfectly the atmosphere of home life, that after more than half a century it still stands as a masterpiece of description and of characterization—a poem "notable," as Mr. Bliss Perry says, "not so much for sensuous beauty or for any fresh range of thought, as for its vividness, its fidelity of homely detail, its unerring feeling for the sentiment of the hearth-side."

The title Religious Poems, prefixed by Whittier to a group of seventy-five pieces, suggests indirectly the patent fact that the tone of his whole poetic output is "religious." This religious spirit is to be found, for example, in Snow-Bound, in the anti-slavery poems, and in the collection At Sundown (the benediction at the end of his life), almost as much as in poems chosen at random from this specially classified group. Within this limited group, however, there are several points worthy of note: One is the persistence with which Whittier combatted the idea of a God of Vengeance—a Calvinistic conception to which many of his contemporaries still clung; poems like The Minister's Daughter and The Meeting—to mention only two among many—are so controversial as to be almost satiric. Again, it should be remembered that passages from Whittier are used as hymns even in churches whose creeds and ritual the poet attacked with vigor. Finally, there is the generally recognized truth that Our Master is one of the most spiritual poems in our language. Here Whittier succeeded in giving utterance to ideas which are fundamental in the simple Quaker faith, and which for the most part are shared by all Christians. The message of the poem—that of love from God to man, from man to God, and from man to man—was the motivating force of his own life; it moulded his views on race problems and on war; it gave him courage for self-sacrifice; it brought him in happiness to a serene old age, in which he was universally loved as man and as poet.

Despite the fact that some of Whittier's work is marred by bad rimes (though it should be noted that the inaccuracy often disappears when one pronounces the rime-words as they were pronounced in eastern Massachusetts), despite the fact that he devoted much of his energy to polemics rather than to poetry, and that his work is lacking in both the originality and depth that mark the greatest literature, nevertheless Whittier wrote enough poetry distinguished by simple beauty, rugged strength, and sincere religious feeling, to assure him a position among the chief American poets. If we add to this achievement his political activity from 1833 to 1865, his relative success in writing historical essays, and his permanent influence on our religious thought, it becomes self-evident that he will always hold a place of high honor among American men of letters.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The Whittier bibliography in the C. H. A. L. should be consulted by any student who wishes more than the most obvious suggestions such as are here set down.

EDITIONS. The Riverside Edition, Boston, 1888, 7 vols., is an admirable collected edition of Whittier's work. The best one-volume edition of the poetry is the Cambridge, ed. Horace Scudder, Boston, 1894.

BIOGRAPHIES. Either George D. Carpenter's John Greenleaf Whittier (A. M. L. series), Boston, 1903, or T. W. Higginson's John Greenleaf Whittier (E. M. L. series), N. Y. 1902, is an admirable brief biography. The most exhaustive treatment is S. T. Pickard's The Life and Letters of John Greenleaf Whittier, Boston, revised edition 1907, 2 vols.

NOTES

TO WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON

658. This poem, read at the Anti-Slavery Convention at Philadelphia, December, 1833, is more than a tribute to a personal friend. It marks Whittier's formal avowal of the principles of abolition.

PENTUCKET

659. The town is now called Haverhill. Whittier gives another account of this attack in his prose article entitled The Border War of 1708. The poem was written in 1838.

MASSACHUSETTS TO VIRGINIA

661. The immediate cause of the poem was the arrest in 1843 of George Latimer, a fugitive slave who had taken refuge in Massachusetts. Over fifty thousand citizens of Massachusetts petitioned Congress for reforms which should forever free them from any participation whatsoever in the slave trade. First published in The Liberator, January, 1843.
662. 67. Essex. Whittier here begins calling the roll of the counties of Massachusetts.

THE SHOEMAKERS

663. Published in Songs of Labor, 1850, though written in 1845.
7. St. Crispin's day. St. Crispin, a shoemaker, was martyred ca. 287. His day is October 25.

PROEM

666. Written at the end of 1847, and published in 1849 as the introductory verses in the first collected edition of Whittier's poetry. The accuracy of Whittier's self-criticism is notable.
33. Marvell. Andrew Marvell (1621-1678), a Puritan poet.

ICHABOD

This indictment of Webster, occasioned by his "Seventh of March" speech (see p. 721, this volume, and note), should be contrasted with the more favorable opinion expressed later by Whittier in The Lost Occasion. The word Ichabod means "the glory has departed," or "there is no glory." For the Biblical use of the term see I Samuel, IV, 21.

WORDSWORTH

667. Written in 1851, the year following Wordsworth's death. The Memoirs was the official life of the poet, by his nephew Christopher Wordsworth.
17. The violet by its mossy stone. Celebrated by Wordsworth in She Dwelt among the Untrodden Ways.
18. The primrose by the river's brim. From line 58 of Wordsworth's Peter Bell.
19. Chance-sown daffodils. The occasion of Wordsworth's I Wandered Lonely as a Cloud.

SUMMER BY THE LAKESIDE

Whittier spent many summers by the shore of Lake Winnepesaukee; in southern New Hampshire. The poem was written in 1853.

MAUD MULLER

669. Whittier once said that the story of the poem had no foundation in actual fact, but that he got a hint for the character of Maud Muller when he and his sister once saw in a hay field a young girl who blushed as she tried to cover her bare feet by raking hay over them. Written in 1854.
670. 94. Astral. An elaborately wrought table-lamp.
95. Chimney lug. A pole from which a kettle hung over the fire.

SKIPPER IRESON'S RIDE

672. Some time after publishing the poem Whittier learned that Ireson was in reality blameless, but that as a result of a conspiracy on the part of a cowardly crew he had been falsely accused and subjected to the ignominy here described.
3. Apuleius's Golden Ass. In the second century Apuleius, a Roman philosopher, wrote Metamorphoses, or the Golden Ass as it was popularly called, a satiric narrative of a young man named Lucian who was changed into an ass.
4. One-eyed Calender's horse of brass. A calender or dervish was a religious mendicant. Whittier's reference is to a story in The Arabian Nights.

6. Al-Borák. The steed which carried Mahomet to the seventh heaven; it had an eagle's wings and a human face.

THE GARRISON OF CAPE ANN

673. The source of the poem, as indicated in lines 10 and 11, is Cotton Mather's Magnolia Christi Americana. See the selections, pages 77 ff., this volume, and notes.

8. Rantoul. Robert Rantoul (1805-1852), a friend of Whittier, was distinguished as a reformer, statesman, and abolitionist. See Whittier's poem Rantoul.

THE PIPES AT LUCKNOW

675. The siege of Lucknow in 1857 and its relief by Scottish troops led by Sir Henry Havelock constitute one of the most thrilling incidents of the Sepoy mutiny in India. Whittier's poem was written in the following year.

TELLING THE BEES

676. The ceremony here described was thought necessary to prevent the swarms of bees from leaving their hives when a member of the family died. The setting of the poem is that of the poet's boyhood home.

MY PLAYMATE

677. The original title of the poem was Eleanor. It was first published in The Atlantic Monthly, in 1860. Tennyson later said of it, "It is a 'perfect poem.' In some of his descriptions of scenery and wild flowers [Whittier] would rank with Wordsworth."

LAUS DEO

The poem is Whittier's outburst of joy on hearing the bells ring to announce the ratification of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery. He was sitting in the Friends' Meeting House at Amesbury, Mass., on Dec. 18, 1865, when he heard the bells.

SNOW-BOUND

The text is that of the 1866 edition, tenth thousand, published by Ticknor and Fields, and copyright 1865 by the author. This text is not in all respects identical with that of the first edition, nor with that which the poem finally assumed under Whittier's revision. It represents, however, the form in which the poem first attained its nation-wide popularity, and has been chosen for that reason.

680. 90. Amun. An Egyptian God, in the shape of a ram.

682. 215. The Chief of Gambia's golden shore. From Sarah Morton's poem, The African Chief.

286. Sewell's ancient tome. The History of the Quakers, by William Sewell (1654-1720), a Dutch Quaker and a man of letters. The book was highly praised by Charles Lamb in his essay, A Quakers' Meeting.

289. Chalkley's Journal. Thomas Chalkley (1675-1749) records in his Journal the details of the incident here related by Whittier.

307. Our uncle. In his essay, The Fish I Didn't Catch, Whittier says, "Our bachelor uncle . . . was a quiet, genial man, much given to hunting and fishing."—Prose Works, I, 323.

683. 320. Apollonius of old. Apollonius Tyanæus, a philosopher of the first century.

322. Hermes. The Egyptian Hermes Trismegistus, reputed to have had great knowledge of magic, has for centuries been confused with the god Thoth.

332. White. Gilbert White (1720-1793) made his Natural History of Selborne more readable than the general run of such works by his vivid and colorful descriptions.

684. 476. Pindus-born Araxes. A river of Greece which rises in the Pindus Mountains.

685. 510. Another guest. Harriet Livermore. See next note.

555. The crazy queen of Lebanon. Lady Hester Stanhope, like Harriet Livermore, was an eccentric religious fanatic of unsound mind. The two women wandered over much of the near East, and lived for a time on the slope of Mt. Lebanon, awaiting the second coming of Christ.

687. 683. Ellwood's meek, drab-skirted Muse. An English Quaker (1639-1713), who wrote an uninspired epic on David. Posterity has remembered him more kindly for his suggestion to Milton that he write Paradise Lost.

694. Daft McGregor. Sir Gregor McGregor, a Scot who attempted to establish a colony in Costa Rica.

696. Taygetos. A mountain in Greece.

697. Ypsilanti. A Greek patriot (1792-1828), who took an active part in freeing Greece from Turkish rule.

719. The weird palimpsest. Literally, a parchment from which the first writing has been erased, in order that it may be used again. Here it means simply an ancient book.

741. Some Truce of God. An agreement or plan much talked of during the eleventh century, for the purpose of reducing the amount of warfare and bloodshed.

OUR MASTER

This poem, like The Eternal Goodness (above, p. 678), shows Whittier's religious poetry at its best. Several popular church hymns have been formed from the two poems.

ABRAHAM DAVENPORT

689. Colonel Abraham Davenport, of Stamford, Conn., was an historical character whom Whittier admired because of his firm conduct in the State House on May 19, 1780, the terrifying "dark day." The poem was written in 1866.

SUNSET ON THE BEARCAMP

690. Without being in any way imitative of Wordsworth, this description of the scenery of Bearcamp River, New Hampshire, suggests Wordsworth's view of Nature in at least two particulars: the insistence on the immediate presence of God in nature; and the concluding idea, that the poet will always retain in his memory the beauties of the scene which he is viewing. Compare Tintern Abbey, passim, and the last stanza of I Wandered Lonely as a Cloud.

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES
(1809-1894)

Almost every discussion of Holmes includes a statement to the effect that he was born in Cambridge, lived most of his life in Boston, and was a member of what he himself called the "Brahmin caste" of New England—a man whose ancestors for generations had followed one or another of the learned professions, and had contributed to the intellectual life of the communities in which they lived, and a man who himself continued in the way his fathers trod. It is quite as much to the point to indicate that Holmes was in some ways unique in his reaction to both his heredity and his environment.

Despite the strict orthodoxy of his father's Calvinism, Holmes became a Unitarian, and devoted much of his energy to combating a conception of God which had dominated New England since long before the time of Jonathan Edwards. He loved the good things of life with a catholicity of taste unknown to the "Brahmin caste"; in his zest for life, his enjoyment of the many phases of music, science, and letters, he was a Renaissance spirit in the environment of a Puritan. He was a connoisseur of old violins; he toyed with the microscope by the hour, and finally made an optical invention worth a fortune if he had taken out a patent; he loved a spirited horse to such an extent that his friends said he maintained his medical practise largely to justify the expense of his stable. As an undergraduate at Harvard he had dabbled in verse with enough success to win the election as Class Poet, but after his graduation in 1829 he turned to law rather than to letters. After one year in the Law School, he frankly admitted that poetry had interfered with his studies; nevertheless the wide popularity of his earliest poem of note, Old Ironsides (1830), did not restrain him from a new interest, medicine. To this he devoted four years of hard work in Boston and Paris, and the lure of a still broader culture took him into England, Germany, and Italy.

With his return to America at the end of 1835 Holmes's joy in the artistic side of life, and in life itself, made it impossible for him to confine himself to any one activity. From the publication of his first volume of poems in 1836 until the founding of the Atlantic Monthly in 1857, he divided his intellectual efforts with fair impartiality between teaching anatomy—first at Dartmouth, and after 1847 in the Harvard Medical School—writing poetry, practising medicine, and lecturing in public. His marriage (1840) to Miss Amelia Jackson brought domestic responsibilities which made him careful of his financial interests, but which extended, rather than limited, the range of his interests. The spirit of levity which led him to announce, when he began the practice of medicine, "The smallest of fevers thankfully received," is said to have lost him an occasional patient who preferred solemnity to mirth at the sick-bed. He served for thirty-five years with great distinction as Professor of Anatomy and Physiology at the Harvard Medical School, where he became famous as an entertaining instructor and a productive scientist.

When the Atlantic Monthly was founded in 1857, the editor, Lowell, pressed Holmes into immediate service, with the result that the overwhelming success of the Breakfast-Table series made its many-sided author henceforth primarily a man of letters. Even then, however, Holmes's diversity of interests persisted in making itself felt: he wrote novels—"medicated novels," they have been called—designed principally as vehicles for his theological and biological views, Elsie Venner (1861), The Guardian Angel (1867), and A Moral Antipathy (1884); essays and poems almost without number; and biographies of his friends Motley and Emerson.

His temperate ways of living enabled him to enjoy to the full his old age, in which the social delights of the Saturday Club were his greatest pleasure. He had by this time become in one sense the most provincial of Bostonians; for fifty years the ties of his home, his profession, his college, his club, and his business affairs (for his publishers accounted him an excellent business man) all combined to make him for and of Boston. Yet on his brief trip to Europe in 1886 he was given honorary degrees by Oxford, Cambridge, and Edinburgh; and long before his death in 1894 he had become an international figure in the world of letters.

Although here and there one of Holmes's poems is outstanding for some special quality—Old Ironsides for its vigor; The Chambered Nautilus for its spirituality; My Aunt, The Wonderful One-Hoss-Shay, and a dozen others for sheer humor—yet during his own lifetime he was best known for his occasional poems, such as those he wrote year after year for the reunion of his class at Harvard, and for the birthdays of his friends. With many of these apparently trifling pieces he said he took more pains than a minister takes with the preparation of his Sunday sermon. The best of them are little masterpieces of celebration or greeting or appreciation, in which the poetry—with none of the cold glitter of formal vers de société—flows along with almost the friendly informality of conversation and sparkles with Popeian wit. The most popular bit of this familiar verse, at which Holmes was so adept, is perhaps The Last Leaf. But more truly representative is the best of his reunion poems, The Boys. Here are combined all the usual Holmes characteristics: a touch of Harvard spirit, a sentimental reference to old age, a vitality that rises above any regret for the passing years, an appreciation of the worth of his friends—all these bound together by the author's habitual mood of conviviality and good-fellowship.

Most of Holmes's verse was, from the very nature of the subject matter, ephemeral or provincial; poems written specifically for the dedication of the Boston Library or for the dinner in honor of Whittier's seventieth birthday may not attract the readers of another century. Yet it is something that he was foremost among the American poets of his age at this type of verse, and that it would be hard to find his superior even among his great contemporaries in England. As has often been suggested, what a Poet Laureate he would have made!

If it is true that Holmes's poetry often has the charming intimacy of conversation, it is equally true that his conversation had the polished perfection of poetry. Many of his contemporaries have borne witness to the fact that he was the best talker in Boston—both the most interesting and the most brilliant—and that, too, at a time when—if ever—Boston was "the Hub." In this connection it would be a pity to overlook the points of similarity and of contrast between Dr. Johnson at The Club in the London of the seven-teen-sixties, and Holmes at the Saturday Club of Boston a century later; Johnson, with his gigantic figure and truculent manners, "tossing and goring" people right and left; Holmes, five feet three, suave, almost dapper, courteous to a degree, using his rapier of wit against the idea rather than the man who advanced it—or if he did encounter an opponent, thrusting home so skillfully that the victim scarcely knew he was impaled; yet each of them dominating the greatest minds of his age by sheer conversational power. The names of the illustrious members of Johnson's Club have been immortalized by Boswell; the Saturday Club had, in this sense, no Boswell; but its membership included Longfellow, Lowell, Emerson, Hawthorne, Whittier, Motley, the younger Dana, Prescott, Howells, Aldrich, and in addition to these a dozen other men who, though not primarily men of letters, stood—like President Eliot and Bishop Brooks—at the head of their respective professions.

Yet in a very genuine sense Holmes did have a Boswell; not a biographer, but one to report and give lasting form to his conversational brilliancies, a man amply qualified—himself. In The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table (1858), The Professor (1859), The Poet (1872), and Over the Teacups (1889), he has reproduced the best of his own conversation. "The best things which he said, the best bits in his letters, were very sure to be encountered afterwards in print. He gathered up the fragments, that nothing should be lost." (Life and Letters of Oliver Wendell Holmes, by John T. Morse, Jr., II, 24.)

The most famous of these books is, of course, The Autocrat. Here for the first time Holmes found his perfect medium of expression—conversational prose interspersed with bits of verse and an occasional poem like The Chambered Nautilus,—a medium flexible enough to allow full play to his many-sided personality. As in brilliant conversation, there are abrupt changes from one mood to another—now a keen flash of wit, now a dogmatic utterance, and now a suggestion of sentiment. There is a deal of argument, too, but it is always rapid, logical, and incisive. Some of the sly irony has doubtless been misunderstood by the majority of casual readers; for instance the remark that a pun is "the lowest form of wit." Holmes happened to be an inveterate punster himself, and even with the approach of blindness in his old age, he could write that he suffered from "cataract" still in the "kitten" stage. Yet the very subtlety of Holmes's manner gives the book one of its principal charms, for with each re-reading one is sure to find fresh delights to provoke thoughtful laughter. Seldom if ever has a series of essays been conceived and carried out so successfully in the spirit of high comedy.

The Professor and The Poet continue, with only a little less piquancy, the manner of The Autocrat. Either of the two later volumes would have been enough to make the author famous; Holmes was never "written out"—not even in Over the Teacups; his later work shows only a slight falling-off in vigor and variety. The Breakfast-Table series as a whole is almost unique; it is more sparkling than the best of Addison or Goldsmith, and it stands so far above Johnson's Rambler and Idler as to make comparison absurd. Only in the best conversational passages of Boswell's Johnson do we find a comparable body of good talk on such an endless variety of subjects.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. The Riverside Edition of Holmes's collected works, Boston, 1891, 14 vols., is the best readily available. For the poetry, the most useful one volume edition is the Cambridge, ed. Horace Scudder, Boston, 1895.

BIOGRAPHIES. The standard biography is J. T. Morse's The Life and Letters of Oliver Wendell Holmes, Boston, 1896, 2 vols.

CRITICAL ARTICLES. Edmund Gosse's An English View of the Autocrat, in The Critic, December 1, 1894, and Sir Leslie Stephen's Oliver Wendell Holmes, in The National Review, July, 1896, are interesting English comments. Edward Everett Hale's Personal Recollections of Oliver Wendell Holmes, in The Arena, December, 1895, is an intimate picturing of Holmes's personality. W. D. Howells' Oliver Wendell Holmes, first published in Harper's Monthly for December, 1896, is as good an essay on Holmes as has yet appeared.

NOTES

THE AUTOCRAT OF THE BREAKFAST-TABLE

691. Holmes's most famous work of any considerable length, The Autocrat, was first published in the Atlantic during 1857 and 1858. As was quite appropriate in what purported to be the record of a long series of conversations, held around a boarding-house table, the first number opened with the phrase, "I was just going to say, when I was interrupted." The conversation thus begun continued, with longer or shorter interruptions, through four series of papers, and ended only with Over the Teacups in 1888.

692. a. 27. C'est le dernier pas. It is the last step which comes hardest.

693. b. 26. Hunc lapidem. His mourning comrades erected this stone.

b. 46. Arcus senilis. A whitish ring in the eye, caused by old age.

694. b. 29. Μῆνιν ἄειδε θεά. The opening words of the Iliad: "Sing, O Goddess, the wrath [of Achilles]."

b. 45. McFingal. For selections from this once-popular piece of satire by John Trumbull, see pages 183 ff., above.

b. 52. The spacious firmament on high. The opening lines of Addison's hymn.

OLD IRONSIDES

697. In September, 1830, when Holmes read of the proposal to break up the famous frigate Constitution, popularly known as "Old Ironsides," he wrote this almost impromptu outburst, which appeared first in the Boston Advertiser, and was at once so widely reprinted that it brought him an immediate fame.

THE LAST LEAF

First published in 1831. The subject of The Last Leaf was Major Thomas Melville, one of the "Indians" of the "Boston Tea Party." When Holmes saw him he was an old man, but still a picturesque figure on the streets of Boston. The poet retained his youthful fondness for the poem, and allowed it to be reprinted in his own extreme old age, saying, "I have lasted long enough to serve as an illustration of my own poem."

NON-RESISTANCE

699. Written in 1852, but withheld from publication until 1862.

THE CHAMBERED NAUTILUS

First published in The Autocrat.

700. 26. Than ever Triton blew. The adaptation of the line from Wordsworth's sonnet, The World is too Much With Us, is obvious.

THE LIVING TEMPLE

First published in The Autocrat. The poem has been called "the anatomist's hymn."

THE DEACON'S MASTERPIECE

Another of the poems woven into The Autocrat. It is probable that Holmes intended the poem to be considered as an allegory of the breakdown of Calvinism in New England.

CONTENTMENT

702. Also from The Autocrat.

21. Be Plenipo. Be Minister to England, or, in diplomatic parlance, "Minister Plenipotentiary."

THE BOYS

703. Written for the thirtieth reunion of Holmes's class (1829) at Harvard, a class which contained many persons of distinction. Those named are identified in the Cambridge Edition of Holmes's poems, p. 340.

A HYMN OF TRUST

704. From The Professor at the Breakfast Table, 1859.

A SUN-DAY HYMN

This poem, also from The Professor, is often used as a hymn.

BROTHER JONATHAN'S LAMENT

705. Compare the anonymous reply to this poem, above, p. 756. The occasion of the verses was the secession of South Carolina.

NEARING THE SNOW-LINE

Written in 1870.

HOW THE OLD HORSE WON THE BET

706. 5. g.m. Grey mare. S.h. Sorrel horse. B.g. Bay gelding. The abbreviations are those of the race-track reports.

39. O woman. A parody on Scott's

O woman! in our hours of ease
Uncertain, coy, and hard to please.
—Marmion, VI, 902.

53. Like Lazarus. As described in Luke, xvi, 19.

64. Old Blue. "A famous Boston horse of the early decades of this century, who was said to trot a mile in less than three minutes." (Holmes's note.)

68. Mazeppa. In Byron's poem of that name.

707. 152. The spectral lover of Lenore. Lenore was a late eighteenth century poem of the supernatural, written by the German Bürger. It was still generally remembered when Holmes wrote his poem.

170. Hector. The story of Hector's ride around the walls of Troy is told in the Iliad, book xxii.

708. 182. Old Dutchman. "Old Dutchman was transferred from between the shafts of a cart to become a champion of the American trotters of his time." (Holmes's note.)

JOHN C. CALHOUN (1782-1850)

Calhoun's position in American history and literature is not difficult to state: among the many persons who between 1830 and 1850 opposed the centralization of power in the Federal government, and attempted to preserve the attributes of sovereignty to the individual states which had formed the Union, Calhoun was probably the most influential. What Webster was to the North, with its growing faith in a Union "one and inseparable," Calhoun was to the South, where the State's Rights theory became increasingly popular as the breach between the two sections steadily widened. The two men are not only figures in American literature by virtue of their ability to write political prose of a masterly sort, but, taken together, stand in much the same relation to the constitutional questions of 1850 that Hamilton and Jefferson had occupied half a century before. Their significance in the chronicle of American civilization is consequently far greater than the space allotted to them in this volume would indicate.

Calhoun was born in South Carolina, in March, 1782. Twenty-two years later he graduated with high honors from Yale. In 1807 he was admitted to the South Carolina Bar. Twice he served in the legislature of his state, and from 1811 to 1817 was a member of the House of Representatives. As the most influential member of the important committee on foreign affairs he played a large part in inducing Congress, in 1812, to declare war against Great Britain. During the eight years of Monroe's administration (1817-1825) he was Secretary of War, and from 1825 to 1832 was Vice-President of the United States. It was during this period of his life that he became an eager supporter of the State's Rights theory. In this connection it is interesting to note that it was not the slavery question, but solely the protective tariff fostered by the North, which occasioned in 1828 his first significant political writing, the so-called "South Carolina Exposition." In this he asserted that if the Federal government exercised any powers which infringed upon the sovereignty of an individual state, that state had the inherent right of nullifying the act of the federal power.

This is the thesis upon which his subsequent political work was to rest. In 1833, after having resigned the Vice-Presidency, he was elected Senator from South Carolina. His first debate concerned the 1832 nullification bill, and his chief opponent was Daniel Webster. From that time until his death in 1850, less than a month after his last great speech in opposition to Webster, he was the foremost champion of Southern rights, protesting against what he considered the unconstitutional encroachment of the North. By 1850 the tariff was no longer of chief consequence; the one question of the hour was slavery. But whether discussing the nullification bill in 1832, or opposing Clay's compromise in 1850, his position was the same: the United States, he held, was but a voluntary association of sovereign states. Any state could nullify an act of the Federal Congress, and—as an ultimate resort—could withdraw from the Union. That Calhoun's theory was destined to fall, when tested on the battlefields of the Civil War, is not necessarily to be taken as a proof that it was either logically or historically invalid.

At the time of his "Fourth of March speech"—here reprinted—Calhoun was seriously ill. Three days later he again rose from a sick-bed to be present during Webster's reply. On the thirty-first of the same month he died, honored both in the North and in the South for his ability and unquestioned sincerity. Interestingly enough, the chief eulogy on Calhoun was pronounced in the Senate chamber by Webster himself.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The Works of John C. Calhoun, N. Y. 1853-1855, 6 vols., is a readily accessible edition of Calhoun's writings. The Annual Report of the American Historical Association for 1899, vol. 2, contains several hundred of his letters. Among many biographies two should be mentioned: H. von Holst's John C. Calhoun, Boston, 1882 and 1899 (American Statesmen Series), and W. M. Meigs's The Life of John Caldwell Calhoun, N. Y. 1917, 2 vols. The latter is the best treatment of Calhoun.

NOTES

SPEECH ON THE SLAVERY QUESTION

709. On March 4, 1850, Calhoun was too ill to stand the strain of speaking. He was in his seat in the Senate chamber, but his address was read for him by Senator Mason of Virginia. As regards the question immediately before the Senate at the time, Calhoun's contention proved correct. The Compromise of 1850 failed, as Calhoun, in this speech, foretold it would fail. Webster and Clay supported it because they believed it would save the Union. It did not. It merely postponed the already inevitable trial by battle. (Curiously enough, no one of the three statesmen most intimately connected with it, lived to see it fail.) This address of Calhoun's however, barely touches upon the Compromise. It is rather a masterly review of the entire slavery question, and of the events which had brought about the situation that existed in 1850.
711. b. 53. Its effect was to exclude the South. I.e., to exclude slavery.
712. a. 5. The Missouri Compromise. The Compromise of 1820.
717. a. 16. Methodist Episcopal Church. Neither the Methodist nor the Baptist church has yet (1927) been reunited.
- a. 32. The Episcopal Church . . . remains unbroken. The Church did divide in 1861, but the breach proved only temporary.
719. a. 24. The plan proposed by the . . . Senator from Kentucky. Henry Clay (1777-1852) was the chief sponsor of what has come to be called the Compromise of 1850.
720. b. 44. California will become the test question. The bill to admit California to the Union with a free-soil constitution finally passed on September 7, 1850, six months after the Webster-Calhoun debate.
721. a. 11. To arrest it. To check the anti-slavery agitation.

DANIEL WEBSTER (1782-1852)

Webster is entitled to representation in any collection of American literature. He belonged, to be sure, to the "old school" of oratory; his rhetoric is more Ciceronian than that of the twentieth century; his periods are at times too long and involved to appeal to readers fed on the "pep" and "punch" of modern journalism; above all, his arguments are too full of facts to allure a public accustomed to draw its information from headlines and tabloid summaries. But when all allowances have been made, the fact remains that he could speak in a manner which no other American has ever been able to equal, and could impart to his best work a quality of style which puts it definitely in the class with the work of Burke, of Cicero, and of Demosthenes.

His abilities were recognized—and honored—during his life-time. When Webster was in England in 1839 he met Carlyle, and Carlyle thus described him in a letter to Emerson: "Not many days ago I saw at breakfast the notablist of all your Notabilities, Daniel Webster. He is a magnificent specimen; you might say to all the world, This is your Yankee Englishman; such Limbs we make in Yankee land! As a Logician, Advocate, or Parliamentary Hercules, one would incline to back him at first sight against all the extant world. The tanned complexion, that amorphous crag-like face; the dull black eyes under their precipice of brows, like dull anthracite furnaces, needing only to be blown; the mastiff-mouth, accurately closed:—I have not traced as much of silent Bersirkir-rage, that I remember of, in any other man." At the time this letter was written, Webster was fifty-seven years old, and was recognized at home and abroad as America's foremost orator, and as the ablest expounder of that theory of government which Hamilton had sponsored half a century before, but which Webster's phrase, "Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable," had seemed to make peculiarly his own.

As has often been said, Webster believed that the United States is rather than are a nation; that nullification and secession were possibilities that should not even be considered; and that the preservation of the Union was of more significance than the preservation—or destruction—of any institution or local interest. This theory, that the agreement between the states "to form a more perfect union" was a contract which could not be broken, was the theory which Calhoun, among others, opposed, and which was to be a matter of debate until the argument was ended by the outcome of the Civil War.

But in the mind of Webster there was never any doubt. He lost no chance to impress his views upon the minds of his countrymen, and by his powerful and repeated iteration of his ideas he did much to make possible the ultimate triumph of the Union cause.

It is interesting to note that at the very beginning of his career Webster had taken the position which he was to maintain till his death. A New Hampshire lad, born in 1782, receiving his early schooling at Philips Academy, Exeter, he naturally attended Dartmouth College, the chief educational institution of his native state. At the close of his junior year he delivered the Fourth of July oration on the college campus, and by implication at least committed himself to the Hamiltonian theory of a strong central government. When on March 7, 1850, he made his last great speech in the Senate, he had gained greatly in power, but his fundamental position was what it had been half a century before.

Interestingly enough, Webster's first important case before the Supreme Court of the United States involved the same question of the inviolability of contracts, and the supremacy of the Federal government over a single state. He had been a member of the Bar since 1805, and after ten years of practice was chosen one of three attorneys to represent his college in a suit which in 1817 reached the Supreme Court of New Hampshire. That court decided that certain acts of the state legislature, which had in effect repealed the college charter, were valid. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, where Webster made the chief argument. The decision, written by Chief Justice Marshall, reversed the New Hampshire court, on the ground that the acts of the state legislature constituted a violation of a contract. Webster had thus assisted in establishing a precedent which has been of value to more than one American educational institution, at the same time that he was preparing for the greater debates with Hayne and Calhoun on the contractual nature of the Constitution, and on the right of the Federal government to over-ride the act of a state legislature.

Despite his early successes as a lawyer, Webster found his life work in politics. He first entered Congress in 1813, as Representative from New Hampshire. In 1827 he was elected Senator from Massachusetts. Except for the years 1841-45, when he was Secretary of State, he remained till July of 1850 in the Senate, where he fought his greatest battles and won his chief honors. In the debates with Hayne in 1830 and 1831 concerning nullification, and again in 1850 when Calhoun was opposing Clay's compromise measure, Webster announced his Unionist doctrines with such force and eloquence that the speeches made on these occasions have become classics of the world's oratory.

Webster's claim to distinction, then, appears to be three-fold: he was the greatest orator of an age which set great store by public eloquence; he was a lawyer of unusual ability; he was the chief expounder of that constitutional theory which time has established as the only tenable foundation for the United States government. His death on October 24, 1852, deprived the Unionist cause of its foremost leader, albeit his influence can be traced in the later work of Lincoln, and—indirectly but none the less surely—in the response of the North when the argument over "State's rights" passed from the Senate chamber to the fields of Antietam and Gettysburg.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Webster's work is available in extenso, in The Writings and Speeches of Daniel Webster, National Edition, Boston, 1903, 18 vols. The first volume contains an adequate biographical memoir. Either Henry C. Lodge's Daniel Webster, Boston, 1883 and 1899 (American Statesman Series), or Frederick A. Ogg's Daniel Webster, Philadelphia, 1914, will serve as a starting point for further study.

NOTES

THE CONSTITUTION AND THE UNION

721. The speech was Webster's reply to Calhoun's speech of March 4, and was delivered on March 7, 1850. To Webster's anti-slavery constituents in Massachusetts it seemed to indicate that he had gone too far in his willingness to compromise with slavery. The reader of today, however, realizes that Webster's position in 1850 was approximately that of Lincoln at the time of his "open letter" to Horace Greeley (p. 787, above). The preservation of the Union was to him of more importance than either the preservation or destruction of slavery. Whittier's Ichabod (p. 666, above) indicates the feeling which the address aroused among the more outspoken opponents of slavery. It should be remembered, however, that Whittier's bitterness passed with the years, and that he later made amends for Ichabod by publishing The Lost Occasion.
723. a. 13. It was prosecuted for the . . . acquisition of territory. In his first speech as Representative from Illinois, Lincoln took a similar position.
724. b. 30. Senator from South Carolina. Calhoun.
726. a. 11. There was then no diversity of opinion. Compare Lincoln's argument throughout the first part of the Cooper Union address, above, p. 767.
727. b. 36. An honorable member. Calhoun.
730. a. 16. There is not at this moment, etc. Many of Webster's constituents objected to this statement that slavery was established by an "irrepealable law."

731. b. 54. The Wilmot Proviso. A proviso, moved in the House of Representatives by David Wilmot of Pennsylvania, on August 4, 1846, and adopted by the House as an amendment to the bill appropriating a sum of money to be used in negotiating peace with Mexico, to the effect that slavery should never exist in any part of the territory ceded by Mexico. The Senate twice rejected the proviso, which never became law.
732. b. 29. The Greek Kalends. A famous if somewhat shop-worn classical joke. There were no Kalends in the Greek calendar; hence the expression "To the Greek Kalends" means forever.
736. b. 16. The South . . . is right. Another statement objectionable to many at the North.
737. a. 10. A bill on the subject. The "Fugitive Slave Law," adopted as part of the Compromise of 1850. Webster's announcement that he would support it gave great offense to many of his friends in Massachusetts.
742. b. 49. Now, the broad shield. Quoted from the concluding section of Book XVIII of Pope's translation of the Iliad.

HARRIET BEECHER STOWE (1811-1896)

Harriet Beecher Stowe was born in Litchfield, Connecticut, on June 14, 1811, of an old and distinguished New England family. In 1832 her father, Dr. Lyman Beecher, was elected President of the newly established Lane Theological Seminary in Cincinnati, and when he moved west, his daughter Harriet naturally accompanied him. In Cincinnati she first came in direct personal contact with slavery, for with only the Ohio river separating the slave state of Kentucky from the free soil of Ohio, it was inevitable that she should see for herself certain phases of "the institution" which in Connecticut she had only read of. The Seminary buildings soon became a station on the "Underground Railroad"; Harriet herself gave aid and shelter to many a runaway negro—and apparently she remembered the stories they told her.

Her marriage to Calvin Stowe took place in 1836. He was a widower with several children; more were born to his second wife; and by 1850, when he was called to the Professorship of Greek in Bowdoin College, Mrs. Stowe was worn with the manifold obligations which life had forced upon her. Before leaving Cincinnati for Brunswick, Maine, she had written stories and sketches, but had done nothing to attract the notice of more than a very limited circle of readers, or to indicate that she possessed any but the most ordinary sort of literary talent. The year 1850, however, in which the Stowes moved to Brunswick, was the year of the fugitive slave law, and even the quiet Maine village found itself aroused by the statute. It was as a protest against this law, and against the institution which it fostered, that Mrs. Stowe wrote Uncle Tom's Cabin.

The story was first published as a serial in The National Era, an anti-slavery journal of relatively little influence, in which it ran from June, 1851, to April, 1852. In this form it attracted but little attention. When it was published in complete form in the spring of 1852, however, it became—almost over-night—not the most widely read piece of fiction of the year, or of the century, but perhaps of all time. It is doubtful whether any book save the Bible has enjoyed such a circulation. Translations have appeared in at least twenty-three languages, and in the dramatized form it is still (1927) a living document.

To answer the charge that Uncle Tom's Cabin grossly misrepresented conditions in the South, Mrs. Stowe published in 1853 A Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin, giving the documentary evidence on which she had based the tale. In 1856 her novel Dred: a Tale of the Great Dismal Swamp, added another title to the list of anti-slavery publications, and for several years thereafter her pen was constantly busy. Never again, however, did she equal the success of Uncle Tom, and today all that she wrote save this one book is virtually forgotten. She died in Hartford, Connecticut, on July 1, 1896.

Uncle Tom's Cabin is one of the books that can be understood only when seen against its own proper historical background. It is a book which belongs definitely to one particular period in the history of one people—to the period when the Missouri Compromise of 1820 was about to be repealed, and when the Compromise of 1850, sponsored by Clay and Webster in a final attempt to save the Union, was offending both North and South because, while satisfying neither, it angered both. It belongs to an age of discontent and uncertainty, to an age when secession was in the air, and when disunion, no longer covertly threatened, was being openly and unqualifiedly advocated.

But Uncle Tom's Cabin was more than a document in the history of the struggle against slavery. It is as surely part and parcel of the literature of what is usually called the Romantic Revolt as was Burns's Jolly Beggars or Shelley's Queen Mab. The humanitarian impulse which is in part exemplified by the French Revolution was not yet played out; and at the same time that Dickens, in England, was striking his passionate blows for justice and kindness and decency, Mrs. Stowe was doing the same thing in America. Consequently, though the anti-slavery people of the North praised the book because of the fearless way in which it exposed the evils of the institution, readers in France and England and Germany saw it in its true significance, and realized that it marked another step in the age-old struggle for the liberation not of the negro but of the human race.

It would be idle to deny that Uncle Tom's Cabin is in some ways unfair to the slaveholders of 1850, or to claim for it any great degree of technical excellence. But this at least is true: it is a picture of what might happen anywhere under "the institution," and of what had happened often; it is written so well that the narrative still retains its compelling interest; it is humanized by sure and sympathetic characterization; it is keyed to the note of tragedy which forms a sombre undertone for the great literature of the entire world. All in all, it is a unique document in the history of civilization, and cannot be pooh-poohed by even the most sophisticated of critics.

Mrs. Stowe's chief works of fiction have been republished as The Novels and Stories of Harriet Beecher Stowe, Boston, 1910, 10 vols. Uncle Tom's Cabin, of course, is available in many reprints. A Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin has never been reprinted, and is somewhat difficult to come at in the original 1853 Boston or London editions. The Story of Uncle Tom's Cabin, which Mrs. Stowe wrote in 1878 as an introduction to a new edition, is available in the Old South Leaflets, General Series, number 82, Boston, 1897. The best biography is that by C. E. and L. B. Stowe: Harriet Beecher Stowe: the Story of her Life, Boston, 1911.

NOTES

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN

Chapter IX

743. The chapter not only gives a vivid picture of the ways in which runaway slaves were assisted to escape, but also shows the conflict that might arise between legal obligation and humanitarian impulse. In this chapter Senator Bird, sworn to uphold the laws of his state and country, assists in the escape of Eliza, who is the wife of George Harris.

Chapter XIX

746. St. Clare represents a fine type of Southern plantation owner, who here talks things over with his Vermont cousin, Ophelia. The discussion does not advance the action materially, but introduces some of the most significant passages in the entire book.
750. b. 31. A mere matter . . . of latitude and longitude. Passages such as that introduced by these words indicate Mrs. Stowe's fair-mindedness.
752. a. 11. The slave-owner can whip, etc. Here again Mrs. Stowe shows herself to be as keenly aware of social injustice in the North as of slavery in the South.

753. b. 34. There is a mustering among the masses. Such passages as this caught the attention of many persons who felt no particular concern over slavery, and showed Mrs. Stowe as the herald of a better day for the lowly folk of all the world.

SONGS AND BALLADS OF THE CIVIL WAR

As was the case with the Revolution of 1776, the Civil War occasioned a large amount of prose and verse, some of which is fairly entitled to preservation in the library of American literature. Lincoln's most famous work, much of Whitman's, certain poems by Lowell and Whittier—these are perhaps the best known literary products of the conflict which all but destroyed the nation that the Revolution had created. And in addition to the work of these—and other—recognized men of letters, there is a large amount of poetry written by persons who might otherwise have been unknown, but who found in the war a stimulus for a sort of literary activity which finds a comparatively recent parallel in the poetry of the Great War.

To realize the amount of this Civil War poetry one must turn to such a collection as Richard Grant White's The Poetry of the Civil War, or consult the bibliographies in Miss Esther P. Ellinger's Southern War Poetry of the Civil War, Philadelphia, 1918. But the selections reprinted in the present volume indicate fairly enough the nature of this verse, and include the best work of representative Southern and Northern writers.

Comparing these selections with the songs and ballads of the Revolution, one sees that the ballad form was less popular in 1861 than it had been in 1776, and that there is a more conscious attempt to write "literature" than there had been during the earlier conflict. The Civil War is farther from the age of oral transmission than was the Revolution. On the other hand, such a marching song as John Brown, of the many versions of which only one is here reprinted, is an indication that the older tradition was by no means dead, and that a song with easily remembered words, united to a thoroughly "singable" tune, will wander far, undergo many changes, and have, in brief, the sort of history recorded for many an age-old traditional ballad.

For other poems of the Civil War, by poets of wider reputation, see pp. 661, 699, 705, 968 ff., etc.

The Picket-Guard was first published in Harper's Weekly in 1861, and was probably the work of Mrs. Ethelinda Elliott Beers (1827-1879), whose pen-name was Ethel Lynn Beers.

Dixie, like John Brown, appeared sooner or later in many versions. The one here reprinted is perhaps the best, and is the work of Albert Pike (1809-1891), who, born in Boston, early transferred his allegiance to the South, and served as a Brigadier-general during the war. It too was published in 1861.

Farewell to Brother Jonathan, the authorship of which is unknown, appeared in the same year, and was a direct answer to Holmes's Brother Jonathan's Lament for Sister Caroline (above, p. 705).

James R. Randall (1839-1908), whose Maryland, My Maryland, attained as wide a popularity as any Southern lyric, was a native of Baltimore who became one of the South's ablest journalists.

George Frederick Root (1820-1895) was at the time of the war a musician and publisher of music in Chicago. A versatile composer as well as a facile rimester, he had the knack of turning out popular compositions with tunes that it was impossible to forget, and with words which made an appeal to the emotions of the day. His best known war songs were The Battle Cry of Freedom, Tramp, Tramp, Tramp, and Just Before the Battle, Mother.

Still another song of the early days of the war is the so-called "original" John Brown, probably the work of Henry Howard Brownell (1820-1872). The author, a Connecticut lawyer, served with Farragut at the battle of Mobile Bay, and remained in the navy till 1868, when he settled at Hartford, Connecticut. He wrote much, but nothing so popular as the song here reprinted.

Stonewall Jackson's Way (1862) is the best known work of John W. Palmer (1825-1906), who, born in Baltimore, practised medicine in San Francisco, transferred his energies to journalism, and served as Confederate war correspondent for the New York Tribune.

Among the many anonymous lyrics of the war, the lines We Are Coming, Father Abraham (1862), were among the most popular. Written in "fourteeners," and thus linked to the old ballad tradition so far as form is concerned, the poem, despite its obvious sentimentalism, has a strength of feeling and concreteness of imagery which make one wish that the author were known.

The Battle Hymn of the Republic (1862) made its author, Mrs. Julia Ward Howe (1819-1910), famous over all the English speaking world. She was a native of New York, but after her marriage lived for most of her life in Boston, editing, with her husband, an anti-slavery journal called The Commonwealth, and publishing several volumes of poetry. The Battle Hymn gave her a reputation which far outshone that won by her more elaborate early work, and made her in great demand as a lecturer on various reform topics, prominent among which was "Woman's Rights." She died in Boston in 1910.

Francis Orrery Ticknor (1822-1874) was a physician of Georgia whose very considerable poetic output is here represented by Little Giffen (?1863). The ballad is founded on Ticknor's acquaintance with a young lad whose history was much like that of the hero of the poem.

Tenting on the Old Camp Ground (1863), by Walter Kittredge, is a song which owes much of its popularity to a melodious and easily remembered tune. It was a favorite in the Northern army, and has not yet ceased to have a certain sort of appeal.

Henry Clay Work (1832-1884) was a musician as well as a poet, and had the same sort of facility in writing popular songs that George Root possessed. Marching through Georgia, commemorating Sherman's famous march to the sea, was published in 1865 by Root's firm, with which Work was connected.

The Blue and the Gray, by Francis Miles Finch, appeared first in the Atlantic Monthly for September, 1867, with the following head-note: "The women of Columbus, Mississippi, animated by nobler sentiments than are many of their sisters, have shown themselves impartial in their offerings in memory of the dead. They strewed flowers alike on the graves of the Confederate and of the National soldiers.—New York Tribune."

BIBLIOGRAPHY

In addition to the work of Richard Grant White and Miss Esther Ellinger, already referred to, the following four collections of Civil War poetry, all edited by Frank Moore, are of great value: Songs for the Soldiers, Lyrics of Loyalty, Personal and Political Ballads (all published in New York in 1864), and Songs and Ballads of the Southern People, N. Y. 1866. Miss Ellinger's bibliographical section will furnish a complete list of other available and useful collections. C. G. Eggleston's American War Ballads and Lyrics, N. Y. 1889, 2 vols., though a popular collection, is of little use to the student.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN (1809-1865)

Only two phases of Lincoln's life and activity will be touched upon here. First, for the sake of the student who is unfamiliar with the life of Lincoln, and to supplement the autobiography printed as one of the selections from his work, there is a brief section setting forth certain facts concerning his life and character. Second, there is a slightly more extensive discussion of Lincoln as a writer of prose. The student who would go further in the fascinating study which Lincoln's work opens before him, must consult one of the biographies referred to later.

It is perhaps easiest to think of Lincoln's life as divided into four periods. From his birth in 1809 to his election to the Illinois legislature in 1834 he was the boy and young frontiersman. More intellectually curious and mentally acquisitive than the average young man growing up in the backwoods of Kentucky or Indiana, more interested in "book-learning" and the worlds that opened to him through the printed page, more given to contemplation and introspection, he was not what would have been called precocious, nor did he early show many signs of the genius that was to develop later. His physical strength was notable; his integrity unquestioned. But he was content to work on a farm, keep store, act as surveyor, or serve as village postmaster. That he was popular with his fellows is clear; that they ever understood him, or penetrated his veil of reserve, is doubtful. He was a good-natured, tolerant, and somewhat indolent young man; not in any obvious sense the sort of person for whom one would have prophesied a career of distinction.

With his election to the Illinois legislature in 1834 the circle of his interests widens. The study of law, which he had taken up when about twenty-three or four years old—he received his license as an attorney in 1837—gave him a profession, and naturally made him think of politics. The storekeeping days become things of the past; he looks beyond the limits of his own township. The next two decades were to see Lincoln a popular and influential local politician, and a most able though somewhat unusual lawyer. Three times he was elected to the Illinois legislature, once to Congress; from time to time his name appeared on the list of Presidential Electors. He became a man of considerable local influence and importance, a believer in party government and party organization, but honorable and unselfish in his use of the party machine which he helped to create.

It was in 1839, during this second period, that he moved to Springfield, Illinois, where his practice as a lawyer increased, despite the fact that at times his attention to his profession was half-hearted. In 1842 he married Mary Todd, and found in the new relationship some relief from the attacks of melancholia to which he had long been subject, and which the death of a former fiancée, Anne Rutledge, in 1835, had greatly intensified. In 1846 he was sent to Washington as a member of the House of Representatives. Here his independence and integrity were demonstrated in his attitude towards the administration and the Mexican War. Though he never refused to vote supplies for the troops, he opposed the war as iniquitous, and in his first speech demonstrated that hostilities had been brought about not by the Mexicans, but by the aggressions of United States forces, acting under orders from Washington. With the expiration of his term he resumed the practice of law, and for five years—from 1849 to 1854—took little part in politics. He had apparently reached the summit, so far as his public life was concerned;

his return to the courtroom appeared to mark his retirement from the political field.

The passage in 1854 of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, sponsored by Judge Stephen A. Douglas, then United States Senator from Illinois, recalled Lincoln from the seclusion of his professional work, and marked the beginning of the third period of his career. Once again the horizon of his interests widened, and he abandoned the rôle of local politician and lawyer for the larger one of a statesman engaged in the great struggle concerning the spread of slavery. His chief opponent, so far as Illinois was concerned, was Douglas, whom in April of 1858 the Democrats renominated for the Senatorship. Two months later the Republicans nominated Lincoln. In July Lincoln challenged Douglas to a series of public debates, to be held in seven Illinois towns. When the election was held, Douglas won, but Lincoln had forced him into such a position concerning slavery that the South lost confidence in him, and two years later deserted him in the presidential campaign.

The Republican National Convention met on May 16, 1860, in Chicago. At first Seward was the leading candidate, but on the third ballot Lincoln was nominated. As a result of the November election he received 180 electoral votes, while the three other candidates polled only 123 in all.

Then began the fourth period of Lincoln's life, his four years in the White House. Fort Sumter surrendered to Beauregard on April 14, 1861. The next day Lincoln issued a proclamation calling for seventy-five thousand volunteers; five days later another proclamation announced the blockade of the Southern ports; on April 27 he authorized the military commanders to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. From then to the surrender of Lee on April 9, 1865, Lincoln used all his power, and all the powers of the government, with but one thought: to restore the Union to the condition in which it had been before the secession movement had begun. That he succeeded in the attempt was due in part to the skill of the commanders who ultimately found themselves at the head of the Northern forces, and in part to the fact—which Lee pointed out at the opening of hostilities—that the North was more populous and better equipped for a long struggle than the South; but in large measure the success of the North was due to Lincoln himself. The "common people" of the North believed in him and trusted him, and the victories of Grant and Sherman were in great measure the victories of Lincoln himself.

On November 8, 1864, while the issue of the war was still in doubt, Lincoln was re-elected to the Presidency, receiving 212 electoral votes to 21 for McClellan. His second inauguration, on March 4, 1865, was the occasion of his last great address, for one month and ten days later he was shot by John Wilkes Booth during a performance in Ford's Theatre, Washington. At seven o'clock the next morning he was dead—just four years after he had issued the first call for volunteers.

In passing from this bare chronicle of fact to a consideration of Lincoln as a man of letters, one's first reaction is apt to be that of bewilderment. How came this backwoods lawyer to be the master of such a prose style? to wield such an influence? Without formal education, and—what is more important—without that environment which commonly accompanies and in part occasions an interest in letters, he made a greater impression on the thought of America than any other person in his century. And he made this impression largely through his ability to write—to phrase his ideas so compellingly that the audience to which he spoke, and the still larger audience which read the printed address, understood what he was saying and accepted his conclusions as true. The student who finds it hard to "explain" or "account for" the literary skill of Benjamin Franklin, will be even more baffled when he tries to come at some accurate understanding of Lincoln's power. His accomplishment is too many-sided to be understood by even the most sympathetic of observers. The result is that after spending more than a little time on the study of Lincoln one still finds oneself baffled and bewildered.

Yet some things stand out with reasonable clearness. To begin with, there is the obvious fact that though Lincoln's power was at its height during his later years, he was, even as a young man, the master of clear, vigorous exposition. Such a letter as that written in June 1836 to Colonel Robert Allen, when Lincoln was 27 years old, is of the same sort as the more famous—but no more lucid—open letter to Horace Greeley written a quarter of a century later. Indeed this lucidity is perhaps the outstanding quality of most of Lincoln's prose. "I know what I mean and I do not propose to leave this crowd in doubt," he once said in reply to a taunt by Douglas. In that succinct, monosyllabic rejoinder might fairly be found the key to Lincoln's success as a writer. He knew what he had to say; he aimed to say it so that his readers would know too; more than that seemed unnecessary.

This quality of lucidity was never due, in Lincoln's case, to mere thinness. On the other hand, he might well have become confused by the very multiplicity and magnitude of the ideas with which he was dealing. Wherever one turns one realizes that Lincoln "had something to say." He knew facts—the facts of law, of military science, of human nature; he was even interested in some of the facts of literature. And these facts did not lie inert in his consciousness; they were productive of thought, of intellectual reactions. As a result, his prose is rich not in facts alone, but in ideas; it is pregnant with ideas.

It is perhaps in the orderly presentation of these ideas that Lincoln best shows his genius for clear thinking and writing. His analytical powers were superb. There is never a doubt in his mind as to what the chief issue is; he arranges his material in such a way as to make that issue clear to the reader, and presents his evidence so that the conclusion he wishes to establish appears inevitable. It is a tradition in Illinois that when Lincoln was arguing a case before a jury he would often present his opponent's side better than that opponent had been able to state it—all for the sake of placing the case before the jury in such a way that confusion would be impossible. Such a speech as the Cooper Union address is possibly the best single illustration of this phase of Lincoln's ability. In it he deals with facts and prejudices and ideas and themes that would have involved most people in a slough of disorganized illogicality; yet, so sure is his grasp of the facts, so trenchant his analysis, and so clear the organization of his material, that never for an instant does the reader become confused, or burdened with the weight of ill-digested irrelevancies.

Richness in idea; absolute clarity of thought and expression—these are perhaps the two qualities in Lincoln's prose that first impress the student. It is not till one has read much in Lincoln that one realizes the flexibility of his style—a quality which Burke, for instance, who was his equal in many respects, did not possess. Burke's work is all of a piece; the "grand style" was his habitual note. Lincoln, however, was more than ordinarily skillful in adapting what he had to say to the particular audience in front of him. For instance, he could write to his step-brother Johnston in a language that Johnston could understand; he could address an audience of Illinois farmers so interestingly that they would stand for an hour and a half in silent attention; he could pour into the four sentences of a letter to a bereaved mother all the sympathy and gratitude of an entire nation; he could transform what might have been a perfunctory address of dedication into an enduring statement of the hopes and ideals of a civilization. This deftness with which he varied his medium, to adapt it to the exigencies of a particular situation, is one of the less obvious but distinctly significant indications of his command of his pen.

The comparison with Burke suggests another trait that marks Lincoln's prose as different from that of the English political philosopher: his fondness for the idiom of the common man, for the provincialisms that show how close he was to the every-day life of the American frontier. Illustrations of this quality can be found wherever one cares to turn: "Major-generalships in the regular army are not as plenty as blackberries";

"We shall hive the enemy yet"; "We shall sooner have the fowl by hatching the egg than by smashing it"; "Hold on with a bull-dog grip, and chew and choke as much as possible"; "I would not take any risk of being entangled upon the river, like an ox jumped half over a fence, and liable to be torn by dogs front and rear without a fair chance to gore one way or kick the other." This is the language of a man who has lived close to the soil; it is the idiom of the farm, not that of the library. When such homely but telling figures as these are grafted into a diction that is always direct, pungent, and vigorous, the result is a prose style which is not only downright American in its flavor, but also as admirable as it is unusual.

Lincoln's humor derives from the same source as the provincialisms in his diction. The stories he told, and the anecdotes that add zest to many of his speeches, were in part based on actual experiences, and in part invented to fit particular occasions. But always they show Lincoln's understanding of the world in which he lived, and his sympathy with the pioneers whom he knew and loved. One never finds Lincoln speaking wittily; his humor was more serious and more simple than wit. Like much native American humor it was occasionally tinged with coarseness—another indication of Lincoln's familiarity with the talk in the country store and the broad jests of the tavern.

But never did Lincoln's provincialism or humor detract from the dignity of his utterance when a memorable occasion offered the sort of opportunity of which he could so well take advantage. The judgment of the years, that in so far as the matter of English prose is concerned he was at his best in the Gettysburg Address and the Second Inaugural, is without doubt a correct judgment. Here, as in the letter to Mrs. Bixby, and in occasional paragraphs in various addresses, there is found that touch of genius which is at once the distinction of Lincoln's style and the mark of his personality. Rich in idea as well as in imagery, flawless in form, vibrant with an emotional quality which finds part of its expression in rhythms and cadences that defy analysis even while they are making their sure effect upon the reader's consciousness, and touching those fundamental issues of life with which the most significant literature is always concerned, these documents remain the unquestioned proof of Lincoln's greatness in the field of letters, and promise to endure as the most memorable individual works in the entire collection of American prose.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. Several excellent collected editions of Lincoln's works are available today. The selections in the present volume have been taken from The Complete Works of Abraham Lincoln, ed. Nicolay and Hay, The Century Company, N. Y. 1894, 2 vols., and from The Constitutional Edition, G. P. Putnam's Sons, N. Y. 1906, 8 vols.

BIOGRAPHIES. Biographical and critical literature is so voluminous that if any particular items are mentioned, others perhaps as valuable will surely be omitted. The most detailed life is that by Nicolay and Hay, N. Y. 1890, 10 vols. This is invaluable for matters that of necessity are omitted from briefer treatments. Miss Ida M. Tarbell's Life of Abraham Lincoln, N. Y. 1900, 2 vols., and Brand Whitlock's Abraham Lincoln, revised edition, Boston, 1916, are both readable and reliable. Lord Charnwood's Abraham Lincoln, London, 1916, has an especial interest because it represents an English point of view. Carl Sandburg's Abraham Lincoln: the Prairie Years, N. Y. 1926, 2 vols., is a highly imaginative recreation of the world in which Lincoln lived.

NOTES

AUTOBIOGRAPHY

763. On December 20, 1859, Lincoln wrote to J. W. Fell, enclosing this brief account of his life, to be used for campaign purposes. A longer and more detailed autobiography was prepared in June, 1860, and may be found in the Nicolay-Hay edition, I, 638.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLITICAL VIEWS

764. Published when Lincoln was a candidate for the position of representative in the Legislature from Sangamon County. He was elected.
b. 30. By no means excluding females. This early pronouncement in favor of woman-suffrage has been often pointed to as evidence of Lincoln's progressive attitude on political and economic matters.
b. 51. Hugh L. White. Hugh Lawson White (1773-1840) was a Tennessee banker and politician who in 1836 was both a member of the United States Senate and an independent anti-Van Buren candidate for the Presidency. He received the electoral votes of only Tennessee and Georgia.

LETTER TO JOHN D. JOHNSTON

766. Johnston was Lincoln's step-brother.

LETTER TO H. D. SHARPE

ADDRESS AT COOPER INSTITUTE

The series of debates between Lincoln and Judge Stephen A. Douglas, held in 1858, made Lincoln a figure of national interest. Though defeated by Douglas in the Senatorial campaign of which the debates were the most spectacular feature, Lincoln forced his opponent into the admission that the people of a territory could by lawful means prevent the introduction of slavery into the territory—an admission that was to make Douglas unacceptable to the South as a Presidential candidate two years later. Moreover, Lincoln's trenchant way of writing and speaking on the large issues of the campaign had already marked him as a man of power. By the time the debates had come to a close, the East was finding itself interested in Lincoln, and towards the end of 1859 he was invited to speak in the Cooper Institute at New York. The Presidential nominating conventions were still some months in the future, but the possibility that Lincoln might be the leader of the Republicans was already being discussed. It is probably no exaggeration to say that the address delivered in response to this invitation did as much as any single thing to make that possibility a fact.

The presiding officer on the evening of the address was William Cullen Bryant. It is well known that at first Lincoln seemed ill at ease and somewhat awkward. As he proceeded, however, and realized the intelligent friendliness of his audience, he quickly got rid of his initial embarrassment, and made the event one of the great triumphs in his career as a speaker.

The address is memorable on many accounts, but three considerations will impress the student most strongly: (1) It shows Lincoln as a master of facts; (2) It shows his power of organizing the facts which his own research had made available; (3) It shows him phrasing his ideas so clearly that even a hostile auditor could not fail to grasp his meaning.

771. b. 25. Dred Scott Case. In 1848 Dred Scott, a negro slave then residing in Missouri, sued for his freedom on the grounds that his owner had in 1836 taken him into Illinois, where slavery was illegal, and in 1838 into Minnesota—part of the Louisiana territory where slavery was expressly prohibited by the "Compromise of 1820." The case reached the Supreme Court of the United States in 1854, and in 1857 the decision was handed down, written by Chief Justice Taney. The decision held, in effect, that Scott was not entitled to sue for his freedom, because as a slave he was not a citizen of Missouri. The Chief Justice went further than this, however, and wrote into the decision certain obiter dicta concerning the entire matter of slavery, virtually stating that slaves were not persons but property, and as such could be taken into any free territory and held in slavery.

773. a. 6. But enough! Up to this point Lincoln has been discussing Douglas's statement quoted at the beginning of the address. He now turns to the attitude of the South towards the Republican Party, and of the Republican Party towards slavery and related questions.
774. b. 35. Harper's Ferry! John Brown! For years before his raid upon the arsenal at Harper's Ferry, October 16, 1859, John Brown (1800-1859) had been an uncompromising abolitionist. The raid, intended to start a general slave revolt, failed completely of its purpose. Brown was captured by troops under command of R. E. Lee, convicted of treason and murder, and hanged on December 2, 1859. The incident provoked the most intense bitterness at the South. See Stedman's poem, above, p. 1023.
775. a. 47. Southampton insurrection. A rising of the slaves in Southampton County, Virginia, which took place in 1831. Before the affair ended some seventy persons had lost their lives.
- b. 21. Slave revolution in Haiti. The famous insurrection of 1791, led by Toussaint L'Ouverture.
- b. 23. Gunpowder Plot. A plot to blow up the houses of Parliament at a time when the King, Ministers, and Members, should all be present. The plot was discovered, and frustrated on November 5, 1605.
776. a. 28. Orsini's attempt. On January 14, 1858, Felice Orsini attempted to assassinate Napoleon III.
- a. 38. Helper's book. The Impending Crisis in the South, and How to Meet It, by Hinton R. Helper (1829-1909), published in 1857.
- b. 36. The Supreme Court has decided. In the Dred Scott case. See note, above.

FAREWELL ADDRESS

779. Just as the train bearing Lincoln towards Washington was about to start, the President-elect appeared on the rear platform and spoke briefly to the friends and neighbors who were standing in a drizzling rain waiting "to see him off." The speech was wholly extemporaneous.

ADDRESS IN INDEPENDENCE HALL

One of several informal addresses made in the course of the journey from Springfield, Illinois, to Washington.

FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS

780. The last paragraph of this address gives interesting evidence of Lincoln's stylistic ability. As originally written, the conclusion was unsatisfactory, both to Lincoln and to Seward, who advised with Lincoln concerning the entire address. Seward submitted two suggestions for a concluding paragraph, one of little value, and the other running thus: "I close. We are not, we must not be, aliens or enemies, but fellow-countrymen and brethren. Although passion has strained our bonds of affection too hardly, they must not, I am sure they will not, be broken. The mystic chords which, proceeding from so many battlefields and so many patriot graves, pass through all the hearts and all the hearths in this broad continent of ours, will yet again harmonize in their ancient music when breathed upon by the guardian angel of the nation."

Recognizing this as more appropriate than what he had previously written, Lincoln took the general idea, and the figure of speech in Seward's last sentence, recast it all in simpler sentence structure, and gave to the whole the touch of style which was henceforth to distinguish all his work.

LETTER TO MAJOR RAMSEY

785. This letter is reprinted from the Constitutional Edition of Lincoln's works, by permission of the publishers, Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

LETTER TO GENERAL G. B. McCLELLAN

George B. McClellan (1826-1885) was one of the many Northern generals who proved unequal to the tasks assigned them. A genius at organization, and a favorite with the men of his command, he lacked the driving ability necessary in a commander confronted by men like Jackson and Lee. Not long after this letter was sent, McClellan was removed from the command of the Army of the Potomac. See the telegram to him dated October 24, 1862.

LETTER TO HORACE GREELEY

786. Horace Greeley (1811-1872), owner and editor of the New York Tribune, had supported Lincoln during the campaign, and during the trying first year of the war. By the summer of 1862, however, he had come to feel that the administration's policy as regards slavery was a temporizing one. Hence his "Open letter," entitled "A Prayer of Twenty Millions," that elicited Lincoln's reply. The third paragraph of Lincoln's letter is at once the classic statement of Lincoln's attitude towards slavery, and perhaps the best single example of his power of expressing himself with absolute clearness.

LETTER TO GENERAL JOSEPH HOOKER

787. In contrast to McClellan, who organized and planned but would not fight, "Fighting Joe Hooker" (1814-1879) was apt to fight first and do his thinking afterwards. When, after seeing McClellan and Burnside fail, Lincoln appointed him to the command of the Army of the Potomac, the President felt constrained to give his fiery subordinate some kindly counsel. The resulting letter shows Lincoln doing a difficult thing with tact but also with unmistakable firmness. The original of this letter was sold in 1924 for ten thousand dollars.

LETTER TO GENERAL U. S. GRANT

788. a. 25. The almost inestimable service. Just at the time Lee was receiving his first really serious defeat, at Gettysburg, Grant was adding to his growing fame by the capture of Vicksburg. The many letters written by Lincoln to Grant would in themselves form an interesting study. Early in the series the reader senses a new note of confidence and assurance—a note absent from the letters to McClellan and Hooker.

LETTER TO JAMES H. HACKETT

This letter to an actor occasioned Lincoln some embarrassment. With very poor taste, Hackett gave the letter to the press, and secured some "free publicity." Lincoln's critics seized on it as evidence that the President was wasting his time on trivial concerns such as literature.

ADDRESS AT THE DEDICATION OF THE GETTYSBURG CEMETERY

When it was decided to set apart a section of the Gettysburg battlefield as a national cemetery, Edward Everett was asked to make the formal address. This he did, speaking for two hours in a manner which was in keeping with the occasion, and in harmony with the "oratorical tradition" which he represented. When he had concluded, Lincoln read the three paragraphs which have become known wherever English can be understood or translations procured.

Immediately after returning to Washington Everett wrote Lincoln, saying that "I should be glad if I could flatter myself that I came as near to the central idea of the occasion in two hours as you did in two minutes."

789. a. 22. Of the people, by the people, for the people. It has been several times pointed out that Theodore Parker, in an anti-slavery address given in 1850, defined a democracy as "a government of all the people, by all the people, for all the people." See The Dial, N. Y. Oct. 25, 1917, p. 407.

MEMORANDUM

This brief prophecy of defeat at the polls, Lincoln brought to a cabinet meeting, where it was sealed, initialed by the men around the table, and filed in a drawer for future reference—all without the persons who were present being aware of its contents. The November elections showed Lincoln's prophecy to be ill-grounded. The "President-elect" referred to would have been General George McClellan.

LETTER TO MRS. BIXBY

The original of this letter is not now known to exist. On this account the authenticity of the document has at times been questioned. The entire matter was thoroughly discussed in the press during the summer of 1925, and the New York Times for August 6 and 7, 1925, contains interesting articles concerning the letter, its genuineness, and the circumstances that prompted Lincoln to write it. There still remains some doubt as to whether five or four of Mrs. Bixby's sons died in the war.

LETTER TO THURLOW WEED

790. Weed was a New York journalist and politician, a friend of Seward and Horace Greeley, and one of the most influential men in his state.

EDWARD EVERETT HALE (1822-1909)

In the eighty-seven years of Dr. Hale's life as preacher, editor, lecturer, and author, he did much that was of value to American civilization and literature, and imparted a flavor of distinction to everything that he touched. Born in Boston in 1822, graduating from Harvard in 1839, he lived most of his life within sight of the State House dome which his friend and contemporary Holmes had pronounced to be the hub of the universe. His literary work, however, was in no sense provincial, and his most famous story, The Man Without a Country, centers around a theme that is of interest wherever patriotism is esteemed a virtue.

This account of the life and death of Lieutenant Philip Nolan—a character purely imaginary, yet described so convincingly that it is hard not to believe the entire story literally true—possessed a special significance at the time it was first published. It appeared as the leading article in the Atlantic Monthly for December, 1863, and was as much a campaign document as had been some of Whittier's anti-slavery poems. It was intended to hearten those Northerners who might be in despair over the repeated failures of their armies, and to throw into disrepute the "Copperheads" who—especially in Ohio—were advocating peace with disunion and dishonor. The popularity of the story was instant and worldwide. Even in the South it was reprinted and read with eagerness, and as many copies seem to have been sold in England as in America. It remains to this day one of the classics of American letters, and one of the few American short stories that seem reasonably sure of immortality.

NOTES

THE MAN WITHOUT A COUNTRY

791. b. 25. Ross burned the public buildings. On the evening of August 24, 1814, a British force commanded by Major General Robert Ross captured Washington and burned the public buildings. Ross was killed in action a few days later.
- b. 52. Aaron Burr. No one knows just what Burr's plans were, but in 1805 he was busy in the Southwest about those plottings which later caused his arrest and trial for treason. He was acquitted of the charge.
792. a. 50. Jefferson and the House of Virginia. Jefferson was President at the time Burr came to trial for treason.
- a. 52. All the possible Clarendons. The reference is to George, Duke of Clarence (1449-1478), the brother of Edward IV. He was one of the many victims of the long struggle between the house of York and its various opponents, and was beheaded in February of 1478. See Shakespeare's Richard III.
795. a. 16. Hesiod. A Greek poet (ca. 750 B. C.), whose chief surviving works are the Works and Days and Theogony.
- a. 18. Canning. George Canning (1770-1827), British statesman and economist, who served as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Governor General of India, and Prime Minister.
- a. 42. The Lay of the Last Minstrel. The first of Scott's poetical romances, published in January, 1805.
796. b. 30. Lady Hamilton herself. Wife of Sir William Hamilton, a British diplomat, and for many years mistress of Lord Nelson.
797. b. 11. The Iron Mask. The reference is to a famous prisoner in the Bastille. He died in 1703, for the last thirty years of his life having worn a mask of iron.
- b. 13. The author of "Junius." "Junius" was the only signature appended to a series of letters attacking the British ministry, and published in London journals between 1769 and 1772. The author was probably Sir Philip Francis, though there is still some doubt concerning the matter.

b. 18. The War. The War of 1812.

798. a. 46. He was with Porter. David Porter (1780-1843). His son was an Admiral in the Civil War.

b. 10. Our French friends. The French flag was raised on the Marquesas islands in 1842.

799. a. 20. Linnaeus. Carl von Linné (1707-1778), a Swedish scientist who may fairly be called the father of modern botany.

a. 21. John Foy the idiot. The chief character in Wordsworth's Idiot Boy.

a. 39. Our slave-trade treaty. By the treaty of Ghent, which in 1814 ended the War of 1812, England and the United States covenanted to abolish the infamous "slave trade," or importation of negroes kidnapped in Africa. "The Middle Passage" was the name popularly given to that part of the Atlantic which lay between the West Indies and Africa.

800. a. 25. The deus ex machina. Literally, "The god from the machine." In Greek drama, when it became necessary for an actor impersonating one of the gods to appear on the scene and bring the action to a happy ending, he was lowered to the stage by machinery.

802. b. 4. The Vallandingham and Tatnalls. Clement Vallandingham was the "Copperhead" candidate for the governorship of Ohio in 1863. Hale intended his story to appear before the election, in the hope that it might influence the result. It was not published, however, till after the defeat of the Copperheads at the polls. Joseph Tatnall resigned his commission in the United States navy to follow his state into secession.

803. b. 50. To ask about the Chesapeake. In 1807 the U. S. S. Chesapeake was fired upon by the British frigate Leopard, which then sent an armed boat to board the American vessel and remove four seamen claimed by the British as deserters from the English navy. This particular episode, involving the "right of search," was one of the dramatic incidents which occasioned the War of 1812.

805. a. 8. The Order of the Cincinnati. An association of officers of the American Revolutionary forces.

DAVID ROSS LOCKE (1833-1888) (“PETROLEUM V. NASBY”)

Among the humorists who entertained America during the years just following the Civil War, David Ross Locke is the one whose political satire seems at once most trenchant and most readable. Following the fashion of the hour, he adopted a picturesque pen-name, and like "Bill Arp," "Josh Billings," "Artemus Ward," and others of his contemporaries, employed a bizarre sort of spelling that represented no spoken dialect whatsoever, but lent an amusing sort of tang to his work. Despite this veneer of what might seem affectation, the Nasby Letters are genuinely humorous, and hit off with power and deftness certain aspects of the political situation following the war.

Locke first began to issue these letters in April, 1861, in the Findlay, Ohio, Jeffersonian, of which he was editor. Previous to this time he had worked as printer, reporter, and editor, on various Western journals, but had done nothing to attract attention. The personage of "Petroleum V. Nasby," however, caught the public fancy, and before long became much such a character in American letters as Finley P. Dunne's "Mr. Dooley" was to be half a century later.

After Mark Twain's Innocents Abroad (1868) had set the fashion for a new sort of "travel-book," Locke undertook a similar work, sending his character Nasby to Europe, and chronicling his adventures in a way which more than occasionally suggests Clemens's vein. But the political satire produced in the earlier days was more sincere and more timely, and it is by this that Locke will be known. He died in 1888, in Toledo, Ohio, where for many years he had been proprietor and editor of The Blade.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Locke's work is not available in any collected edition. The following titles, however, are not difficult to obtain, and are representative of his best vein: The Nasby Papers, Indianapolis, 1865; Ekkoes from Kentucky, Boston, 1867; The Impending Crisis of the Democracy, Toledo, 1868; Inflation at the Cross-Roads, N. Y. 1875.

NOTES

MR. NASBY FINDS A NEW BUSINESS

805. b. 24. Destroyed by Buell. During the early part of the war General D. C. Buell (1818-1898) was in command of the Federal forces in Kentucky and Tennessee.

806. a. 51. General Morgan. General John Hunt Morgan (1825-1864), the famous Confederate cavalry leader, one of whose raids took him as far as the suburbs of Cincinnati.

b. 21. He voted fer Micklellan and Seymour. General George B. McClellan (1826-1885), whom Lincoln had been forced twice to depose from the command of the Army of the Potomac, was

- a Presidential candidate in 1864 on the Democratic ticket, but was defeated. Horatio Seymour (1810-1886), the able and vigorous governor of New York during the latter part of the war, was the Democratic candidate in 1868, but was defeated by General Grant.
- b. 26. The Ku Klux. The society founded during the reconstruction period to control the blacks and "carpet-baggers," and retain some semblance of white supremacy in the occupied regions.

MR. NASBY LOSES HIS POST OFFICE

808. b. 5. A. Johnson. The reference, of course, is to Andrew Johnson (1808-1875), Vice-president when Lincoln was assassinated, and afterwards President. In 1868 he narrowly escaped impeachment, and virtually the entire country was relieved when on March 4, 1869, he relinquished the Presidency to General U. S. Grant.

HENRY W. GRADY (1851-1889)

Grady was a journalist and lecturer who made it his chief task, during the mature years of his life, to help re-establish the good feeling between the North and South which the Civil War had destroyed. Born in Georgia in 1851, and educated at the University of Georgia, he served an apprenticeship as reporter for the New York Herald, and in 1880 returned to his native state as editor and part owner of the Atlanta Constitution. On the twenty-first of December, 1886, he was one of the speakers at the annual dinner of the New England Society of New York City, and took the occasion to make the remarks which bear the well-known title, The New South. The address was at once reprinted far and wide, and was of no slight influence in enabling the North and South to meet once more on terms of amity. During the three years of life that remained to him, Grady wrote and spoke extensively on the same general topic; but the New England Society address remains the best known and most influential of his works. He died in Georgia in December, 1889.

BRET HARTE (1839-1902)

"Bret Harte," says Mr. Fred L. Pattee in his History of American Literature since 1870, "is the writer of the epic of the gold rush of the middle century in America, and whatever the quality of the epic may be, it can never be forgotten." The sentence sums up what is certainly the most significant fact concerning Harte's literary accomplishment. Despite his many attempts to write about themes other than the "Golden West," he is remembered today because of a sheaf of short stories in which he re-created the picturesque conditions of life which the world will always think of—whether rightly or wrongly is small matter—as characteristic of California during the two decades following the discovery of gold at Sutter's mill. It was his good fortune to be in California at the time the gold rush was at its height. With the instinct of a trained and successful reporter he seized upon the most picturesque elements of that epic adventure. He heightened the contrasts which in cold fact were already sharp and dramatic, humanized the entire picture by placing in the foreground a handful of characters portrayed realistically yet sympathetically, and threw over it all a glamor of romantic sentimentalism which it is easy to tag as reminiscent of Dickens, but which none the less—in combination with the other elements referred to—won for Harte a popularity that extended to all the English-speaking world.

Curiously enough, only a brief portion of his life was spent in California. Born in 1839, in Albany, New York, where his father was a school teacher, he first saw the Pacific Ocean in 1854, when his widowed mother moved her family to San Francisco. Here, as a lad of fifteen, he proved more interested in reading poetry and fiction than in sharing the adventurous existence which California offered to him. When he had to support himself, he set type, as Mark Twain was doing in Hannibal, or served behind the counter in a drug store, as O. Henry was to do twenty years later in Greensboro, or—possibly—turned an occasional shovelful of dirt on a mining claim. The details of his life are doubtful enough, let his biographers do what they can to clear up the uncertainties. But the general outlines, the significant facts, are obvious, and easily grasped.

It is certain, for instance, that Bret Harte lived in California more as an observer of events than as an active participator. He "knocked around" from one job to another, and found his most congenial employment on various newspapers and magazines where he acted as compositor, proof-reader, errand-boy, or editor. It is clear that like Mark Twain and O. Henry he gave much time to learning to write, albeit he was far more imitative in his early work than either of the two persons with whom he is often compared. Gradually he became known around San Francisco as something of a man of letters, and by 1863 had the satisfaction of seeing his Legend of Monte del Diablo in the Atlantic Monthly. It was during these years that he met Mark Twain, and gave him a position writing for the journal of which Harte at the time chanced to be editor. In 1868 he was chosen editor of the newly-established Overland Monthly. The second issue contained his Luck of Roaring Camp—and with the publication of that story Harte's fame spread from San Francisco to New York and London.

As if for good measure he followed this first great story with The Outcasts of Poker Flat and Tennessee's Partner, and by 1870 had become so much of a figure that the Atlantic offered him ten thousand dollars for a year's output. Accepting the offer eagerly, he at once left California, and journeyed back to the east from which he had come. He was never again to see the Golden Gate.

The rest of his story is peculiarly insipid. For seven years he remained in the vicinity of New York, writing. Then he went abroad on a consular appointment to Germany. From 1888 till his death in 1902 he lived in London, still writing assiduously, but never approaching the accomplishment of his first glorious outburst.

The significance of this accomplishment, which is fairly represented by the two stories printed in this volume, is not difficult to state, although the importance of the work under consideration is in no way commensurate with the brevity of the statement. For one thing, it is clear that Harte is perhaps the most important figure in the transition from the dreamy romances of Irving and the other-worldly vignettes of Hawthorne, to the more realistic short stories of the present. Once he had written his tales of California, it was but a short step to O. Henry and The Four Million. Again, he enriched American fiction immensely by popularizing the element which for want of a more specific term one calls "local color." The provincialisms, the dialectical peculiarities, the entire flavor of a story like Tennessee's Partner—all this was relatively new in America, and proved as appealing as it was novel. Finally, when he was at his best, he was without any qualification a great artist, dealing with one of the most difficult and elusive of prose types, and developing such a technical mastery of the type that some few of his tales must be included in any catalogue of the world's greatest short stories. It is easy, therefore, to forgive him his sentimental proclivities, and to close one's eyes to the fact that California in the Golden Age may not have been exactly as Bret Harte pictured it.

Harte's work is available in The Writings of Bret Harte, Standard Library Edition, Boston, 1896-1903, 20 vols. His poems are to be had in the one volume Household Edition, Boston. The only extensive biography is H. C. Merwin's Life of Bret Harte, Boston, 1911.

THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH (1836-1907)

Aldrich was one of the large number of American men of letters who wrote with sufficient power to attain contemporary fame in both prose and verse without achieving great distinction in either. In the case of Aldrich, however, his further work as editor of the Atlantic Monthly raised him to a position well above that of an author like Bayard Taylor, but far from the height of Lowell. Occasionally, as in Marjorie Daw (p. 825), he produced a masterpiece of prose; and among the great body of his lyrics there are a few, such as the Longfellow (p. 1022), which rank among the best of their respective types. Again as with many of his countrymen, the man's character and personality were to his contemporaries integral parts of his literary equipment.

Born in 1836, Aldrich has set forth the pranks and friendships of his boyhood days in Portsmouth ("Rivermouth") in his autobiographical Story of a Bad Boy (1869). On the death of his father in 1852 he gave up his plans for college and tried banking in New York City, but in 1855 he turned definitely to literature as a profession, becoming associated in turn with the New York Evening Mirror, the Home Journal, and Every Saturday, while from 1881 to 1890 he edited the Atlantic Monthly. After marrying and taking up his work in Boston, Aldrich lived for some time in the village of Ponkapog, but for two years, during the absence of Lowell, he occupied Elmwood (see p. 1020). Throughout his later life he wrote extensively, making himself known as short story writer, novelist, and lyric poet. He travelled widely, circling the globe twice, received honorary degrees from several American universities, and died in Boston on March 19, 1907.

NOTES

MARJORIE DAW

825. Published in the Atlantic Monthly and in book form (Marjorie Daw and Other People) in 1873. By 1885 seventeen editions of the volume had been printed. The story furnishes an almost perfect example of the surprise ending—an ending which is not generally anticipated by the reader but which on analysis proves to be the most logical of all that were possible. A modification of the type has been used with great success by later writers, notably O. Henry.
826. b. 2. Fidus Achates. Faithful Achates was the intimate companion of Æneas; hence the term means "faithful friend."

FRANCIS MARION CRAWFORD
(1854-1909)

The inclusion of Marion Crawford in the present collection is incidentally an acknowledgment of his ability as a novelist, but principally an effort to set forth the literary ideals of a conservative romanticist of the past generation. There has been of late a good deal of question-begging discussion of "the triumph of realism" in poetry and fiction, by critics whose personal bias is self-evident. To offset this prejudice and to stimulate sounder thinking, the student will find Crawford's moderate statement of his views unusually valuable, as coming from an author of unquestioned success.

Crawford was born in Italy in 1854, the son of an American sculptor, and was educated in the United States, England, Germany, and Italy. An enthusiastic student of Sanscrit, he spent some time in India during the seventies, and on his return to the United States he was advised by his uncle, Samuel Ward (a brother of Julia Ward Howe), to put some of his experiences of life in India into the form of a novel. This he did, five years before the appearance of Kipling's Plain Tales from the Hills, and the resulting volume, Mr. Isaacs (1882), was so immediately popular that Crawford devoted himself assiduously to fiction and became one of the most prolific of the American novelists. The latter part of his life was spent largely at Sorrento, on the Bay of Naples, where he enjoyed the prosperity that came from producing over forty volumes, chiefly of fiction. Having travelled extensively himself, he chose his settings from all over the world, but the books that are most admired are those dealing with the Italian life in which he was completely at home; of these the best are the Saracinesca series: Saracinesca (1887), Sant' Ilario (1889), Don Orsino (1892), and Corleone (1897).

HENRY JAMES (1843-1916)

Whether James should be considered an American, by virtue of his American ancestry, birth, and early education, or an Englishman, by virtue of his long residence in London and naturalization as a British subject in 1915, is a question of some interest though of little importance. He belongs to both peoples; he was a man of unique Anglo-American relationships; and, because of the high quality of his art, he was a member of the relatively small group of novelists who have come to assume international significance. Not everyone reads James's fiction with enthusiasm; his criticism, likewise, is too acute and subtle to find favor with the multitude. But despite the lack of popular applause which many persons of essentially smaller talents have succeeded in winning, James's position is as assured as is possible in the case of a man whose work must be viewed in the short perspective of half a century. It is already clear that as an analyst of human emotion, or, to use the well-known phrase, as a psychological novelist, he belongs with George Eliot and Meredith. It is beyond cavil that in the architectonics of fiction James had few peers, and in English at least, no superiors. The great public may never read his books, but other novelists have turned to them with avidity, and have been eager to acknowledge his mastership. Furthermore, it is impossible to read a chapter of one of James's books without recognizing and admiring his sheer intellectual power, a power which may at times serve as a drag on his story-telling ability, but is nevertheless one of the clearest marks of his distinction.

To understand James's fiction, one should have in mind the story of his life, especially as it concerns that process of denationalization to which he was early and intentionally subjected by his father. The materials for such a story are at hand in his own autobiographical volumes, A Small Boy and Others (1913), Notes of a Son and Brother (1914), and The Middle Years (1917). If to these one adds The Letters of Henry James (1920, 2 vols.), and supplements the entire group by The Letters of William James (1921, 2 vols.), one will have clearly in mind the main outlines of his story, though one may still be baffled by some phases of James's development.

One should remember, in considering James's life, that he was the son of Henry James, Senior, a distinguished American scholar and metaphysician, whose essays lent dignity to the pages of the Atlantic and North American Review long before his son's first story appeared in the former journal. One should remember, too, that it was part of the elder James's system to bring up his sons in such a fashion that they should escape, if possible, the provincialisms of their native land. Consequently, though the boy was born in New York, his early education was derived in more than half a dozen centers of European culture, and closed—oddly enough—with a period of study in the Harvard Law School. Kept out of the Civil War by ill health, James took to writing, and under the friendly encouragement of Howells had succeeded by 1868 in publishing a number of stories in the Atlantic and the Galaxy. In 1869, and again in 1872-73, he made extended trips to Europe, and found in the civilization of the old world the quintessence of something generally lacking in the United States. In 1875 he definitely abandoned all attempts to live in the United States, and began what was to prove a permanent residence in London. "Live all you can; it's a mistake not to," he makes one of his characters say in The Ambassadors. It was in pursuit of this goal of a full, vivid, intellectual life, that James abandoned America for Europe.

Many years before his death he had thus virtually expatriated himself, though not till the United States, after the sinking of the Lusitania, failed at once to declare war, did James make the final gesture by renouncing his citizenship, and becoming a subject of King George. Immediately on completion of this act he received from his sovereign the Order of Merit, only to die in London in 1916.

During his last forty years, James had been incessantly active in his chosen calling. The works which he published during this period—novels, tales, plays, and critical essays,—are so numerous, and the changes between his early and later manners of writing are so striking, that it is difficult to make any brief statement about his aims and achievements which will not be misleading. Yet wherever one turns in James's fiction—the most important phase of his work—one realizes that he was an observer of life, not a man of action, and that the particular thing which most interested him was the analysis of human motives. He left the United States, in part at least, to find social centers where the physical needs of man were cared for so automatically, where the struggle against the forces of nature had been over for so many years, and where the routine of life was so well established, that he could study without distraction the comedies and tragedies of the human soul. His novels and tales are his varied and fascinating accounts of this study.

The student who wishes to become familiar with James's work, especially as it is best represented in the novels, should by all means begin with his earlier publications, say, for instance, The American (1877), and The Europeans (1878). In the former James takes Christopher Newman to Europe, where, as he later put it, he is "insidiously beguiled and cruelly wronged, . . . the point being in especial that he should suffer at the hands of persons pretending to represent the highest possible civilization, and to be of an order in every way superior to his own." In The Europeans the situation is reversed, and two visitors from England serve as foils to set off some of the American traits which James considered least worthy.

With the publication of these two books, James appeared as virtually the creator of what has since been called the "international novel." An International Episode (1879), Daisy Miller (1879), and The Portrait of a Lady (1881) continue in the same spacious field, and illustrate James's all-absorbing interest in analyzing and depicting human character. Indeed, his picturing of Isabel Archer, "heroine" of the last book, is so deft, so subtle, and so plausible, that one hesitates not to call the story which shapes itself around her, James's best novel.

By the time one has read these five books, one may well go on to The Princess Cassamassa (1886), The Aspern Papers (1888), The Tragic Muse (1890), or even, perhaps, The Ambassadors (1903) and The Golden Bowl (1904). In the last two one finds oneself baffled by the mannerisms of style and method which became more and more obvious as James grew older. To say that his later style is involved almost to the point of being ridiculous, is hardly to overstate the matter. Here, for instance, are three sentences, culled from the Preface (1909) to the volume containing a revised form of The Real Thing, which account for the origin of the story and illustrate James's stylistic peculiarities:

"In like manner my much-loved friend George du Maurier had spoken to me of a call from a strange and striking couple desirous to propose themselves as artist's models for his weekly 'social' illustrations to Punch, and the acceptance of whose services would have entailed the dismissal of an undistinguished but highly expert pair, also husband and wife, who had come to him from far back on the irregular day and whom, thanks to a happy, and to that extent lucrative, appearance of 'type' on the part of each, he had reproduced, to the best effect, in a thousand drawing-room attitudes and combinations. Exceedingly modest members of society, they earned their bread by looking and, with the aid of supplied toggery, dressing, greater favourites of fortune to the life; or, otherwise expressed, by skilfully feigning a virtue not in the least native to them. Here meanwhile were their so handsome proposed, so anxious, so almost haggard competitors, originally, by every sign, of the best condition and estate, but overtaken by reverses even while conforming impeccably to the standard of superficial 'smartness' and pleading with well-bred ease and the right light tone, not to say with feverish gaiety, that (as in the interest of art itself) they at least should n't have to 'make believe.'"

The fact of course is that James became so concerned with the minute and subtle shades, gradations, and differentiations, in his analysis of human conduct, that he failed to hold himself to the major task of telling the story, or even to the relatively simple one of writing so that the ordinary reader could understand him. One wishes, while reading The Ambassadors, as one does while reading Joseph Conrad's Arrow of Gold, that the author had forgotten himself occasionally, forgotten his concern with the soul-stuff of his characters, and given free rein to his genius for absorbing narrative. Had he been able to make this one concession to the frailty of his readers, he would have found few novelists, the world over, entitled to stand beside him. Carl Van Doren's summary puts the case so well that the last four sentences must be quoted as they stand: "He is the creator of a world immensely beautiful in its own right: a world of international proportions, peopled by charming human beings who live graceful lives in settings lovely almost beyond description; a world which vibrates with the finest instincts and sentiments and trembles at vulgarity and ugliness; a world full of works of art and learning and intelligence, a world infinitely refined, a world perfectly civilized. In real life the danger to such a world is that it may be overwhelmed by some burly rush of actuality from without. In literature the danger is that such a world will gradually fade out as dreams fade, and as the old romances of feudalism have already faded. Elaborate systems of decorum pass away; it is only the simpler manners of men which live forever." (The American Novel, N. Y. 1921; p. 220.)

EDITIONS. The New York Edition of James's novels and tales, N. Y. 1907-1917, 26 vols., is the best collected edition. For this he wrote the famous prefaces which not only explain the origins of the various works, but—what is more important—set forth in extenso James's critical theories.

BIOGRAPHICAL AND CRITICAL ARTICLES. There is as yet no adequate life of James. Joseph Warren Beach's The Method of Henry James, New Haven, 1918, is an admirable book with which to begin the study of James's novels. An essay by Howells, Mr. Henry James's Later Work, published originally in the North American Review for January, 1903, and reprinted in April, 1916, and one by Joseph Conrad, Henry James: An Appreciation, published in the same journal in January, 1905, and also reprinted in April, 1916, are especially interesting because of their authorship. For other suggestions, consult the C. H. A. L. James's own autobiographical works have been listed in the preceding account of his life.

THE REAL THING

842. Here printed in its original (1893) form. An interesting illustration of James's fondness for revising his own work may be had by comparing a few paragraphs of this version with the 1909 text in The Novels and Tales of Henry James, New York Edition, vol. xviii, p. 305.

JOHN BURROUGHS (1837-1921)

Burroughs' long life was given wholeheartedly to the study of that Nature which he did so much to present to American writers. Born in Roxbury, New York, in 1837, he grew up on a farm, with but little formal education, and with—apparently—few opportunities for outgrowing the somewhat restricted life to which fate seemed to have devoted him. He tried his hand at school-teaching, held a government clerkship in Washington (where he met Walt Whitman and came to know him intimately) from 1864 to 1873, was a national bank examiner from 1873 to 1884, and in 1884 retired to his home at West Park, New York. There he spent the rest of his life, "devoting his time to literature and fruit culture," as he modestly put it. He died in 1921.

The best discussion of one interesting phase of Burroughs' life, his changing attitude towards the problems which the scientific study of life was emphasizing, is Norman Foerster's chapter on Burroughs, in his Nature in American Literature, N. Y. 1923. But throughout the entire five decades of his literary productivity, and despite the many variations in his philosophical outlook, he remained unaltered in his love of the outdoor world and his ability to interpret it to others. As early as 1867, in his Notes on Walt Whitman (which he subsequently expanded into Walt Whitman: a Study, 1896) he had written the following self-revealing sentences: "From childhood I was familiar with the homely facts of the barn, and of cattle and horses; the sugar making in the maple woods in early spring; the work of the corn-field, hay-field, potato-field; the delicious fall months with their pigeon and squirrel shooting; threshing of buckwheat, gathering of apples, and burning of fallows; in short, everything that smacked of, and led to, the open air and its exhilarations. I belonged, as I may say, to them; and my substance and taste, as they grew, assimilated them as truly as my body did its food. I loved a few books much; but I loved Nature, in all those material examples and subtle expressions, with a love passing all the books of the world."

To the end of his days Burroughs continued to live in this same intimate relationship with the world of Nature, and his great contribution to American literature consists of a long series of volumes by the aid of which others may enjoy what Burroughs knew so intimately.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Burroughs' most important writings are available in The Collected Works of John Burroughs, Boston, 1922, 12 vols. His best known single works are Wake Robin, Boston, 1871, in which he first appeared as the sympathetic interpreter of Nature; Birds and Poets, Boston, 1877, a similar collection of descriptive essays; Locusts and Wild Honey, Boston, 1879; Whitman: A Study, New York, 1896; Literary Values, Boston, 1904; Accepting the Universe, Boston, 1910; The Summit of the Years, Boston, 1913; and The Last Harvest, Boston, 1922. My Boyhood: An Autobiography, N. Y. 1922, is the best source of information about his early life; Clifton Johnson's John Burroughs Talks, Boston, 1922, is valuable for the light it throws on his personality and ideals during his later years.

NOTES

BIRDS'-NESTS

857. This essay, from the Atlantic Monthly for June, 1869, shows Burroughs in a characteristic rôle at the very beginning of his literary career.

SAMUEL LANGHORNE CLEMENS (1835-1910) ("MARK TWAIN")

The student who finds himself interested in the astonishing phenomenon which the world knows as Mark Twain, should begin his reading with Albert B. Paine's admirable Mark Twain: A Biography (N. Y. 1912, 3 vols.); second, he might turn to Mark Twain's Letters (N. Y. 1917, 2 vols.), edited by the same competent critic. Mary Lawton's A Life-time with Mark Twain (N. Y. 1925) should perhaps come next; and by the time one has completed the pleasant task of reading these three works, one will be in a position to enjoy with intelligence the twenty-five volumes of Mark Twain's collected works, and to estimate more or less for oneself his significance in American literature, and will be in reasonably sure possession of the chief facts concerning Clemens's picturesque personality and equally picturesque career.

Picturesque: the adjective is perhaps the first that comes to mind as one thinks over Mark Twain's seventy-five years of adventurous life. He was picturesque to look at, with his white clothes, white hair and moustache, deep-set, blue eyes, and rolling, slouching gait—a combination of personal attributes that made him a marked man in any group. The most striking fact concerning his psychological make-up has also its picturesque interest: he was at once pessimist and optimist, a confirmed cynic, and an incurable idealist. As regards the here and now, the race of human beings as he saw it all around him, he saw little occasion for hopefulness; he knew too well our manifold shortcomings, our hypocrisies and self-deceptions. "Poor old Methuselah," he exclaimed in a characteristic outburst, "how ever could he have endured so many years of human existence." Yet only the most superficial of readers would be content to find in this, or in the scores of similar remarks that lie scattered throughout his writing, Mark Twain's final verdict on life. To turn the pages of Joan of Arc, or of the essay In Defence of Harriet Shelley, is to realize that the habitual note of cynicism is but a sort of protective armor, and that Clemens, as surely as his contemporary Walt Whitman, knew that truth and honor and unselfishness and purity were still to be found in human hearts, though often concealed beneath the most unpromising of exteriors. He knew the race of men as few Americans have ever known it. Towards the close of his life, when his whole outlook was embittered by painful illness, and when his ideally happy family life had been shattered by the death of his wife and three children, he published The Mysterious Stranger, an almost Swiftian attack on the entire scheme of things. But one should always remember the circumstances under which this indictment was drawn; "the real Mark Twain" was the Mark Twain of the eighteen-eighties,—a firm believer in boys and girls and men and women, and in the world in which they lived their happy lives.

And surely it was a picturesque career which Clemens fashioned for himself. Born in Florida, Missouri, on November 30, 1835, he was the son of a restless and easy-going old-time pioneer, who had left Virginia in the sure conviction that happiness and fortune, which had hitherto eluded him, were to be had "across the mountains," "beyond the next river," "out west." In quest of the pot of gold, he had moved and moved again, till finally he found himself precariously settled on the western shore of the Mississippi River, in Hannibal, Missouri, where in 1847 he tired of the game, and departed on his Last Adventure.

The boy Sam promptly went to work to help support the family—running errands, setting type, and delivering papers for his brother Orion, who was finding in the editorship of the Hannibal Journal one of the many occupations to which from time to time he turned his hand. For the next ten years the lad followed with more or less regularity his trade as a printer. He made himself an admirable compositor, as Benjamin Franklin had done under somewhat similar circumstances over a century before, and like Franklin wrote an occasional paragraph for the paper on which he was employed. By 1853 he found life in Hannibal too circumscribed for anyone who had inherited his father's fondness for roving adventure, and before long had worked his way to New York and Philadelphia, still setting type, and reading in the Printers' Library which Franklin had founded in the city of his adoption.

It is interesting to speculate on what might have happened had Clemens been possessed of Franklin's "industry and frugality," and had he settled down to make his living in Philadelphia. But the speculation is futile, for in 1857 one finds him back in St. Louis, recalled from the east by the lure of the Mississippi River, beside which he had grown up, and which was then in the heyday of its importance as the chief artery of traffic throughout the center of the continent. As a boy he had fallen under the romantic spell of the river, and had long cherished the ambition of some day becoming a member of the glorious fraternity of pilots. Consequently it is no surprise to find that in the spring of 1857 he persuaded Horace Bixby to take him on as a "cub," and began, under the tutelage of that superlatively skillful navigator, the long task of "learning the river."

When Clemens thus committed himself to the task of mastering the bars and points and channels and bends of the river from St. Louis to New Orleans, he may fairly be said to have entered upon the second phase of his career: the years from 1857 to 1870, when he experienced to the full all that western America had to offer in the way of adventure, and made the first of what were to prove numerous trips to Europe in search of still more romantic experiences. The story of these golden years begins with the account of his life as "Bixby's cub"—a story that he himself has told in Life on the Mississippi. The book as a whole is markedly uneven; but the first twenty chapters, which contain the record of his life in the pilot-house, reproduce with complete accuracy (so far as the major facts are concerned) Mark Twain's own experiences as a pilot, and also paint a fascinating and colorful picture of a phase of American civilization which has now passed beyond recall.

When the Mississippi was closed to navigation on the outbreak of the Civil War, Clemens, who had just received his license as a pilot, found himself out of a job. His brother Orion, however, had recently been appointed Secretary of the Territory of Nevada, and was only too glad to have his younger and more able brother Sam go with him to the gold fields of the west. Consequently he left the Mississippi valley and turned towards the mountains, as happy and care-free as a youngster going to a circus.

For an account of Clemens's experiences during the next three years, one reads Roughing It—a book which, like Life on the Mississippi, is substantially accurate concerning general conditions, albeit not to be implicitly trusted for details. To turn the pages of this chronicle is to discover that Clemens set out to make a fortune with his miner's pick and shovel, and that he failed; but that in the course of his three years' wanderings he made a "find" worth more to him than any pocket or vein of gold: he discovered that he could write, and that other people took delight in reading what he had written.

In 1864 he gave up mining for journalism in San Francisco. In 1866 he visited Hawaii as correspondent for the Sacramento Union, wrote a series of letters describing his experiences, and on his return recounted his adventures in the first of what was to prove a life-long series of popular and humorous lectures. By this time he was well known in California, though unheard of in the east. But in the spring of 1867 he joined the Quaker City expedition to the Holy Land, recounted his experiences in letters to the New York Tribune as well as to the Sacramento paper which had commissioned him to make the trip, and in 1869 published the entire record as The Innocents Abroad. With the appearance of this volume, published in Hartford, Connecticut, Mark Twain became a figure of national importance.

The next year, 1870, saw him married to Olivia Langdon, of Elmira, New York, and also marked the opening of the last period of his life—the forty years in which he made himself the distinguished man of letters whom the entire world came to know and love. For a detailed record of these four decades one must turn to Paine's biography; the story is too fascinating to be marred by condensation. Suffice it to say here that they were years of great happiness and astonishing accomplishment, though shadowed by financial disaster and domestic bereavement. Twice he found himself virtually bankrupt, the very considerable sums his writing and lecturing had brought in, dissipated by his own lack of business sense and unconquerable eagerness for "getting rich quick." Each time, however, he did what Scott had done half a century before, and repaid to the penny not only his legal but also what he considered his moral obligations. Three of his four children, as well as his wife, preceded him to the grave. In 1907 he went to England to receive the degree of Doctor of Literature from Oxford University, and found in this symbol of his European recognition virtually the only relief from the lonely sadness of his last years. He died on April 21, 1910.

The student who wishes to discover for himself what Mark Twain accomplished during the forty years of his literary life, might well think of his writings as falling into three groups. First, there are the three great books centering around Clemens's own experiences on or beside the Mississippi River: The Adventures of Tom Sawyer (1876), Life on the Mississippi (1883), and The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1884). Second, there is the group of books in which he is still coining his own experiences into literature, but which leads one far from the river beside which he grew up: The Innocents Abroad (1869), Roughing It (1872), A Tramp Abroad (1880), and Following the Equator (1897). Finally, there are several books of a more varied sort, diverse in theme and method, of which the following are perhaps most certainly worth while: The Prince and the Pauper (1882), A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court (1889), Joan of Arc (1896), How to Tell a Story, and Other Essays (1897), Christian Science (1907), The Mysterious Stranger (1916), and What is Man? (1917). The student who knows these books, may fairly say that he knows Mark Twain at his best.

To read such a list of selections from Mark Twain's collected works is to enjoy an experience which can be duplicated nowhere else in the library of American literature. Here, in Dryden's phrase, "is God's plenty." To match this output one must go beyond the confines of the new world—to Chaucer, or Dickens, or Rabelais. And in thinking over such a representation of Mark Twain's work as these selections present, one realizes that there are three or four things which can be said concerning his total accomplishment, and his position in literature.

First of all, he made humanity laugh. Not California alone, nor the West, nor the United States, but—as his world tour triumphantly demonstrated—readers of all climes and races found delight in the humor which at first seemed to be Mark Twain's chief stock in trade. Here is humor compounded of broad jest and sheer burlesque, of unexpected incongruity and subtle contrast. Here is colossal exaggeration concealing the kernel of truth, and the casual remark, made with artless seriousness, which proves on second thought to be more mirth-provoking than the obviously farcical anecdote. And the whole world laughed at this humor which Mark Twain offered it.

If such a statement as this is virtually obvious, it is almost as obvious that Mark Twain made the world think. He was moralist as well as humorist, and could have said with Stevenson, "I would rise from my grave to preach a sermon." To search his volumes for the subjects on which he was most sure to indulge his fondness for homiletics is unnecessary; once more the truth is patent. Sincerity and democracy were the themes on which he never tired of writing, and for the constant reiteration of which the shortcomings of the human race seemed ample justification. From the lighthearted banter of Innocents Abroad through the almost reverent restraint of Joan of Arc and on to the mordant irony of The Mysterious Stranger, he is tireless in ringing the changes on these two motifs, till at the end he seemed more concerned with this serious side of his work than with the lighter.

Again, whether one finds him in the mood of the preacher or the jester, Mark Twain was always—after his boyish experiments—a sure master of his chosen art. He could write so well that at times one is tempted to call this particular phase of his accomplishment the most significant matter of all. In his own special field of humorous anecdote he was without any peer, so far as American letters are concerned. But he was in no sense limited to one genre. With a versatility which but few of his contemporaries possessed, he could describe some changing and evanescent mood of "the river," or hit off in half a dozen lines the character of some person who had caught his fancy, or picture the beauty of a sunset on Lake Tahoe, or send the shafts of his invective ringing against the armor of hypocrisy, or touch with reverence and awe upon the deepest emotions and most moving experiences of human life. And almost never does he strike a false note. If the sophisticated critic thinks that Mark Twain was "a mere journalist," let him read such a paragraph as his description of the Sphinx—and revise his opinion:

"After years of waiting, it was before me at last. The great face was so sad, so earnest, so longing, so patient. There was a dignity not of earth in its mien, and in its countenance a benignity such as never anything human wore. It was stone, but it seemed sentient. If ever image of stone thought, it was thinking. . . . All who know what pathos there is in memories of days that are accomplished and faces that have vanished—albeit only a trifling score of years gone by—will have some appreciation of the pathos that dwells in those grave eyes that look so steadfastly back upon the things they knew before History was born—before Tradition had being—things that were, and forms that moved, in a vague era which even Poetry and Romance scarce know of—and passed one by one away and left the stony dreamer solitary in the midst of a strange new age, and uncomprehended scenes.” To match such a portrait, one must turn to Carlyle, for Clemens was a master of words, a great artist, who saw what other people are blind to in the world around them, and who possessed the rare skill of reproducing what he had seen, that others as well as he might enjoy the beauty of the vision.

Finally, it is without doubt in point to suggest that in all his best work he was at once sturdily independent, and unqualifiedly American. His intellectual independence need not be argued. It is apparent in everything he wrote after, say, Innocents Abroad. His best pages are as inimitable as The Ancient Mariner. With equal confidence can it be said that the qualities in his work which differentiate it from that of any other of the world's great humorists, are qualities which may fairly be called American. The tang and flavor of the west, of the Mississippi valley and the gold fields, are in all the books which the world knows best. There too, as in the man himself, is the curious blending of idealism and materialism, of frank acquisitiveness and careless generosity, which Europe—probably rightly—thinks characteristic of America. There is the uncertain taste, redeemed by the sound heart, the boyish delight in adventure strangely intermingled with the brooding melancholy of the pioneer—the man who has seen the dawn grow red on lonely mountain tops, and watched the sun sink behind the horizon rim of desolate prairie and alkali desert. Yes, it would be as hard to “place” Mark Twain anywhere save in the America which he knew so well, as it would be to think of Dickens as uninfluenced by the sights and smells and sounds of London streets and alleys.

Humorist, preacher, artist, and downright Yankee: something like that seems to be our conception of Mark Twain. It is all summed up in the comprehensive phrase which Howells applied to him—“the Lincoln of our literature.”

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. The most widely read of Mark Twain's works—such as those listed above—may be found in the original editions in any large library. His collected works were published in 1910, in 25 vols., by Harper's. The Mysterious Stranger and What is Man? were published posthumously, in 1916 and 1917 respectively.

BIOGRAPHIES. Albert B. Paine's Mark Twain: A Biography, N. Y., 1912, 3 vols., is an admirable study, which may be supplemented by the same critic's edition of Mark Twain's Letters, N. Y., 1917, 2 vols. Mary Lawton's A Life-time with Mark Twain is the re-telling of Katie Leary's story of her thirty-five years of domestic service in the Clemens family. Mark Twain's Autobiography, N. Y., 1924, 2 vols., is an omnium gatherum of autobiographical material, the most interesting sections of which had previously appeared in magazine form.

CRITICAL ARTICLES. W. D. Howells's My Mark Twain, N. Y., 1910, is a fascinating study by one who was an intimate friend of the Clemens family, and is perhaps the best of the many critical discussions of Mark Twain that have yet appeared. For other suggestions, consult the C. H. A. L. bibliography, IV, 635 ff.

NOTES

LIFE ON THE MISSISSIPPI

866. During the first seven months of 1875 Mark Twain published, in the Atlantic Monthly, a series of papers entitled Old Times on the Mississippi. Eight years later these sketches, revised and amplified, appeared as a book under the present title. The first half of this latter publication, roughly speaking, deals with Clemens's own experiences as a “cub” pilot. The second half is an account of a long river trip, made in 1882, in which the author revisited the scenes of his earlier adventures. Chapters VII and VIII, here reprinted entire, are virtually self-explanatory.
867. b. 12. Quarter less twain. A quarter of a fathom less than two fathoms. In 1857 the channels of the river were virtually unmarked, and no useful charts had yet been made. Consequently the pilots had to depend, in tight places, on constant sounding by the two leadsmen, stationed in the bow of the boat.
868. a. 1. Mr. Bixby. Horace Bixby, who had undertaken the job of “learning” Clemens the river.
869. a. 10. The cries of the leadsmen. “Mark three” means exactly three fathoms; “quarter less three,” two and three quarters; “half twain,” two and a half; “mark twain,” exactly two fathoms. This last phrase, which Clemens adopted as his pen-name when working on a Nevada newspaper in 1862, had been previously used in similar fashion by a retired pilot who from time to time contributed "Notes on the state of the river" to the New Orleans Picayune. Clemens subsequently appropriated it for himself.

THE ADVENTURES OF HUCKLEBERRY FINN

873. This book, which it is hard not to call Mark Twain's masterpiece, recounts the experiences of Huck Finn, son of a ne'er-do-weel and drunkard, here called "Pap," and Jim, Miss Watson's runaway "nigger," on their long trip down the river by raft and canoe. In The Adventures of Tom Sawyer (1876) Mark Twain had created the two characters, and set the stage. Eight years later he continued the narrative in the present work. The first sentence of Huckleberry Finn indicates how close is the relationship between the earlier and later books: "You don't know about me without you have read a book by the name of The Adventures of Tom Sawyer; but that ain't no matter."

Both parts of this statement are quite true. To understand in detail the somewhat puzzling relationships referred to throughout Huck Finn, one must have Tom Sawyer in mind. But to be ignorant concerning these details "ain't no matter." The book stands by itself, and has already come to be recognized as one of the world's most fascinating tales of picaresque adventure.

When William Dean Howells was asked, in his old age, what college courses should be taken to aid one in becoming an author, he laconically replied that he had written some ninety things in which the public had shown a good deal of interest, without ever feeling the need of any college courses whatever. Had he been given to boasting, he might have added that he was a self-made middle-westerner (for he was born in Martin's Ferry, Ohio, in 1837, when Ohio was "west"), that he attained to the editorship of the Atlantic Monthly when New England letters were at their height, and that his books are generally conceded to give "the most considerable transcript of American life yet made by one man."

Of his youth Howells has written, in a way that rivals Aldrich's Story of a Bad Boy, in A Boy's Town (1890) and Years of My Youth (1916). Educated in the common schools, he worked as a printer under his father, read extensively among English and American authors, tried his hand at poetry, and became in Columbus a journalist of enough standing to be called on in 1860 to write a campaign biography of Lincoln. Appointed American Consul at Venice, he served there from 1861 to 1865 and extended his reading to include an amazing proportion of the best literature of Europe. For a detailed account of his wide range of study one must turn to his own volume My Literary Passions (1895); suffice it to say here that among the Continental authors whom he particularly admired at one time or another were Heine, Dante, Goldoni, and Tolstoy. Returning to the United States in 1865, he published two books on Italy, joined the staff of the Nation for a few months, and was made assistant editor of the Atlantic under James T. Fields. From 1872 to 1881 he was editor-in-chief, having thus reached at the age of thirty-five one of the highest editorial positions his country had to offer. Of these busy years in Boston Howells has told many anecdotes in Literary Friends and Acquaintance (1900), from which certain sections are reprinted on pp. 885-890 above.

With the publication of Their Wedding Journey in 1871 the young editor appeared as a writer of prose fiction; and two years later with A Chance Acquaintance he began the long series of novels which he produced, sometimes at the rate of two a year, for half a century. At the same time that he was busy as a novelist he wrote a number of plays, chiefly farces, which considerably enhanced his reputation as a humorist. After four years of vacation from editorial duty, which he spent chiefly in England, Howells settled in New York City in 1885 and took charge of The Editor's Study and subsequently of The Editor's Easy Chair in Harper's Magazine, where he found a natural outlet for the thoughts of his later years. During this time he published, in addition to more novels, various entertaining collections of essays and one particularly noteworthy biography, My Mark Twain (1910). Before his death, in 1920, he had been honored by being made President of the American Academy and by receiving honorary degrees from Harvard, Yale, Oxford, and Columbia.

Howells's personality cannot be represented by any single selection, or combination of short selections from his varied writings; even his manner as an author cannot be thus represented. In the majority of his pages he is light, vivacious, friendly, and even brilliant; we read with unfeigned enjoyment the sparkling chapters of such romances as The Lady of the Aroostook and A Woman's Reason, or the witty dialogue of his one-act plays, and we sense something delightful which we know to be Howells. But when we come to the deep character study of The Rise of Silas Lapham and the stern realism of A Modern Instance we find an insight into human nature that is a Howells of quite another sort. And when we consider such delightful and friendly literary gossip as that printed on pp. 885-890 above, we find still another aspect of his personality in the respectful kindness—not unmixed with editorial frankness—with which he came to treat the literary elect of New England.

Yet despite the many fields of life and letters in which Howells made himself loved and admired, he will be looked on by posterity chiefly as a novelist. In this capacity he stood as the first of the successful American realists—using the word realist in his case always with certain qualifications. He was far too sensitive to the prudishness of Victorian days—or he was personally too much averse to breaches of literary decorum—to search out the sordid, the unlovely, and the neurotic phases of life and flaunt them before the public as has been done by certain writers of a later generation. That he preferred to select characters and incidents which represent life under reasonably normal conditions, that he avoided the passionate scenes and morbid descriptions so popular with sensation-mongers, that he could use his own wife as the model for more than one of his frivolous but charming heroines, that he was a gentleman in his books quite as much as in his private life—all this militates against his posthumous reputation with a certain type of reader. Too realistic to satisfy entirely the taste of the late nineteenth century, yet far too cheerful and idealistic to fall into line with American imitators of Thomas Hardy, Howells is thought by some to have made an unhappy compromise, and by others to have achieved the golden mean. His all-pervading humor and the delicacy of touch with which he continually satirized the foibles of women are even more characteristic of his art than the power of the two novels for which he is now most admired—A Modern Instance (1882) and The Rise of Silas Lapham (1884). In his later years he came to have a mature optimism which enabled him to write realistically without being often depressing, entertainingly without being often superficial. There seems little doubt that his novels will remain as the broadest canvas, if not the most highly colored, on which American life from 1870 to 1920 has been pictured.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Howells's work is so extensive that the following lists must be supplemented by reference to the C. H. A. L.

EDITIONS. There is no complete collected edition of Howells's writings. Both Harper and Houghton-Mifflin publish uniform editions of his more important works.

Of his books of travel, Venetian Life, Boston, 1872, and Italian Journeys, Boston, 1872, are the best known. The most notable of his novels are A Chance Acquaintance, Boston, 1873; A Foregone Conclusion, Boston, 1875; The Lady of the Aroostook, Boston, 1879;

A Modern Instance, Boston, 1882; The Rise of Silas Lapham, Boston, 1884; New Leaf Mills, New York, 1913; and The Leatherwood God, N. Y., 1916.

Much of Howells's critical writing is to be found in Criticism and Fiction, N. Y., 1891; and Literature and Life, N. Y., 1902. Three volumes in which autobiographical reminiscence and literary gossip are delightfully mingled are My Literary Passions, N. Y., 1895; Literary Friends and Acquaintance, N. Y., 1900; and Years of My Youth, N. Y., 1916. His study of S. L. Clemens, My Mark Twain (N. Y., 1910), is doubly interesting: for the light it throws on Clemens, and for its revelation of Howells himself.

BIOGRAPHICAL AND CRITICAL WORKS. The best single work through which to approach the study of Howells is Oscar W. Firkins's William Dean Howells: A Study, Cambridge, 1924. Throughout the Letters of Mark Twain (N. Y., 1917, 2 vols.) and the Letters of Henry James (N. Y. 1920, 2 vols.) there is material which the biographer or serious student will find invaluable.

NOTES

LITERARY BOSTON AS I KNEW IT

885. These excerpts from Literary Friends and Acquaintance (1900) contain sketches of some of the leading figures in American literature, and in addition two portraits of personal friends of less prominence which are painted with strokes so affectionate that they reveal, as no autobiography could do, the rich personality of the author himself.
b. 31. In Fields's room. James T. Fields (1817-1881), junior partner of the publishing house of Ticknor and Fields, and for a time editor of the Atlantic Monthly with Howells as his assistant. Various aspects of his literary and social relations are set forth in his Yesterdays with Authors (1872).
888. a. 22. A controversy between her and Doctor Holmes. Holmes's views are set forth in his vigorous treatise, Homeopathy and its Kindred Delusions (1842).
a. 33. Lady Byron's jealousy. The reference is to Mrs. Stowe's Lady Byron Vindicated (1870).

WILLIAM SIDNEY PORTER (1862-1910)

("O. HENRY")

William Sidney Porter is in some ways one of the most interesting figures in recent American literature. A southerner, born and brought up in Greensboro, North Carolina, spending his young manhood on a ranch in Texas, or as reporter, government clerk, or banker, in one or another of the cities of Texas, he lived the last eight years of his life in New York City, where he made himself so thoroughly at home that one hesitates to name anyone—save perhaps Walt Whitman—as his equal, so far as intimate first-hand knowledge of that city is concerned. When he died, he left behind him a dozen volumes of short stories dealing with life in the southwest, in Central America, and in New York—and the best are those of the last group. In such collections as The Four Million (1906) and The Voice of the City (1908), for example, one sees him at the height of his power. Here are the New Yorkers whom other people never wrote about—the people who wash dishes in restaurants and measure ribbons behind the counters of stores. Here, skillfully blended, are the comedy and pathos and selfishness and heroism which somehow or other make life in New York what it is, and that make life over all the world, so far as the fundamental issues are concerned, precisely what it is on Manhattan Island. And the man who thus pictured not only New York but human nature, was born in a far-away southern state, brought up to be a clerk in a country drug store, and spent three years and three months in the Ohio State penitentiary, convicted of embezzlement while serving as cashier in a national bank. Withal he was a simple, friendly, human being, modest, unselfish, untainted by the bitterness of his dark years, unspoiled by the success of his last decade; a man whose only boast was that he “had never written a filthy line.” Take him all in all, he seems to have been one of the most lovable persons with whom the student of American letters can come in contact.

The story of his life has been told by C. Alphonso Smith in his sympathetic study, O. Henry Biography (New York, 1916). Reading this chronicle one realizes again that the child was father to the man. The young pharmacist, occupying his leisure by drawing pictures of the people who came into the store, had already begun his life-long study of human nature. The amateur cow-boy on Red Hall's ranch, carrying Webster's dictionary and Tennyson's poems with him in the saddle, had already fallen victim to the fascination of words. The newspaper reporter, writing for a living, and trying his hand at any sort of journalistic work that would pay, had begun the years of apprenticeship that were necessary before the mature O. Henry could produce the stories in which all the United States was to delight.

Yet despite the fact that in O. Henry's early experiences one sees much that was later to stand him in good stead, one realizes that it was the prison ordeal which transformed the writer of humorous quips, the “column conductor,” into the masterly story teller of the later years. It was in the penitentiary that O. Henry really grew up. Convicted on inconclusive evidence, and largely the victim of a go-as-you-please banking system against which he had vainly protested to his directors, he was fortunate enough to be assigned to duty as night-clerk in the prison drug store and hospital. Here, in comparative leisure, he served his time, studying the luckless men around him, and writing a score of stories which first introduced his newly adopted pen-name to the public.

When he was released, he soon found his way to New York, where he lived the rest of his life. Before long he was under contract with The World to write a story a week, at the modest rate of one hundred dollars for each story. During the rest of his life he was ceaselessly busy, sometimes drawing for material on his early experiences in the west, sometimes looking about him at the fascinating drama of life, and recording what he saw. When he died, in 1910, no other short story writer in America had such a following.

It is easy to borrow Alphonso Smith's phrase, and say that O. Henry “humanized the short story.” It is almost as easy to point out one or two things concerning his technique, especially his use of the “surprise ending,” which, on analysis, often proves to be more logical than the conclusion the reader had anticipated. It is easy to praise him for his persistent optimism, his manliness, his cleanness. Only one thing should be noted by way of adverse criticism. O. Henry wrote so fast, under such constant, such almost unbelievable pressure, that he never allowed himself the privilege of writing a story as well as he might have written it. A personal friend once told the editors of this book how he had sat for an hour in O. Henry's study while Porter, using the long-distance telephone, dictated the conclusion of a story for which an importunate publisher was clamoring. The writer who does his work under such disadvantages can hardly expect even the best of his output to measure up to, say, The Brushwood Boy or The End of the Tether. In finish, in the fine points of technique, as in breadth of vision, O. Henry is simply outclassed by such writers as Conrad or Kipling. But even to compare him with these masters is to honor him, and in his own particular métier as chronicler of the “four million,” he is unique and supreme.

O. Henry's collected works are available in a uniform edition published by Doubleday Page, N. Y., 1911, 12 vols. The only extensive study is C. Alphonso Smith's O. Henry Biography, N. Y., 1916.

JACK LONDON (1876-1916).

Jack London was born in California, of humble stock, in 1876, and after a few years of elementary schooling became an unskilled laborer in and about San Francisco. Like Carl Sandburg he learned at first hand the life of the proletariat, working as ranchman, coal-shoveler, longshoreman, and factory-hand, and hunting seals on the Pacific, where he went as far as Japan and the Bering Sea. After tramping ten thousand miles over the United States and Canada, joining the mad rush for gold in the Klondike, and studying for a year at the University of California, he became a leader among socialists of the less conservative type and developed a talent for prose fiction which gained him an enormous popularity. Continuing to travel, he explored the slums of London, cruised the South Seas in his own vessel, and finally bought a ranch in California where he could enjoy the prosperity which came to him through his writings. Of the ups and downs of his sensational and picturesque, though not altogether romantic, career, many volumes could be written—and indeed have been written. His most strongly autobiographical volumes are: The People of the Abyss (1903), The Road (1907), Martin Eden (1909), The Cruise of the Snark (1911), and John Barleycorn (1913); and the study of his personality may be carried further by reference to the recent Book of Jack London by his widow, Charmian London. Between 1900 and 1916 London accomplished the stupendous task of producing over fifty volumes, chiefly of popular fiction. His public experienced the thrill of travelling the world from England to Japan, from Alaska to the South Seas, with a man who, within those large geographical limits, seemed to have gone everywhere and seen everything. Despite his large income and the social opportunities which came to him as a popular author, London definitely cast his lot with the masses, and died in 1916 a man of the common people.

London probably did more than any of his contemporaries to vitalize, and at the same time to brutalize, the short story. His work in this field was so vivid and so appealing to certain elemental instincts that it became immediately popular, and was widely imitated. But the stories, like the author, were lacking in the patrician touch that makes for finish of style, and his vogue with the more cultivated class of readers has been very moderate. He came into prominence when even the mushroom growth of short story magazines seemed unable to satisfy the demand for a certain type of fiction, when the public wanted "action stories" and "stories with punch" and stories of "red-blooded he-men" regardless of literary merit, and when editors frankly advertised their need of such wares in those very terms. Yet amid the host of already forgotten catch-penny authors who aimed at quantity production of what the public wanted, London stood out as an almost unique writer; if he was a lumber jack rather than a cabinet-maker among American authors, he did his work more conscientiously and more skillfully than the would-be lumber jacks. His local color is accurate as well as vivid, for he knew whereof he wrote and many of his stories have a flavor of autobiographical truth. In his novels, except those treating the themes of socialism, the same faults are obvious; they deal with men who act like animals, or with animals who act like men; physical struggle is omnipresent; the descriptions, especially in the earlier work, show a considerable artistry, but the subtle shadings of character by which great fiction is commonly recognized are sought in vain. For this reason, perhaps, his books dealing principally with animals—The Call of the Wild (1903) and White Fang (1905), for instance—seem likely to leave a more lasting impression on our literature than the more conventional novels in which he attempted a form a little too fine to be shaped by his heavy axe.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT (1858-1919)

Theodore Roosevelt, twenty-sixth President of the United States, was born in 1858 and graduated from Harvard in 1880. His rise to positions of increasing importance was rapid; and though the bitterness of party strife still clings to his memory too strongly to permit a fair estimate of his position as a statesman, a few of the brilliant points in his career may be reviewed. As civil service commissioner, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Lieutenant-Colonel of the "Rough Riders," and Governor of New York, he climbed to the height of popularity which made him Vice-President in 1900; and on the death of President McKinley he carried on the duties of the chief executive in such a fashion that in 1904 he was elected President by the largest popular majority ever accorded a candidate up to that time. His leadership in cutting short the Russo-Japanese War (for which he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize), in defending the Monroe Doctrine against infringement by Germany, and in "taking" the Panama Canal, was characteristic of the manner in which he conducted affairs of state for many years. At the expiration of his term in 1909, he travelled extensively, made a spectacular but unsuccessful attempt to lead the Progressive Party to victory in 1912, and died in 1919, loved, honored, feared, and disliked as only a few other distinguished leaders of his country have been, and admired throughout Europe as our most representative American.

No President except Lincoln is more certain of a permanent place among our men of letters than is Roosevelt, and in variety of literary achievement the advantage rests entirely with the latter; there is, indeed, some chance that his posthumous reputation may rest almost as much on his writings as on his active life in the world of affairs. The honors which he won in the Spanish-American War and the notable part he played in the government of New York are now but chapters—or pages—in the history of his country; even his career of national and international leadership as President has, in the opinion of some people, been a little shadowed by his treatment of ex-President Taft in the campaign of 1912, and by the débacle of the Progressive Party through his overwhelming defeat in the election of the same year. But throughout the mature years of his "strenuous life"—one inevitably falls into his own phrase—he produced a number of books on history, biography, nature, and standards of conduct (both personal and national) which are still of interest. Just as his characteristic words, nature-faker, muck-raking, mollycoddle, have come into general use throughout the country, so his philosophy of strenuous living and of fearing God and taking your own part has been an important element in the thought of an entire generation. And his accounts of the joys of outdoor existence, his accurate and intimate pictures of the life of nature in western America, show him in his most delightful vein, and apparently will be read as long, and with as much pleasure, as the similar pages of Burroughs or John Muir.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Roosevelt's collected works are available in several editions, best of which is the Memorial, edited by Herman Hagedorn, N. Y., 1923-25, 24 vols. Biographical treatments of Roosevelt are numerous. The following are useful as points of departure for a study that may be as extensive as the reader's time will allow: Theodore Roosevelt, An Autobiography, N. Y., 1920; Theodore Roosevelt and His Times, by Joseph B. Bishop, N. Y., 1920, 2 vols.; My Brother, Theodore Roosevelt, by Corinne Roosevelt Robinson, N. Y., 1921; Theodore Roosevelt, by Lord Charnwood, Boston, 1923. Further information is available in The Bibliography of Theodore Roosevelt, by John Hall Wheelock, N. Y., 1920.

THE STRENUOUS LIFE

905. The address was delivered in Chicago, on April 10, 1899, when the events of the Spanish War were still fresh in men's minds.

HENRY ADAMS (1838-1918)

If George Meredith had been able to follow Adams's career to its close, he would have taken a keen relish in noting the "comedy" of it all. Here was a New Englander, with the blood of the Puritans in his veins, a member of a family whose very name had for a century and a half been synonymous with success and distinction, grandson of President John Quincy Adams and great-grandson of President John Adams, a man who began life by turning to the appropriate career of historian and teacher of history in Harvard, and yet who ultimately came to the conclusion that all his labors had been essentially futile, and wrote an extensive autobiography to prove how pointless his own career had been, and how out of sorts was the entire order of things that his family had done so much to establish. With the publication of this work, The Education of Henry Adams, immediately following the author's death, there came to Adams's memory the honor which he had never coveted. His autobiography attained the distinction of a "best-seller," and he himself was generally recognized as a man of genius who had given virtually final expression to one phase of American life. All that Barrett Wendell, writing in 1904, could say of Adams was that his History of the United States "combines accuracy of detail with grasp of subject and scale of composition in a manner which fairly achieves, in dealing with a limited epoch, what Macaulay did not live to achieve when he tried to deal with two English centuries." In 1921 Professor John Spencer Bassett, a historian not given to superlatives, put the case in quite a different way: "Two of [Adams's] books, the Mont Saint Michel and the Education, deserve to rank among the best American books that have yet been written." (C. H. A. L. III, 199.) The difference between the two statements fairly represents the difference between what Adams felt that he had accomplished, and what the world insists on crediting him with. In this discrepancy Meredith would have found something essentially comic. There is a further touch of Meredithian comedy, a comedy that shades perilously close to tragedy, in the fact that—as Paul Elmer Moore puts it—"the latest spokesman of the Adamses and of New England ended his career in sentimental nihilism."

This career can be easily sketched, though no one who finds himself interested in Adams will be content with the narrative in any form except that which he gave it himself in the Education. Born in 1838, the son of Charles Francis Adams, he graduated from Harvard College, and during the Civil War was private secretary to his father, whom Lincoln had appointed Minister to the Court of St. James's. When he returned to the United States in 1868, he spent eight years as editor of the North American Review and assistant professor of history in Harvard, and then for a decade gave himself to writing various books dealing with American history.

By 1892, however, he had become so impressed with the futility of his efforts that he gave over the type of work in which he was engaged, and found relief in study of the Middle Ages, especially the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. In 1904 he printed, privately, Mont Saint Michel and Chartres, in which his historical and artistic enthusiasms were given full expression, and which is so well written that when it was finally published in 1913 it was recognized, over-night, as one of the masterpieces of American literature. In 1906 he allowed The Education of Henry Adams to be printed, but again, with characteristic reticence, circulated it only among his most intimate friends. In 1918, after Adams's death, the Education was published, and greatly exceeded the earlier work in popular favor. So far as American literature is concerned, Adams might well have limited himself to these two volumes.

Different as they may be from each other, the Mont Saint Michel and Education have certain traits in common. In both, one sees Adams as a keen observer, a conscientious scholar, an assured master of words. If the almost mystical enthusiasms of Mont Saint Michel seem difficult to reconcile with the cynicism and asperity of the Education, the fact only goes to show the many-sidedness of Adams's own personality, and to make more interesting the study of a man who felt himself to be of little significance to anyone.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Mont Saint Michel and Chartres, Boston, 1913, and The Education of Henry Adams, Boston, 1918, are the two books which every student of Adams will read. His historical writings are listed in the C. H. A. L. Stuart P. Sherman's Evolution in the Adams Family, in The Nation, April 10, 1920, and Paul Elmer More's Henry Adams, in his Shelburne Essays, Eleventh Series, N. Y., 1921, are two admirable interpretations of Adams and his work.

MONT SAINT MICHEL AND CHARTRES

913. The relatively few technical architectural terms which appear in this selection may be interpreted by referring to any good dictionary.
914. a. 27. True qui file, etc. The spinning sow and fiddling ass. Probably an allusion to two gargoyles on the cathedral which were known by these names.

WOODROW WILSON (1856-1924)

Woodrow Wilson, the twenty-eighth President of the United States, and the sixth to find representation in this volume, was born in Staunton, Virginia, on December 28, 1856. He attended Davidson College, North Carolina, for one year, and then transferred to Princeton, where he received his A. B. degree in 1879. Two years later he completed the course in law at the University of Virginia, and began what was to prove a brief practice as an attorney. He then entered the Johns Hopkins University as a graduate student of history and economics, and received his Ph.D. in 1886. From 1885 to 1888 he taught at Bryn Mawr, and from 1888 to 1890 at Wesleyan University. In 1890 he returned to Princeton as Professor of Jurisprudence and Political Economy, and twelve years later was elected President of the University.

Until 1910 Wilson's connections with politics had largely been those of the scholar and historian. But in the autumn of that year, when he resigned the Presidency of Princeton, he was elected Governor of New Jersey, and began a term of service so distinguished that in 1912 he was nominated for the Presidency by the Democratic party, and was elected by an overwhelming majority of the Electoral College, defeating both Roosevelt, the Progressive candidate, and Taft, the Republican. On November 7, 1916, he was again elected, defeating Charles E. Hughes by a narrow margin.

Wilson's second term began on March 4, 1917, when the United States was on the verge of entering the Great War. The events of the four turbulent years that followed his second inauguration are still too recent to admit of impartial interpretation. But one thing at least is certain: from the time of Wilson's War-Massage to Congress, April 2, 1917, until his appearance at the first session of the Versailles Peace Conference, January 18, 1919, as head of the American Commission, he exercised the almost dictatorial war-time powers of the President in masterly fashion, and came to occupy a position of unique and unbelievable prominence in world affairs. To Europeans, especially the rank and file of the people, he seemed the one man who had brought the United States to the aid of the Allied nations at a time when only that aid could have saved them. Furthermore, because of his many distinguished addresses and letters on the problems of international polity which the closing year of the war threw into the foreground, he appeared as the triumphant prophet of a new and better civilization, a civilization in which the common people, the "democracy" of the world, should have a larger opportunity for liberty and happiness.

It is a commonplace that Wilson's advocacy of the League of Nations, which he considered the best means of bringing about the new order, caused many Americans to lose faith in him, and gave his political enemies a weapon which they used vigorously and relentlessly. It is as clear that his acquiescence in the Treaty of Versailles, with its harsh measures of reprisal, lost him the admiration of many subjects of the Central Empires who had hoped that Wilson would be able to hold in check the old-school politicians most influential in framing the treaty. Once the document had been signed, however, Wilson returned to the United States to begin a nation-wide campaign looking to the ratification of the treaty by the Senate. In the midst of his first speaking tour his health gave way, and he returned to the White House incapacitated for further active participation in the gigantic struggle. He spent the rest of his second term as an invalid, and died on February 3, 1924, in Washington.

On Wilson's significance as a statesman it would be futile to comment either here or now. But something of his literary power is suggested by the two addresses printed on pages 917 ff., and it seems only fitting to indicate that he occupies a high and even unique position among the political writers of his country. In this connection it is essential to have in mind the changes in the style of the political address brought about by the development of the newspapers, especially as they grew in circulation at the time of the Great War. In the days of Webster and Calhoun the political address had been delivered chiefly for its immediate effect on a relatively small group of auditors. More recently, however, and especially during the last two decades, the political address has had to meet two demands: to compel the attention of the hundreds or thousands who actually heard it delivered; and, what is much more important, to satisfy the analytical study of the millions who would read it a few hours later in the daily papers—a reading which would have none of the speaker's voice or personality to make the address "carry."

Of this modern type of political address Wilson was a master. He had every advantage of academic training; he was practised in the arts of class-room exposition and political campaigning, as well as in the more exacting requirements of biographical and historical writing. Avoiding alike the ornate periods which may be lifeless and even tiresome to the ordinary reader, and the intricate argumentation which is sure to be over the head of the average listener, he combined a restrained but moving eloquence with a simple and convincing logic in proportions which made his speeches effective wherever newspapers circulated—that is, over the whole civilized world.

He came into power at a time when his own country, and the entire democratic world, needed a spokesman. His passionate enthusiasm for the cause of democracy was as sincere as that of Mrs. Stowe or of Lincoln. And for a time his speeches in advocacy of this cause made him the most influential figure in either Europe or America.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. There is as yet no collected edition of Wilson's writings. The most important of them are Congressional Government, Boston, 1885; Division and Reunion, N. Y., 1893; Mere Literature, N. Y., 1893; A History of the American People, N. Y., 1902, 5 vols.; Constitutional Government in the United States, N. Y., 1908; The New Freedom, N. Y., 1913; On Being Human, N. Y., 1916. The speeches and letters that marked Wilson's eight years as President are available in the files of the daily papers, in the Congressional Record, and in various war-time booklets. His last published essay, The Road Away from Revolution, appeared in the Atlantic for August, 1923.

BIOGRAPHIES. William E. Dodd's Woodrow Wilson and His Work, N. Y., 1920, and William Allen White's Woodrow Wilson, Boston, 1924, are two admirable biographical studies.

CRITICAL ARTICLES. Two articles which the student will find different from the many controversial publications concerning Wilson are Bliss Perry's Woodrow Wilson as a Man of Letters, in The Praise of Folly, Boston, 1923, and Charles William Eliot's Woodrow Wilson, in the Atlantic Monthly for June, 1924.

NOTES

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

917. Delivered at Hodgenville, Kentucky, September 4, 1916. Wilson had gone to Hodgenville to accept, on behalf of the nation, the gift of the birthplace of Abraham Lincoln.

FLAG DAY ADDRESS

919. The most significant feature of this address is the care with which Wilson distinguishes between the German people and the "military masters" of Germany. The collapse of German power ultimately came about much as Wilson here prophesied.

WALTER HINES PAGE (1855-1918)

Walter Hines Page was born in 1855 in Cary, North Carolina, and studied at Randolph-Macon College and The Johns Hopkins University from 1872 to 1878. At the age of twenty-five he became editor of the St. Joseph, Missouri, Daily Gazette; by rapid strides he made his way to positions of increasing importance until he attained the distinction of editing The Forum (1890-95), The Atlantic Monthly (1896-99), and The World's Work (1900-1913). His Rebuilding of Old Commonwealths (1902) and his many delightful essays were well received; but it was his wide experience with men and affairs which peculiarly fitted him for the honor and the grave responsibilities that came to him in 1913, when he was appointed Ambassador to Great Britain.

From 1913 until just before his death in 1918, Page performed his regular duties as Ambassador, and carried a multitude of special burdens due to the exigencies of the World War, with a combination of kindness, tact, and efficiency which cannot—and fortunately need not—be recorded here. His renunciation of literature in 1913 brought him, paradoxically, the international fame as a man of letters which, despite his creditable editorial career, he had not succeeded in winning, and which only came posthumously with the publication of his Life and Letters. Always a keen observer and brilliant letter writer, gifted with an unusual insight into the fundamentals of international relationships, Page came to occupy a position where his official and personal letters together constitute one of the most illuminating group of documents yet available on the most interesting period of world history. He died in 1918, soon after he had resigned his Ambassadorship on account of ill-health.

The three volumes which constitute The Life and Letters of Walter H. Page (Garden City, 1922 and 1925) owe their continuity to the skillful editorial hand of Burton J. Hendrick, whose contribution virtually entitles him to be considered Page's biographer.

HENRY LOUIS MENCKEN (1880—)

If anyone were to ask by what right Mr. Mencken is represented in a volume of American literature, the answer would be simple. He is here for the very good reason that he writes readable prose of a sort so unique that it cannot be overlooked. Whatever else one may say of him, one can not call him spiritless or dull. He may be unsound in his logic, careless of his facts, destitute of the loyalties that simple, unenlightened folk find worth cherishing. He may ultimately grow tiresome, through constant iteration of two or three prejudices with which the public is already well enough acquainted. But to read a single essay, yes, even half a dozen at a stretch, is to be convinced that he is an extremely vigorous writer. His pages are irritating, stimulating, sparkling, and unconvincing; they are never flat. To adopt for the moment the language of the college professor whom Mr. Mencken never tires of ridiculing, a few people would grade his work "A"; more would probably grade it "F." No one, however, would stigmatise it with a "C—," the symbol of correct and docile mediocrity.

One further consideration prompted the editors to ask Mr. Mencken's permission to represent his work in this volume. By common assent, he has come to be considered the arch-protestor of all the restless spirits who find themselves ill at ease in this world of American traditions and American establishments. One can apply to him the words once used to picture an even more formidable rebel than he,

"High on a throne of royal state . . .
[Mencken] exalted sat, by merit raised
To that bad eminence."

Throughout Mr. Mencken's career he has been intimately connected with journalism. Born and educated in Baltimore, he was writing for the Morning Herald when he was nineteen years old, and by 1905 was editor of the Evening Herald. He first found a thoroughly congenial medium for the expression of his views in the pages of literary criticism which for many years were the most entertaining feature of The Smart Set. Ultimately becoming co-editor of this journal, with George Jean Nathan, he won such popularity with certain elements in American life that when he recently (1923) launched his latest venture, The American Mercury, its immediate success was as well assured as were its readable quality and general character as a vehicle of indiscriminate protest. Thus by 1926 Mr. Mencken has "made a go of it" in journalistic writing. More than that, he has won for himself a definite "position" in American thinking—a statement that can be made concerning but few of his contemporaries.

That this position is what it is, and not one of greater distinction, is due, fundamentally, to his inability to measure up to his own standards. "A man must have acquired discipline over his feelings before he can write sound prose; he must have learned how to subordinate his transient ideas to more general and permanent ideas," he writes in the essay here reprinted. Precisely. Is it too much to hope that Mr. Mencken will some day take his own advice?

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Mr. Mencken's work is best illustrated in a series of volumes entitled Prejudices, published at various times since 1919, by Alfred Knopf, N. Y. A representative selection, of his own making, may be had in Selected Prejudices, which makes one volume in The Travellers' Library, London, 1926. In The American Language (N. Y., 1918), Mr. Mencken dropped the rôle of jester and essayed that of scholar, with a result which even scholars admitted was not negligible.

THE POET AND HIS ART

927. b. 2. A. E. George William Russell (1867—) Irish poet and prose writer.

- b. 28. He needs none of these things. The fallaciousness of the statement is patent, despite the grain of truth that is discernible.
929. b. 19. God's in His heaven. Slightly misquoted from the well-known song in Pippa Passes.
- b. 23. I am the master of my fate, etc. From Henley's Invictus.
930. a. 15. Will deliberately seek a rendezvous with death, etc. A reference to the poem inevitably suggested by these lines, Alan Seeger's I Have a Rendezvous with Death, p. 1084, above, will show that the poet's idea is quite different from what is here suggested.

STUART PRATT SHERMAN (1881-1926)

It has seemed wise to include in the present collection at least one sample of the serious, one might almost say the academic, essays, in which American literature of the twentieth century has been rich. Such essays, while not associated with names as imposing as Emerson's, sometimes make quite as profitable reading as do the more oracular but less coherent utterances of the Concord philosopher. They are, of course, to be distinguished from the "familiar essays" in which Miss Repplier, Mr. Crothers, Mr. Morley, and a dozen others have been so whimsically entertaining. Among the writers of these academic essays Mr. Sherman has for some years occupied a prominent place. His discussion of The Point of View in American Criticism (p. 934) is representative of the class as a whole, and of his own work at its best: a serious consideration of a problem of national importance; the sort of essay which quite appropriately was delivered as a lecture at the University of Chicago, and found its first publication in the Atlantic Monthly.

Mr. Sherman was born in Anita, Iowa, in 1881, graduated from Williams in 1903, and received the degrees of A. M. and Ph. D. from Harvard. He began his academic career as an instructor in English at Northwestern University, but from 1907 to 1924 was on the faculty of the University of Illinois. Resigning his position there as Professor of English and Chairman of the Department in 1924, Mr. Sherman became literary editor of the New York Herald-Tribune, in which capacity he was serving at the time of his death in the late summer of 1926. His work as an essayist of distinction is well represented in three recent volumes: On Contemporary Literature, N. Y., 1917; Americans, N. Y., 1922; The Genius of America, N. Y., 1923.

- b. 23. The Crocean philosophy. Benedetto Croce (1866—), is an Italian philosopher whose Aesthetics as the Science of Expression (1908) brought him into immediate prominence.
943. b. 36. Waiting for the hindmost. It is interesting to note John Adams's expression of almost the same idea, in the letter of June 17, 1775, p. 156, above.

WALT WHITMAN (1819-1892)

Walter Whitman, dubbed "Walt" at an early age to distinguish him from his father, Walter Whitman, was born in West Hills, Long Island, in 1819. His ancestors were of English and Dutch extraction with leanings towards Quakerism, his father's family especially coming under the influence of Elias Hicks (1748-1830), on whom Whitman wrote an appreciative essay. The poet's father, a carpenter and contractor, moved his family to Brooklyn about the year 1824, and there Walt passed his boyhood, going to school and working as a carpenter. Taking up type-setting in the office of the Long Island Patriot and the Brooklyn Star, he occupied himself for some years as printer, school-teacher, and editor on Long Island. Various aspects of these early years are revealed in his poem There Was a Child Went Forth (above, p. 979).

His early reading (as listed in his essay A Backward Glance) included all of Scott's poetry, a thorough study of the Old and New Testaments, Shakespeare, Ossian, the best available translations of Homer, Æschylus, Sophocles, the Nibelungenlied, the ancient Hindoo poems, and Dante. Whatever influence the unnamed "Hindoo poems" may have exerted on his philosophy, there can be little doubt about the influence of the Ossianic poems and the prophetic books of the Old Testament on his subsequent style.

From 1841 to 1848 Whitman served as reporter and editor on various papers in New York City. His interest in the theatres, to which he had free access, in politics, music, art, and in virtually every phase of metropolitan life—admirably set forth in Chapter II of the standard biography by Bliss Perry (1906)—must have played an important part in his development as a poet of democracy. What the metropolis came to mean to him is suggested by the lines he published in 1856 on Crossing Brooklyn Ferry (above, p. 958). It is significant that his mystical vision of "the simple, compact, well-join'd scheme" of life began with the city and spread to include the country, while Wordsworth's mysticism began in the country and proceeded, with difficulty, to include the city.

In 1848 Whitman accepted the editorship of the new Daily Crescent of New Orleans, and in company with his brother Jeff, made the trip south through Pennsylvania and Virginia. After only a few months in New Orleans, the brothers returned by way of Chicago and the Great Lakes. Except for this broadening experience of travel, we know little about Whitman's life from 1848 to 1855; for the most part he lived with his parents in Brooklyn, editing, lecturing a little, and working on Leaves of Grass.

Of the first edition of Leaves of Grass (1855), which contained a preface and twelve poems, Whitman printed less than a thousand copies; of this number only a few—probably not a dozen—were sold. Copies were sent free to the poet's friends and to famous authors whom he had never even met, but many of them were returned. Whittier is said to have thrown his into the fire. Emerson, however, wrote a personal letter of encouragement, from which Whitman excerpted a phrase and printed it (without permission) on the outside of the new and enlarged edition of Leaves of Grass in 1856: "I greet you at the beginning of a great career, R. W. Emerson!" The thirty-two poems of this second edition had enough vitality to start the "Whitman controversy," which has raged ever since. Though this second edition was not remunerative, it was widely reviewed—some of the fairest criticisms being written by Whitman himself and printed anonymously.

From 1856 to 1873 Whitman enjoyed perhaps the richest years of his life. After bringing out the large 1860 edition of the Leaves of Grass (456 pages), he devoted himself with ceaseless energy to relieving the sufferings of wounded soldiers, chiefly in the hospitals of Washington. Though he was forced out of a government clerkship because of the alleged indecency of some of his poems, he found his writings had won him many warm admirers who helped him when he was in straits, and cleared his reputation from any taint of immoral purpose. His poems on the Civil War, published as Drum Taps, showed at last his full stature as poet: he was able to handle without "verbal superfluity" both his own long irregular lines and the more conventional stanza form of O Captain! My Captain; he had acquired a fresh power to treat themes of universal interest with an irresistible appeal; and he made it clear that, although he approved his own course in having written freely of sex, he had now turned finally from that topic. The vigor with which his early poems were still attacked gave zest to the reviews of each new and enlarged edition of the Leaves of Grass; but in the main his vogue increased. Then came the flood of European appreciation, when Whitman found he was receiving unstinted homage from English critics and men of letters, and began the extensive correspondence which brought him merited encouragement, and proved the solace of his old age.

For the last nineteen years of his life Whitman lived chiefly in Camden, N. J. A paralytic attack in 1873 greatly impaired his health; and though he was sometimes able to travel—once as far as Colorado—and to write prose and verse, his creative work was largely done. Of these years, however, details of great interest are now available in the series of volumes by Horace Traubel, published under the general title of With Walt Whitman in Camden. By the time of his death, in 1892, he was generally recognized in Europe as the most original and vital force in American poetry. No other American poet has been so violently attacked, or so ably defended; and no other American poet, unless it be Poe, has been so widely imitated here and in Europe.

In studying the life of Whitman, one must bear in mind that the Good Gray Poet was a mystic, influenced by the teachings and example of Elias Hicks, and that the spiritual crises of his early life have never been satisfactorily recorded. His own attempts to record them, as in the Song of Myself, are hopelessly obscure. We cannot know when, or how often, the "inner light" may have revealed to him glimpses of the divine plan. Between his poetry and the known facts of his life there is, naturally, a close relationship; but one must always suspect that the unknown factors in his personality were more significant than the known.

The student will make sure that he understands not only two large subjects of controversy, but also the fact that he may accept Whitman's views, wholly or in part, on either one, while rejecting them, wholly or in part, on the other. The first, and simpler, topic is Whitman's theory of poetry: that rhythms should be freer than in standard verse, length of line being determined by the length of phrase needed to express an idea or a picture; that a detailed list of component parts is more effective than a selection of fundamentals,—a theory justifying long catalogues of nouns, participles, or parallel phrases; that the primary aim of poetry is to teach and inspire, and that style should be secondary; that simplicity is better than ornateness—specifically that rime and elaborate figures of speech are dangerous; that however exquisitely Poe carried out his theory of limiting poetry to "the rhythmical creation of beauty," that theory is fundamentally inadequate and unsound; that the subject matter of poetry should be as broad and inclusive as life itself. These (and other) views on the technique of poetry which Whitman specifically stated or implied by his practice, should be temporarily accepted while studying Leaves of Grass. One should search for the rhythmic effects (which—as Whitman pointed out—are often as regular as those of waves on a beach or branches waving in the wind) and should read the poems aloud with cadences and intonations similar to those generally used in reading the Psalms. Having done so much towards getting Whitman's feeling for poetry, one can form one's own opinion on the merits of the much-disputed question of the technique.

The second and larger topic of controversy deals with Whitman's whole concept of life. Only a few of his more striking views may be indicated here: that every created thing is a manifestation of the Divine, and hence worthy to be celebrated in verse; that the democratic spirit glorifies all men equally and hence is—or should become—the great contribution of the United States to the world; that fatherhood is as worthy to be celebrated in verse as motherhood; that the soul derives as much from the body, as does the body from the soul; that the poet who glorifies any individual—even himself—is glorifying all humanity; that men and women are equal; that death is but the beginning of a spiritual experience more satisfying than life. These are a few of the doctrines of Leaves of Grass; and even a rapid reading of such selections as are included in the present volume shows that they are more closely related than the foregoing synopsis would indicate. Seeing these and similar ideas carried vigorously to their logical extremes in the complete Leaves of Grass, the student can understand why some of Whitman's poetry has been condemned as indecent, and can also understand why such a critic as Edward Dowden wrote: "We none of us question that yours is the clearest, and sweetest, and fullest American voice."

It is not yet possible to come to any sure conclusion concerning Whitman's ultimate position among the poets. Hardly a generation has passed since his death; we are still unable to see him in a fair perspective. It already seems clear, however, that a considerable amount of his work will be forgotten; like Wordsworth, he wrote too much, and was blind to inequalities that every reader detects in his pages. It is also clear that his poetic instinct often outran his artistic skill; many a time, even when dealing with some essentially poetic theme or incident, he failed to express his ideas in language of significance or beauty. It may be that his "free verse" will in the long run prove less satisfying than the regular patterns which experience has approved, and which he consciously avoided. But even after these concessions have been made, there still remains much for which no admirer of Whitman need apologize. Judge Whitman by Out of the Cradle, When Lilacs Last in the Door-yard Bloom'd, many sections of the Song of Myself, Crossing Brooklyn Ferry, O Captain! My Captain, and half a dozen of the Civil War poems, and there seems to be only one verdict possible. Here is poetry in which one finds that combination of emotional satisfaction and intellectual stimulus which only great poetry possesses. Here is poetry in which the facts of life, imaginatively interpreted, are set forth in language rich with sensuous imagery, and shaped into cadences that haunt one's memory like strains of music. Here, in other words, is the work of a great and original artist, of a man who has thought much about the perplexing experiences of life, has come to some conclusion concerning the significance of it all, and who has had the genius to express himself in such a fashion that other people may take both pleasure and profit from reading what he has written.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

EDITIONS. The many editions of Leaves of Grass, or of Whitman's complete poetical works, that have been published from time to time, have now been superseded by Emory Holloway's recently issued Leaves of Grass, Inclusive Edition, N. Y., 1924. Whitman's prose is available in The Complete Prose Works of Walt Whitman, N. Y., 1898, which, though by no means complete, contains his most significant work. The Uncollected Poetry and Prose of Walt Whitman, edited by Emory Holloway, N. Y., 1921, 2 vols., contains a considerable amount of work done by Whitman during his early years, interesting chiefly in view of his subsequent development.

BIOGRAPHIES. A few biographical studies stand out from among the many. John Burroughs' Whitman: a Study, Boston, 1896, has an especial interest because of Burroughs' friendship for Whitman. Bliss Perry's Walt Whitman: his Life and Works (A. M. L. series), Boston, 1906, contains perhaps the best critical estimate. George Rice Carpenter's Walt Whitman (E. M. L. series), N. Y., 1909, contains chapters of particular interest on Whitman's verse-form and his "catalogue method." Léon Bazalgette's Walt Whitman, L'Homme et son Oeuvre, Paris, 1908 (translated 1920) is more of an impressionistic study than a formal biography. John Bailey's Walt Whitman (E. M. L., New Series), London, 1926, has much valuable criticism from the British point of view. The most recent important biography is Emory Holloway's Whitman, an Interpretation in Narrative, N. Y. and London, 1926. The Magnificent Idler, by Cameron Rogers, N. Y., 1926, is a pleasantly imaginative chronicle, based upon fact.

CRITICAL ARTICLES. From among the great mass of criticism listed in the C. H. A. L. the special student will select such titles as seem particularly pertinent. Horace Traubel's With Walt Whitman in Camden (N. Y., 1906-14, 3 vols.) is a mélange of fact, opinion and criticism, cast in the form of a diary, and should be consulted by whoever wishes an intimate picture of the poet's later years.

The whole story of the Whitman controversy is indicated in the trenchant, though prejudiced, comments in W. S. Kennedy's bibliographical volume, The Fight of a Book for the World, West Yarmouth, Mass., 1926.

NOTES

Emory Holloway's Leaves of Grass, Inclusive Edition, New York, 1924, has been followed as regards both text and order of arrangement of the poems. To supplement the following notes the student will consult the pertinent sections of Whitman's Complete Prose Works, especially Specimen Days and The Wound Dresser.

I HEAR AMERICA SINGING

946. First published 1860; final form 1867.

SONG OF MYSELF

First published 1855; final form 1881. The poem occupied the first forty-five pages of the first (1855) edition of Leaves of Grass, and, like the eleven other poems in that volume; was printed without title. In the second edition it was called Poem of Walt Whitman, an American. The present title was first used in the seventh edition.

The poem may be considered as Whitman's triumphant announcement that at last he had come to understand himself, and that through understanding himself he had learned to understand other people, to see the meaning of life in the United States, and had even grasped the ultimate significance of existence. Much too long to be read with pleasure save by avowed disciples of Whitman, the poem gains rather than suffers by friendly cutting. The selections here printed indicate the nature of the poem as a whole, and show Whitman in his various rôles of speculative philosopher, sympathetic lover of mankind and of nature, imperturbable egotist ("he would patronize God himself," Lanier once said), mystic dreamer, almost overcome by the vision which his contemplation of the phenomena of life had evoked, and skillful handler of words and sentences.

To understand the poem, and, indeed, many others of the works here printed, one must keep in mind Whitman's mysticism, his power of identifying himself with other persons, of seeing the underlying unity behind the multiplicity of particular phenomena, and of coming into direct contact with that unity. One should think of him as belonging in the same class as Wordsworth and Emerson, so far as their fondness for "impassioned contemplation" is concerned. One should also remember the significant second clause in the sentence from Emerson: "I greet you at the beginning of a great career, which yet must have had a long foreground somewhere, for such a start." The "long foreground" included Whitman's early days on Long Island, his experiences as carpenter, school-teacher, type-setter, journalist, his years of reading and "loafing," his intimate friendships with men and women of all sorts, his vague speculations concerning the mysteries of birth and death. All these, and more, he summed up in the Song of Myself.

949. 898. An old time sea-fight. The reader recognizes Paul Jones's most famous victory, that of the Bon Homme Richard over the Serapis.

THE BASE OF ALL METAPHYSICS

951. First published 1871; final form the same year. Like the succeeding poem, this centers around one of Whitman's favorite themes, "the dear love of man for his comrade."

I HEAR IT WAS CHARGED AGAINST ME

- First published 1860; final form 1867.

SONG OF THE OPEN ROAD

First published 1856; final form 1881. The poem opens as if it were to be a celebration of that sort of tramping through Vagabondia which Hovey and Bliss Carman celebrated. One soon discovers, however, that Whitman's journeyings lead him far from the "long brown paths," and that to travel with him is to voyage "on strange seas of thought."

CROSSING BROOKLYN FERRY

958. First published 1856; final form 1881. The poem is autobiographically reminiscent of the author's life in Brooklyn and New York. In Specimen Days (1881) he wrote: "Almost daily I cross'd on the boats, often up in the pilot-houses where I could get a full sweep, absorbing shows, accompaniments, surroundings. What oceanic currents, eddies, underneath—the great tides of humanity also, with ever-shifting movements! Indeed, I have always had a passion for ferries; to me they afford inimitable, streaming, never-failing, living poems."

PIONEERS! O PIONEERS!

961. First published 1865; final form 1881. The poem is one of Whitman's relatively few attempts—after his early work—to utilize a regular stanzaic form, though it does not, like O Captain, fall into either rime or a regular rhythmic pattern. The student will find it perhaps the clearest expression of Whitman's faith in the new civilization of the United States, a faith which he summarizes in the fourth stanza.

OUT OF THE CRADLE ENDLESSLY ROCKING

964. First published 1859; final form 1881. The original title was A Child's Reminiscence. The story of the birds, the "two feather'd guests from Alabama," is virtually an allegory of human life. Trying to find some clue to the significance of such experiences, the poet at last realizes that death, "the word of the sweetest song and all songs," will solve the riddle. See Whitman's treatment of the same idea in Night on the Prairies (p. 981), and Good-Bye, My Fancy (p. 982).
23. Once Paumanok. Once on Long Island. Whitman was fond of the Indian name.

WHEN I HEARD THE LEARN'D ASTRONOMER

968. First published 1865; final form 1867.

BEAT! BEAT! DRUMS

First published 1865, in Drum Taps, a volume reminiscent of Whitman's contacts with the Civil War. Final form 1867.

CAVALRY CROSSING A FORD

969. First published 1865; final form 1871.

COME UP FROM THE FIELDS, FATHER

First published 1865; final form 1867.

VIGIL STRANGE I KEPT ON THE FIELD ONE NIGHT

970. First published 1865; final form 1867.

A MARCH IN THE RANKS HARD-PRESSED

First published 1865; final form 1867.

GIVE ME THE SPLENDID SILENT SUN

971. First published 1865; final form 1867.

ETHIOPIA SALUTING THE COLORS

972. First published 1865; not revised.

WHEN LILACS LAST IN THE DOORYARD BLOOM'D

973. First published 1865-66; final form 1881. The title originally was President Lincoln's Burial Hymn. Swinburne's pronouncement is famous: "The most sonorous nocturne ever chanted in the church of the world."

O CAPTAIN! MY CAPTAIN!

978. First published 1865; final form 1871. The most widely known of all Whitman's poems, partly, at least, on account of the use of rime and a regular rhythmic pattern.

THERE WAS A CHILD WENT FORTH

979. First published 1855; final form 1871. The poem states, in the simplest of terms, Whitman's facility for identifying himself with the people whom he met or read about.

THE SINGER IN THE PRISON

980. First published 1869; final form 1881.

A NOISELESS PATIENT SPIDER

981. First published 1862-63; final form 1881. The poem is an allegorical study of man's effort to "get into immediate contact with self-transcending reality." The "bridge" (l. 9) is the mystic's means of direct contact with the Deity. On this matter see Rufus M. Jones's The Inner Life, especially chapter 7, which opens with this poem.

NIGHT ON THE PRAIRIES

First published 1860; final form 1871.

WITH HUSKY-HAUGHTY LIPS, O SEA!

982. First published 1883; final form 1888-89.

GOOD-BYE MY FANCY!

First published 1891; final form 1891-92.

A BACKWARD GLANCE O'ER TRAVELED ROADS

983. Originally printed as the preface to Whitman's volume of poetry entitled November Boughs (1888). The essay is notable as containing some of Whitman's most illuminating comments on his own work.

COWBOY SONGS

The songs that Mr. John A. Lomax has done so much to collect and preserve in his two volumes, Cowboy Songs (N. Y., 1910), and Songs of the Cattle Trail and Cow Camp (N. Y., 1919), are certainly entitled to representation in any volume of American literature. Indeed, these artless and all but forgotten ballads, as indigenous as prairie grass, and as typical of a picturesque phase of American civilization as Mark Twain's best work, might well be accorded far more space than has been allotted them. But whoever reads the three here printed will turn to Mr. Lomax's collections, where the songs and ballads are to be had in generous numbers, and where Mr. Lomax's own comments may be found.

In addition to the two volumes listed in the preceding paragraph, the student should note Miss Louise Pound's collection, American Ballads and Songs (N. Y., 1922), where other types of popular verse are represented.

RICHARD HENRY STODDARD
(1825-1903)

Stoddard was born in Hingham, Massachusetts, in 1825, but after his tenth year lived chiefly in New York City. Leaving school at the age of fifteen, he spent nine years working by day with his hands and devoting his evenings largely to reading and writing poetry. For several years thereafter he tried, with little success, to support himself by writing, and at length he compromised by taking a position in the New York Custom House (1853-70) which allowed him a certain amount of leisure for writing and editing. He was literary editor of the New York World (1860-70), managing editor of the Aldine (1872-80), and literary editor of the New York Mail and Express from 1880 until his death in 1903. As a poet he achieved, like his friends Taylor and Stedman, a considerable vogue which was at its height from 1852 to 1880.

For the most part Stoddard's verse is too imitative, too deficient in vitality, to interest readers not his friends and contemporaries. He wrote poems of the Orient, as did Taylor; but Stoddard's work lacks the vivid descriptive touch. His poetry is criticized today as being concerned less with life as it is, or may become, than with a dreamy picturing of what it might have been. Occasionally, as in Without and Within (p. 997), he succeeded in attaining a certain poetic realism, but there is no certainty that he will be long remembered as a poet.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Stoddard's poetical work is available in The Poems of Richard Henry Stoddard, N. Y., 1880, which is the authorized collected edition. For biographical information one should consult Stoddard's Recollections, Personal and Literary, edited by Ripley Hitchcock, N. Y., 1903.

NOTES

IMOGEN

996. The material of the poem is drawn from Shakspeare's Cymbeline, while the manner is somewhat comparable to that of Tennyson's Lady of Shalott.

PAUL HAMILTON HAYNE (1830-1886)

Hayne was born and brought up as a member of one of the most aristocratic families in Charleston, S. C., at a time when that city was the literary center of the South. Despite the early death of his father, a naval officer, he had every advantage of wealth and position; and he gave early promise of a career as distinguished in literature as was that of his uncle, Senator Robert Y. Hayne, in the field of politics. After graduating from Charleston College, he turned definitely to literature as his profession and brought out volumes of poems in 1855, 1857, and 1860. Joining with W. G. Simms and others of the coterie that frequented Russell's bookshop in the project of launching a literary magazine intended to rival the Atlantic, Hayne became editor of the ill-fated monthly known as Russell's (1857-1860).

The tragedy of Hayne's life was the Civil War. Though his frail health did not permit him to undertake active duty in the field, he supported the southern cause vigorously both by writing war poetry and by occupying a position on the staff of Governor Pickens. During the bombardment of Charleston his house, including his valuable library, was burned, and before the war was over he had been reduced from a position of comparative opulence to one of almost abject poverty.

Throughout the rest of his life he lived obscurely in a little cottage among the Georgia pines, where he managed to keep his living expenses within the narrow range of his earning power as a writer. Such being his unhappy situation, he was often forced to write from necessity rather than inspiration; and it is to his credit that his work, especially his "nature poetry," maintains such a high average. Despite the fact that this poetry suffers by comparison with that, say, of Wordsworth, there is an undeniable charm in much of it, and occasionally, as in Unveiled, a suggestion of the significance of Nature as a spiritual link between God and man.

Before his death in 1886 Hayne saw through the press his edition of his friend Timrod's poems, as well as his own Legends and Lyrics (1872), The Mountain of the Lovers (1875), and Complete Poems (1882).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Hayne's own edition of his works, the Complete Poems of Paul Hamilton Hayne, New York, 1882, is a good and readily available edition. This contains a sympathetic but brief biographical sketch by Margaret J. Preston. J. T. Brown's article, Paul Hamilton Hayne, in the Sevanee Review for April, 1906, is worth reading. No adequate biographical study has yet been published.

NOTES

UNVEILED

1000. The tone of the entire poem should be compared to that of Wordsworth's Tintern Abbey, and the "ante-natal music" of line 140 to the ideas expressed in his Ode: Intimations of Immortality.
1001. 47. Isis. An Egyptian goddess.
76. Titania grows. Fairy-like. From Titania, queen of the fairies in A Midsummer-Night's Dream.

IN HARBOR

1004. It must not be supposed that this poem is in any way an echo of Tennyson's Crossing the Bar, which first appeared in 1889, three years after Hayne's death.

SIDNEY LANIER (1842-1881)

The story of Lanier's life is a tragic one of genius buffeted by fortune and baffled by fate, but the tragedy is finally relieved by the achievement of his last years and by the survival of his poetry. Born in Macon, Georgia, in 1842, the son of a lawyer who had a taste for Shakespeare, Addison, and Scott, Lanier showed an early leaning towards music. While still a youth he learned to play the flute—an instrument from which he was seldom separated—as well as the piano, violin, organ, guitar, and banjo. When he was receiving a rudimentary education at Oglethorpe College (an institution now defunct, and to which he subsequently applied the epithet "farcical"), he found that playing the violin produced emotional effects so fatiguing that he would sometimes lose consciousness for hours. Accordingly he took his father's advice to curb his devotion to music as best he could, and found some consolation in graduating with high honors and laying plans for two years of graduate study at Heidelberg.

During the next decade Lanier was largely the victim of circumstances. At the outbreak of the Civil War, he volunteered as a private and remained in that capacity, despite three offers of promotion, in order to be near his brother. In his leisure, which was considerable, he substituted the writing of both prose and verse for the course of study in Europe now rendered impossible, and built high hopes of becoming a professional man of letters. After four years of service he was captured on a Confederate blockade runner, and although his confinement in Point Lookout Prison lasted only a few months, it completely shattered his already frail health. On returning to his home in 1865, he found his mother dying of consumption and his family and friends reduced to poverty. Forced to earn a living as best he could, he turned from poetry to an unimportant clerkship, taught school, published a novel, Tiger Lilies (1867), descriptive of his experiences in the war, and after his marriage to Mary Day in 1868 took up the study and practice of law with his father in Macon. Whatever success he gained in his legal work was largely offset by the lack of public interest in his poetry and the gradual decline of his physical powers. Ten years after the outbreak of the war he was forced to try the effect of the Texas climate, and as he left home with slight prospect of ever returning, he realized that his passion for music had been largely stifled, his poetic talent undeveloped, and his legal career cut short.

Yet during the winter of 1872-73 Lanier underwent a sort of artistic rebirth. His playing of the flute before the Männerchor of San Antonio was perhaps the turning point in his career; the success of his performance was so overwhelming that he determined to devote himself to music and poetry regardless of consequences. As a first step he went to New York, where, he gained immediate recognition as a musician. In a short time he was appointed first flutist of the new Peabody Orchestra in Baltimore, and began anew his efforts to infuse the spirit of music into poetry. His poems Corn and The Symphony, which appeared in Lippincott's Magazine in 1875, met with very general approval and won him influential friends. Among these was Bayard Taylor, who promptly had Lanier appointed to write the Cantata for the Centennial Exposition to be held at Philadelphia. But the struggle for bread and for health was severe, and what he regarded as his best work was often unappreciated. He persisted nevertheless, as his letters show, with the artist's sublime confidence in his ultimate accomplishment; brought out a volume of Poems in 1877, and became such an authority on English literature that he was called on to deliver at the Peabody Institute and Johns Hopkins University the lectures to which we owe his critical works entitled The Science of English Verse (1880) and The English Novel (published posthumously in 1883). But the hand of death was already upon him; he composed his great poem Sunrise with a fever temperature of a hundred and four, and those who listened to his lectures often had reason to fear that he would not survive to the end of the hour. By the spring of 1881 he was forced to retire to the mountains of North Carolina, where he died in September of the same year, a victim of the tuberculosis which his war-time experiences had fastened upon him.

As Lanier's musical genius lay in playing rather than in composing, it naturally came about that with the deaths of those who remember his marvelous performances on the flute, there could remain no adequate record of his instrumental triumphs. But the music which he infused into his poetry has survived to bring delight to an increasing number of readers. His Science of English Verse, though soon superseded as a technical treatise, was the point of departure for that large group of poets and critics who feel that in poetry the element of time is virtually as important as that of stress. And Lanier's achievement is the greater because in his own verse he succeeded in using the simple time relationships of music in a way that few other poets have duplicated.

Lanier's posthumous fame, when contrasted with that of other poets of the reconstruction like Timrod or Hayne, suggests that the only poet of the South worthy to be compared with him is Poe. And though Lanier's versification never took the public by storm as did that of Poe, his poetry has other characteristics which Poe never attained. Its range is admirably illustrated by the serene intellectuality of The Crystal, the simplicity of A Ballad of Trees and the Master, and the vigorous narrative of The Revenge of Hamish; while the combination of haunting sweetness and religious ecstasy in such a masterpiece as The Marshes of Glynn is unique. An unbiased estimate of the permanent value of his work may be had by a glance at the bibliography in the C. H. A. L.: the poems that were published in book form only once during his lifetime (in 1877) came to be so much admired that for many years after his death a new edition was called for annually; while of the long series of books and articles on Lanier there listed, not one appeared until the poet had been in his grave five years, and practically all are of recent date. There could be no clearer indication of the merit of his work.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The most complete edition of Lanier's verse is the Poems by Sidney Lanier, edited by his wife, and containing a brief biographical memoir by W. H. Ward, N. Y., 1884; new editions, 1891, 1892, etc. Morgan Calloway's Select Poems of Sidney Lanier, containing useful editorial and bibliographical material, appeared in N. Y. in 1895. The best biography is Edwin Mims's Sidney Lanier, Boston, 1905. The many special studies of Lanier, and critical articles concerning his work, are listed in the C. H. A. L.

NOTES

THE DYING WORDS OF STONEWALL JACKSON

1005. Written in 1865 and published posthumously in 1884 without the author's revision. Neither this poem nor the one that follows is to be regarded as an example of the technique which the poet achieved in his maturity.

NIGHT AND DAY

Written in 1866 and published in The Independent for August, 1884, without revision. (See the note on the preceding poem.)

SONG OF THE CHATTAHOOCHEE

Written in 1877 and published the same year in Scott's Magazine.

THE STIRRUP-CUP

1006. Written in 1877, when the poet was seeking to recover his health in Florida, and published the same year in Scribner's Magazine. Lanier faced death with a fortitude of mind that was due in part to his deeply religious nature and in part to his confidence in the permanent value of his poetry. In one of his letters to his wife he wrote: "Let my name perish—the poetry is good poetry and the music is good music, and beauty dieth not, and the heart that needs it will find it."

THE REVENGE OF HAMISH

This vigorous poem, contrasting strongly with the poet's usual style, has been extravagantly praised as "the finest ballad written on American soil." It was written in 1878 and published the same year in Appleton's Magazine.

THE MARSHES OF GLYNN

1008. "If one had to rely upon one poem to keep alive the fame of Lanier, he could single out The Marshes of Glynn with assurance that there is something so individual and original about it, and that, at the same time, there is such a roll and range of verse in it, that it will surely live not only in American poetry but in English. Here the imagination has taken the place of fancy, the effort to do great things ends in victory, and the melody of the poem corresponds to the exalted thought. It has all the strong points of Sunrise, with but few of its limitations. There is something of Whitman's virile imagination and Emerson's high spirituality combined with the haunting melody of Poe's best work. Written in 1878, when Lanier was in the full exercise of all his powers, it is the best expression of his genius, and one of the few great American poems." (—Sidney Lanier, by Edwin Mims, 1905, p. 371). Lanier planned a series of six Hymns of the Marshes, but lived to complete only three of them.

A BALLAD OF TREES AND THE MASTER

1012. Written in November, 1880, in the last year of the poet's life. "With all of Lanier's development . . . he retained a vital faith in the Christian religion. He reacted against the Calvinism of his youth to almost as great a degree as did some of the New England poets. . . . In his thinking he found no place for the rigid and severe creed which dominated his youth. . . . He lived the abundant life, and all the roads which he traveled led to God. . . . 'He was the most Christlike man I ever knew,' said one of his intimate friends." (—Sidney Lanier, by Edwin Mims, 1905, pp. 317-318.)

JOHN BANISTER TABB (1845-1909)

Father Tabb was born in Virginia, in 1845; and by the time he was seventeen years old was serving the Confederacy on board a blockade runner. Captured in 1864, he was sent to a military prison at Point Lookout, Maryland. "Here, in this hell-hole," he said later, "I met Sidney Lanier. One day, while I was lying in my cot, ill with fever, the distant notes of a flute reached my ears. . . . I said to myself, 'I must find that man.'" The friendship thus begun was maintained till Lanier's death, and meant much to the two men.

The first few years after the war Tabb spent in teaching, and in preparing himself for the Episcopal ministry. In September of 1872, however, he followed Newman's example and was received into the Roman Catholic Church. More teaching, this time in Catholic schools, occupied several years, and in 1884 he was ordained to the priesthood. From then till his death in 1909 he served as Professor of Literature in St. Charles College, Maryland, continuing his teaching even during the last three years of his life when he was totally blind.

To turn the pages of Father Tabb's best known publications, Poems (Boston, 1894), Lyrics (Boston, 1897), and Later Poems (N. Y., 1910), or of the Selections from the Verses of John B. Tabb which Mrs. Alice Meynell edited in 1906, is to find oneself in the presence of a poet whose epigrammatic terseness suggests the best work of Emily Dickinson, but who writes without ironic bitterness. His kindly humor, his sensitiveness to the beauty of Nature, his friendliness, his unclouded faith in God—these are the marks of his personality, as well as the distinguishing characteristics of the verse by which he is sure to be remembered.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The four volumes referred to in the preceding note contain the best of Tabb's poetry. Two biographical studies of importance are Father Tabb, His Life and Work, by his niece, Jennie Masters Tabb, Boston, 1921, and Father Tabb: A Study of his Life and Work, by Francis A. Litz, Baltimore, 1923. The latter contains a large amount of previously unpublished poetry.

EMILY DICKINSON (1830-1886)

The publication in 1924 of The Life and Letters of Emily Dickinson, by her niece, Martha Dickinson Bianchi, has lifted the veil from the character and personality of the most elusive American poetess of the nineteenth century. The complete seclusion of her last thirty-three years, combined with the fact that her poetry was not published during her lifetime, gave rise to many absurd and conflicting stories which found their way into reputable histories of literature.

Emily Norcross Dickinson was born in 1830 in Amherst, Mass., of the best New England stock. Her father was a lawyer and treasurer of Amherst College, but he never allowed mundane affairs to interfere with his stern Puritanism; he was feared and honored by his wife "after the manner of the Old Testament," and his one approach to worldliness was indicated by his often saying, "I always intend to have the best horse in town." Emily's girlhood was normal except that she was subjected to religious influences which a later age would have considered austere. She went to public school with her brother and sister, and made a lifelong friend of Helen Hunt (Jackson); then at the age of seventeen she was sent to the South Hadley Female Seminary—"one of whose avowed objects was to provide mates for the missionaries sent out to the foreign field." She expressed her individuality in various harmless pranks, and appalled her teachers when she and her roommate proved to be the only girls out of three hundred who opposed observing Christmas as a day of fasting and solitary meditation!

At the age of twenty-three she spent a winter in Washington and Philadelphia with her father (then a Congressman), and at that time had the experience which—though only enough is told of it to occupy one page in Mrs. Bianchi's biography—evidently blighted the rest of her life. Fundamentally moral, yet tempted as only a woman of temperament can be by the love of a man already married, she fled to her home, and forever barred the door to her importunate lover. "There is no doubt that two predestined souls were kept apart only by her high sense of duty, and the necessity for preserving love untarnished by the inevitable destruction of another woman's life." The effect of her renunciation was to send her lover to a city "a continent's width remote," and to make her unable either to forget her secret grief or to force herself from the seclusion of her home. For the remainder of her life she was a recluse—spiritual, affectionate, social within the large family circle, and endowed with a brilliant turn of phrase and a piquant way of expressing herself that was revealed in her letters as well as her conversation. It was known to Colonel Higginson and a few others that she wrote poetry for her own satisfaction; but for the most part her life after 1853 was spent within the four walls of her father's house, and to the public it was a closed book. At the time of her death, in 1886, people realized that Amherst had lost a woman of rare charm, but her poems were still in manuscript. Beginning with 1890, small collections were published at short intervals, and all her extant verse is now available in the Complete Poems issued in 1925.

It would appear that the conscientious renunciation of her twenty-third year, with its inevitable sublimation of selfish impulses, had produced in her a compensating spiritual insight into life, a keener sense of its significance than is accorded to many writers of wider personal experience. Her poetry has a direct way of cutting to the heart of matters that is singularly modern. Its freedom from the paraphernalia of poetic ornament is likewise modern, yet its Puritanism is so strict, and at times so didactic, as to make it appear in some respects pre-nineteenth-century. On close study her work proves to be in its modest way "not of an age but for all time"; the themes with which she deals in her characteristic subjective poems—love, self-sacrifice, time and eternity, religion and the feeling for immortality—are the ever-recurring ones of human life. Her verses are brief, to be sure, but often almost oracular in their wisdom, and their lack of lyric sweetness is offset by a poignant intensity of feeling which women have seldom succeeded in conveying in poetry. It may be too high praise to equate her work with that of Mrs. Browning, and yet when Conrad Aiken called it "perhaps the finest by a woman in the English language," an English critic in the London Spectator added, "I quarrel only with his 'perhaps.'"

CELIA THAXTER (1835-1894)

Celia Thaxter was born at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, in 1835. As a child of five she was taken to the Isles of Shoals, some ten miles off shore, where her father, Thomas B. Lighton, was keeper of the lighthouse, and where she spent the greater part of her life. Even after her marriage in 1851 to Levi Lincoln Thaxter, she usually lived for a part or all of each year at Appledore (the largest of the Isles), where she shared the beauties of her large flower garden and of the rugged island scenery with the many friends who came to visit her from the mainland. She always kept her girlhood fondness for the romance and the majesty of the sea, as well as for the less awe-inspiring beauties of her favorite nooks along the shore. The scenery is admirably described in her prose volume Among the Isles of Shoals (1873).

Her career as a poetess began with the appearance of Land-Locked (above, p. 1015) in the Atlantic Monthly for March, 1861, and continued with such success as to warrant the publication of five volumes of verses: Poems (1872), Drift-weed (1879), Poems for Children (1884), The Cruise of the Mystery and other Poems (1886), and Verses (1891). She wrote for the most part what might be called a stock type of poem which begins by describing the beauties of the seacoast and commonly ends with some moral reflection of the sort that was popular in the mid-nineteenth century. The moralizing usually is as sweet and womanly in its sentiment as the flowers which she used to enclose in her letters. ("This pansy, with my dear love," happens to have survived in an old unpublished letter now in the writer's hand.) But her poems would not stand out from the mass of contemporary sentimental verse were they not alive with the tang and murmur of the sea.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The best edition of Celia Thaxter's poems is the Appledore, edited by Sarah Orne Jewett, Boston, 1895. One volume of prose, Among the Isles of Shoals, Boston, 1873, gives a semi-autobiographical account of her manner of life on Appledore. No formal biography of her has yet been written.

(A brief biographical sketch of Aldrich is to be found on page 4197.)

NOTES

ELM WOOD

1020. Lowell's lifelong connection with Elmwood is indicated on p. 1170, above.
1021. 53. Beside the Manzanares and the Thames. A reference to Lowell's career as American Minister at Madrid and at London.

AN ODE

1022. 41. Roland. The hero of romance whose exploits are set forth in the Chanson de Roland and elsewhere.

LONGFELLOW

This poem, written for the centenary of Longfellow's birth, was appropriately read at Aldrich's own funeral.

EDMUND CLARENCE STEDMAN
(1833-1908)

The Life and Letters of Edmund Clarence Stedman (2 vols., 1910) sets forth with delightful intimacy what can only be hinted at here: among other things, his gay days at Yale (ending in expulsion), his vigorous romantic youth, his successful courtship of Laura Woodworth, his brilliant career as a war correspondent for the World, his long and varied business activities as a member of the New York Stock Exchange, and the futile struggle to make success in business compatible with great accomplishment in poetry. Although born in Hartford, he lived so long in New York City that he is to be regarded as a member of the metropolitan group, along with his friends Stoddard and Taylor. Like them he wrote readable lyrics for the most part so lacking in vitality as to hold little interest for the succeeding generation; but during the War he was sometimes roused, as in Old Brown (p. 1023) and Wanted—a Man (p. 1025), to express himself with greater passion. Once at least he drew from his business experience material for an exquisite poem, and the result, Pan in Wall Street (p. 1026) is probably his best known piece.

It was Stedman's aim to attain through his activities in Wall Street a financial independence sufficient to allow him full liberty to devote himself to literary work. But though he occasionally made considerable sums of money, the turns of the market often went against him, the public lost interest in the type of poetry he wrote, and he is remembered now less as financier and poet than as anthologist and critic. His love of poetry, his prose style, and his indefatigable zeal in editorial matters combined to make his most valuable contribution to poetry the anthologies and books of criticism which from time to time he edited.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The Poems of Edmund Clarence Stedman, New Household Edition, Boston, 1908, is the best one-volume collected edition of his verse. For biographical information one turns to The Life and Letters of Edmund Clarence Stedman, by Laura Stedman and George M. Gould, N. Y., 1910, 2 vols. Stedman's work as editor and critic is well represented by Victorian Poets, Boston, 1876; Poets of America, Boston, 1885; A Library of American Literature, N. Y. 1889, 11 vols.; An American Anthology, Boston, 1900.

NOTES

HOW OLD BROWN TOOK HARPER'S FERRY

1023. This poem, dated November, 1859, was greatly admired by Emerson; it combines indignation and sympathy in such proportions as to throw a most favorable light on the life of one of the most fanatical of the abolitionists.

WANTED—A MAN

1025. Dated September 8, 1862, when the lack of generalship among the Union forces was notorious. At that time the Confederate troops under General Bragg had started the invasion of Kentucky which resulted in the capture of Richmond, Lexington, Munfordsville, and Frankfort. In the east the Confederate leaders, Lee, Jackson, and Longstreet, were proving more than a match for McClellan, who on November 7th was superseded by Burnside. Burnside in turn gave way to "Fighting Joe" Hooker. (See Lincoln's letter to Hooker, p. 787, above.) Not till Grant was finally commissioned lieutenant-general and given supreme command of all the military forces of the United States, was the "man" finally discovered.

"THE UNDISCOVERED COUNTRY"

1027. The title is from Hamlet's phrase, "the undiscovered country from whose bourn no traveller returns."

"JOAQUIN" MILLER (1841-1913)

According to his own romantic story, which is not to be trusted as regards details, Cincinnati Hiner Miller had for his cradle "a covered wagon, pointed west." It is beyond dispute, however, that in the west he spent the years of his adventurous youth, and of the west he wrote his best poetry. As a young man he happened to write a public letter in defense of the much-abused Mexicans just at the time when Joaquin Murietta, a Mexican bandit, had been killed; and by a queer train of circumstances the bandit's name of Joaquin became attached to the author (as set forth by him in Lippincott's Magazine for July, 1886). Miller had little recognition as a poet until the early seventies, when the publication in London, at his own expense, of his Songs of the Sierras brought him high praises from Browning, Rossetti, and the reviewers of the English press. This dramatic rise from obscure poverty to sudden fame in literary London may be understood by reference to the Introduction and the notes—many of which are little autobiographical essays—of the six-volume Bear Edition of the Poems (1909), and especially to the Fragments from the English Press (I, 119 ff.). But the promise of development and of improved technique which the critics saw in the Songs of the Sierras was never realized, despite the fact that Miller kept on writing verse as well as prose to the end of his life. When he brought the real west into English poetry, he went up to fame like a skyrocket; he came down, not like a rocket-stick, but slowly, like a balloon no longer able to hold its cargo aloft. Once the vivid narrative and accurate imagery of his western poems had lost their novelty, his later work was—or seemed as a rule to be—inferior. Notable exceptions to this rule, however, are The Passing of Tennyson (1892) and Columbus (1896); in the latter he showed in the spirit of Columbus the same steadfastness of purpose which had driven the American pioneers, including Miller himself, "on! and on!"

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Miller's Collected Poems, San Francisco, 1919, 6 vols., contain virtually everything that he wrote. Stuart P. Sherman's Selected Poems of Joaquin Miller, N. Y., 1923, omits the large amount of trivial verse, and presents the best of Miller in convenient form. Mr. Sherman's introductory essay is a sane estimate of Miller's accomplishment and significance. No biography of an adequate sort exists; Fred L. Pattee's American Literature since 1870 discusses Miller in chapter VI.

NOTES

KIT CARSON'S RIDE

1027. During his stay in London 1870-71, Miller asked Browning if he might "borrow the measure and spirit" of How They Brought the Good News from Ghent to Aix "for a prairie fire on the plains, driving buffalo and all other life before it into a river." The English poet acquiesced modestly by referring to Vergil as the source from which he himself had borrowed. As Kit Carson's Ride was originally published, the Indian bride was overwhelmed like Revels, in the fire, and the concluding lines were these:

"Sell Pache! You buy him! A bag full of gold!
You show him! Tell of him the tale I have told!
Why, he bore me through fire, and is blind, and is old!
Now pack up your papers, and get up and spin
To them cities you tell of—Blast you and your tin!"

Miller subsequently cut the poem down and changed it because he thought "it was too long for the tumultuous and swift action, and then the end was coarse and unworthy the brave spirit of Kit Carson."

EXODOS FOR OREGON

1030. These vivid descriptions of a life with which Miller had been familiar from earliest childhood are fairly representative of the sort of work which gave the Oregon poet his popularity.

COLUMBUS

1032. For other poems on Columbus, see Lowell's, above, p. 613, and pages 8-18 of Burton Egbert Stevenson's Poems of American History (1908).

EUGENE FIELD (1850-1895)

Eugene Field was born in St. Louis, in 1850, but received his early education in Amherst, Massachusetts. He had three years of college training—at Williams, Knox, and the University of Missouri—and a few months of travel in Europe; in 1873 he married, and soon settled down for life to the exacting duties of a journalist. He distinguished himself especially by his contributions to the Denver Tribune, and subsequently made "Sharps and Flats," his column on the Chicago Record (now the Daily News), famous the country over. With the publication of his best pieces in book form—a venture which began modestly with The Tribune Primer in 1882 and was continued with such well-known volumes as A Little Book of Western Verse (1889), and A Little Book of Profitable Tales (1890)—Field took a conspicuous place among contemporary humorists and writers of familiar verse. Since his death in 1895, he has been popularly classed with Riley, but there is a great difference in their literary range.

A clue to understanding this difference is the fact, pointed out by Wordsworth, that of two equally well executed compositions, one in verse and the other in prose, the former will be read a hundred times as often as the latter. Riley was a poet; Field was primarily a prose humorist who could fill his column day after day with such satire as this:—

Blue Cut, Tenn., May 2, 1885.—The second section of the train bearing the Illinois Legislature to New Orleans was stopped near this station by bandits last night. After relieving the bandits of their watches and money, the excursionists proceeded on their journey with increased enthusiasm.

But Field was also a poet, and already his prose is largely forgotten, while his verse, especially that dealing with childhood, has survived. The imitations and adaptations of Horace, Echoes from the Sabine Farm (1891), written in collaboration with his brother, Roswell M. Field, are unique and may perhaps be read longer than anything else he ever wrote.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The Writings in Prose and Verse of Eugene Field, N. Y., 1896-1900, 12 vols., is the standard edition. The poems are available by themselves in a complete edition, N. Y., 1910. A memoir of the poet by his brother, R. M. Field, is part of the twelve volume edition. Slason Thompson's Eugene Field: A Study in Heredity and Contradiction, N. Y., 1901, 2 vols., is the most exhaustive biographical and critical study.

JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY (1849-1916)

Riley was born in 1849 in Greenfield, Indiana. His father, a lawyer, looked with but little favor on the boy's interest in poetry, dramatics, and music; and as a preliminary to the grind of studying law, he gave his son two summers of hard work painting signs on fences and barns. To this the boy submitted cheerfully, but once he came into actual contact with Blackstone, he ran away and joined the troupe of a travelling quack doctor. After such a display of independence the youth was allowed to make his own way by his pen, writing verses now for one paper, now for another, and eventually establishing a permanent connection with the Indianapolis Journal.

From the first publication of The Old Swimmin' Hole and Leven More Poems in 1883 the poet's vogue increased with amazing rapidity. He poured forth dialect poems by the hundred, and toured the country in company with celebrities like Mark Twain, Robert J. Burdette, and Bill Nye, reciting his own verses with such universal success that he was acclaimed "the people's laureate." A selection of his poems published in England under the title of Old Fashioned Roses (1888) considerably enhanced his international reputation; and after the turn of the century such universities as Yale, Pennsylvania, and Indiana vied with each other in conferring on him honorary degrees. Before his death in 1916 "Riley Day" had been celebrated in public schools throughout the country at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior, and at his funeral thirty-five thousand people gathered to do honor to his memory.

Riley had something of Burns's power to "touch the heart" by suggesting the pathos and the sweetness of home life in "the good old days"; as might be expected, his favorite authors were Burns and Dickens. But he frankly estimated the value of his poems by their respective power to grip an audience when recited by himself. Such a standard assured simplicity, directness, and emotional appeal—nothing more; it was at once his strength and his weakness. Of passion or depth or profound thought, his verse has but little; of maudlin sentiment, all too much. It aspires to reach the intellectual level of an average American audience gathered for amusement—and it seldom reaches higher.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Riley's work is available in many editions, best of which is the Biographical, Indianapolis, 1916, 10 vols. The critical apparatus in this edition is adequate for an understanding of Riley's life. There is an appreciative essay by Meredith Nicholson in the Atlantic Monthly for October, 1916.

EDWARD ROWLAND SILL (1841-1887)

Sill has been aptly compared to Emily Dickinson in spiritual isolation from his contemporaries. Frail in health and doubtful as to the choice of a profession on his graduation as class poet at Yale in 1861, he went to the Pacific Coast via Cape Horn; then, after various failures to find a congenial occupation in the west, he returned to the east with the idea of 'becoming a minister. His religious doubts, however, always kept him out of the ministry, and the messages that might have found expression in sermons were compressed into poems. He eventually settled down in California to the life of a teacher and poet, occupying positions in different schools and in the state university. Several volumes of his poetry were published during his lifetime, and there has been a quiet but persistent continuation of interest in his work manifested since his death in 1887.

Sill himself in his Principles of Criticism (quoted in the C. H. A. L., III, p. 57) sets forth his view that a poem should "be full of lovely images" and should bring us "troops of high and pure associations,—the very words so chosen that they come 'trailing clouds of glory' in their suggestiveness." Much of his work is frankly didactic, but fresh and spontaneous. In his youth, when he wrote Morning (p. 1035), he was already breathing the rarefied air of the spirit which is the essence of his best-loved poems. Of these The Fool's Prayer (p. 1036) has already taken its place among the American classics.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The Household Edition of Sill's poems, Boston, 1906, is a satisfactory one-volume collection of virtually all his work. W. B. Parker's Edward Rowland Sill, His Life and Work, Boston, 1915, is the best source of biographical information.

KATHERINE LEE BATES (1859—)

Miss Bates was born at Falmouth, Massachusetts, in 1859, and attended Wellesley, Middlebury, and Oberlin Colleges. As Professor of English at Wellesley for over twenty years, she has exerted a considerable influence on the writing and the appreciation of poetry, while her own poetical work has appeared from time to time in such volumes as America the Beautiful and Other Poems (1911), The Retinue and Other Poems (1918), and Yellow Clover (1922).

NOTES

AMERICA THE BEAUTIFUL

1037. Miss Bates's best known poem was written in the summer of 1893 while she was making her first trip west, the opening lines coming into her mind as she looked out over the sea-like expanse of country visible from the top of Pike's Peak. The original four stanzas were written shortly afterwards and were first published in The Congregationalist July 4, 1895. The poem was at once set to music by Silas

G. Pratt, and subsequently by some sixty other composers. In 1904 Miss Bates re-wrote the poem, making the phraseology more simple and direct, and printed the new version in the Boston Evening Transcript November 19, 1904. Her final arrangement is that printed in this volume. (—Condensed from the author's own statement.)

EDWIN MARKHAM (1852—)

Edwin Markham was born in Oregon City, Oregon, in 1852, and spent his boyhood in California. After an extensive school and university training he took up educational work in the state of his adoption, but since the publication of The Man with the Hoe in 1899 he has been best known as a poet. The extravagant praise which Mr. Markham's most famous poem aroused gave him a skyrocket reputation which, except for his Lincoln, the Man of the People, he has hardly sustained. After publishing The Man with the Hoe and Other Poems (1899) and Lincoln and Other Poems (1901), Mr. Markham moved to the east and subsequently has lived in or near New York City. Among his more recent volumes are The Shoes of Happiness (1914) and The Gates of Paradise (1920).

NOTES

THE MAN WITH THE HOE

1037. This poem, first published in the San Francisco Examiner January 15, 1899, met with immediate popularity and was quoted and reprinted throughout the English-speaking world. It voiced so vigorous a protest against the unprincipled exploitation of the laboring man, that it was hailed as "the battle-cry of the next thousand years."

LINCOLN, THE MAN OF THE PEOPLE

1038. Published in 1901 and subsequently revised. The version here printed was selected out of two hundred and fifty Lincoln poems, and read in 1922 before an audience of a hundred thousand at the dedication of the great Lincoln Memorial in Washington, D. C.

RICHARD HOVEY (1864-1900)

Richard Hovey was born in Normal, Illinois, in 1864, and spent his boyhood in Washington, D. C. After his graduation from Dartmouth College in 1885, he studied theology for a while and then shifted from one occupation to another with Bohemian independence. He was journalist, actor, and professor of English at Barnard College, but above all he was a poet. He planned, and in part carried out, a comprehensive treatment, from a modern point of view, of the Arthurian romances. His Songs from Vagabondia (1894), were written in conjunction with Bliss Carman, as were the later collections More Songs from Vagabondia (1896), Last Songs from Vagabondia (1900), and Echoes from Vagabondia (1902). His sudden death in 1900 cut short what promised to be a career of great distinction.

Despite all that Hovey achieved towards making himself the poet of Arthurian romance, he never brought his more pretentious productions to the point of perfection reached by his less aspiring "vagabond" poems. In the latter there is evident a vitality, a youthful touch, and a modernity which have made them appeal to young people throughout the country; his Stein Song (p. 1039) is sung in colleges from coast to coast. Hovey's own view of the poet's calling is best set forth in his own words: "It is not his mission to write elegant canzonettas for the delectation of the Sybaritic dilettanti, but to comfort the sorrowful and hearten the despairing, to champion the oppressed and declare to humanity its inalienable rights, to lay open to the world the heart of man, all its heights and depths, all its glooms and glories, to reveal the beauty in things, and breathe into his fellows a love of it and so a love of Him whose manifestation it is."

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Hovey's plays, which originally appeared between 1889 and 1900, were republished in a uniform edition in 1907 (N. Y., 5 vols.). His "Vagabondia" volumes, from which all the poems here reprinted have been taken, are listed in the preceding note. What may be considered his final volume, To the End of the Trail (N. Y., 1908) is edited by Mrs. Richard Hovey. No biographical study of Hovey has yet appeared, but Odell Shepard's Bliss Carman, 1924, contains much information concerning Hovey's relations to his friend and collaborator. Bruce Weirick's discussion of the two men, in his From Whitman to Sandburg (N. Y., 1924), is sympathetic and illuminating.

RICHARD WATSON GILDER (1844-1909)

Richard Watson Gilder was born in 1844 at Bordentown, New Jersey, and educated at his father's schools at Bordentown and Flushing. His father was not only a schoolmaster but a minister, and subsequently an army chaplain. Richard volunteered for service in the northern army when he was only nineteen, and after the war took up journalism with such success that by 1881 he was editor-in-chief of the Century, a magazine which for some twenty-five years allowed ample scope for the employment of his unusual talents. His career as a poet of note began with the publication in 1875 of The New Day, a collection of sonnets and love songs written under the joint influence of Rossetti's poems and Gilder's own friendship for Helena de Kay, whom he subsequently married. During the rest of his life he produced poetry in sufficient quantity to bring his Complete Poems to nearly five hundred pages. In addition to his literary work, he was active in many philanthropic and artistic movements and received four university doctorates in spite of what he called his "total freedom from collegiate training." He made no secret, however, of the fact that his achievements as a poet meant more to him "than all the rest put together." His death in 1909 was a severe blow to American literature, but much of his personality has been preserved in the volume of Letters edited by his daughter and published in 1916.

Verse was to Gilder "a perfectly natural and inevitable medium of expression." Few American poets have achieved so perfect a feeling for form with so little conscious striving for it. He was a deft sonneteer and a natural master of various lyric measures. His admiration for Whitman's poetry was specifically qualified (See the Letters, passim) by the extent to which the Good Gray Poet made his rhythms effective; and his own use of the freer forms of verse, as in The Night Pasture and In a Night of Midsummer (pp. 1042, 1043), is extremely melodious. The best comment on his manner of composition is the reply which he himself made to the question as to how he wrote his poetry: "What I may call my own poetic mental habit is lyrical. As nearly as I can remember, each poem, or theme, or motif (as one would say in music) occurs to me almost simultaneously in both thought and form. A poetic phrase (made up of words in a certain poetic accent and diction) shapes itself in the mind. I do not realize at the moment what the metre is. I may, or may not, realize what the stanza or complete poem form is to be. I think that most of my lyrics have occurred to me 'on the road,' when moving about, going back and forth to my office, travelling, sometimes when I am reading. Sometimes a line or two will rest in my mind for years, and add other lines, like certain creatures of the lower order, spontaneously; it may be in distant scenes." (Written for Researches on the Rhythm of Speech, and reprinted in the Letters, p. 416.)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The Complete Poems of Richard Watson Gilder, Boston, 1910, is the best single volume to which to turn for his verse. His Letters, edited by his daughter, Rosamund Gilder, appeared in 1916 (Boston). An essay by G. E. Woodberry, Gilder as a Poet, appeared in the Century for February, 1910.

STEPHEN CRANE (1871-1900)

In a brief life of twenty-nine years Crane won distinction in both prose and verse. As an undergraduate in Syracuse University he had his first taste of journalism while serving as correspondent for the New York Tribune (1890-1891). Leaving college without a degree, he began a career of free-lance writing which took him to Cuba and Greece in search of colorful material, and which eventually came to a close in England in 1900, when his untimely death occurred.

It was Crane's purpose to tell the truth as he saw it, and though at times his work became almost brutally realistic, the frank naturalism of his prose is on the whole one of its chief assets. The Red Badge of Courage (1895) is by general consent his chief work, and as a novel presenting the facts of war is virtually without an equal in the language. The Little Regiment (1896), a collection of short tales dealing with the Civil War, has almost as much merit.

As a poet, Crane belongs to the group of "modernists" who have departed far from the beaten paths in search for material and for new artistic effects. Had he written in 1920, when the new forms of verse had become widely known, it would have been easy to "account for" his work. But when one realizes that his two volumes of poetry, The Black Riders (1895) and War is Kind (1899) appeared long before the recent poetic revolt had got under way, one realizes that Crane anticipated the new movement in many respects, and was in all probability somewhat influential in bringing it about.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Crane's Works are now available in a limited edition, edited by Wilson Follett, N. Y., 1925-26, 12 vols. The only authoritative biographical treatment is Thomas Beer's Stephen Crane; a Study in American Letters, N. Y., 1924. This volume contains an interesting preface by Joseph Conrad.

WILLIAM VAUGHN MOODY (1869-1910)

Moody was born in Spencer, Indiana, and was connected with Harvard University as undergraduate, graduate student, and instructor in English. From 1895 to 1903 he taught at the University of Chicago with notable success, but abandoned teaching to devote himself exclusively to creative literary work. Always a great traveller and a thorough student of the world's best literature, he acquired a cosmopolitan view of life and a mastery of the technique of writing that suggest the literary breadth of Longfellow or Lowell. One of his prose plays, The Great Divide (1906), achieved a notable success; and the History of English Literature, written in collaboration with Robert M. Lovett, is still regarded as standard. To poetry, however, Moody gave his best efforts, for he was by nature a poet. He declined President Harper's offer of a full professor's salary for lecturing during only one quarter of each year at Chicago, and subsequently resisted the lure of a publisher's fifty thousand dollar contract to re-write The Great Divide as a novel. His Masque of Judgment (1900) was followed the next year by a volume of Poems, with which he took his place among the few notable American poets of the new century.

A man of such independent spirit in his private life could hardly fail to achieve an independent style in his poetry. This individuality he manifested first by turning his back resolutely on the soothing sweetness which Poe, Keats, Tennyson, and Swinburne had had in common, and second, in attaining a power of vigorous expression on social and political topics without becoming a servile imitator of Whitman. He differed, too, from many of his contemporaries by recognizing that mere eccentricity is no sign of genius. Endowed, then, with an unusual skill in the technique of verse and a keen power of observing nature, Moody succeeded in writing a number of lyrical and reflective poems that have won him many admirers. Of his freedom from sentimentalism we may infer a good deal from the truthful, though flippant, remark in The Menagerie:

I'm not precisely an æolian lute
Hung in the wandering winds of sentiment;

but for his highest aspirations as a poet we must turn to the humble but fervent outpouring of his soul in lines 135-154 of The Daguerreotype. His pictorial phraseology has been justly criticised as being occasionally forced, and his moral earnestness is often above the level of popular intelligence; but his posthumous reputation seems to indicate that if any of the American poets of the first quarter of this century are to survive, Moody will be among them.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The Poems and Plays of William Vaughn Moody, edited by John M. Manly, Boston, 1912, 2 vols., is the one invaluable edition which the student will require. It contains the best life of Moody which has yet appeared. Some Letters of William Vaughn Moody, edited by S. G. Mason, Boston, 1913, supplements Mr. Manly's narrative. Herman Hagedorn's essay in the Independent, February 6, 1913, is an appreciative criticism.

NOTES

ROAD-HYMN FOR THE START

1045. This poem was the result of Moody's bicycle trip from Rome to Lake Como in May, 1897; it was outlined at that time and completed later.

AN ODE IN TIME OF HESITATION

Published in the Atlantic Monthly for May, 1900, during the height of the agitation for Philippine independence. The transition from the theme of the sacrifice for liberty made in the Civil War to the principal theme of the poem is slow but correspondingly effective. Not till line 212 does the poet actually name "the island men."

GLOUCESTER MOORS

1049. Written at Gloucester in 1900 and published in Scribner's Magazine for December of that year. The accurate portrayal of external nature is blended with philosophic musings and reflections on society which have made the poem a favorite with workers in the slums; while the elaboration of the figure of the world as a ship, though by no means original, is singularly effective.

THE MENAGERIE

1050. Beneath the flow of grotesque humor is an undercurrent of serious suggestion about the evolutionary theory and the present incompleteness of the evolutionary process.

THE DAGUERRETYPE

1052. The perfect sincerity of the poem is vouched for by the facts of the poet's life as set forth in the Introduction to his Poems and Plays by John M. Manly, who calls the piece "a poem so deep of thought, so full of poignant feeling and clairvoyant vision, so wrought of passionate beauty that I know not where to look for another tribute from any poet to his mother that equals it." William Cowper's verses entitled On The Receipt of my Mother's Picture are in some ways comparable, but Moody's style is more like that of Browning.
1054. 138. To maiden Mary. The story of the Annunciation may be found in Luke I, 26-38.

EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON (1869—)

Mr. Robinson, the son of a grain merchant, was born in Head Tide, and was brought up in Gardner—both in the state of Maine. After two years at Harvard he went to New York City, where the necessity of earning a living forced him into various unlitary occupations such as subway-construction; but despite the many difficulties involved, he has succeeded in making the writing of poetry his life work. His first four volumes (1896, 1897, 1902, and 1910) contained nothing to bring him prominently before the public, though he did receive from President Roosevelt the American substitute for a pension—a position in the New York Custom House, which he held from 1905 to 1910. The Man Against the Sky (1916), marked a great advance in his work, and was followed in rapid succession by two long poems, Merlin and Lancelot, and the two collections called The Three Taverns and Avon's Harvest. When the contents of all these volumes had been gathered together into the edition of Collected Poems (1921) it was recognized, at least by the poets and critics if not by the general public, that Mr. Robinson had produced a body of carefully wrought and thoughtful verse which none of his American contemporaries had equalled. His variety of subjects and of treatment is so great as to preclude any generalization about his work, but the praise accorded by his fellow-poets is fairly represented by such a statement as Margaret Wilkinson's: "The reader may be sure of finding in his work the faultless meter, the vivid phrase, and the essential nobleness of gesture which is part of being a gentleman." In three of his recent volumes, Roman Bartholow (1923), The Man Who Died Twice (1924), and Tristram (1927), the poet has maintained his own high standard of excellence.

In spite of this achievement, Mr. Robinson's hold on the American public seems to be no stronger than that of Robert Bridges on the British public. He apparently rates the average reader's intelligence high—perhaps too high—and resolutely refuses to cater to the taste of an age that demands sensational effects. His style is so pure and his verse so perfect in technique that the lack of emotional intensity is doubly felt, while the cryptic implications of many poems leave the reader baffled. Occasionally, to be sure, the reader is roused to a sympathetic understanding, as in Lancelot and a dozen of the shorter poems, but more often he feels only a cold admiration.

One of the extraordinary facts of Mr. Robinson's work is that his interest in personalities is so great that some, though not all, of his men and women are detached from any background of time and place. The imagery of external nature is neglected for the study of the human soul; many of his people may have lived in almost any country, at any time these last two thousand years. One grasps—if one is fortunate—the significant point of some character-revealing episode or conversation, and struggles to retain it in a limbo of similar psychological studies. The idea carries by its own merit, or not at all. This is not popular poetry, but its very detachment from time and place assures the permanence of its appeal to the limited class who agree with Browning that the only thing worth studying is the human soul.

Probably the highest praise that has been accorded Mr. Robinson by an English writer of any note is to be found in a stimulating essay by Theodore Maynard (Our Best Poets, 1924, pp. 153-168), which concludes with these words: "What is it that prevents him from being either simple, sensuous or passionate? Is it diffidence? Or his sombre temperament? I do not know . . . it is certain that something has been left out of Robinson's genius. If he had been able to abandon himself he might have become not merely the greatest poet of America (he has, I think, become that) but one of the half-dozen of the world's greatest poets."

All of the seven poems included in this volume are fairly representative of Mr. Robinson's best work of various types. Cliff Klingenhausen, Richard Cory (1896), and Miniver Cheevy (1910) are masterpieces of characterization which incidentally foreshadow some of Edgar Lee Masters' sketches in the Spoon River Anthology, while Flammonde, the man "from God knows where," (1916) is a deeper study of a more baffling personality; The Return of Morgan and Fingal (1902) is one of the characteristic ballads; Partnership (1902) is a monologue faintly suggestive of Browning; while Ben Jonson Entertains a Man from Stratford (1916), with its leisurely piecing together of the mosaic of a man's soul, is regarded as the best study of Shakespeare in the whole realm of poetry.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Virtually everything of Mr. Robinson's except his recent work is included in the Collected Poems, New York, 1921. Lewis Morris's The Poetry of Edwin Arlington Robinson, 1923, contains helpful and stimulating comment on various phases of his work. See also the volumes referred to in the bibliography on "The New Poetry," p. 1232.

NOTES

BEN JONSON ENTERTAINS A MAN FROM STRATFORD

1061. The poem manages to bring together, without any parade of learning, the more important known facts about the life of Shakespeare and to express the vastness of his personality in language such as Jonson might actually have used.

3. Will put an ass's head in Fairyland. A specific reference to A Midsummer-night's Dream, Act. III, sc. 1.

35. I tell him he needs Greek. Line 31 of Jonson's poem To the Memory of My Beloved Master William Shakespeare has become proverbial: "And though thou hadst small Latin and less Greek."

1062. 88. He's all at odds with all the unities. Jonson himself believed in the unities of action, time, and place derived from statements in Aristotle's Poetics; Shakespeare disregarded the unities of time and place as unnecessary hindrances to dramatic expression, though he was doubtless not aware that these doctrines had been established through elaborations and misinterpretations of Aristotle.

1063. 142. Poor Greene. Robert Greene, a dramatist contemporary with Shakespeare, best known today for his jealousy of Shakespeare, whom he called "an upstart crow" in A Groat'sworth of Wit.

1064. 174. He's put one there with all her poison on. The reference is to the "Dark Lady" who figures largely in Sonnets 127-154.

180. Who seems to have decoyed him, married him. Anne Hathaway. She was eight years older than Shakespeare, who married her when he was eighteen. There is no evidence that she went to London to live with him there, and the only mention of her in the poet's will is the bequest to her of his second-best bedroom set.

206. Engines. "Natural capacities" is the probable meaning; but the word was also used (by Shakespeare himself) to mean "contrivances."

1066. 290-302. The ideas expressed are Shakespeare's, while the figures are Mr. Robinson's. The language is a masterly reproduction of Shakespeare's with a slight colloquial touch.

1067. 383. Katharsis. Aristotle's theory of katharsis, set forth in his Poetics, is that tragedy exercises a cleansing or purging influence through pity and fear.

AMY LOWELL (1874-1925)

and

THE "NEW POETRY"

It would be unjust to the memory of Miss Lowell to hold her responsible for all that has masqueraded under the name of "new poetry" since the year 1914, but it is convenient and not unjust to group together a discussion of her own work, and a consideration of various modern tendencies which are in large part due to her direct and indirect influence.

Looking back over the mass of "new poetry" published since 1914, it is now apparent that only a little of it is worthy the name poetry, and that of that little there are but few elements which can with honesty be called new. For the most part the characteristics which distinguish great poetry from mere trifling in verse are lacking: the memorable phrase, the sense of form and plan which appeals to a well-ordered mind, a recognizable pattern of sound sufficient to heighten whatever emotional effect the poem may otherwise produce, and many other subtler elements which are perceived, though seldom analyzed, in all that the world has called great poetry from Homer to William Vaughn Moody. Leaving out of consideration, then, those ephemeral productions which aimed to attract attention by startling the reader and too often succeeded in amusing him, there is still a modest body of respectable poetry produced since 1914 worthy of serious consideration. That it is not wholly new is rapidly being recognized; and a few of the more evident foreshadowings may be briefly indicated.

(1) The use of freer forms of verse was anticipated by Whitman, who in turn derived from Macpherson's Ossian many hints which he used to advantage, the similarity being more evident if one prints Macpherson's measured prose in the long lines so common in Leaves of Grass. (2) The simplicity of diction may likewise be traced back through Whitman and a dozen others to Wordsworth, and beyond him to Burns. (3) The broadening of the range of subject-matter to include all phases of life has been an intermittent but powerful tendency ever since the middle of the eighteenth century; Burns' treatment of peasant life, Coleridge's poem To a Young Ass, Wordsworth's effusions both successful and unsuccessful, were only single manifestations of a movement that found fuller expression in such a comprehensive work as Browning's Ring and the Book. (4) The tendency to cut loose from sentimentalism and get down to the facts of life as it is, though more obviously modern, had been notably manifest in the poetry of Whitman and the prose of Hardy.

There are, nevertheless, certain currents in the poetry of these years so wholesome as to merit consideration. Most of them, as might be expected, are what it is popular to call "democratic." (1) The vocabulary has been largely freed from the artificial and florid expressions which often seemed to set the older poetry apart from real life; and the "poetic license" to depart from the logical word-order merely to suit the exigencies of versification has, apparently, become a thing of the past. Granted that this had been recommended and at times practised by Wordsworth in the Lyrical Ballads, it was not the uniform practice of the great poets of the nineteenth century. (2) The romantic versifier's tendency to idealize life, and to treat the world as a sort of fairyland, has been supplemented by the realist's fondness for giving to the sordid side of life at least its full share of prominence. (3) The anti-sentimental and anti-didactic tendency of the age has shown itself in a willingness to let the facts of life, as reproduced in poetry, speak for themselves; and the result has often been in the direction of greater dramatic power and a more enduring form of art. (4) Critics and editors have shown an almost uniform tendency to recognize the worth of various patterns of sound not commonly employed by the older poets; and though the term "free verse" has caused much confusion, it is clear that certain freer rhythms (as indicated, for instance, in Bliss Perry's Study of Poetry, 1920, pp. 204 ff.) are worth experimenting with, and that some of the "new poetry" is indeed poetry of a high order.

Poetry has thus been made more democratic because it has been made easier to read, it has been brought closer to the experiences of every-day life, it has been freed from an unpopular didacticism, and it has been set loose (for better or for worse) from the more or less rigid traditions of versification. The day has passed when a critic of the standing of Poe dares condemn a line because it does not "scan" according to the "rules." In bringing about these changes the most successful and influential leader was undoubtedly Miss Lowell.

Miss Lowell was peculiarly fitted by birth and training to be a powerful force in our literature. A relative of James Russell Lowell, and sister of Abbott Lawrence Lowell, now (1927) President of Harvard University, she was born in Brookline in 1874, and during her early years had every advantage that could be derived from family associations and foreign travel. When she was twenty-eight, she definitely decided on a literary career, but wisely refrained from rushing into print; in fact, before venturing to publish her first volume of verse she devoted ten full years to the study of English and foreign poetry and to practice in writing. (A single sonnet, to be sure, had appeared in the Atlantic Monthly in 1910.) In addition to her much-discussed work as a poet—of which more anon—she proved herself a critic of no little power; no one can deny that her propaganda for the Imagists and other unorthodox poets was often as sound as it was vigorous. Her ten years of preparation and her subsequent researches bore ample fruit not only in her public lectures but also in three volumes of criticism and biography which serve to illustrate the keenness of her mind and the wide range of her learning: Six French Poets (1915), Tendencies in Modern American Poetry (1917), and John Keats (1925).

It is futile to discount Miss Lowell's influence by saying it was due to her having a wider newspaper publicity than any other American poet of her generation—that her personal eccentricities and the fervor with which she argued, and wept, for her theories when she was on the lecture platform made every wide-awake reporter her unpaid publicity agent. As a matter of fact, this gratuitous advertising was scarcely of a sort to predispose the public in her favor; with many intelligent readers it was a handicap to be overcome. Nor can one even tentatively suggest that she used the freer forms of verse through inability to master the stricter ones, when she was constantly writing the strictest forms with technical correctness; the inclusion of twenty-eight sonnets in her first volume, A Dome of Many-Coloured Glass (1912), should have been sufficient to forestall that slur, though it may have been applied with reason to some of her disciples. She was, however, subjected to much unfair, adverse criticism, until ridicule and petty abuse were definitely silenced by the appearance in 1925 of her life of Keats—a work which proved her a deep and thoughtful, though at times erratic, scholar.

Her first pronounced success in poetry was Sword Blades and Poppy Seeds (1914), from which the first two poems printed in this volume have been selected. Two years later she further illustrated her unusual theories of versification, and at the same time showed an amazing advance in interest and power, with the publication of Men, Women and Ghosts. There is a flexibility and a dramatic power in such pieces as Patterns, The Bombardment, Reaping, and Number 3 on the Docket, which established her position as observer of life and as poet. With the later volumes, Can Grande's Castle (1918) and Pictures of the Floating World (1919), Miss Lowell maintained the position which had been accorded her, however reluctantly, by the whole English-speaking world—a position of respect for her poetical achievements if not always for her theoretical views of technique. Her death in 1925 removed the ablest and most uniformly successful of the entire group of "new poets."

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The more important of Miss Lowell's works have been referred to in the paragraphs above: to these the student may add her posthumous poems, of which East Wind is a representative collection; but for a careful study of her work, and the work of the other poets with whom she is inevitably associated, the student should add to his reading from the lists which follow.

BIBLIOGRAPHY OF THE "NEW POETRY"

COLLECTIONS—Both British and American poets are included in The New Poetry: An Anthology, edited by Harriet Monroe and Alice Corbin Henderson, N. Y., 1917 (new edition 1923), and in Marguerite Wilkinson's Contemporary Poetry, N. Y., 1923; but a fuller representation of the Americans is given, with criticism and valuable biographical information, in Louis Untermeyer's Modern American Poetry: A Critical Anthology, third revised edition, N. Y., 1925. Other collections are the well known volumes edited by Jessie B. Rittenhouse and the annual Anthology of Magazine Verse by William Stanley Braithwaite.

The "Imagist" movement may best be approached through a series of three volumes edited by Amy Lowell: Some Imagist Poets, Boston, 1915, 1916, and 1917. The Preface of the 1915 collection is of special interest.

BIOGRAPHY AND CRITICISM—A convenient book for general reference is Contemporary American Literature: Bibliographies and Study Outlines, by John M. Manly and Edith Rickert, N. Y., 1922. Miss Lowell's Tendencies in Modern American Poetry, N. Y., 1917, is still valuable for the earlier work, but should be supplemented by one of the more recent volumes of criticism: Louis Untermeyer's American Poetry Since 1900, N. Y., 1923; Clement Wood's Poets of America, N. Y., 1925; or Percy H. Boynton's Some Contemporary Americans, Chicago, 1924; or, for the British point of view, Theodore Maynard's Our Best Poets, London, 1924. For the relation of the modern poets to their predecessors, one should read the pertinent chapters in studies of broader scope such as John Livingston Lowes' Convention and Revolt in Poetry, Boston, 1919, Bliss Perry's Study of Poetry, Boston, 1920, and Bruce Weirick's From Whitman to Sandburg, N. Y., 1925.

VACHEL LINDSAY (1879—)

Few contrasts are more striking than that between the blatant rag-time verse for which (Nicholas) Vachel Lindsay is best known and the æsthetic trend of his education. One might infer from his poetry that he was a self-made man, with a frail structure of culture on a foundation of youthful crudity; but such is by no means the case. He was born in 1879 in Springfield, Illinois, in the house once owned by Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Smith (Mrs. Smith was Lincoln's sister), where Lincoln had often been entertained. His mother told stories "with the literary accent of her idol, Jane Austen," wrote and staged amateur plays, lectured on Italian art, and brought into the boy's life all the best influences of wide reading and extensive travel. As we read in the Autobiographical Foreword of Lindsay's Collected Poems (1923), she had been courted by Dr. Vachel Lindsay "in the galleries of Dresden, Saxony, and Florence, Italy, and in the gondolas of Venice" during a year which she spent "in the art galleries and cathedrals and pagan temples from Scotland to Sicily." From early infancy the boy Vachel was trained to be an artist. With that end in view he was given a good schooling, with special emphasis on drawing, and was encouraged to read the standard authors. Before he was fourteen he had read Poe's "complete works, criticism and all, through and through" and championed him "as a sage, and a high priest of every form of beauty, and not a jingle man." After attending Hiram College (1897-1900), he took a three years' course of study at the Art Institute of Chicago, and supplemented it by another year at the New York School of Art. He was engaged in "drawing architecture, drawing sculpture, trying to draw the Venus of Milo, and imitating the Japanese Prints and Beardsley, and trying to draw like Blake, and all such matters." Since those days his interest in art has been unflagging; as he significantly remarks in the same Autobiographical Foreword, "I have now, for eighteen years, walked the corridors of the Metropolitan Museum, for the most part alone. Each room echoes like a mausoleum."

The satiric implication of the words just quoted suggests the fact that Mr. Lindsay is a reformer, who has considered it his mission in life to preach "the gospel of beauty"—and various other gospels—to the unwashed millions. Ever since 1906 he has at frequent intervals roamed over the country, lecturing now on temperance, now on art, sometimes distributing a little pamphlet called Rhymes to be Traded for Bread; of late he has engaged in a number of "national reciting tours" which have made him one of the most picturesque figures in contemporary literature.

Mr. Lindsay's first two volumes of poems, General Booth Enters Into Heaven (1913) and The Congo and Other Poems (1914) showed what he could do at his best, and brought him well deserved popularity. The next two volumes, The Chinese Nightingale (1917) and The Golden Whales of California (1920), despite occasional purple patches, have met with little favor. Meanwhile, however, Mr. Lindsay has entertained so many thousands by chanting and reciting his poems that he has become steadily more of a national figure, and his publishers have brought out his Collected Poems (1923, and again in 1925) as well as the prose volumes Adventures While Preaching the Gospel of Beauty (1914), The Art of the Moving Picture (1915), A Handy Guide for Beggars (1916), and The Golden Book of Springfield (1920).

If one intones such a poem as The Congo, or The Santa-Fé Trail in the manner indicated by the various sizes of type and the marginal directions (which are intended to suggest the author's own manner of delivery), one gets a clue to the success of his most representative pieces. There is a thumping, pounding rhythm as vigorous as that of Anglo-Saxon poetry, and as tantalizingly contagious as the syncopated dance music of the twentieth century. Here we have a return to the primitive instinct for the communal chant, which is common to the life of ancient Greece and the negro districts of America. It is a reaction against all that is over-elaborate and difficult to follow in the varied rhythms with which sophisticated poets love to experiment—a movement back to The Bells of Poe, but carried further until even the most uncultivated ear must feel its rhythmic appeal.

If Mr. Lindsay had had the patience and discrimination to keep his work up to his own best standard, his permanent place among our poets would be assured. But after the success of the first two volumes he fell into a careless way of writing that has lost him many admirers. One critic (Clement Wood, Poets of America, pp. 238 ff.) piles up such phrases as "unintentionally funny," "perilously close to drivel," and tries to account for "the gradual degradation of a great gift." The fact that the English publishers of The Golden Whales of California renamed it (without the author's permission) Daniel Jazz, is also significant. The strong, elemental themes of negro life and Salvation Army ecstasy have given way to a futile, elementary, and even childish rant on politics, religion, and life in general. It would appear that Mr. Lindsay in attempting to coax the Philistine mind up to the level of poetry, has often succeeded in bringing his poetry down to the level of the Philistines.

NOTES

GENERAL WILLIAM BOOTH ENTERS INTO HEAVEN

1075. The poem was written in 1912, shortly after the death of the founder of the Salvation Army. "In my poem," writes the author, "I merely turned into rhyme as well as I could, word for word, General Booth's own account of his life, and the telegraph dispatches of his death after going blind. I set it to a tune that is not a tune, but a speech, a refrain used most frequently in the meeting of the Army on any public square to this day."

THE CONGO

1076. "This poem, particularly the third section, was suggested by an allusion in a sermon by my pastor, F. W. Burnham, to the heroic life and death of Ray Eldred. Eldred was a missionary of the Disciples of Christ who perished while swimming a treacherous branch of the Congo. See A Master Builder on the Congo, by Andrew F. Henesey, published by Fleming H. Revell.—Author's note. On the author's intimate knowledge of negro life, and on the various influences that led to the composition of the poem, see his Collected Poems (1923), p. 23; Louis Untermeyer's New Era in American Poetry (1919), p. 81; and Clement Wood's Poets of America (1925), p. 235.

1077. 37. Leopold's ghost. Leopold II (1835-1909), King of the Belgians and tyrannical ruler of the Congo.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN WALKS AT MIDNIGHT

1080. Written in August, 1914. The Lincoln tomb is at Oak Ridge, near Springfield, Illinois, where the poet spent his boyhood.

EDGAR LEE MASTERS (1868—)

It is the paradox of Mr. Masters' career that the only part of his literary work which seems sure to live after him is a book of epitaphs. Mitch Miller, Children of the Market Place, and other attempts at prose fiction, plays, and poems of varied sort have all been cast into the shadow by his Spoon River Anthology (1915); even the magnificent conception of his Doomsday Book (1920) proved inadequate to carry the weight of mediocre verse. The Spoon River Anthology, on the other hand, has enjoyed an unusual popularity and is commonly said to have exerted a greater influence than any other recent volume of American poetry.

Mr. Masters was born in Garnett, Kansas, August 23, 1868, of an old Puritan family. He spent his youth in Illinois, where he studied law and wrote verses. As a Chicago attorney he had a successful career, but as a writer he enjoyed little success until 1914. His early verses, like those of Petit the Poet of his own Anthology, were suggestive of Seeds in a dry pod, tick, tick, tick.

But in 1914—unlike Petit, who was blind to Life all around [him] here in the village:

Tragedy, comedy, valor and truth—

Mr. Masters followed a hint from William Marion Reedy, considered the opportunity at his very feet, and printed in Reedy's Mirror for May 29, 1914, four epitaphs purporting to be written with perfect candor by the deceased themselves. In a short time the author was famous and his collection of epitaphs in book form (1915) had gone through several editions. His New Spoon River Anthology (1925) is a continuation of the plan of the original collection, and shows better work than the author has produced at any time in the intervening decade.

Now that the thing has been done, it seems very simple to have written the Spoon River Anthology: the Greek Anthology from which various hints were derived has been at the disposal of poets through the ages, while the fulsome misrepresentation of life in conventional epitaphs has been a matter of comment for centuries. Nothing seems easier than to reverse the usual process and let a person write his own obituary, setting forth the real facts about the crises of his life; but no American had successfully put the materials together until Mr. Masters did so, and his extension of the scheme to include virtually the whole life of a typical mid-western town was a stroke of genius. Further, Mr. Masters' vigorous realism gains a special effectiveness by its contrast with the effusiveness of the usual epitaph, and the fact that the majority of his more effective epitaphs deal with somewhat sordid lives provides another artistic contrast when some few of them prove to be aglow with the joy of existence. Of the poems printed in this volume, for instance, Lucinda Matlock's enjoyment of her ninety-six years is all the more vital if the reader comes upon it shortly after considering the grim views of life set forth by Knowlton Hoheimer and Jack McGuire.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

In addition to the works listed above, Mr. Masters has published Songs and Satires, 1916, The Great Valley, 1916, and Toward the Gulf, 1918. The Preface to Toward the Gulf contains the author's own comment on the Spoon River Anthology, and account of how it came to be written. For further comment, see the works listed in the general bibliography of "The New Poetry," p. 1232.

CARL SANDBURG (1878—)

Mr. Sandburg was born in Galesburg, Illinois, in 1878, the son of a Swedish immigrant who changed his name from Johnson to Sandburg to avoid confusion with other Johnsons on the same payroll. The boy was able to attend school only until his thirteenth year, and then took up one after another of the occupations which have qualified him—at least so far as experience with work is concerned—to become "the laureate of industrial America." He drove a milk wagon, served as porter in a barber shop, shifted scenes in a theatre, washed dishes in hotels, made bricks, harvested wheat, and volunteered for service in the army during the Spanish-American War. With a hundred dollars in his pocket when he was mustered out, he entered Lombard College and worked his way through with characteristic energy. As editor of the college paper he discovered a bent for journalism, which has been the most important of his many occupations since his graduation.

Mr. Sandburg first caught the attention of the public in 1914, when he published a collection of his poems in Poetry: A Magazine of Verse, and was awarded a prize of two hundred dollars for the now famous lines on Chicago (above, p. 1082). From that time to the present day he has been active both as journalist (he is now on the staff of the Chicago Daily News) and as writer of the characteristic products of which several specimens are given in this volume. From the style of his Chicago Poems (1916) there was no great change in Cornhuskers (1918), nor in his more recent volumes Smoke and Steel (1920) and Slabs of the Sunburnt West (1923); yet Mr. Sandburg's experience of life has been so broad and varied that there is no indication of his being written out. His Abraham Lincoln: The Prairie Years (1926) showed that he has the instincts of a scholar and historian as well as those of a poet.

The difference of opinion concerning the value of Mr. Sandburg's work is so great that the student will do well to consider for himself the three chief artistic questions involved: whether the varied rhythms are sufficiently effective to lift his work above the level of prose; whether the numerous slang expressions will be understood by another generation, or will relegate his work to the dime museum of verbal curiosities; and whether his type of realism is consistent with true art.

The first of these questions is inevitably bound up with the whole matter of free verse, and with the experimental attempts to give still wider application to the theories made popular by Whitman and his numerous followers; adequate discussion within the present limits of space is of course out of the question. It is fairly obvious, however, that the best of Mr. Sandburg's productions, when put to the test of being read aloud, possess a rhythmic structure and value that one does not associate with prose. The matter of slang, though debatable, is easier to decide: the critic who says that Mr. Sandburg's speech is "simple and powerful" and that he uses slang "freely and beautifully" is probably not so near the truth as is Clement Wood, who says (Poets of America, 1925, p. 260), "it limits the poet's audience to-day, and does more than decimate his admirers of tomorrow." So far as realism is concerned, there should be but one opinion; the same principles that may be deduced from a study of Chaucer or of Massfield are bound to control our enjoyment of Mr. Sandburg—both for better and for worse. Occasionally his work is of a sort that by no stretch of the imagination can be called poetical; it verges on brutality; but when his stark realism serves to set off by contrast something fine and beautiful, or when it gives fresh vitality to a significant idea, then the true poet emerges.

At his best, then, Mr. Sandburg is not only powerful but genuinely poetical, sketching with few and firm strokes some phase of modern life that has caught his attention, and conveying to the reader his own sense of the significance of what he has seen. Truth one finds often in Sandburg's best work, and in rich measure; when to that truth is added the occasional touch of beauty, or when that truth is so interpreted as to make it possible for the reader to add, vicariously, to his own store of human experiences, and to widen the range of his sympathies, then the result is a sort of work which—call it what you will—is worth reading, and reading again.

For comment on Mr. Sandburg's work, see the books listed in the general bibliography on "The New Poetry," p. 1232. His chief publications have been noted in the preceding paragraphs. See in particular, for a statement concerning his conception of the nature of poetry, his own Poetry Considered, in the Atlantic Monthly for March, 1923. Of special value is the volume of his Selected Poems, N. Y., 1926, with a preface and editorial matter by Rebecca West.

ALAN SEEGER (1888-1916)

Alan Seeger was one of the promising poets whom the Great War cut off just as he had given evidence of his power. In 1913 he found himself in France, where he had gone to study and write after graduating from Harvard. When the war broke out he enlisted in the French Foreign Legion, and served for almost two years before he was mortally wounded on July 4, 1916, shortly after his Rendezvous with Death had been published.

He had already written enough to make some people rank him with Rupert Brooke. The comparison seems unwarranted, for Brooke had far greater power than Seeger had manifested at the time of his death. Nevertheless his best known poem, here reprinted, won a deserved popularity that was only in part occasioned by the dramatic circumstances of the author's own death.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Seeger's work is available in Poems by Alan Seeger, N. Y., 1916. William Archer's introduction to the volume gives a sympathetic picturing of the author's brief life.

SARA TEASDALE (1884—)

(Mrs. Ernst Filsinger)

Sara Teasdale was born in St. Louis in 1884 and was educated in various private schools in that city; she subsequently travelled extensively in Europe and the Near East. Prior to her marriage to Ernst Filsinger in 1914, she published a little collection of Sonnets to Duse (1907) and a more pretentious volume entitled Helen of Troy and Other Poems (1911). In the second of these she showed a masterful handling of blank verse, as well as the deft lyric technique which is an invariable characteristic of her later work. Rivers to the Sea (1915), from which comes the first selection here printed (p. 1085), established her position among the modern lyric poets. Two years later appeared Love Songs, largely a reprinting of her most exquisite chansons d'amour. Flame and Shadow (1920), from which three poems are here included, showed a greater maturity and a deeper confidence—as illustrated by such a poem as August Moonrise—in the triumph of love and beauty over death.

Few of the poets who have come into prominence during the past few years have avoided the bizarre and the sensational so studiously as Miss Teasdale. Her lyrics seldom thrill the reader into ecstasy, but as Theodore Maynard has remarked, they "are saved from being classed with the ordinary drawing-room song by their delicacy, their melodiousness and their epigrammatic flavour."

EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY

(1892—) 19

(Mrs. Eugen Boissevan)

Miss Millay was born in Rockland, Maine, in 1892 and graduated from Vassar College in 1917. As early as 1912 one of her most famous single poems, Renascence, appeared in a collection called The Lyric Year, by various writers; five years later the same poem was made the title-piece of her first volume. In 1920 she published the sophisticatedly naïve collection entitled A Few Figs from Thistles. The flippancies of this volume—enjoyed and disliked by various critics—gave way in 1921 to the more substantial values of Second April. At the same time Miss Millay showed a considerable dramatic skill, writing three plays, of which one in particular, Aria da Capo, has often been produced with success. Another play of note, The King's Henchman (also in opera form), was published in 1927. With The Harp-Weaver and Other Poems (1924) Miss Millay gave further evidence of maintaining the high standard she had set for herself twelve years before.

The more enthusiastic of her critics find in her reflective poems, such as Renascence and God's World (p. 1086) a philosophic grasp suggestive of Whitman; less enthusiastic admirers find at the lowest estimate the achievement of having written of love without being maudlin, and of having brought to inland readers the salt tang of the coastline at low tide. In this connection nothing could better illustrate the change in poetic fashions than a comparison of that most Victorian of Victorians, Celia Thaxter (p. 1015), with that most modern of moderns, Miss Millay. It is a matter of regret that insuperable copyright difficulties prevent the inclusion of more of her poetry in this volume.

ROBERT FROST (1875—)

Robert Frost, born in California, was brought at the age of ten to New England, where his ancestors had lived for eight generations. As student, editor, and teacher, but chiefly as farmer and would-be poet, he kept close to the soil of New England until 1912. Then, having failed to achieve poetical success at home, he moved to England for three years and found (as "Joaquin" Miller had done in 1870) the exact stimulus and sympathetic appreciation necessary to immediate recognition. His first collection of poems, A Boy's Will (1913) was followed a year later by North of Boston, a "book of people," which is now too well known to require comment. Mr. Frost's success as poet brought him flattering appointments at Amherst and the University of Michigan; with the latter institution he seems to have established a permanent connection which leaves him at liberty to carry on his writing. His third volume, Mountain Interval (1916), and his latest New Hampshire (1923), show an increase in power and maturity which makes him to-day perhaps America's foremost poet.

The outstanding characteristic of Mr. Frost's work is quiet power. Like the modern actor or orator who carefully shuns the theatrical ranting of an earlier day, Mr. Frost avoids all that is flashy or obviously calculated to produce a brilliant climax. But such a quality, largely negative, could not in itself account for the success of his poems. Rather, this element of dignity and repose combines with his strong feeling for the meaning of various phases of rural life, to produce something vital. With certain artistic aims apparently similar to those of Wordsworth, he has a keen faculty of selecting what is interesting and significant, and is thus able to avoid the peaceful dullness which is so common in poetry of rural life. The Death of the Hired Man is an admirable illustration: there are no rhetorical fireworks of any sort, but in less than two hundred lines of easy reading we get four distinct personalities, an amazing study of human sympathy, and a tragedy.

The ease with which one reads Mr. Frost's poems is another specific characteristic. It is due to various causes, among them: (1) the preservation of the normal order of words; (2) the use of a limited but expressive vocabulary; (3) the use of verb-forms contracted as in familiar (but grammatical) conversation; (4) a flexible rhythm well suited to the varying ideas. In the last of these qualities—a highly poetic one—Mr. Frost baffles the critic by the apparent ease of his technique. His unrimed iambic pentameter is so unlike the blank verse of Shakespeare or Milton or Tennyson that one hesitates to call it blank verse at all. Yet a careful study of this style (represented in the first four of the selections in this book) leaves no doubt that it is admirably suited to a variety of topics—indeed, to celebrate the amusing aspects of farm life in the organ tones of Paradise Lost would be a sin against art. Mr. Frost is so fond of his easy, familiar style that he uses it not merely when his characters speak but when he speaks himself in his own character as author:

I like to think some boy's been swinging them.

This tendency is a departure from the standard practice of most poets, and the future will doubtless show whether it is too colloquial or not.

The time is not ripe to attempt any comprehensive criticism of Mr. Frost's understanding of men and women or of his general philosophy of life. But even now, while he is still writing, one may give unstinted praise to his success in conveying the atmosphere of life in northern New England—a success epitomized in the oft-quoted statement that while other poets have written about New England, Mr. Frost is New England.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Mr. Frost's four volumes have been listed in the preceding account of his work. For biographical and critical comment, one should consult the works listed in the general bibliography for "The New Poetry," p. 1232, and an article by G. R. Elliott in the Nation, December 6, 1909.
